[13] Leo XIII himself had studied philosophy and theology with G. Perrone and F. Patrizi at the Roman College. Perrone (1794–1876) was friends with H. Newman and influenced by Möhler in his doctrine of tradition. He was less inclined toward theological speculation than toward the positive, apologetic method and belongs among the founders of Neo-Scholasticism with his Praelectiones theologicae (1835–42) (W. Kasper, Die Lehre von der Tradition in der Römischen Schule [Freiburg i. Br. 1962], 29–181).

[14] G. Söhngen, *LThK*² VII, 923.

Schiffini, S.J., taught mainly philosophy at the Gregoriana; after 1885 L. Billot, S.J., taught theology; in 1886 C. Mazzella, S.J., from 1878 dogmatist at the Gregoriana, was appointed cardinal. In 1884, at papal request, the University of Louvain established a teaching chair for Thomistic philosophy, which was first occupied by D. Mercier, and developed one of the most important centers of creative Neo-Scholasticism. However, D. Palmieri, S.J., after 1867 professor for dogmatics at the Gregoriana and critic of hylomorphism, was dismissed in 1879 because he was unable to comply with the philosophical program of the Pope and preferred to keep silent rather than speak out against his convictions.[15] In Piacenza in 1880, the periodical Divus Thomas began a series of new Thomistic publications: the Philosophisches Jahrbuch der Görres-Gesellschaft (1888), Pastor Bonus (Trier 1888), Revue Thomiste (Paris 1893), Revue néo-scolastique de philosophie (Louvain 1894), Rivista di filosofia neo-scolastica (Milan 1909). There were plenty of channels for a Thomas renascence.

---

[15] Hocedez III, 48, 371f. But Leo XIII was considerate enough to agree to transfer Palmieri as exegete to Maastricht, where Palmieri represented a conservative standpoint until 1894. Other professors at the Gregoriana had to go, too (R. Aubert, Aspects, 159ff.).

CHAPTER 21

Neo-Thomism, Neo-Scholasticism, and the "New Philosophers"

The necessary conceptual differentiation between "Neo-Scholasticism" and "Neo-Thomism"[1] indicates that scholastic-systematic philosophy and theology in the Catholic Church of the nineteenth century and also during Leo XIII's pontificate do not represent a monolith, as most of the publications[2] seem to suggest. However, they often simply claim to be written ad mentem S. Thomae Aquinatis. But the traditions of Duns Scotus (especially with the Franciscans) and of Suárez (especially with the Jesuits) continue to thrive. There is also a difference between the often sterile letter-bound Neo-Thomism ("Paleothomism" [Steenbergen]) and the attempts of those, in the minority though they were, to proceed not formally from Thomas and thereby deduce the actualizing conclusions but rather to reverse the process and return to the great tradition of a real live questioning of contemporary problems. The picture becomes much more variegated if one considers that the other great (and older) tradition of Catholic thought, leading from Augustine via Bonaventura to Pascal, had not died out, even though those men who lived in it, as for example Maurice Blondel, could cause conflicts if they were not willing to subordinate the great father of the Church Augustine to the now dominant doctrine by quoting him occasionally. The Jesuit Franz Ehrle, who began his scholarly career with commentaries on Aeterni Patris,[3] proved, as one of the great scholars of medieval Scholasticism, what the "Augustinianism" of the thirteenth century, existing alongside and in harmony with Aristotelianism, had meant. However, it took time to recover the entire wealth of tradition and thus the freedom to philosophize in the Catholic Church.

---

[1] "Neo-Scholasticism" refers to the Scholasticism of the nineteenth century, including the Scholastic traditions which continue to survive in spite of Thomas Aquinas's official preferential position since 1879, traditions which particularly follow Duns Scotus and Suárez; "Neo-Thomism" begins in the middle of the nineteenth century (after a few predecessors) and is the renascence of Aquinas's philosophy and theology, proceeding without direct relation to academic tradition. However, most Neo-Thomist philosophers and historians are not pure Thomists.

[2] The Thomist bibliography (1920) contains 2,219 entries for the period from 1800 to 1920; F. van Steenberghen, op. cit., 352.

In Rome itself, the encyclical was unable to give rise to a Neo-Thomism which could be compared to the significance of Matteo Liberatore. This is partially due to the difficulties of changing the current school traditions, partially to the tendency of formally arguing with Aquinas' authority, and to not taking modern philosophy and science seriously. The influential Jesuit Camillo Mazzella[4] advocated in his extensive treatise a Suarezian Scholasticism (Grabmann). Its most important representative was the Jesuit Louis Billot of Lorraine, who regularly taught theology at the Gregoriana from 1885 until 1911. He was a "Thomist totally adhering to Thomas and the older Thomists" (S. Tromp) defending the immutabilitas of tradition against all historical thought, which he equated with heretical evolutionism (rejection of a history of dogma).[5] G. Cornoldi, who participated in the founding of the Accademia Romana di San Tommaso, fought against the disciples of Rosmini, charging them with a "synthesis of ontologism and pantheism," a dispute which, in 1887, in conjunction with the political problem of the "Roman question," brought about the ecclesiastical censure of forty of Rosmini's propositions.[6] Two years before the encyclical on Thomas, the Collegio di S. Bonaventura was established in Quaracchi (Florence). There, the works of the Franciscan Doctor of the Church (since 1588) were published and an international research center was developed.[7] This did more to overcome a stagnation of philosophical-theological tradition than narrow-minded anti-Thomist polemics.

---

[3] Cf. chap. 20.

[4] Cf. below, p. 315.

[5] H. Le Floche, Le cardinal Billot (Paris 1947).

[6] Cf. chap. 15.—P. Dezza, I neotomisti italiani del secolo XIX, 2 vols. (Milan 1942–44).

In Germany and Austria, Neo-Thomism also had numerous, often rather belligerent representatives who continued the tradition of Jakob Clemens and Constantin von Schäzler (died 1880) and contributed a great deal to the failure of the intention underlying Leo XIII's encyclical.[8] Matthias Joseph Scheeben (1835–88), by far superior to the theologians of his generation, was an unusually open-minded spirit and a deeply devout dogmatist from the Rhineland. He left a gap in this period in Germany which will never be closed. It is questionable whether Scheeben, who incorporated post-Tridentine theology and the Tübingen school as well as Neo-Thomism into his creative, original, and modern work, should be included in "Neo-Scholasticism." But excluding him from this category would mean isolating him in a manner which is not in accord with the movement as a whole. It would mean presenting "the theology of the past as a multiplicity of efforts exerted by devout thinkers" (J. Höfer). Many of Scheeben's main works had already been published long before Aeterni Patris,[9] penetrating an area of action that had been inspired by the encyclical among groups who did not interpret the letter as a request for 'repristination.' When Scheeben was completely himself, "he thought, like no other Neo-Scholastic, purely from faith and 'unapologetically,' "[10] from the "childlike faith" (Scheeben) which was to him the perfection of religious belief. This, of course, did not comply with the kind of conclusion theology which dominated Neo-Scholasticism. The "double form" of theology—devotion and intellectual agreement—remained a problem for Scheeben, which he faced through the influence of Kleutgen and Schäzler.

---

[7] The first assistant prefect was Fidelis a Fanna (1838–81), who searched five hundred libraries for manuscripts. His successor was the Westphalian I. Jeiler (1832–1904), after 1879 in Quaracchi; J. Reinhold, AFrH 47 (1954), 1–44.—Since 1885 publication of Analecta Franciscana, since 1903 the Bibliotheca Franciscana Scholastica mediiaevi.

[8] Especially polemical was E. Commer (1847–1928, born in Berlin), who founded in 1886 the Jahrbuch für Philosophie und spekulative Theologie (after 1914 Divus Thomas), author of Immerwährende Philosophie (1899), 1900–11 professor of dogmatics in Vienna; regarding his fight against H. Schell, cf. chap. 29.—As a result of the conflict with the rector of the Catholic University in Washington, J. Keane, J. Pohle returned to Germany in 1894 (cf. chap. 10), thereafter professor of dogmatics in Münster; in 1888, he and K. Gutberlet (1837–1928) founded the Philosophische Jahrbuch of the Görres-Society; concerning Gutberlet, see E. Hartman, PhJ 41 (1928), 261–66; P. Simon, Hochland 25 (1927), 437ff.—As a politician, as well as in his few philosophical works, G. von Hertling (cf. chap. 15) pursued an objective presentation of Neo-Scholastic principles; C. Baeumker, DLZ 39 (1918), 3–7, 35–40.—The apologist from Würzburg, F. Hettinger (1819–90), derived his criticism of the period from his profound knowledge, while A. M. Weiß, O.P., from Upper Bavaria, after 1890 professor in Fribourg, fought a very unsophisticated battle against Liberalism.—Leading away from a very narrow-minded opposition, the moral theologian from Münster, J. Mausbach (1861–1931), was able to combine Thomism with the Augustinian tradition; G. Schreiber, J. Mausbach (Münster 1931).—Regarding the Jesuit moral theologians, cf. chaps. 12 and 13.—Dogmatist J. B. Heinrich (1816–91) was known as the "head of the second Mainz circle" (L. Lenhart). He was a cofounder of the Görres-Society, like P. L. Haffner (1829–99; 1886: bishop of Mainz), whom he influenced greatly and who became the first chairman of the philosophical section; H. Lenhart, Die philosophische-theologische Fakultät des Mainzer Priesterseminars (Mainz 1946); Grabmann G., 230–36.—Since the faculty of theology at the University of Fribourg was entrusted to the Dominicans, Neo-Thomism ruled supreme. T. Coconnier (1846–1908; 1875: student of Zigliara in Rome, 1890: dogmatist at the Institut catholique in Toulouse), J.-J. Berthier (1847–1924, after 1905 mostly in Rome) and P. Mandonnet (1858–1936) founded the Revue Thomiste (1893).

With the exception of Scheeben, all German Neo-Scholastics of that period are outranked in significance by the scholars of medieval Scholasticism (Franz Ehrle, Heinrich Denifle, Clemens Baeumker, and Martin Grabmann), whose early activities still belong in this period. The Dominican Denifle from Tyrol (1844–1905) and the Jesuit Ehrle from the Allgäu (1845–1934) collaborated (after 1880 in Rome) in the publication of the Archiv für Literatur und Kirchengeschichte des Mittelalters: from 1885 until 1900 seven volumes of "eternal value" (Grabmann). Denifle deserves special credit regarding mysticism (Eckhart, Tauler, Suso), and Ehrle demonstrated with his scholarship and editions the variety of Scholastic thought.[11] The historian of philosophy Baeumker (1853–1924; following his professorship in Breslau, Bonn, and Strasbourg, he succeeded Georg von Hertling in Munich in 1912) showed the connection between Scholasticism and Moslem philosophy and called attention to the continued existence of Platonism, which he demonstrated in his main work on Witelo (1908) and his metaphysics of light in the thirteenth century. Now the stage was set for an extensive study of the Scholastic method, which was presented by Grabmann (1875–1945).[12] Included in this group of scholars is the Belgian

---

[9] Natur und Gnade I (Mainz 1861); Mysterien des Christentums (Freiburg i. Br. 1865); Handbuch der katholischen Dogmatik I and II (Freiburg i. Br. 1874–75), III–VI (1880–87), incomplete; new edition by J. Höfer and others, 7 vols. (Freiburg 1941–57).

[10] K. Eschweiler, Die zwei Wege der neueren Theologie. G. Hermes—M. J. Scheeben (Augsburg 1926), 183; biblio. in regard to Scheeben until 1957 in the new edition (cf. n. 9). In that regard, see F. S. Pancheri, Il pensiero teologico di M. Scheeben e S. Tommaso (Padua 1956).

[11] M. Grabmann, H. S. Denifle (Mainz 1905); A. Walz, Studi storiografici (Rome 1949), 28–33; id. Analecta Denifleana (Rome 1955); A. Redigonda, H. S. Denifle (Florence 1953). Regarding F. Ehrle, 1895–1941 prefect of the Vatican Library, cf. chap. 20.

[12] C. Baeumker founded the Beiträge zur Geschichte der Philosophie des Mittelalters (1891). The title of one of his main works, Die europäische Philosophie des Mittelalters (Leipzig 1909), was changed for its second edition in 1913 to Die christliche Philosophie des Mittelalters. In regard to his audience with Pius X on 2 March 1908 in connection

Maurice De Wulf (1867–1947), a pupil of Désiré Mercier, who founded the collection Les Philosophes belges (Louvain 1901ff).[13] Even though the Neo-Scholastic systematists initially ignored these efforts, they kept the Thomistic renascence from stagnating into a classicism.

In France, most of the Neo-Thomists, strictly following the Gregoriana, did not go beyond their sterile disputations. An exception was the Institut catholique in Paris where Maurice d'Hulst seized upon Duilhé's idea of trying to avoid spiritual provincialism and to prove the productiveness of the Neo-Thomist method by holding international congresses for Catholic scholars.[14] In this respect, the spirit of the center took effect where this particular period succeeded in an actual encounter with Thomas Aquinas: the spirit of the University of Louvain and Mercier (1851–1926). This scholar from Brabant, after studying philosophy and theology, became interested in psychiatry, which had an impact on the curriculum which Mercier taught after 1882 in his position as professor of Thomist philosophy, which had been created by the Belgian episcopate at Leo XIII's request. The thirty-one-year-old professor fascinated his students, including nontheologians, with the decisiveness with which he responded to the ultimate questions posed by the natural sciences, and with his efforts to "philosophize for one's contemporaries." Of course, his extensive use of psychology raises the question whether this approach is appropriate for Thomist ontology. However, Mercier tried most of all to come to terms with Positivism, so popular those days, and he was just as interested in it as he was in Kant's philosophy. He was intent, however, on preserving theology's independence relative to philosophy. The Institut supérieur de philosophie, established in 1889, was the result of a proposal by Mercier to Leo XIII in 1887. Mercier was also its first president. The Revue néo-scolastique, founded in 1894, achieved international repute. The success created enemies, at first in Belgium, later in Rome, where the new prefect of the Congregation of Studies, Cardinal Mazella, S.J., considered theologians' with the founding of an international society for scholars (cf. chap. 15) L. Pastor (Tagebücher, 490) writes: the Pope said that, "in agreement with Cardinal Rampolla and Merry del Val, it is out of the question that M. Spahn and C. Baeumker be accepted" (M. Grabmann, "C. Baeumker und die Erforschung der Geschichte der mittelalterlichen Philosophie," BGPhMA 25 [1927], 1–38).—M. Grabmann conducted his manuscript studies in Rome after 1900, supported by Ehrle and Denifle (L. Ott, M. Grabmann zum Gedächtnis [Munich 1949]).

---

[13] The Histoire de la philosophie médiévale (Louvain ^{1}1940) deals with the question of what Scholastics have in common; the revision of the 6th edition (1934ff.) shows with which problems a universal presentation has to deal; F. van Steenberghen, RPhL 46 (1948), 421–47.

[14] Cf. chap. 15.

intensive occupation with natural sciences a waste of time. Of equal importance was the objection that the lectures in French were jeopardizing not only Scholastic terminology, but also the theological correctness of the doctrine. Since Mazzella succeeded in persuading the Pope in favor of his reservations, Latin was decreed as the language of instruction for some time after 1895. Mazella's succession by Cardinal (after 1895) Satolli, who respected Mercier, brought about the conclusion of the affair in 1898.[15]

The picture of a united front does not entirely match the reality of Neo-Scholasticism. This is evidenced by the effort in regard to Bonaventure, the rather aggressively defended positions of Suarezianism[16] which the Jesuits (often somewhat artificially) tried to coordinate with Thomism, and Scotism to which the Franciscans were devoted.[17] Such differences were still confined to Neo-Scholasticism. However, within the tradition of occidental thinking, attempts were made by individuals (consequently isolated people) to break, so to speak, the anthropocentric concept of the world from the inside and to prove the terminologically absolute opposite of immanence and transcendence to be an apparent opposite by using the argument of concrete existence. This resulted in a dispute with strangely inverted fronts: These philosophical theorems are based on the Christian mystery of Incarnation and on the belief in the support of the Holy Spirit, even though they were clearly philosophical or, at least, intended to be. They were rejected by the Neo-Scholastics as "modernistic" and categorized under different, hostile "isms." Neo-Scholastic philosophy and theology, on the other hand, often contained a goodly measure of rationalism, which could only seemingly be brought in tune with the Christian belief in revealed religion. These disputations often entailed quite subjective assessments of Neo-Scholastic efforts. The German theologian and religious philosopher Herman Schell taught that "in the acknowledgement of the Holy Spirit as the essential manifestation of Deity the principle of immanence and the idea of transcendence are intimately linked and the intrinsic worldliness of action is combined in superior harmony with the nontemporal power of creation." Rejecting any form of pantheism, Schell developed an image of God as "being completely in Himself and of Himself." He did not believe that the dynamics of this image could be grasped by the terminology of academic tradition. Thus he conceived the term God as causa sui, which he later (after being put on the Index) replaced with "self-reality," without terminologically relinquishing the actuality of God and His being-active-in Himself. This concept of God was the foundation of Schell's personalism: In God's living personality rests all human personality.[18] This Augustinian tradition was transmitted by German Idealism, while the philosophy of Maurice Blondel (1861–1949) was supported by Blaise Pascal, who survived in the background of French philosophical life, and by Nicolas de Malebranche, who influenced Leibniz. One of Leibniz's key problems was the topic of Blondel's first and fundamental work: the Vinculum substantiale. Blondel's basic philosophical theme dealt with the attempt "to overcome the static and concrete concept of substance and to define substance both as a unifying force and as a metaphysical entity, thus evading Idealism as well as the all too material Realism. Blondel's philosophy tried to solve the problem of transcendence by integrating the triple reality of life, of thought, and of being in existence.[19] In contrast to objectivism, Blondel believes knowledge and existential revelation to be tied to subjectivity. He does not accept the opposition of immanence and transcendence, but rather finds them unified in "action" (existential realization), from which immanence automatically reaches out toward transcendence. This is the basis for the famous Lettre sur les exigences de la pensée contemporaine en matière d'apologétique et sur la méthode de la philosophie dans l'étude du problème religieux (1896): The "supernatural" in the Christian message is not an extrinsécism, something which approaches human reality like a stranger from the outside, rather it corresponds to reality, and is thus logically necessary, even if this logic does not say anything about the freedom of divine revelation and the freedom of human acceptance of it.[20]

---

[15] Some of D. Mercier's most important works are: Psychologie (Paris 1892); Logique (Paris 1894); Métaphysique générale ou Ontologie (Paris 1894).—M. De Wulf et al., RNPh 28 (1926), 5–22, 99–249; J. Pirlot, L'enseignement de la métaphysique. Critique et Suggestions (Louvain 1950), 33–59; L. de Raeymaeker, Le card. Mercier et l'Institut supérieur de philosophie de Louvain (Louvain 1952); A. Simon, D. Mercier (Brussels 1960).

[16] For example, by the Spaniard J. J. Urráburu, S.J. (1844–1904), (Eguía Ruiz, EE 4 [1945], 45–59) and by the French P. Descoqs, S.J. (1877–1946).

[17] For example Déodat de Basly (1863–1937), especially in regard to Christology; R. Haubst, ThRv (1956), 145–62.

---

[18] Regarding H. Schell, cf. chap 29. Quotations from: Türmer Jahrbuch (1906), 194; Dogmatik IV (1893), x; O. Schröder (op. cit., biblio. chap. 29), 370–91.

[19] R. Scherer, Einführung zu: M. Blondel, Das Denken (Freiburg i. Br. 1953), viii-xxxii; U. Hommes, Transzendenz und Personalität. Zum Begriff der Action bei M. Blondel (Frankfurt 1972).

[20] R. Scherer, *LThK*² II, 533.—Preceding the Lettre, L'Action. Essai d'une critique de la vie et d'une science de la pratique was published in 1893 (Paris); in contrast to the volumes of 1936–37, it was called "first action." The period covered here includes the following works by Blondel: Histoire de dogme. Les lacunes philosophiques de l'exégèse moderne (La Chapelle-Montligeon 1904), a critical study of historicism.—Basic literature regarding the Lettre: R. Aubert, Le problème de l'acte de foi, données traditionelles et résultats des controverses récentes (Louvain 1945).—A. Hayen, Bibliographie blondélienne (Messina

Blondel's teacher was L. Ollé-Laprune (1839–1898), professor in Aix-en-Provence from 1896 to his death, who from 1875 on had taught philosophy at the École normale supérieure in Paris as a disciple of Malebranche: The conflict between faith and knowledge can only be overcome in personal experience, which is inaccessible to dialectic analysis.[21] This was also the basis for the philosophy of Lucien Laberthonnière (1860–1932), who became an Oratorian in 1886. In the Annales de Philosophie chrétienne, which he edited between 1905 and 1913, he campaigned passionately for Blondel's work and against Neo-Scholasticism.[22] When (in 1913) the Holy Office prohibited him from publishing, his loyalty to the Church remained unshaken.

Both the initiative to revive the Thomism that was inspired by Leo XIII and that was productive in significant ways, as well as the efforts of these "new philosophers" have to be seen in context, in spite of their opposition to Neo-Scholasticism, if one intends to obtain a historically adequate picture of the sincerity of the philosophers and theologians of those decades and of their efforts regarding the intellectual conditions under which the Christian faith can be experienced and justified in the modern world.

1953); J.-P. Golinas, La restauration du Thomisme sous Léon XIII et les philosophes nouvelles. Études de la pensée de M. Blondel et du Père Laberthonnière (Washington 1959); O. Schröder (op. cit., biblio., chap. 29), 255–71.

[21] R. Crippa, Il pensiero di L. Ollé-Laprune (Brescia 1947).

[22] M.-M. d'Hendecourt, Essai sur la philosophie du Pere Laberthonnière (Paris 1947); J.-P. Golinas, op. cit.

CHAPTER 22

The Theory of Church History

The "almost turbulent expansion and specialization of Church history" (H. Jedin) corresponds to the general interest in history, developing in the last third of the nineteenth century and continuing into the twentieth. Prerequisite for research was the publication of new sources of Church history in which secular institutes participated. Following the extensive editions of A. Theiner of Silesia[1] (1855–70 prefect of the Vatican Archives), and after Leo XIII opened the Archives to scholars in general in 1881, a new era began. The prefect at the time, Cardinal (after 1879) J. Hergenröther, had considerable difficulties solving the technical problems of using the Archives.[2] The rules of 1878 and 1888 regarding the use of the Vatican Library were helpful, as was its significant expansion after 1890 through the Borghese and the Barberini Libraries. In 1895 the medievalist Franz Ehrle (1922 cardinal) was appointed prefect. The opening of the Vatican Archives, which was followed by the founding of a series of national historical institutes in Rome—1881: the Austrian Institute (first director: the Protestant T. von Sickel; after 1901: L. von Pastor), 1888: the Prussian Institute (director after 1903: P. F. Kehr), later the École française de Rome (director after 1895: L. Duchesne)—was one of the most important moments for the rich deployment of editions and books on Church history. They have been described extensively in the first volume of this series[3] and are of interest here only in so far as we are dealing with the theoretical notion of Church history during Leo XIII's pontificate.

---

[1] H. Jedin, "A. Theiner. Zum 100. Jahrestag seines Todes (4 August 1974)," ArSKG 31 (1973).

As is the case in all aspects of life, history has to inquire about the relationship which Catholicism had established in regard to this academic discipline since its introduction to the modern world during Leo XIII's pontificate. The superficial debate concerning historical "objectivity," which many Catholic authors at that time felt compelled to discuss in their forewords, had no theoretical basis after G. Droysen's

---

[2] An advocate of this decision was, among others, L. Pastor, whom Hergenröther asked to write a memorial (Tagebücher, 128–32). A glance into the situation at that time is provided by Pastor's statement explaining that his abstracts of the archives, which he was able to prepare by special permission, were shortened by the keeper of the archives (K. A. Fink, "Das Vatikanische Archiv," Bibliothek des Deutschen Historischen Instituts in Rom [Rome ^{2}1951], 155–67).

[3] Regarding the strong development of the history of the orders, see M. Heimbucher, Orden und Kongregationen der katholischen Kirche (Paderborn 1896–97, ^{3}1933–34); regarding the Benedictines in France, see J.-J. Bourasse (Tours 1900); in England: E. L. Taunton (London 1898); in Maredsous, U. Berlière and others deserve credit for the publication of the Monasticon belge (after 1890); the Revue bénédictine (Maredsous, after 1884, at first a general spiritual publication) was joined in 1903 by the Bulletin d'histoire monastique; in Munich, the Studien und Mitteilungen aus dem Benediktiner- und Zisterzienserorden was published after 1880.—Concerning the Dominicans, see B. M. Reichert (ed.), M.O.P. (Rome after 1896); A. Mortier, Histoire des maîtres généreaux de l'ordre des frères prêcheurs (Paris 1903).—Regarding the Franciscans, see AFrH (Florence after 1908); H. Holzapfel's handbook (Freiburg i. Br. 1909) is still indispensable.—Concerning the Jesuits, see MHSI (Rome, after 1894), also: P. de Leturia, "Geschichte und Inhalt der Monumenta . . . ," HJ 72 (1953), 585–604; Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus (Brussels, Paris after 1890); A. Astraín, Historia de la Compañia de Jésus en la Asistencia de España (Madrid 1902; up to 1773); P. Tacchi-Venturi (inspired by Cardinal Ehrle), Storia della Compagnia di Gesù in Italia (Rome 1910); St. Zaleski, Jezuici w Polsce (Lemberg 1900–06); T. Hughes, The History of the Society of Jesus in North America (London, New York 1907–17); B. Duhr, Geschichte der Jesuiten in den Ländern deutscher Zunge (Freiburg i. Br. 1907), especially apologetic; C. Sommervogel, Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 9 vols. (Brussels 1890–1900).

Historik, which in the meantime was rendered obsolete especially since its advocates from the nineteenth century could be proven guilty of a natural subjectivity of their own. But just how problematic the Catholic study of history could be is shown by a remark made in 1889 by the influencial apologist A. M. Weiß, O.P. He justified the fact that the textbooks of Church history still constituted an extreme minority compared to the systematic theological textbooks by asserting that "this fact is in accord with the nature of this matter. For us, exegesis and the description of the traditional doctrines of faith and morals are the essential elements in theology. History can only be granted the rank of an ancillary science."[4] The historical-theological thought of the Tübingen school was replaced by the essentially ahistorical Neo-Scholasticism. Even though the numerous and productive Catholic historians of those decades did not consider themselves representatives of an ancillary discipline, the question remains whether and in what respect "the world" could be conceived "as history." The dispute over Johannes Janssen's (1829–91) Geschichte des deutschen Volkes seit dem Ausgang des Mittelalters[5] largely missed the point that it was not a question of selecting the documents, which Janssen had done with utmost conscientiousness, but rather of the futility of letting the sources themselves speak. "Historical understanding" was the new hallmark of historical studies. Janssen had a better comprehension of this understanding than the otherwise much more important papal historian Ludwig Pastor (1854–1928), who was "seized by the material aspect to such an extent that he continued to work"[6] on his sixteen-volume Geschichte der Päpste seit dem Ausgang des Mittelalters (first volume 1886) "undisturbed by all intellectual developments around him, and unconcerned about the changes in historical theories." "Negating the historical development, he unfolded a detailed concept of the centralistic Church and papacy and projected it on the past." This endeavor separated him later in Innsbruck from the general development of German Catholicism,[7] but it endeared him to the Rome of Pius X (less that of Leo XIII), where he exerted considerable influence on the ecclesiastical personnel policy in Germany and Austria. Pastor's spirit permeated Cardinal J. Hergenröther's Handbuch der allgemeinen Kirchengeschichte (1876/80, three volumes). It preserved this orientation throughout the revisions.

---

[4] In O. Köhler, Der Katholizismus in Deutschland und der Verlag Herder (Freiburg i. Br. 1951), 130.

[5] J. Janssen, An meine Kritiker (Freiburg i. Br. 1882); id., Zweites Wort an meine Kritiker (Freiburg i. Br. 1883).—L. von Pastor, Joh. Janssen (Freiburg i. Br. ^{2}1894); id., J. Janssens Briefe, 2 vols. (Freiburg i. Br. 1920). Regarding the difference between Pastor and the basically irenic Janssen, see W. Baum, "J. Janssen, Persönlichkeit, Leben und Werke," (diss., Innsbruck 1971).

[6] C. Bauer about L. Pastor, Hochland 26 (1928–29), 578–88 (reprint in: Gesammelte Aufsätze [Freiburg i. Br. 1965], 466–75).—Characteristic is Pastor's strict opposition to the title of the Reformationsgeschichtliche Studien, ed. by J. Greving (after 1906) (H. Jedin, J. Greving [Münster 1954]).

[7] Interesting in this respect is the conflict developing since 1891 between Pastor and the medievalist from Munich, H. von Grauert (1850–1924), in the editorial office of the

Leo XIII did not grow tired of including in his letters and encyclicals rather lengthy passages about Church history and especially the history of his predecessors and their service to the Western World. In the brief Saepenumero of 18 August 1883, addressed to Cardinals A. de Luca, J. B. Pitra and J. Hergenröther, he explained what he expected from the historians: a defense against accounts of the papacy written in mendaci colore. He trusted that the incorrupta rerum gestarum monumenta, if studied without prejudice, would successfully defend the Church and the papacy per se ipsa. With special regard to Italy, he called to mind the papacy's achievements during the time of the barbarian migrations, in the struggle against the medieval Emperors, and in the Turkish Wars. He also mentioned the preservation of Roman and Greek literature by the popes and the clergy.[8] The Pope spoke with conviction when he said in 1884 "Non abbiamo paura della pubblicità dei documenti,"[9] scornfully calling the sceptics around him "small minds." But, as a sharp observer noticed, Leo XIII could only say this because he did not understand the "historical method."[10] It is completely erroneous to judge this as a "gap" in Leo XIII's education. In spite of the complex quality of his personality, there was no room for historical thinking. This should not be understood to mean that the Pope was unable to follow Pastor's description of Alexander VI;[11] the history of the institution was not Historisches Jahrbuch. Pastor (Tagebücher, 244, 270, 288); "in Munich, Grauert and Hertling developed a new point of departure toward a liberal Catholicism" (28 December 1895). The conflict caused a critical revision of the "Geschichte des deutschen Volkes" by the Church historian Emil Michael in Historisches Jahrbuch. Consequently, in July 1901, Pastor resigned his position in the editorial office (Tagebücher, 193). However, cf. the letters addressed to F. X. Kraus (H. Schiel, Rheinische Vierteljahresblätter 19 [1954], 191–233). Regarding E. Michael, see W. Baum, ZKTh 93 (Innsbruck 1971), 182–99.

---

[8] Acta Leonis III, 259–73.

[9] Schmidlin, PG II, 400, maintains that this was addressed to the "German circle of historians in Rome." Pastor (Tagebücher) noted the reception of the "historian of Campo Santa," commenting: "Which secular sovereign could say this?" According to Pastor, Anton de Waal (1837–1917; 1873: rector at Campo Santo) was willing to "work in full force for the honor and glory of the Church and the defense of the Holy See."

[10] P. M. Baumgarten, quoted in Schmidlin, PG II, 399; he means "historical sense."

[11] L. Pastor (Tagebücher, 309) noted one of Leo XIII's statements to Boyer d'Agen in 1897: "If you want to write about Alexander VI, you have to read the third volume of Pastor's book first."

thereby touched. In Leo XIII's opinion, the first law for writing history demands that nothing false be said, furthermore, that the truth not be hidden, and, lastly, that any suspicion of either favoritism or hostility be avoided.[12] But in view of indeed widespread hostility toward the Church and particularly the papacy, he presented these principles in an apologetic context which permeated all of Saepenumero.

German Catholicism lost its edge in the area of critical historical method after the conflict with Ignaz von Döllinger,[13] even though certain scholars tried to continue the historical method, such as: Franz Xaver Kraus, one of the founders of Christian archeology, who had already offended the sensibilities of tradition with his early work on blood ampuls found in Roman catacombs and on the Holy Nail in the Cathedral of Trier (both: 1868); K. J. Hefele's successor in Tübingen, Franz Xaver Funk, who, in his textbook of 1886, tried to overcome the static condition of Neo-Scholasticism with his concept of "development";[14] and Albert Ehrhard, who did not join the battle until 1901, and whose unpretentious scholarship was reflected in his research on the hagiography in the Greek Church.[15] The fundamental deliberation of these issues took place in France, because there the problem of the relation between revelation and history was debated by including the "Biblical question" and the history of dogma.

Charles de Smedt, S.J. (1864–76 professor of Church history at the Jesuit College in Louvain, 1882–1911 president of the Bollandists), developed certain principles of philological criticism which were used by his tremendously successful collaborator (after 1891) H. Delehaye, S.J. Per se, these principles were not problematic, even though de Smedt had to defend them, presenting them in his work Principes de la critique historique (Liège 1883) in the perspective of the total problem. However, Louis Duchesne (1843–1922), the famous Church historian and professor at the Institut Catholique in Paris from 1877 to 1885, got into a critical situation with his lectures on the history of dogma, creating debate and painful consequences.[16] In 1895, he became the director of the École française de Rome.[17] In 1882, Abbé Rambouillet attacked Duchesne for his theory of the development of the dogma.[18] Duchesne's response was supported by Maurice d'Hulst. While universal inerrancy was the issue of the "biblical question," historical change was the problem in regard to the history of dogma. Billot rejected even the term itself.[19] The debate, which continued into the crisis of Modernism, included in its arguments the famous essay by John Henry Newman dealing with the personal tradition of faith in history,[20] in contrast to the unfortunate concept of Vincent of Lérins, which is purely biological and develops an "unhistorical theory of tradition" (J. Ratzinger). Joseph Tixeront, after 1881 professor of the seminary of Lyon, carefully furthered the method of his teacher Duchesne. Pierre Batiffol (1861–1929), a friend of Albert Lagrange and patronized by Duchesne, studied early Christian history in Rome and became rector of the Institut Catholique in Toulouse in 1898, a position which he had to relinquish in 1907 after his book about the Eucharist (1905) was put on the Index. In his Études d'histoire et de théologie positive (1902), he had attempted a theoretical solution to the problem. In 1892, the historian of dogma J. Turmel was dismissed from the seminary in Rennes. His own crisis occurred in the period of Modernism.[21] In Germany, the problem was ignored. The convert Constantin von Schäzler, after 1874 consultant to the Holy Office, advocated an ahistorical position in his book Die Bedeutung der Dogmengeschichte vom katholischen Standpunkt aus (1884), as did J. Schwane in his four-volume history of dogma (Münster 1862/90).

---

[12] Acta Leonis III, 268.

[13] Concerning the headstart of the "Munich School" relative to France, see Hocedez III, 56.

[14] This theory derived one of its arguments from the fact that the Vatican Council used Vinzenz von Lérins's image of the seed for the defense against theological evolutionism. An older and more historical attempt was the essay by H. Newman "On the Development of Christian Doctrine" (London 1845), which caused a serious controversy around the eighties (cf. the following). Regarding the problem of the relationship between "development" and "tradition", see O. Köhler, Mysterium salutis, n. 24 with text.

[15] Regarding F. X. Kraus and A. Ehrhard, cf. chap. 29. A. Ehrhard, in connection with the antimodernist oath, was deprived of his title as prelate (1908), which hurt him deeply. He was reinstated by Pius XI in 1922 (K. Baus, Bonner Gelehrte, Katholische Theologie [Bonn 1968], 114–22).

---

[16] With his study about the "Holy Nail" (Trier), L. Duchesne wounded sensitivities regarding tradition even more than F. X. Kraus, because he destroyed the legend of the apostolic origin of the old French dioceses; his research, conducted since 1881, is contained in the three volumes of Les fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule (Paris 1894, 1900, 1915); A. Houtin, La controverse de l'apostolicité des Églises de France au XIX^e siècle (Paris 1903). Between 1886 and 1892, his critical edition of the Liber pontificalis appeared. The Histoire ancienne de l'Église, 3 vols. (Paris 1906–10) was put on the Index in 1912.—The Bulletin critique, which Duchesne published for twenty years, trained a critical and quite ecclesiastically minded generation of historians.

[17] F. X. Kraus (Tagebücher, 461f., in March 1883), about a visit in Paris: Duchesne, "who is indeed even more liberal than I am and who hates the ultramontane bunch at least as much if not more, is also aux peines regarding the Index . . . , he wants to resign from teaching"; in November 1895 (p. 630): "D. is very happy in his position; but he seems to lean more and more toward ultramontanism . . ."; in 1898 (p. 698): ". . . now, he is obviously through with the Curia." L. Pastor (Tagebücher, 309, in 1897): Duchesne "expressed rather liberal and in part even strange opinions" (referring to Leo XIII's politics); in 1902 (p. 385): statement by Duchesne about T. Mommsen, who "overreacts in his hatred of Christianity" and would probably exaggerate even more if he would not have to fear criticism in "progressive Berlin."

[18] In Revue des sciences ecclésiastiques (Lille 1882). It is understandable that Cardinal Franzelin rejected d'Hulst's attempt to present himself as in agreement with Duchesne (Hocedez III, 162).

[19] Hocedez III, 84; regarding the whole controversy: 161–172; regarding Billot: 322, 337.

[20] He was not touched by the controversy.—Cf. n. 14.

Because of the methodological specialization, several disciplines were singled out from general Church history, such as patrology,[22] a large area which, after the Vatican Council, was put aside for the time being along with the history of councils.[23] However, with few exceptions, the history of dogma within Catholic theology was unable to divorce itself from dogmatics.[24] This circumstance is significant for the condition of Church history as a whole. The fundamental problem was, on the one hand, to overcome an ahistorical concept of tradition implying a Church historiographical positivism, and on the other hand, to avoid falling victim to relativistic historicism. The largely methodical critical work of Church historians regarding editions and research during Leo XIII's pontificate set the scene for a theoretical solution of the problem of Church history.

---

[21] Cf. chap. 33, n. 28.

[22] The controversy developing around the turn of the century over this term is related to the problem of the history of dogma. O. Bardenhewer (1851–1935) rejected the theory according to which patrology is the literary history of Church Fathers, including the heretics. He advocated relying closely on the history of dogmatic definitions.

[23] K. J. von Hefele's Conciliengeschichte I–VII (1855–74) was continued by J. Hergenröther in volumes VIII and IX (1887, 1890). In Hefele's estate (died 1893), nothing was found because the noble bishop destroyed almost all his papers before he died (R. Reinhardt, "Der Nachlaß . . . ," ZKG 82 [1971], 261–72; letters addressed to F. X. Kraus: H. Schiel, ThQ 168 [1957], 178–86).

[24] Cf. in this regard the thorough work of J. Ratzinger (1966; biblio., chap. 22).

CHAPTER 23

The Question of the Bible

While the Protestant Bible societies in Germany, England, and the United States developed with increased activity at the beginning of the nineteenth century, the efforts toward a Catholic biblical movement were suppressed and pastoral use of Holy Scripture fell behind the scholastic question-and-answer catechism. Readings of the Epistle and Gospel during Sunday Mass were generally bilingual, which was of less significance if they were considered part of the "pre-Mass" and had no relation to the sermon. "Biblical history," which was introduced to religious instruction in Germany[1] and generated a great deal of familiarity with the Holy Scriptures, had a continuing impact in that country.

Both the position of Holy Scripture in everyday religious and pastoral life and the position of biblical studies in Catholic theology have the same origin: "Since the Reformation, Catholic theology in general and biblical studies in particular considered their foremost task to be confrontation with Protestant theology."[2] This resulted in the dilemma of whether biblical studies, in accord with the Catholic idea of the Church, were "to play a role inferior to" that of theology. It is part of the Catholic self-awareness that the First Vatican Council reiterated the Tridentine decree regarding the use of the Holy Scriptures, requiring that the ecclesiastical teaching authority had the exclusive right to decide on the "true meaning" and interpretation. However, this purely negative definition did not exactly encourage the desire for biblical research, regardless of conflicts. This is demonstrated by a glance at the bibliographies relating to biblical studies at that time, when Catholic works represented a clear minority, not to mention their quality. This situation intensified in proportion to the phase difference between the defensive attitude of the teaching authority (which was understandable in view of the radical biblical criticism of David Friedrich Strauß (died 1874), Bruno Bauer (died 1882), Ernest Renan (died 1892), and others) as contrasted to the development of biblical studies according to principles about which everyone is in agreement nowadays.

Among the Bible translations in German-speaking countries, Joseph Franz von Allioli's, published between 1830 and 1832, was able to maintain its leading position throughout the nineteenth century and beyond. It follows the Vulgate "with reference to the basic text." The French translation by Jean-Baptiste Glaire was also based on the Vulgate. It was later incorporated by Fulcrain Vigouroux (1837–1915) into his Bible polyglotte (Paris 1897–1909). The translation of the original texts by C. Crampon gained in significance (NT 1885, OT 1894–1904). The efforts to approach the original texts by using handwritten manuscripts, i.e., philological-critical Bible editions, causing research to progress swiftly in the last third of the nineteenth century, were made almost exclusively by Protestant scholars.[3] A "decisive impact"[4] on the stimulation of biblical studies in France was accredited to the Sulpician Vigouroux, whose Manuel Biblique appeared between 1879 and 1890. His Bible polyglotte (8 volumes, in Hebrew, Greek, Latin Vulgate, and French) is derived from the Protestant Bielefelder Polyglotte.[5] Vigouroux was totally occupied with the battle against biblical criticism and he fought it in every way possible. In that respect he is like T.-J. Lamy (1827–1907), an exegete from Louvain, who is somewhat more moderate, however. As a Hebraist and Syriologist, he is important for the development of Eastern studies.[6] Of prominent influence in German-speaking areas was the exegete F. P. Kaulen from Bonn (1827–1907). He served as the editor of the second edition of Wetzer und Welte's Kirchenlexikon (Freiburg 1882–1903, 13 vols.). In 1903 he became a member of the Pontifical Biblical Commission. He was especially interested in the history of the Vulgate (1868), emphasizing this text as the "valid expression of biblical revelation" and describing the edition of the Benedictines of Tournai (1885) as "almost without errors." Like Kaulen, almost all exegetical collaborators of the Church lexicon took an extremely conservative viewpoint, which explains why, for instance, the biblical information about the patriarchs' ages was considered "historical data."[7] [1] Regarding M. Sailer, ibid., 436.—Regarding the Biblische Geschichte by Christoph von Schmid and by Ignaz Schuster, see G. Mey: ibid., 435. Regarding the catechetical problem, see B. Dreher and H. Kreutzwald (biblio., chap. 28).

---

[2] A. Wikenhauser, J. Schmid, op. cit., 8.

[3] The New Testament text by Anglicans B. F. Westcott and F. J. A. Hort (Cambridge, London 1881) was, at first, considered the final version; later, H. von Soden (New Testament 1913) offered a wealth of variances, but his theses were rejected. Research

The participation of Catholic exegetes in historical-literary biblical criticism was closely related to the concept of inspiration. Lenormant's attempt to limit the correctness of the Bible to dogmatic and moral statements failed, as did the complex undertaking of Salvatore di Bartolo to differentiate between facts, which are an integral part of dogma and ethics, and incidental, possibly erroneous data.[8] Statements of "pro-regarding the Hebrew text of the Old Testament reached a climax with R. Kittel's work (1905–06).

---

[4] Hocedez III, 80.—The Manuel Biblique appeared in many editions. Because of additions in the fourteenth edition it was put on the Index. Vigouroux became professor of exegesis at the Institut catholique in Paris (1890) and (between 1903 and 1913) was secretary of the Pontifical Biblical Commission. Between 1895 and 1912 the five-volume Dictionnaire Biblique appeared, which was continued in supplements.—E. Levesque, RB 24 (1915), 183–216.

[5] J. Ziegler, "Polyglotten," *LThK*² VIII, 596.

[6] R. Aubert, *LThK*² VI, 770f.

[7] F. P. Kaulen, "Vulgata," Wetzer-Welte XII (1901), 1140; regarding the further history of the Vulgate edition, see K. T. Schäfer, *LThK*² II, 383, and ibid., X, 901f.—F. P. Kaulen ("Patriarchen," Wetzer Welte IX, 1603) maintains that "scholars searched, partly out of incredulous opposition, partly for cowardly consideration, for means to circumvent the literal acceptance of this information. However, this information can be explained by the fact that "the transmission of the unabridged revealed truth is guaranteed by the phenomenon of three generations embracing two millenia."

[8] F. Lenormant, Les origines de l'histoire et les traditions des peuples orientaux (1880), put fane truth" in the Bible were usually considered nonerroneous, even though, in regard to the six-day creation, it was conceded that there was "no need for clinging anxiously to the letter of the text." However, in cases where an undeniable error could be noted in regard to "perfectly certain facts of natural history, geology, and chronology," the explanation had to suffice that the inspired original text had been perverted in the course of tradition.[9] A fundamental problem existed in the Holy Scriptures regarding the relationship between God, the inspiring "author," and the human author. The Neo-Scholastic theologian Johann Baptist Franzelin, S.J.[10], in his De divina traditione et scriptura (1870) defined the term "inspiration" so broadly that in fact, in accord with tradition, only the verbal inspiration was excluded. This theory dominated the textbooks to the end of the nineteenth century. In the middle of the nineties began the kind of criticism that was especially advocated by the Dominicans with reference to Thomas Aquinas. To avoid mixing revelation itself with the process of inspiration, there were attempts to define the latter as a motion inspiratrice, thus expanding the freedom of the writer.[11] But the Jesuit theologians continued to adhere to their theory of inspiration. The work De inspiratione (Rome 1903) by Louis Billot, S.J., one of the most influential theologians (from 1885 to 1911 professor at the Gregoriana),[12] opposed the modernistic exegesis, but also the efforts of scholarly biblical studies by authors who stayed within the ecclesiastical tradition. However, it was precisely the inspiration of the Bible on the whole that motivated critical Catholic exegetes to discover the "true 'literal meaning'" of the Bible.[13] This, however, put them for a long time in the extremely difficult position of vacillating between liberal biblical criticism and general ecclesiastical traditionalism.

The defense of Alfred Loisy's[14] first writings by Maurice d'Hulst on the Index; Salvatore di Bartolo, I criteri teologici (1886), put on the Index in 1891. In this context belongs Newman's attempt (retracted later) to introduce the term obiter dicta (Hocedez III, 126).

---

[9] This general procedure was used in "Inspiration," Wetzer-Welte VI, 806.

[10] Franzelin taught from 1850 until 1876 at the Gregoriana. Later, as cardinal, he was very influential in the Roman congregations. Regarding Franzelin's important contribution about the relationship between the written word, tradition, and the Church, see W. Kasper, Die Lehre von der Tradition in der Römischen Schule (Freiburg 1962), 397–401, 406ff.

[11] The discussion in Hocedez III, 133–40. One of the most important books written in this Dominican vein is: C. Gonzáles y Días Tuñón, La Biblia y la Ciencia, 2 vols. (Madrid 1891, ^{2}1894).

[12] Cf. pp. 312, 323, 458, 470.

[13] J. Schmid, "Bibelkritik," LThK^{2} II, 366.

[14] Cf. pp. 432–38.

(1841–96),[15] rector of the Institut catholique in Paris, where Loisy was a member of the faculty, in his article "La question biblique," which appeared in 1893 in Correspondant, caused a severe controversy, which was also carried on by the daily press. D'Hulst tried, according to his character—he was a monarchist, opponent of the Ralliement and in terms of church policy a liberal—to bridge the differences and to define in regard to the Bible question a "middle-of-the-road school," from where he was trying to mediate between the école étroite (the thesis of the equal inspiration of the Bible) and the école large, which he defined similarly to the attempts by Salvatore di Bartolo. Opposition came from all sides.

In November of the same year, the encyclical Providentissimus Deus appeared,[16] stating that the defense against the rationalistic enemies of Holy Scripture, the "sons and heirs" of the Reformation, was especially urgent, since there are some men among them who want to be known as Christian theologians. It is an unreliable approach to overcome "difficulties" by admitting that the inspiration only referred to questions of faith and morals; such interpretations originate from the erroneous opinion that the primary goal is the discovery of why God said a certain thing. Referring to the Council of Trent and the Vatican Council the encyclical states that the "authentic parts" (locis authenticis) of the Bible do not contain any errors. Positively, the letter demands that biblical studies, ad temporum necessitates congruentius, be furthered carefully but decisively. The improvement of the Vulgate is encouraged by a quotation from Augustine. To determine the meaning, the encyclical suggests consulting, aside from parallel passages, the findings of related sciences (externa quoque appositae eruditionis illustratio); Eastern studies are to be strengthened. The exegeses of the Church Fathers, including the allegorical ones, are to be respected, which does not exclude ultra procedere. It is wrong to prefer the studies of "heterodox scholars," even though they may be useful at times; however, the untainted meaning cannot be found outside of the Church. The Critica sublimior, which judges parts of the Scriptures according to "internal motives" is rejected; only the historiae testimonia is important. One passage of the encyclical was particularly interesting to those who interpreted it for the purpose of finding assistance. Here, a quotation of Thomas's regarding questions of natural science serves to express the idea that the sacred author followed physical phenomena, similar to popular speech (ea secutus est, quae sensibiliter apparent). In regard to historical problems, the encyclical reiterates the thesis that errors are the fault of the copyists; moreover, the original meaning of a passage (germana alicuius loci sententia) could remain ambiguous (anceps). Also, the phrase stating that the Holy Spirit inspired and motivated (excitavit et movit) the biblical writer was interpreted to indicate a theory of inspiration which favors the human collaborator.[17]

---

[15] A. Baudrillart, Vie de M gr. d'Hulst, 2 vols. (Paris 1912–14); Aubert, LThK^{2} V, 524; cf. above, p. 255.

[16] Acta Leonis XIII, 326–64;

The encyclical found practically no opposition among Catholic theologians, but it was still short of solving the problems.[18] The necessary effort made to agree with the encyclical resulted in artistic interpretations. The quotation of Thomas's regarding the physical phenomena in biblical texts inspired Albert Lagrange to write his famous study La méthode historique sourtout à propos de l'Ancien Testament (1903), which outlined the thesis of the apparences historiques. But this raised the decisive question: What was the historical place and time when inspiration struck the biblical authors? This was the point of departure from which the historical positivism in the arguments of the "error debate" had to be overcome. It was unfortunate that the term vérité relative, which can be correctly understood and was used to replace the term historical or scientific "error," met with the twilight of modern relativism. In this regard, the "quotation theory,"[19] according to which a biblical author sums up other texts, was an expedient in view of the unsolved question of inspiration. This and other theories, also used by Lagrange and Hummelauer, were solidified into a system by the French Jesuit Ferdinand Prat (1857–1938).[20] The Jesuits Delattre and Fonck, who rejected this theory, pursued with particular vehemence the Dominican Lagrange, who had studied Eastern cultures in Vienna from 1888 until 1890 and had founded the École Biblique in Jerusalem by request of his order. Lagrange planned to make his series of monographs, the Revue Biblique (1892) and the Études Bibliques (1903), to be scholarly-critical as well as Church-minded.[21] A fateful trial for Lagrange was his occupation with chapters 1–6 of Genesis (published in manuscript form, Paris 1906) and especially the Pentateuch. He followed his principles of the "historical method" and was convinced that it was no longer possible to hold the opinion that Moses had composed the whole Pentateuch, as we know it; that while the antiquity of the Ten Commandments in their substance and their proclamation by Moses be adhered to, the Pentateuch be differentiated according to various editorial levels, of which a large part is younger than Moses.[22] Lagrange's importance is substantiated by the fact that he is one of the few older exegetes who is still quoted in basic scholarship. However, at that time he encountered the bitter animosities of the Jesuits, and even the Dominican order no longer authorized his refutation, written in defense against the attacks by A. Delattre, S.J., Éclaircissement sur la Méthode historique (1905, only published in manuscript form). He suffered the most painful blow when his order requested his withdrawal from the exegesis of the Old Testament.[23] Another important center for similar efforts was the University of Louvain, where the Old Testament scholar A. van Hoonacker had started a course in 1889 called "Histoire critique l'Ancien Testament." His significant book Le sacerdoce lévitique dans la Loi et dans l'histoire (1899) won him European recognition. His work about the Hexateuch, written in Latin, was not published (Bruges 1949) until after the encyclical Divino afflante Spiritu (1943). Among the founders of the Cursus scripturae sanctae, a collection of commentaries published after 1888 and not finished, were R. Cornely, S.J., and J. Knabenbauer, S.J.; but the most outstanding of them was the Jesuit Franz von Hummelauer (1842–1914), who deserves special recognition for his serious definition of literary genres and who proceeded from the conviction that "every (literary) genre possesses its very own unique truth, which is the only thing we are justified in demanding from it."[24] Like most critical scholars of the Old Testament, E. Podechard, after 1892 professor at the seminary in Lyon, published very little; he was the teacher of J. Chaine.

---

[17] Ibid., 339f., 357f., 327f., 342f., 346f., 348, 353, 355, 357, 358.

[18] Schmidlin, PG II, 398: The encyclical encouraged the studies, "however, even most of the scholars with good intentions were unable to find the necessary means to solve the questions or to reconcile the truth of the texts with modern accomplishments."

[19] About the usage of this term, see Hocedez III, 129f. Representatives of the "quotation theory": ibid., 131.

[20] In 1903, appointed consultant to the Biblical Commission (1907 dismissed), devoting his time to Pauline theology (J. Calès, Ferdinand Prat [Paris 1942]).

[21] In 1903, J. Goettsberger and J. Sickenberger founded the Biblische Zeitschrift. Sickenberger introduced the "two sources theory," developed by K. Lachmann, to the Catholic exegesis of the Evangelists Matthew and Luke.

When revising the regulations of the Index, the apostolic constitution Officiorum ac munerum of 25 January 1897 declared that, according to experience, translations of Holy Scripture edited by Catholics in the language of the people usually do more damage than good, as long as distinctions were not made (sine discrimine). Therefore it was decreed that these Bibles contain adnotationes from the Fathers or Catholic scholars.[25] In 1902, the Society of Saint Jerome for the Propagation of the Holy Gospel was founded. Its chairman, Giacomo della Chiesa, was a member of the Curia from 1887 to 1907 and later became Pope Benedict XV. In the first year, one hundred eighty thousand copies of the New Testament were sold in Italy. On 30 October 1902, the apostolic letter Vigilantiae was issued,[26] on the basis of which the Pontifical Biblical Commission was established, so that the studies might be conducted auspicio ductuque Sedis Apostolicae and new problems, not covered by doctrine, be solved according to ecclesiastical norms. The intention to safeguard during disputes the "limits of mutual love" could be sufficiently realized. Members of the Commission were the Cardinals Rampolla, Parocchi, Satolli, Segna, and Vives y Tutó. Two of the secretaries were the very conservative Vigouroux and the Franciscan Fleming, who had an open mind for exegetical problems. Leo's plan was oriented toward mediation, which is shown by the fact that the Revue biblique was originally intended to be the organ of the Commission. The forty consultants comprised an international committee, to which men like Lagrange, Prat, and Hummelauer were appointed. The intention of the founders was supervision (to preserve the faith) but also the support of truly scholarly studies. However, the question was whether the optimistic words which the Pope addressed to d'Hulst and which were recorded by Baudrillart[27] would have an impact.

---

[22] J. Chaine, 27f.

[23] In 1909, L. Fonck, S.J., who had spoken of the pernicious spirit permeating the École Biblique, became rector of the Pontifical Biblical Institute. On 29 June 1912, scripta plura of P. Lagrange were put on the Index. In his letter to Pope Pius X, Lagrange amended his words of submission imploring: "However, just because I feel I am a most loyal son, may I be permitted to speak to a father, the most illustrious of all fathers but nevertheless a father, concerning my anxiety over the motives which caused the total censorship of most of my work." Lagrange was willing to admit that his works contained errors. However, he made an appropriate, but clear protest against the charge that he wrote them in the "spirit of disobedience" (Vincent, 348f.). On 4 September 1912, the order recalled him from Jerusalem.

[24] Quoted according to V. Hamp, LThK^{2} IV, 688. Hummelauer was appointed consultant to the Biblical Commission in 1903 and dismissed in 1908.

---

[25] Acta Leonis XVII, 24f.

[26] Acta Leonis XXII, 232–38.

[27] "Il y a des esprits inquiets et chagrins qui pressent les congrégtions romaines de se prononcer sur des question encore douteuses. Je m'y oppose, je les arrête: car il ne faut pas empêcher les savants de travailler. Il faut leur laisser le loisir d'hésiter et même d'errer. La vérité ne peut qu'y gagner. L'Église arrivera toujours à temps pour les remettre dans le droit chemin" (A. Baudrillart, op. cit. I, 456).—Regarding Catholic exegesis from 1880 to 1914, Leo XIII's "more constructive than repressive initiative" at the founding of the Biblical Commission, and the measures taken after 1903, see J. Levie, La Bible. Parole humaine et message de Dieu (Paris, Louvain 1958), 46–88; cf. chap. 30.

CHAPTER 24

The Condemnation of "Americanism"

The term and theory of "Americanism" originated in French academic circles. This is the reason for the content of the papal letter Testem benevolentiae of 22 January 1899, addressed to Cardinal Gibbons, which condemned "opinions, the sum of which some call 'Americanism.'"[1] In 1897, Walter Elliot's biography of the founder of the Paulists, Isaac Hecker (1819–88), which appeared in the United States of America in 1891, was published in France in a shortened version prepared by the author himself from the French text. It was made "more attractive" (T. T. McAvoy, C.S.C.) by Abbé Félix Klein (1862–1953), who was professor at the Institut catholique in Paris from 1893 to 1907. The original edition had been given a special importance because the introduction was written by Archbishop Ireland, but it had not received particular attention. However, by calling Hecker the "priest of the future" and thus presenting the "American Way" of Catholicism as a model for the French traditionalists, Abbé Klein, in his foreword, gave a signal which aroused the indignation of the conservatives, who were already deeply wounded by the papal Ralliement policy. The book soon went through six editions. The same year, Denis O'Connell gave a lecture at the Congress for Catholic Scholars in Fribourg on Hecker and the advantages of American democracy. He encountered the strong opposition of the bishop of Nancy, Charles François.[2] In the spring of 1892, Ireland, who spoke fluent French since his youth,[3] was invited by the advocates of the current Ralliement policy in France to speak. He impressed Abbé Klein, who, in 1894, published a selection of his lectures under the title L'Église et le Siècle. Finally, he was contacted by those forces in French and American Catholicism which hoped to find the remedy for Church life by opening up toward the modern spirit that had arisen from the Revolution.[4] This contact was expedient, if only because the Gibbons-Ireland group had been in trouble since 1895.[5] In 1897, Ireland tried in his speeches to fend off the "retractors," charging them with rebelling against the Pope in conservative disguise.

The term "Americanism" was not defined by those who tried to follow the "American Way" in practice more than in theory, but rather by the French ultraconservatives. It began with a series of articles on Amér-

---

[1] Acta Leonis XIX, 5–20.

[2] F. X. Kraus (Tagebücher, 719) notes his agreement with L. Duchesne about Bishop Turinaz being a leader of the rétrécissements.—O'Connell's lecture: Compte-rendu du IV^e congrès . . . (Fribourg 1898), 74–81.

[3] In 1899, he preached as guest of the French government on the occasion of the anniversary of Joan of Arc.

[4] F. X. Kraus (Tagebücher, 720) notes in April 1899 the plan of "a meeting of equal-minded men" in Freiburg i. Br., expecting, among others, Denis O'Connell, Loisy, Abbé Klein, and "maybe even" H. Schell: "They will negotiate a uniform attitude toward the Curia." At the end of 1898, O'Connell had visited Abbé Klein to discuss the impending papal condemnation. One has to consider, however, the notable differences between these "equal-minded men."

[5] Cf. chap. 10.

icanisme mystique by Charles Maignen, an opponent of the Ralliement, published under the pseudonym "Martel" in the conservative Paris paper Vérité Française. In a course of sermons, the Jesuits of Paris warned of the danger of "Hecker's Americanism" threatening the Church. In 1898, Maignen published his newspaper articles and other essays under the title Études sur l'américanisme. Le Père Hecker, est-il un Saint? Since Cardinal Richard refused the imprimatur, Maignen obtained approval from the Magister Palatii, the Dominican A. Lepidi in Rome, which was interpreted as papal sanction. Gibbons, Ireland, and Keane protested to Rome against the book, considering it a defamation of the American Catholicism they represented, while Archbishop Corrigan welcomed it. The controversies reached Belgium, Germany, and Italy and compounded the respective territorial tensions. The most vehement opponents of Hecker's friends were, among others, the Jesuit A. Delattre, who also sharply condemned the moderate biblical criticism of Lagrange; the Belgian Benedictine L. Jannsens at the Anselmianum in Rome; Merry del Val, who was promoted by Leo XIII and had been consulted in the battle against the validity of the Anglican ordinations; and especially Cardinals F. Satolli and Camillo Mazzella, S.J. (1833–1900), who taught dogmatics in Georgetown and Woodstock (after 1868) and at the Gregoriana (after 1878).[6]

The Pope rejected the request to put the Hecker biography on the Index and he appointed a Commission of Cardinals; representatives of the American episcopate were not included. The text of Testem benevolentiae was mainly written by Mazzela. The Pope changed the beginning and the end of the letter in order to avoid the impression of condemning the Gibbons group and the American situation. Whether Gibbons's telegram and Ireland's trip to Rome came "too late" (T. T. McAvoy C.S.C.) or whether the letter could not be retracted by any means cannot be determined.

Leo XIII's letter to Gibbons began with a few words about the Hecker biography, especially its translation, noting that it had caused innumerable controversies because of certain opinions about the Christian way of life; these problems the Pope would treat extensively later (de re universa fusiori sermone).[7] He condemned the following views: dogmas that are incomprehensible to contemporaries should not be denied, but rather be emphasized less or ignored; the ecclesiastical office is to refrain from authoritative statements to ensure the freedom of the individual through whom the Holy Spirit speaks more distinctly today than ever; natural virtues which promote activity are more important than supernatural ones; contemplative orders used to be justified, however, today, active virtues are needed; vows in the older religious orders kill the freedom to make decisions, which are so necessary today; the apostolate has to relinquish the old methods if operating among non-Catholics.

---

[6] Regarding Satolli, see chap. 10; regarding Mazzella, see chap. 21.

[7] Acta Leonis XIX, 6.

None of the suspects identified with these condemned opinions. But it wounded them deeply that the cavenda et corrigenda, though in a quotation, was cited Americanismi nomine. On 27 February the tactful Ireland wrote to the Pope that all "misunderstandings" had been cleared away and "true Americanism" was only "what was so called by the Americans."[8] The letter by Cardinal Gibbons to the Pope was published post festum:[9] "I do not believe that there is a bishop, a priest, or even a layman in this country who knows his religion and utters such enormities. No, this is not, has never been, and will never be our Americanism." The opponents of the Gibbons group, however, among them the German Archbishop Katzer of Milwaukee, who compared the "Americanists" with the Jansenists, thanked the Pope for having saved the Church in America from a great danger. Even though it was not put on the Index, the Paulists took the Hecker biography off the book market.

A distinction was drawn between "dogmatic" and "historical" Americanism, the latter being defined in Abbé Klein's words as une hérésie fantôme.[10] However, one may question whether it was proper to extract papal doctrinal authority in this manner from its exceedingly complicated context; after all, the letter was addressed to Cardinal Gibbons. It is also questionable whether one could speak of a connection with modernism;[11] this depends entirely on the definition of "modernism" and the customary terminological distinctions. In the perspective of the Roman procedure, it was noted that the "basic tendency and method of defense against modernism had largely been anticipated."[12]

---

[8] It does not quite make sense that L. Hertling, S.J., 238f., should call this an "unfair" departure from the "friends in France," because not "friends" such as Abbé Klein, but C. Maignen and his followers were meant by Ireland when he wrote: "We can be upset about such insults inflicted upon us, the bishops, the faithful, and the nation."

[9] J. T. Ellis, Gibbons II (1952), 71.

[10] G. Weigel, *LThK*² I, 434f.—F. Klein, "Une hérésie fantôme: l'Américanisme," Souvenirs IV (Paris 1949).

[11] L. Hertling (op. cit., 232), not very friendly toward Gibbons: "Even the most fanatic Americanists did not consider for a moment loosening the ties which bound them to the Church and its center"; 243: it was "true injustice" that prompted A. Gisler to write that Americanism was the pioneer of modernism.—A. Houton, L'Américanisme (Paris 1903), was put on the Index; regarding A. Houtin, cf. chap. 30, n. 13.

[12] R. Lill, "Der Kampf der römischen Kurie gegen den 'praktischen' Modernismus," Die päpstliche Autorität im Selbstverständnis des 19. und 20. Jahrhunderts, ed. by E. Weinzierl; Internationales Forschungszentrum . . . in Salzburg, Discussion 11 (1970), 110.

CHAPTER 25

Papal Hopes for Unification
The Independent Eastern Churches and the Uniates

Papal Hopes for Unification

The unions formed with Eastern Churches by the Popes of modern times were felt by most Eastern Christians to be violations of their traditions, which go back to the first centuries. The Holy See recognized the dignity of the old liturgies, but its efforts toward unification were based too strictly on the Tridentine concept of the unified Church and did not consider sufficiently the evolutionary character of the national churches of the East, thus creating a "Uniatism" which was an obstacle to the organic unification of the independent Eastern Churches separated from the universal Church. The unionist initiatives which had arisen in the middle of the nineteenth century and had been partially adopted by the Propaganda Fide failed to develop.

Pius IX's proclamation of unification of 6 January 1848 in his encyclical In suprema Petri Apostoli Sede was harshly rejected by the four Orthodox patriarchs for its authoritarian tone. His brief Arcano Divinae Providentiae consilio of 8 September 1868, addressed to all Orthodox bishops, suggesting a return to Catholic unity and participation in the council, also failed; the Patriarch of Constantinople Gregorios (1867–71) bemoaned, for instance, the lack of respect for apostolic equality and brotherhood. Cardinal Alessandro Barnabò, prefect of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, presided over the Commission for Missions and Churches of the Eastern Rites, one of the five subcommissions for the preparation of the First Vatican Council. This commission convened thirty-seven plenary sessions between 29 September 1867 and 9 May 1870.[1] At the first working session, Barnabò declared that the negotiations were to avoid everything that could possibly injure the feelings of the Orthodox. However, the topic, debated by the seventeen consultors for months concerned the possibility of applying the disciplinary canons of the Council of Trent to the Uniate Church and was therefore little suited to pay tribute to the spiritual heritage of the Christian Middle East. The commission's task, to deal simultaneously with problems of missions and the Uniate Churches, must have been shocking to the Eastern Churches. The Latin patriarch of Jerusalem, Archbishop Giuseppe Valerga (1813–72), participated energetically in the formulation of the mission plan, which had been prepared by the commission and, after several revisions, on 26 June 1870, was extensively debated by the Council's fathers. More than half of the text (forty-four folio-size pages) dealt with the Uniate Churches, the rest (thirty-five pages) with the Latin mission in the Middle East. Valerga was intent on equating the Uniates with the Latin Church as far as canon law is concerned, but he wanted to let them retain their liturgical customs. At the request of the cardinals' commission, Valerga wrote a report on the manner in which the upcoming council was to handle questions regarding the Eastern Churches. At the council itself, the Uniate hierarchs were not united. The Melchite patriarch, Gregory II Jussef Sayyur (1864–97), the Chaldean patriarch, Joseph II Audo (1848–78), and the Syrian patriarch, Philip Argus (1866–74), left Rome before the final voting on the dogmatic constitution Pastor aeternus of 18 July 1870. Later, they agreed to it, but they remained indignant because of insufficient consideration of the patriarchs' traditional rights and privileges.

---

[1] "Acta commissionis super missionibus et ecclesiis ritus orientalis," Mansi XLIX (1923), 985–1162.

The pontificate of Leo XIII, who pursued liberal conciliatory policies in the political and social arena and hoped for reconciliation with the Anglicans and independent Eastern Churches, began a new phase in the relations between Rome and the Eastern Christians,[2] reflecting the results of scholarly research and productive dialogues between open-minded experts. The reunification of those separated from the Church by belief and obedience was one of the Pope's main objectives, which he advocated in 6 encyclicals, 7 apostolic briefs, 14 pronouncements, and 5 addresses.[3] Reunification was an integral part of his mission as peacemaker. In his encyclical Grande munus christiani nominis propagandi of 30 September 1880, on the Apostles of the Slavs, Cyril and Methodius,[4] the Pope drew attention to the close relationship between those two men and the Holy See and to the Pope's interest in the Slavic peoples. He had special concern for the Eastern Churches and his most ardent wish was for them to unite with "Us and be committed to the eternal bond of unity (concordia)."[5] The Uniates welcomed the encyclical with enthusiasm, for instance at the pilgrimage of fourteen Slavs on 5 July 1881 in Rome. It was led by Bishop Josip Jurij Stroßmayer of [2] L. Berg, "La réunion des églises orientales avec l'église catholique romaine au cours des siècles," Ex Oriente, op. cit., 115–17; A. S. Hernández, op. cit., 413–17; J. Alameda, op. cit., 91–99; R. F. Esposito, op. cit., 687–701; W. de Vries, Orthodoxie, 127–34; J. Hajjar, op. cit., 243–51.

---

[3] R. F. Esposito, op. cit., 412. According to his estimate, Leo XIII discussed the Christian East in thirty-two important documents and in more than two hundred paragraphs. He lists 248 significant papal statements (ibid., 702–12, appendix 1: I documenti Leoniani interessanti l'Oriente).

[4] ASS XIII (1880), 145–53.

[5] Ibid., 152.

Djakovo,[6] who had impressed the Pope with his ideas on ways of uniting with Russia and the Slavic faithful. Catholic Panslavism, which Stroßmayer supported and which originated in the Brotherhood of Saints Cyril and Methodius (in existence since the middle of the nineteenth century), encountered resistance in Russia, where it was feared its influence on the Slavs in the Habsburg Monarchy and on the Balkans would suffer a setback.

England's occupation of Egypt in 1882 and the Russian Orthodox Imperial Society of Palestine, founded the same year, turned Leo XIII's attention to the Near East. The Greek government asked that the Pope no longer appoint bishops in partibus infidelium for vacant episcopal sees in the Greek territories. The Pope granted the wish on 10 June 1882, using the term episcopus titularis in his apostolic letter In suprema.[7]

In 1883, he received two extensive reports concerning the resumption of contacts with the Orthodox Churches. One was written by the apostolic delegate of Constantinople, Serafino Vannutelli. His motion regarding "the best available means to lead the dissidents back to the Catholic Church"[8] demonstrated the failure of the Latin missionaries in the Near East and criticized their Latinization measures. The other report was written by Carlo Gallien, the Turkish consul general in Rome. He suggested sending new missionary societies into the respective areas, once their members had been made aware of the basic proplems. The papal brief Abbiamo appreso of 4 January 1887,[9] addressed to Giuseppe Benedetto Cardinal Dusmet, O.S.B., archbishop of Catania, seemed to be the first to be inspired by this proposal. In this brief, the Pope congratulated Dusmet, praising him for reopening the College of Saint Anselmo and including it in plans for the Christian Near East.

New ideas came from the Eucharistic Congress in Jerusalem of 14 to 21 May 1893.[10] Bishop Victor Doutreloux of Liège (president of the Permanent Committee for Eucharistic Congresses, which prepared the Jerusalem Congress together with the Superior General of the Assumptionists, François Picard), expected the participation of representatives of the Eastern Churches paying homage to the Eucharist, and hoped for the return of the separated brethren to the great Catholic family. Leo XIII avoided expected diplomatic complications by informing Sultan Abdul Hamid (1876–1909) and Emperor Alexander III of Russia (1881–94) (via a French mediator) about the planned congress and by assuring the governments in Berlin, Vienna, and London that the meeting had a strictly religious purpose. He appointed Cardinal Benedict Maria Langénieux, archbishop of Rheims, his legate and president of the congress, which was attended by thousands of Catholic pilgrims, several cardinals, fifteen dignitaries of the Roman Catholic Church, eighteen representatives of the Uniate Churches, and twenty priests of the independent Eastern Churches. In his opening address, the cardinal legate emphasized the fact that his mission was marked by the sign of love and piety, implying an invitation to unite in faith. The congress submitted to the Pope eight desiderata, including Eucharistic prayers of Eastern liturgies in manuals of Roman Catholics, the encouragement of studies on the religious problems of the Eastern Churches with a view to church union; and the strengthening of relations between the faithful of the East and West and their clergy.

---

[6] See chap. 11, p. 184.

[7] Acta Leonis I (1887), 277–85, especially 283f.

[8] J. Hajjar, op. cit., 243.

[9] Acta Leonis II (1887), 250–53, especially 252f.

[10] Irénikon 1 (1926), 353–57; A. S. Hernández, op. cit., 414–17; O. Rousseau, op. cit., 370–71; R. F. Esposito, op. cit., 367–84; C. Soetens, op. cit., 107–15.

The Pope had ordered Cardinal Langénieux to inquire into the situation of the Uniates, the impact of the Latinization measures, and ways and means of overcoming the separation of the Eastern Churches from Rome. On 23 May, the Melchite Patriarch Gregory II Jussef Sayyur delivered a complaint concerning the Latinization measures, claiming they hindered the task and mission of the Uniate Churches. On 2 July, the cardinal of Lourdes sent a secret report to Rome on his investigations.[11] Remembering the consequences of the Crusades, which are still felt today, he mentioned the Eastern Christians' mistrust of private interests and political goals. He also reprimanded Latin missionaries, whose behavior often contradicted apostolic directives, and expressed regret over the predominance of the Latin rites over the Uniate rites. He described the lack of authority and power of the Uniate Churches, which suffered from a lack of support and whose clergy was insufficiently trained. He reiterated the objections and opinions voiced by Latin missionaries, claiming that the theory of the apostolate of Uniate Christians in the Eastern Churches was a utopia. He was convinced of the future of the Uniate Churches, hoping that their revival could overcome their inferiority and link the Roman Catholics with the Eastern Orthodox. To disperse the prejudice of the schismatics and to strengthen the Uniates, he stressed the publication of an encyclical that would clarify papal principles regarding Eastern Christianity.

The apostolic brief Praeclara gratulationis of 20 June 1894,[12] which Leo XIII addressed to all sovereigns and peoples on occasion of the 50th anniversary of his consecration as bishop, clearly reflects the ideas that were inspired by the Jerusalem Congress. He recalled the original unity of the Church, challenging the Eastern Christians to restore it. All Christians in the East and West, he said, recognized the Roman bishop, the successor to Saint Peter, before their separation. He promised that he and his successors would not touch their rights, the privileges of the patriarchs, their rites and customs. The Pope devoted one paragraph to the Slavic peoples, pointing out that the papacy had supported them since the time of Cyril and Methodius, but that a great segment had been alienated from the Roman belief; he therefore challenged them to unite. As far as the Eastern Churches were concerned, this programmatic letter contained the "first appeal for ecclesiastical unity with acceptable arguments."[13]

---

[11] J. Hajjar, op. cit., 246–48.

[12] ASS XXVI (1893–94), 705–17; cf. R. F. Esposito, op. cit., 385–90.

To use the results of the Congress in Jerusalem to strengthen further the Uniate Churches and reunite with the Eastern Churches, Leo XIII organized and chaired several conferences with Uniate patriarchs (24–28 November). In attendance were the Melchite Patriarch, Gregory II Jussef Sayyur, the Syrian Patriarch, Cyril Behnam Benni (1893–97), the patriarchal vicar, Archbishop Elias Huayek (replacing the aging Maronite Patriarch, John Hagg [1890–98, born 1817]),[14] Cardinal Secretary of State Rampolla, the Cardinals Galimberti, Langénieux, Ledóchowski, and Vincenzo Vannutelli, who had been sent as papal legate to Saint Petersburg in 1882 on the occasion of Tsar Alexander III's coronation. These patriarchal conferences clearly defined the competencies of Latin missionaries and the rights of Uniate dignitaries. They also prepared the papal brief Orientalium dignitas of 30 November 1894,[15] which relinquished the adaptation of rites and disciplines to Latin. "The preservation of the Eastern rites is more important than one is led to believe. The honorable age which distinguishes the various rites dignifies the entire Church and confirms the divine unity of Catholic belief."[16] In thirteen theses, the Pope gave guidelines for the preservation of the old liturgies. He strengthened his intention to expand the Uniate seminaries and colleges for the native clergy.

In his letter Christi nomen of 24 December 1894,[17] Leo XIII referred to his expositions in the apostolic brief Praeclara gratulationis of 20 June, stressing his efforts toward unity with the Eastern Churches and asking for support and training of a qualified Uniate clergy. In the motu proprio Optatissimae of 19 March 1895,[18] he decreed that a permanent cardinals' commission for Uniate rites and reunification, chaired by Cardinal Ledóchowski, continue the deliberations of the patriarchal conferences of the fall of 1894. The brief Provida matris of 5 May 1895,[19] on preparation for Pentecost, the extensive encyclicals Satis cognitum of 29 June 1896,[20] dealing with the unity of the Church, and Divinum illud munus of 9 May 1897,[21] concerning the Holy Spirit, elaborated his theological thoughts and practical suggestions pertaining to the union. On the occasion of the publication of the encyclical of 29 June 1896, Leo XIII had a medal struck, the front of which displayed his image with the inscription Pontifex maximus and the year of his pontificate (anno XIX) while the reverse side showed an allegory of Church unity with the words: "May there be one fold and one shepherd."[22]

---

[13] J. Hajjar, op. cit., 248.

[14] Armenian Patriarch Stefan Peter X Azarian (1881–99), residing in Constantinople, did not receive permission from the sultan to leave the country. The Chaldean patriarchate was vacant after the death of Patriarch Elias XII Abolionan (1879–94).

[15] ASS XXVII (1894–95), 257–64: De disciplina orientalium conservanda et tuenda.

[16] Ibid., 258.

[17] Ibid., 385–87.

All these pronouncements differed from earlier papal utterances in their tone and their expression of sympathy for the Eastern Christians. They avoided terms like "schismatics" and "heretics," instead using words like fratelli separati or dissidenti; they distinguished themselves by respect for the rites and ecclesiastical laws of the East and prepared the climate for reconciliation. These papal efforts of appeasement were supported by Catholic diplomats (the Belgian Baron d'Erp),[23] princes of the Church (Cardinals Langénieux and Vincenzo Vannutelli), bishops (Doutreloux of Liège and Stroßmayer of Djakovo) and theologians (Abbé Fernand Portal),[24] who passionately pleaded for closer relations between the Catholic Church and the Anglicans as well as the Eastern Christians. Portal was a friend of Lord Halifax's and was inspired by the ideas of Russian religious philosophers, especially those of Vladimir Soloviev (1853–1900),[25] who, as an Orthodox Christian, recognized the

---

[18] ASS XXVIII (1895–96), 323–24: De commissione pontificia ad reconciliationem dissidentium cum Ecclesia fovendam.

[19] ASS XXVII (1894–95), 646–47.

[20] ASS XXVIII (1895–96), 708–39; also cf. R. F. Esposito, op. cit., 420–56.

[21] ASS XXIX (1896–97), 644–58; also cf. R. F. Esposito, op. cit., 462–67.

[22] Fiet. Unum. Ovile. Et. Unus. Pastor. MDCCCXCVI, cf. L. K. Goetz, op. cit., 233–34.

[23] R. Aubert, Un document, 429–35.

[24] F. Portal. op. cit., 5–8; also cf. A. Gratieux, op. cit.

[25] V. Solovjev, La Russie et l'Église universelle (Paris 1889); id., Monarchia Sancti Petri. Die kirchliche Monarchie des heiligen Petrus als freie und universelle Theokratie im Lichte der Weisheit. Aus den Hauptwerken von Wladimir Solowjew systematisch gesammelt, übersetzt und erklärt, ed. by L. Kobilinski-Ellis (Mainz, Wiesbaden 1929); id., Una Sancta. Schriften zur Vereinigung der Kirchen und zur Grundlegung der universalen Theokratie, 2 vols. (Freiburg i. Br. 1954–57); cf. T. G. Masaryk, Zur russischen Geschichts- und Religionsphilosophie. Soziologische Skizzen II (Jena 1913), 225–77; L. Kobilinski-Ellis, "Die freie Theokratie nach der Lehre von Wladimir Solowjew," Ex Oriente, op. cit., 278–86; T. Grivec, "L'Indépendance et originalité de Wladimir Solowjew," ibid., 298–305; Un

Pope and supported unification with Rome, the traditional center of the Christian world. For Soloviev, the papacy was a mysterium unitatis, the center of apostolicity, universality, and ecumenicity, the temporal manifestation and metaphor of the great secret of Sophia. In his philosophical works he strove to make his doctrine of the sophic world-soul agree with Christian theology.[26] His convictions regarding the Russian Church's mission to unify all the churches evoked no response in the Eastern Churches during his lifetime, but his writings have had an ecumenical impact to the present day.

Leo XIII's intentions were published in numerous theological periodicals: the L'Œuvre d'Orient (published since 1857 in Paris), the Revue de l'Orient chrétien (Paris 1896), Échos d'Orient (since 1897, the quarterly published by the Assumptionists' Central Institute for Eastern Studies), and the Oriens Christianus (Rome, after 1901, for the study of the Christian East). These and other periodicals, such as Bessarione, pubblicazione periodica di Studi Orientali, published in Rome since 1896, provided a wealth of information, documentation, historical and theological research. By virtue of their scholarly integrity and theological sensitivity they rendered a clear picture of the history and the current situation of Eastern Christianity.

Generously, Leo XIII supported the Assumptionists, Benedictines, Dominicans, Jesuits, Capuchins, Carmelites, Lazarists, Lyon Missionaries, Redemptorists, Salesians, Christian Brothers, and White Fathers, who actively advocated the union in their pastoral work. The Pope also founded or restored colleges in Rome to train the Uniate clergy, such as the Armenian College (1883) and the Maronite College (1891). He carefully placed suitable candidates in the Propaganda College and in the international academies of orders, such as the pontifical Benedictine academy, the Anselmianum. He established Uniate seminaries and schools for the Copts in Cairo, for the Melchites in Jerusalem, for the Bulgarians in Plovdiv and Adrianople, for the Syrians and Chaldeans in Mosul, for the Greeks in Constantinople, Kadikoy (formerly Chalcedon), and in Athens. He willingly donated considerable funds for the development of these educational institutions.

Even though the Uniate Churches did not increase in their membership to any considerable extent in the last decades of the nineteenth moine de l'Église d'Orient, La signification de Soloviev: 1054–1954. L'Église et les églises, neuf siècles de douloureuse séparation entre l'Orient et l'Occident II, ed. by L. Beuduin (Chevetogne 1955), 369–79; G. Florowski, op. cit., 295–96; St. Napierała, "Wizja jedności kościoła w 'wielkim sporze' Włodzimierza Sołowjewa," Collectanea Theologica 40 (1970), 49–62.

---

[26] B. Schultze, "Probleme der orthodoxen Theologie," Handbuch der Ostkirchenkunde, op. cit., 144–55.

century, the Pope emphasized their unique value within Catholicism as a whole. In his encyclicals and many other writings, Leo XIII traced their historical descent from early Christianity and the first Christian centuries to the missionary popes of the early Middle Ages who assured the Slavs their own ecclesiastical language, to the re-union councils of the early and high Middle Ages, the Second Council of Lyon in 1274 and the Council of Basel-Ferrara-Florence-Rome in 1431–45, and to the popes of modern times who struggled for union, especially Benedict XIV. These references alleviated the Uniates' inferiority complex; they no longer felt isolated, but were confirmed in their conviction of being recognized members of the universal Catholic Church, and entrusted with the task of building a bridge to the separated Eastern Christians. Their patriarchs, who had suffered under the Latinization measures instituted by Rome and under disciplinary regulations, were relieved and, because of the papal kindness and its accompanying proclamations, they felt themselves to be on equal footing with the Roman Catholic episcopate.

The Pope expected his unification program, his personal involvement on behalf of reunification with the separated Eastern Churches, and the expansion of the Uniate Churches to be successful. But many external and internal difficulties obstructed the realization of his ambitions. Turkish, French, Austro-Hungarian, and Russian interests clashed in the Balkans and in the Middle East. The cultural protectorate,[27] which had developed from an institution of international law into a protectorate of foreign countries over Christians living in Turkey, enabled France (since the sixteenth century) and Austria (since the end of the eighteenth century) to obtain certain privileges, particularly since numerous churches were under their protection and financed by them. The attempt to win over the Orthodox Slavs had to take Russia into consideration. When favoring the Uniate Slavs in Austria-Hungary, the delicate situation in this multi-national state could not be ignored. By order of their governments, diplomats intervened and expressed their anxieties over possible conflicts, as did, for instance, the Russian representative at the Vatican, Alexander Izvolsky (1888–96), and the Austro-Hungarian ambassador to the Vatican, Duke Friedrich Revertera-Salandra (1888–1901).[28]

At the Curia, Leo XIII encountered resistance to his unification efforts and rejection of his personally benevolent attitude toward the Eastern Churches. He was unable to transfer his hopes to his immediate environment and the lower levels of his administration. Also, the penal regulations regarding Latinizing missionaries contained in his encylical Orientalium dignitas[29] were not very successful because they were not obeyed by the order members who devoted their efforts to traditional Latinization.[30] Yet the Pope adhered to his ideas. According to Revertera's notes of New Year's Day 1897, Leo XIII desired to attempt the ecclesiastical unification with the Christian nations outside of the Church. This, Revertera said, would be very difficult in Russia: "He could not hope to witness more than the first dawn of a future which he so ardently desired."[31]

---

[27] J. Lammeyer, op. cit., 57–82, 84–88, M. Lehmann, op. cit., 37–44.

[28] A. Hudal, op. cit., 236–54; G. Adrianyi, op. cit., 241–339.

Leo XIII had no illusions about the impending reunification with the Eastern Churches. Yet he strove for the unity of all Christians in the one and only Church, a characteristic of all his ecclesiological thoughts, which were the focal point of his theological concepts.[32] When he died in 1903, the Uniates lost in him a pioneer and protector. His initiative prepared an ecumenical foundation which led to détente between Rome and the separated Eastern Churches, was continued by his successors, was reinforced by Pope John XXIII, and is still in effect.

His successor, Pius X (1903–14) proved to be primarily a pragmatic spiritual adviser. As patriarch of Venice (1894–1903), he had learned about the Slavic liturgy and the interests of the union through the Mechitharists, the Armenian Uniate monks, whose monastery on the island of San Lazzaro near Venice had been the center of religious and scholarly work since 1717. As Pope, he renewed the unification efforts of Leo XIII. He put the Roman churches San Lorenzo ai Monti and San Salvatore alle Capelle at the disposal of the Uniate Russians and Rumanians. He personally took charge of the protectorate over the Greek abbey of Grottaferrata near Rome, for which his predecessor, in 1881 had decreed the use of the original Greek-Byzantine rite. In 1904 he attended the celebration of the nine hundredth anniversary of the abbey, and he supported it throughout his pontificate. He anxiously observed the situation of the Uniates in Galicia and the propaganda of Russian missionaries in favor of unification with the Orthodox Church. For the Uniate Ruthenians, who had emigrated to the United States of America from Galicia and Hungary, he issued the bull Ea semper of 14 June 1907;[33] that year, he appointed Vicar Apostolic Stephan Soter [29] See above, n. 15.

---

[30] W. de Vries, Orthodoxie, 128: "In 1920, the Oriental Congregation had to resign itself to the fact that Latinization continued after Orientalum dignitas and that penalties were not enforced and could not be enforced."

[31] F. Engel-Janosi, op. cit. I, 322.

[32] E. Hocedez, Histoire de la théologie au XIX^e siècle III (Brussels, Paris 1947), 387–91; R. F. Esposito, op. cit., 409–97.

[33] ASS XLI (1908), 1–12.

Ortynski and (in 1912) he sent, on behalf of the Ruthenians in Canada, Niceta Budka[34] to be the bishop of Winnipeg. In his letter Quidquid consilii of 8 June 1908, addressed to Uniate Archbishop Andreas Szepticki of Lemberg (1900–44), he recognized the unification efforts of the separated Eastern Churches and praised him in his capacity as president of the Union Congresses in Welehrade.[35]

By order of the Pope, Cardinal Vannutelli prepared festivities in Rome to honor the fifteen hundredth anniversary of the death of the patriarch of Constantinople, John Chrysostom,[36] who was venerated by Christians in both the East and West. On 12 February 1908, in Saint Peter's Cathedral, Melchite Patriarch Cyril VIII Geha (1903–16) and his bishops and archimandrites celebrated the liturgy in the presence of the Pope, who sang the benediction, which according to their rite was to be delivered in the Greek language by the highest dignitary present. The next day he spoke to the numerous Uniates who had come to Rome of the Holy See's respect for the dignity and glory of the Eastern rites; he assured them that the Pope would guard the preservation of their national customs, that the congregation for the Propagation of the Faith would annually send a number of native priests to the East with the message to remain loyal to national rites and to avoid conversion to the Latin rite, and that he admired the accomplishments of great Eastern men and intended to make efforts to revive their heritage.[37]

In his apostolic letter Ex quo of 26 December 1910,[38] the Pope declared that the interest of the Holy See in the problems of the Eastern Churches had not ceased, that his predecessors had passionately desired the end of the separation, and that all Catholics were obligated to support the reunification. In 1910 he approved the world prayer octave for the unification of the separated Christians, which was to last from 18 to 25 January and had been initiated by the Anglican clergyman Paul J. Francis Wattson (1863–1940), who had converted in 1909 to the Catholic Church together with the Brother- and Sisterhood of the Reconciliation, which he had founded. The octave was observed after 1908 by the Anglican and Catholic congregations in the United States and spread in the next decades to most of the Christian Churches.[39]

---

[34] AAS IV (1912), 531, 555–56.

[35] Acta Pii V (1971), 287–88.

[36] ÉO 11 (1908), 131–46; C. Charam, Le quinzième centenaire de Jean Chrysostome (Rome 1909); B. Arens, Papst Pius X und die Weltmission (Aachen 1919), 16–18.

[37] ASS XLI (1908), 130–34; Allocutio, quam die 13 Februarii 1908 Pius X habuit ad Orientales.

[38] AAS III (1911), 117–21.—This letter was addressed to all apostolic delegates in the East and took issue with an article published in Roma e l'Oriente (see n. 40). Its dogmatic and historical errors were criticized and corrected (also cf. "Roma e l'Oriente pensieri sull'unione delle chiese," CivCatt, 62 [1911], I, 64–78, and "La parola del papa intorno all'unione delle chiese," ibid., 129–34).

After 1910 the monks of Grottaferrata published the periodical Roma e l'Oriente, which proselytized for the union of the Eastern Churches with Rome and was subsidized actively by the Pope. He was not always in agreement with all its articles, especially not with the essay "Thoughts about the Question of the Reunification of the Churches," which was written by Prince Maximilian of Saxony, a professor who had done respectable studies on Eastern liturgies.[40] In this article Prince Maximilian spoke of the Roman lust for power. Yet in 1914 the Pope wrote to the editor: "Continue with your work on behalf of a difficult and frustrating cause and always apply the necessary wisdom."[41]

In 1912 he established for the Hungarian Uniates the diocese of Hajdudorog.[42] On 14 September of the same year, in connection with his liturgical reforms which earned him the sobriquet "Pope of the Liturgy," Pius X published the apostolic constitution Tradita ab antiquis,[43] dealing with the receiver and administrator of Holy Communion. He gave the faithful the choice whether they wanted to receive the Eucharist in the form of leavened or unleavened bread, and, if possible, they were to receive Communion according to their own rites during Easter and the last viaticum.[44]

Under Pius X's pontificate, the interest in the independent churches and those united with Rome was not as pronounced as under the pontificate of his predecessor; yet the papal hopes for reunification did not cease.[45] The Pope assessed the possibilities of realizing his ambitions more sceptically and more realistically than Leo XIII. He did not share the optimism which had permeated Leo's proclamations. He was worried about the division of the Uniates into smaller churches where the lay element exerted great influence. He carefully observed the political development in Galicia and Southeastern Europe, and the attempts of the Orthodox Church to convert the Slavs of Dalmatia. He doubted whether Austria-Hungary would be able to preserve its cultural protectorate in the Balkans and feared the annexation of the Slavs to Russia, which he considered the greatest enemy of the Church.[46] Therefore, he urged that the Uniates be bound closer to the Holy See and that they strengthen their religious life.

---

[39] R. Aubert, La semaine de prières pour l'unité chrétien (Louvain 1950); A. S. Hernández, op. cit., 417–19.

[40] Max Prince de Saxe, "Pensées sur la question de l'union des églises," Roma e l'Oriente 1 (1910–1911), 13–29; cf. Schmidlin, PG III, 129, n. 4.

[41] "Pio X e le chiese orientali," Roma e l'Oriente 8 (1914), 70.

[42] AAS IV (1912), 429–35.

[43] Ibid., 609–17.

[44] J. Hajjar (op. cit., 251–52) assesses this constitution, which was dictated by motives of spiritual guidance in order to facilitate a more frequent Communion recommended by Pius X. Hajjar considers it to be an "anti-Oriental reaction" and "a step backward under Pius X."

[45] B. Arens, op. cit., 5–18; A. S. Hernández, op. cit., 417–19; J. Alameda, op. cit., 101–05.

It was Benedict XV who finally created institutions which, taking Leo XIII's appeals seriously, could reliably carry out papal unification policies in the twentieth century. These institutions were the Sacra Congregatio pro Ecclesia Orientali (the result of the motu proprio Dei providentis of 1 May 1917)[47] in which the Uniate Churches were freed from the union with other Roman congregations and placed under their own cardinals' congregation; and the Pontifical Institute of Oriental Studies (the result of the motu proprio Orientis Catholici of 15 October 1917),[48] which was devoted to the study and teaching of all Eastern Churches and trained men to serve the reconciliation of the churches.

The Independent Eastern Churches

To facilitate an understanding of the papal unification efforts and the development of Church history at the end of the nineteenth and the beginning of the twentieth century, we insert a brief summary of the situation of the Eastern Churches separated from Rome, which can be divided into five groups: 1) the Orthodox Church in Russia (100 million), which had assumed jurisdiction over the Georgian Church in the nineteenth century; 2) three Orthodox Churches in Austria-Hungary: the Serbian Church of Karlowitz (800,000), the Church of Bukovina and of Dalmatia (550,000), the Church of Sibiu for the Rumanians living in Hungary (220,000); 3) five national Orthodox Churches in Southeastern Europe: the Church in Rumania (5 million), in Bulgaria (3.5 million), in Serbia (2.5 million), in Greece (2 million), in Montenegro (150,000); 4) the four old Orthodox patriarchates of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem (8.5 million); 5) the National Church of the Syrian Nestorians (80,000), the Monophysite Churches of the West Syrian Jacobites (100,000), the Thomist Christians in Southern India (450,000) the Copts in Egypt (800,000), the Ethiopians (3.5 million), and the Armenians (4 million).[49]

---

[46] L. v. Pastor, Tagebücher—Briefe—Erinnerungen, ed. by W. Wühr (Heidelberg 1950), 584–85; F. Engel-Janosi, op. cit. II, 122–25.

[47] AAS IX (1917), 529–31.

[48] Ibid., 531–33.

[49] Cf. N. Zernow, op. cit., 314–320. The numbers of faithful he lists for the year 1910 need to be corrected in some cases, especially regarding the Orthodox in Austria-Hungary (see n. 69) and the four old patriarchal churches: Constantinople: 3 million, Alexandria: 50,000, Antioch: 250,000, and Jerusalem: 20,000.

The Orthodox Church in Russia

The largest and most influential Orthodox Church was the Russian State Church, which was ruled by the Holy Synod. Since the dissolution of the first Muscovite patriarchate at the beginning of the eighteenth century, the State Church was more than ever subject to the monarchs who called themselves autonomous rulers by the grace of God. The Holy Synod was considered an administrative organ of the state, and it felt its subordination to be submission to the ruler himself. The Synod was chaired by the metropolitan of Moscow, but he was completely dependent on the representatives of the Tsar and on the chief procurator, whom Peter I had appointed as the chief secretary of the chancellory and called "our eye and administrator of state affairs." He received ministerial rank and was empowered with unlimited authority over the Church, which reached its peak in the second half of the nineteenth century.

Chief Procurator Count Dmitri Tolstoy (1865–80) was a dry bureaucrat who wanted to pursue reforms in the Church similar to those in the state. He abolished the division of the bishoprics into three categories and regulated the salaries of the secular clergy in detail. He had little interest in matters of faith and extended the liberal reforms of Alexander II to the seminaries (1867) and academies (1869). His plan to reform clerical jurisdiction was never completed. He was extraordinarily critical of the Catholic Church, as is proven both by his two-volume work about the Catholics in Russia,[50] which he had written as a civil servant in the Department for Spiritual Affairs and Foreign Creeds in the Ministry of the Interior, and by his strict incorporation of the faithful of the Uniate bishopric of Chelm (1875) into the Russian State Church.

His successor, Constantin Petrovich Pobedonostsev (1880–1905),[51] an outstanding lawyer and jurist, was a devout and pious Orthodox Christian. He grew up with the ideals of Muscovite Russia: Church and state, the faithful, and the tsar all form a unity according to the example of the Byzantine State Church. He considered people's sovereignty, parliamentarism, and democracy to be the great falsehoods of the time. He rejected liberal innovations and believed that a powerful authority headed by the patriarchal autocrat, preservation of the traditional faith, encouragement of the liturgy and worship of icons, and reinforcement and strengthening of monarchism would protect Russia from revolutionary threats. Under Tsars Alexander II, Alexander III, and Nicholas II he conducted the affairs of the Russian State Church. He supervised the election of the bishops, allowed them little independence, and systematically expanded the administrative body of the Holy Synod to supervise the Church. He felt responsible for state and Church, wanting to protect the latter against fads and to strengthen it for its providential task of preserving the state. He provided the clerical schools, seminaries, and academies with new statutes in order to purge them of liberal infiltration. He reorganized parochial schools, demanding considerable state funds for their development. He intensified the Orthodox mission among the Old Believers, fought against the sectarian groups of the Dukobors, Molokans, Chilysty, and Skoptsy, and opposed all non-Orthodox religious congregations in Russia, such as the Catholic Church, the Evangelical Lutheran Church, Evangelical sects like the Stundists, and the Muslims.

---

[50] D. A. Tolstoj, Le catholicisme romain en Russie, 2 vols. (Paris 1863–64).

[51] F. Steinmann, E. Hurwicz, Konstantin Petrowitsch Pobjedonoscew, der Staatsmann der Reaktion unter Alexander III. (Königsberg 1933); R. F. Byrnes, Pobedonostsev. His Life and Thought (London 1968); G. Simon, Konstantin Petrovič Pobedonoscev und die Kirchenpolitik des Heiligen Synod 1880–1905 (Göttingen 1969); F. Jockwig, Der Weg der Laien auf das Landeskonzil der Russischen Orthodoxen Kirche, Moskau 1917/18. Werden und Verwirklichung einer demokratischen Idee in der Russischen Kirche (Würzburg 1971), 42–55.

On the occasion of the nine hundredth anniversary of the Christianization of Russia by Grand Duke Vladimir I of Kiev (979–1015) on 15 July 1888, Pobedonostsev delivered a speech in which he pointed out that Russia had risen to its present height because of Christianity and under the flag of the autocracy of the tsar.[52] True Orthodox religiosity, Russian Church policy, and Russian Panslavism converged in the secular and ecclesiastical meetings that were attended by the Orthodox metropolitans of Serbia and Montenegro, by a Greek archimandrite, Serbian and Rumanian delegations, and Abyssinians. Ruthenians and Slovacs from Galicia and Hungary also assembled, in spite of their governments' prohibition against travel outside the country. The historical significance of this anniversary, which extended beyond the Russian borders, was characterized by, among other things, a telegram, sent by Bishop Stroßmayer of Djakovo to Tsar Alexander III.[53]

The chief procurator asserted his leading position in Church and state administration during the first years of Nicholas II's government, so that one can speak of the age of Pobedonostsev. It ended with the Revolution of 1905, the collapse of autocracy, the toleration edict of Nicholas

---

[52] F. Steinmann, E. Hurwicz, op. cit., 208: "We are standing under this flag, under it we form a united entity with a united will, and in it we see the future guarantee of truth, order, and the welfare of our country."

[53] J. Matl, "Josef Georg Stroßmayer," Neue Österreichische Biographie sect. i, IX (Vienna 1956), 76: "I have the honor and sincere pleasure of participating in this festivity. . . . May God bless Russia and help her to fulfill in true faith with God's help and with Christian courage this great world mission which God assigned to her in spite of all her other duties."

II of 17 April and his manifesto of 30 October, in which he promised the introduction of civil liberties and general suffrage. Without success, Pobedonostsev protested against the toleration edict, which annulled the restrictions he had imposed for decades. In vain he worked on a project for the Duma, whose members were only entitled to propose legislative bills to the Council of State. The project was announced on 6 August, but was neither accepted by the liberal nor by the revolutionary critics. As he had done throughout the last few years, he bemoaned the fact that there was no longer an authority that was ready to fight. Because of questions pertaining to Church reforms and a council, which the patriarchate of the Russian Orthodox Church was to restore (questions which were debated in ecclesiastical circles and in the press), Pobedonostsev resigned two days after the publication of the October manifesto, twenty-five years after taking office. After his resignation, he wrote to Bishop Eulogi Georgievski (1868–1946), who was at that time bishop of Lublin and later, in the emigration, metropolitan of Paris: "The situation has become intolerable. . . . In the church itself wolves appeared who did not spare the sheep."[54] A time of gloom and the power of darkness had arrived, he wrote, it was time to go.

The protests against the power of bureaucracy in the Church were continued by the first constitutional prime minister, Duke Serge Witte (1905–6) and Metropolitan Antoni Wadkovski (1898–1912) from Saint Petersburg. Nicholas II ordered the metropolitans of Saint Petersburg, Moscow, and Kiev to convene a national council in order to "change the structure of our national Church on the solid basis of the ecumenical canon for the purpose of consolidating Orthodoxy."[55] A precouncil committee met from 8 March to 15 December 1906,[56] working as seven commissions, whose minutes were published. The deliberations were based on responses to a questionnaire which the Holy Synod had sent to the bishops on 29 July 1905. They dealt with the upper Church leadership, diocesan administration, parishes, and the principle of councils; and they contained extensive proposals for the council, e.g., the participation of laymen in the council's proceedings. In six plenary meetings, the resolutions of the commissions were voted on.[57] The votes were unanimously in favor of rejuvenating the patriarchate, on limiting the authority of the chief procurator to a mere controlling function, and on appointing laymen to the council. There was disagreement about the clergy and laity's right to vote, about standing orders, and other questions of formalities. Nicholas II, after dissolving the Second Duma on 8 July 1906, once again ruled autocratically. He suspended the precouncil committee and assigned the preparations for the National Council to the Holy Synod, which presented him with a comprehensive report. After a few changes, he approved it, but postponed the council indefinitely.

---

[54] I. Smolitsch, op. cit., 213f. n. 8.—After his dismissal, Pobedonostsev wrote several essays expressing his protest against state and Church reforms. He died on 10 March 1907.

[55] Ibid., 320.

[56] F. Jockwig, op. cit., 101–32.

[57] Ibid., 164–81.

Four insignificant men[58] held the office of the chief procurator between 1905 and 1911. Then, in May, it was occupied by C. V. Sabler (1911–15), who had been Pobedonostsev's closest adviser from 1892 until 1905. He rose to the leadership of the Holy Synod, limited the religious freedom of non-Orthodox Churches through special regulations which were enacted by the Ministry of the Interior, and treated the proposals of the precouncil committee dilatorily, although he established, in 1912, a precouncil commission at the Holy Synod. He was intent on restoring the harmony between Church and state and initiated appropriate declarations on the occasion of the three hundredth anniversary of the ruling Romanov family (1913) and on the occasion of the outbreak of World War I.

In spite of the submission of the Russian Church to the state, those internal forces which are evidence of a deeply rooted religious life should not be ignored.[59] The official statistics of the Holy Synod for 1914 offer the following numbers,[60] allowing a glance into the organization and institutions of its 100 million faithful: 73 dioceses, 163 bishops, 51,105 clergymen, 1,025 monasteries, with 94,629 monks and nuns, 54,174 churches, 25,593 chapels, 4 clerical academies, 57 seminaries, 185 boys' seminaries, 37,528 parochial schools, 291 hospitals, 1,113 nursing homes, and 34,497 parish libraries. The growth rate of the monasteries is remarkable (1865: 587, 1894: 774, 1914: 1,025). Before the outbreak of World War I, the 550 monasteries housed 11,845 monks, 9,485 novices; the 475 convents had 70,283 nuns and 56,026 novices.[61] The monasteries were centers of charity. Strong influence on the public was exerted by the starets, the ordained or nonordained hermits or monks who had matured through renunciation and contemplation and worked as fathers confessor or spiritual advisers among the common people and the educated, and by the attractiveness of the places of pilgrimage, such as the cavern monastery of Kiev, the island monasteries of Valamo on Lake Ladoga, and Solovki on Onega Bay on the White Sea.

---

[58] Prince A. D. Obolenskij (1905–06), Prince A. A. Schirinskij-Schichmatov (1906), P. P. Izwolskij (1906–09), S. M. Lukianov (1909–11).

[59] I. Peresvetov, "Zur Geschichte der caritativen Tätigkeit in der Ostkirche, mit besonderer Berücksichtigung der russischen Kirche," Das diakonische Amt der Kirche, ed. by H. Krimm (Stuttgart ^{2}1953), 242–68; P. Hauptmann, "Die ekklesiologische Neubesinnung in der russischen Theologie des 20. Jahrhunderts," Kyrios 10 (1970), 225–34; F. Jockwig, "Kirche und Staatsduma. Zur politischen Aktivität der Russisch-Orthodoxen Kirche am Vorabend der Revolution," Wegzeichen. Festgabe zum 60. Geburtstag von Hermenegild M. Biedermann, ed. by E. C. Suttner, C. Patock (Würzburg 1971), 437–50; G. Simon, Kirche, Staat und Gesellschaft, 199–233; P. Hauptmann, Die Katechismen der Russisch- Orthodoxen Kirche. Entstehungsgeschichte und Lehrgehalt (Göttingen 1971); K. C. Felmy, Predigt im orthodoxen Rußland. Untersuchungen zu Inhalt und Eigenart der russischen Predigt in der zweiten Hälfte des 19. Jahrhunderts (Göttingen 1972).

[60] M. Lacko, P. Chrysostomus, "Geschichte und jetziger Stand der orthodoxen Kirchen," K. Algermissen, Konfessionskunde, 185.

The training of the clergy emphasized the study of liturgy and homiletics. Almost all branches of theology were represented by outstanding experts, for example (in Church history), E. E. Golubinsky (1834–1932), N. N. Glubovski (1863–1932), and N. F. Kapterev (1847–1917). The four clerical academies in Saint Petersburg, Moscow, Kiev, and Kazan educated respectable scholars. The episcopate consisted largely of the so-called educated monks who did not feel obligated to monastic life. Most of the eparchs stood the test as lecturers in seminaries and academies. The Russian Orthodox Church received new impetus from lay theologians, such as the landowner and private scholar Alexei Chomjakov (1804–60), the religious philosopher Vladimir Soloviev (1853–1900), and the social philosophers Sergei Bulgakov (1871–1944) and Nicolas Berdyaev (1874–1948), who were later both ordained as priests. Chomjakov developed the idea of the Church offering unity, freedom, and love. In his opinion, Orthodoxy combined unity and freedom, while Catholicism offered unity without freedom and Protestantism freedom without unity. His ideas gave rise to the much-debated doctrine of Sobornost,[62] according to which the entire community of bishops, priests, and laymen are the pillars of faith and doctrine and are thus infallible.

In the wake of ecclesiological reassessment, priests and laymen stood up for the renovation and revival of the Church. They participated in the preparations of the National Council and in the debates of the four Dumas.[63] Priests and bishops served as deputies of various parties; the 440 deputies of the third Duma included 49 representatives of the clergy. Since governmental pressures did not allow a development of parliamentary life, the ecclesiastical demands for easing dependence on the state could not be attained.

---

[61] I. Smolitsch, op. cit., 713.

[62] B. Plank, Katholizität und Sobornost'. Ein Beitrag zum Verständnis der Katholizität der Kirche bei den russischen Theologen in der zweiten Hälfte des 19. Jahrhunderts (Würzburg 1960); cf. B. Schultze, op. cit., 109–21.

[63] F. Jockwig, Kirche und Staatsduma, 437–50.

Not until a provisional government had been formed on 12 March and Tsar Nicholas II had resigned on 15 March 1917, were the plans for a National Council dealing with the reform of the Church realized. The Council convened on 15 August in Moscow and lasted until September 1918. The 586 participants were composed of the bishops from the 65 dioceses (which included 115 million faithful), 5 delegates, 2 clergymen, and 3 laymen from each bishopric. Twenty commissions deliberated an extensive reform program, based on the material prepared by the precouncil committee. The discussions about restructuring the upper Church administration took place in the turbulent days of the October Revolution, when the Bolsheviks seized power in Russia. The most important accomplishment was the restoration of the patriarchate.[64] The patriarch was to be the first among equal bishops and to cooperate with the authorities of the Church administration regarding reports to the National Council. On 5 November Muscovite Metropolitan Tychon (1865–1925) was elected patriarch of Moscow and Russia. On 21 November he was solemnly enthroned in the Cathedral of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin. Two hundred seventeen years after the death of the last patriarch, Adrian (1700), the Russian Orthodox Church was once again headed by a patriarch. The Church had entered into a new period of its history. It had shaken the shackles of the Russian State Church system, but in the following years it was systematically suppressed by Soviet Church policies, which forced its representatives to make declarations of loyalty and limited its activities to a large extent.

The political annexation of Georgia by Russia in 1811 was followed by the suspension of the independent Orthodox Georgian (Grozny) Catholics and their subjugation to the Holy Synod. A Russian exarch with his see in Tiflis received the order to incorporate the Georgian Church into the Russian State Church. In 1886, the Byzantine liturgy and preaching in the Georgian language were forbidden. On 12 March 1917, after the collapse of the Russian regime and the formation of a provisional government in Saint Petersburg, a synod granted autocephaly to the Georgian Church.[65] With its 2.5 million faithful, it became independent again, reorganized its catholicate with four bishoprics, elected Bishop Kyrion patriarch of Georgia and introduced the Georgian language into the church service.

---

[64] A. Herman, op. cit., 92–93; K. Onasch, op. cit., 127–28; J. Chrysostomus, Kirchengeschichte in der neuesten Zeit I (Munich, Salzburg 1965), 92–101.

[65] M. Tamarati, L-Église Géorgienne. Des origines jusqu'à nos jours (Rome 1910); R. Iwanitsky-Ingilo, "Lose Blätter aus der Geschichte der georgischen Kirche," Ex Oriente, op. cit., 133–51; M. Tarchnišvili, "Die Entstehung und Entwicklung der kirchlichen Autokephalie Georgiens," Kyrios 5 (1940–41), 177–93; D. M. Lang, A Modern History of Georgia (London 1962).

The Orthodox Churches in Austria-Hungary

In the middle of the nineteenth century, the Serbian metropolitan of Karlowitz became the head of all the Orthodox in Austria. His patriarchal title was approved in 1848 by Emperor Joseph I. In 1864, the bishopric of Sibiu (Hermannstadt) was taken out of the Karlowitz system and was made a metropolitan see for the Rumanians in Transylvania. After the Austro-Hungarian agreement of 1867, both Orthodox metropolitan sees were located in the Hungarian section of the Empire. Therefore, Chernovtsy in northern Bukovina was elevated to metropolis for the Cisleithan half of the Empire (1873) and also received two bishoprics in Dalmatia. The patriarch of Constantinople recognized the autocephaly of those three Churches. After their election by the appropriate Church congresses, the bishops were confirmed by the Austrian Emperor. They were controlled by the Austro-Hungarian bureaucracy, which limited them severely, because they were suspected of being potential allies of the neighboring Orthodox states. The upper Church echelon and the congresses tried to solidify their legal position in the Monarchy, which had been decreed in Austria and Hungary through imperial documents.[66]

The Church of Karlowitz took care of the Serbs in Hungary. The metropolitan, who carried the title of patriarch, and the six bishops were assisted by an episcopal synod and a national Church congress with twenty-five clergymen and fifty laymen. Both institutions also supervised the numerous Basilian monasteries. The patriarchal church had its own printing press and a theological school in Karlowitz, which was elevated to a theological faculty in 1906.

For the Orthodox Rumanians in Hungary and Transylvania, the Emperor established the Orthodox Church in Sibiu. Its metropolitan and his administration were supported by two suffragan bishops, one episcopal synod and a national Church congress (thirty clergymen, sixty laymen).

---

[66] Regarding the Eastern Churches in Austria-Hungary, cf. A. Ratel, "L'Église orthodoxe de Bukovine," ÉO 5 (1902), 225–36; M. Théarvic, "L'Eglise serbe orthodoxe de Hongrie," ibid. 5 (1902), 164–73; I. Silbernagl, J. Schnitzer, op. cit., 63–65, 180–214; K. Lübeck, op. cit., 88–90; A. Hudal, Die serbisch-orthodoxe Nationalkirche, 38–61; M. Lehmann, op. cit., 26–35. The literature gives different numbers of believers: N. Zernow (op. cit., 319) lists 800,000 for the Church of Karlowitz, 220,000 for Sibiu, and 550,000 for Bukovina-Dalmatia. K. Lübeck (op. cit., 88–90) gives much higher numbers for the first two churches: 1,063,000, 1,075,000, and 528,000. According to M. Lehman (op. cit., 66), Austria had 666,458 Orthodox, Hungary 2,799,846, Bosnia-Herzegovina 826,338 (1 January 1913).

The Orthodox Church of Chernovtsy included a metropolis of the same name in Bukovina with Slavic and Rumanian nationalities, two dioceses in Dalmatia, mainly populated by Serbs, the Orthodox congregation in Trieste, and the Serbian-Orthodox parish of St. Sava in Vienna. The metropolitan synod took place once a year in Vienna. The differences between the Rumanian and Slavic population caused conflicts between the considerable number of Rumanians, the Ukrainians, and Russophile groups. After 1909 the Austrian administration employed strict means of defense to counteract the propaganda of Russian Orthodoxy, which reached into parts of Galicia and northern Hungary.[67] The controversies climaxed in the first half of 1914 with three high treason trials.

The Austro-Hungarian government did not suggest making the four Serbian Orthodox exarchates in Bosnia and Herzegovina, whose bishops carried the metropolitan title, independent areas of jurisdiction. They remained formally subject to the patriarch of Constantinople after the occupation (1878), as well as after the annexation (1908). A seminary in Sarajevo took care of the training of prospective priests. Around the end of the nineteenth century, the Orthodox population launched a protest against the dependence of the metropolitan on the Austro-Hungarian government. This caused priests in the Bosnian eparchy of Mostar to refuse to baptize and conduct funerals (1898).

The Orthodox Churches in Southeast Europe

The struggles for freedom launched by the Balkan peoples against Turkish rule occasioned the creation of new states in Southeast Europe, whose Orthodox population was struggling for ecclesiastical independence. Five independent churches emerged in Greece, Bulgaria, Rumania, Serbia, and Montenegro.[68] After the Balkan Wars and the founding of the Albanian state in 1914, the Orthodox Albanians also tried to form an autocephalous Church. The five or six new churches were filled with belligerent nationalism and quickly consolidated themselves.

The Orthodox faithful in the principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia had preserved their customs in spite of foreign rulers and Hellenization measures by the patriarchs of Constantinople. Their monasteries, which had received generous donations, were centers of religious and cultural life. When the principality of Rumania became politically independent, the two metropolitan sees joined to form the Rumanian National Church.[69] Its independence was proclaimed in 1865 by a national synod and a national congress. The Rumanian language, which had been customary after the seventeenth century next to Old Church Slavonic but was replaced by Greek at the initiative of Constantinople, was decreed to be the liturgical language in 1862. The Holy Synod was headed by the metropolitan of Bucharest. It included 2 metropolitans, 6 eparchal bishops and 8 vicar bishops. Even though (in 1863) the estates of the patriarch of Constantinople and some Greek monasteries were confiscated and their funds deposited in a state-owned church account, the monastic system was successfully restored. In 1902 there were 22 monasteries with 709 monks and 19 convents with 1,742 nuns. In 1884 the University of Bucharest opened a theology faculty, which was in charge of two seminaries and also tried to provide a solid theological and pastoral education for the secular clergy. Its influence was felt in independent Rumanian Churches outside of Rumania: in Sibiu, Chernovtsy, and, among the Rumanians living under Russian rule, in Bessarabia. The eparchs resisted the intervention attempts of liberal ministers. Metropolitan Athanasios Mironescu had to resign in 1910.

---

[67] R. Kißling, "Die russische Orthodoxie und der Nordosten des ehemaligan Habsburgerreiches 1908–1914," Ostdeutsche Wissenschaft 9 (1962), 287–300.

[68] The patriarch of Constantinople recognized the autocephaly for those churches in Greece in 1856, Montenegro in 1878, Serbia in 1879, and Rumania in 1873. He denied it to Bulgaria in 1872.

In Bulgaria, desire for a national Orthodox Church emerged after 1860. By order of the sultan, an independent exarchate was established on 27 February 1870,[70] which was to include all Orthodox Bulgarians in one Church, in order to eliminate Russian intervention in Bulgarian Church affairs. Since Turkish and Greek groups suppressed the Bulgarians, the forces striving for freedom came together in the Bulgarian National Church, which took the lead in the struggle for freedom. The patriarchs of Constantinople refused to grant the Church independence because the expansion of the Bulgarian Church into Macedonia, then part of the Ottoman Empire, did not conform with the principle of territorial unity held by the Orthodox National Churches. Thus the patriarchs declared the Bulgarians to be schismatics.[71] In 1872 the National Assembly sanctioned an exarchal statute which had been designed by a synod in 1871. The administration of the Church was entrusted to the Holy Synod, to which the exarch in his capacity as chairman appointed 4 bishops, and to the exarchal council, composed of the exarch himself and 6 laymen. The exarchate included 32 eparchies, 11 of them located in the principality of Bulgaria, 21 in Thrace and Macedonia. Exarch Joseph (1877–1915) initially resided in Constantinople, from where he directed the eparchies in and outside of Bulgaria. After the Balkan Wars he transferred his see to Sofia (1913). He also supervised the monastery of Rila, which had been restored after a fire (1833–47) and had preserved its reputation as a national shrine. Aside from this, there were 78 monasteries with 193 monks and 14 convents with 348 nuns. In 1912 the Holy Synod complained to the government about the inadequate administration of religious instruction, which was given by liberal, often atheistic teachers. The Synod was worried about the future.

---

[69] S. Pétridès, "Les séminaires orthodoxes in Roumainie," ÉO 6 (1903), 191–98; I. Silbernagl, J. Schnitzer, op. cit., 147–62; R. Janin, op. cit. (1957), 522–24.

[70] X. Véren, "Choses de Bulgarie," ÉO 6 (1903), 328–36; S. S. Bobtchev, La lutte du peuple bulgare pour une église nationale indépendante (Sofia 1938), 1–19; S. Zankow, "Die Bulgarische Orthodoxe Kirche in Geschichte und Gegenwart," IKZ 48 (1958), 189–208; W. de Vries, Der chrisliche Osten, 137–41.

[71] On 22 February 1945, Patriarch Benjamin (1936–46) declared the end of the schism and recognized the autocephaly of the Bulgarian Church.

After the political recognition of Serbia's autonomy within Turkey (1830), the patriarch of Constantinople had granted the metropolitan of Belgrade some independence in a concordat concluded in 1832, which had been amended in 1835/36 by a consistorial statute.[72] Immediately after Serbia's declaration of independence at the Congress of Berlin (1878), Patriarch Joachim III granted the Serbian Orthodox Church its autocephaly (1879).[73] After Serbia was elevated to a kingdom (1882), the government enacted a law regarding the Church administration, which caused a conflict with Metropolitan Michael (Mihailo), who had stood up for the rights of the Church since 1859, and resulted in his dismissal in 1881. The ecclesiastical constitution of 1890 eliminated the tensions and solidified the cooperation between state and Church. It regulated the competencies of the episcopal synod, the metropolitans, and the four eparchal bishops. After the second Balkan War, the territories taken by Serbia in Macedonia and Albania were incorporated into the metropolis of Belgrade and divided into two metropolitan sees and one bishopric. The monastic system (44 monasteries with 118 monks) was still in its infancy. Aside from the theological seminary in Belgrade, a second one was opened in Prizren in 1872. The efforts exerted after the end of the nineteenth century to restore the medieval Serbian patriarchate, which had been renewed in 1557 and dissolved in 1766, failed, since the consolidation of the Serbian Churches of Belgrade, Montenegro, Karlowitz, Bosnia, Herzegovina, and Dalmatia into one patriarchate could not be realized in view of the differences between Russia and Austria-Hungary regarding Church policies.

---

[72] J. Mousset, op. cit., 54–106.

[73] I. Silbernagl, J. Schnitzer, op. cit., 162–75; N. Djordjević, Die Selbständigkeit der serbischen Kirche (Berne 1922); J. Mousset, op. cit., 301–31.

After the suspension of the Serbian patriarchate, the Orthodox Church in Montenegro was de facto independent. The metropolitan of Cetinje combined in his office spiritual and secular power. Since Danilo I (1697–1737), this double office was inherited within his family according to the custom of the Nestorian Church, a nephew always succeeding his uncle. The ecclesiastical prince entrusted the secular government to a civil governor. After the death of Metropolitan Peter III (1830–51), his nephew Danilo renounced his ordination as bishop and as Danilo II (1851–60) founded the secular principality of Montenegro, with the aid of Russia, which, since Peter I, had sent financial and diplomatic aid to the little mountainous country and succeeded in making it the base for its Balkan policy. Danilo's successor Nikita (1860–1918), after successful battles with Turkey, achieved the recognition of his country's independence (1878), including his territorial acquisitions. In 1910 he accepted the title of King. The Orthodox Church, which, since 1878, had been officially autocephalous, included, aside from its metropolis, two bishoprics, which were established in 1876 and 1913.[74] The efforts of the bishops to elevate the clerical ranks and to renovate monasticism (at the beginning of the twentieth century not more than fifteen monks each lived in the eleven monasteries) were not very successful.

After Otto I, son of King Ludwig I of Bavaria, had been elected King of Greece (1832–62), the Greek Orthodox Church,[75] which had declared its independence in 1833, organized itself as a National Church with the King as head, according to the model of the Evangelical Church of Bavaria. It was administered by a permanent Holy Synod with five active and four attending members appointed by the Minister of Religious Affairs. It was chaired by the current archbishop of Athens. In 1850 Constantinople confirmed the autocephaly of the Holy Synod, preserving the honorary primacy of the ecumenical patriarch. Through the territorial expansion of Greece in the second half of the nineteenth century, the number of eparchs rose to thirty-two. According to the constitution of 1852 the Holy Synod was independent of political authority, yet, through the royal commissioner (procurator) who was assigned to the Synod according to the Russian model and who was empowered with unlimited veto rights, it became rather dependent on the government. This was reflected, for instance, in the decline of monasteries, whose rich estates were often confiscated; nevertheless, around 1900, there were 169 monasteries and 9 convents, with almost 2,000 monks and 152 nuns. Most clergymen had nothing but an elementary school education. There were some clerical schools. Only a few priests came from the Rizarios School in Athens, which was turned into a religious teachers' seminary in 1911. Archimandrite Chrysostomos Papadopulos, later archbishop of Athens (1923–39), finally initiated the founding of several qualified seminaries for priests. In addition, there was a theological faculty in the University of Athens which had been established in 1837.

---

[74] I. Silbernagl, J. Schnitzer, op. cit., 175–79; A. Hudal, Die serbisch-orthodoxe Nationalkirche, 31–38.

[75] I. Silbernagl, J. Schnitzer, op. cit., 66–85; R. Janin, op. cit. (1957), 501–03.

The Orthodox in Albania (180,000) belonged (after 1767) to the patriarchate of Constantinople. Before Albania became a principality (1913), efforts to form a separate church where Albanian was spoken during the service rather than Greek had already begun.[76]

The Four Old Orthodox Patriarchal Churches

The patriarchates of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, which had developed during Christian antiquity, suffered under Turkish rule. The Orthodox population, like all non-Islamic groups, was treated as second-class citizens, even though its spiritual advisers were granted certain administrative autonomy. The Ottoman Empire, organized according to the Koran as a theocratic monarchy, gave the patriarch of Constantinople certain rights and recognized him as ethnarch, bearing the responsibility for the subjects of his nation not only in ecclesiastical, but also in secular areas (Millet system). This strengthened the Greek hegemony which had impaired the independence of the other three patriarchs in the Near East since the Middle Ages, at the same time transferring power to the Serbian, Bulgarian, and Rumanian eparchies. The trend toward independence within the Orthodox Churches of Southeast Europe, the growth of a middle class, and the influence of Anglican and Catholic missionaries had aided in weakening the domination of the patriarch of Constantinople over the other three patriarchates.

The ecumenical patriarchate of Constantinople[77], which comprised in the early Middle Ages the entire territory of the Byzantine Empire (624 episcopal sees), shrank more and more during the course of the nineteenth century and included at the beginning of the twentieth century only the rest of European Turkey and the coastal areas of Asia [76] In 1922, these efforts led to the creation of an autocephalous Albanian Orthodox Church, recognized in 1937 by the ecumenical patriarch.

---

[77] I. Silbernagl, J. Schnitzer, op. cit., 3–23; K. Lübeck, op. cit., 58–74; G. M. Drabadjeglon, "Geschichte und Verfassung des Ökumenischen Patriarchats," Ekklesia X (1941), 27–61; G. Every, The Byzantine Patriarchate (London 1947); G. Zananiri, Histoire de l'Église byzantine (Paris 1954); R. Janin, op. cit. (^{4}1955), 114–23; id., op. cit. (1957), 498–501; I. Totzke, Die alten Patriarchate (1959), 204–07; F. W. Fernau, op. cit., 78–81; R. Potz, op. cit., 86–98.

Minor that had been settled by Greeks. Easing of the Millet system undermined the secular rights of the patriarch. The relationship between state and Church was fundamentally regulated through a law in 1856. The so-called statutes of 1860 defined the competencies of the patriarchal synod, which was composed of twelve metropolitans under the chairmanship of the patriarch and the newly created mixed council of four bishops and eight laymen. The constitution of 1876 guaranteed the freedom of the sects existing in the Ottoman Empire and assured the privileges granted them; however, under Sultan Abdul-Hamid II (1876–1909), a judicial reform (suspending, among other things, the privilege of immunity of the Greek clergy), limitation of the patriarchal rights, and interventions in ecclesiastical life (such as in schools), finally led to a Kulturkampf between 1884 and 1890. The constitution of 1908, secured by the Young Turks, changed the Ottoman Empire into a constitutional monarchy. The ecumenical patriarch lost his right to represent Greeks and other ethnic groups under Turkish rule before the sultan, since elected deputies were now responsible for the people's representation. A law of 1910 regarding schools and churches in Macedonia interfered with the property rights of the patriarchate. The Balkan Wars in 1912/13 brought fear of losing the metropolitan sees in northern Greece. Patriarch Joachim III (1878–84, 1901–12) defended himself heroically against the tutelage of the state. He expanded the academy existing since 1844 on the island of Chalki, which was also attended by candidates of the other Orthodox Churches. He founded the periodical Ecclesiastical Truth ('Εκκλησιαστικὴ ἀλήϑεια), improved relations with other Orthodox Churches, and cultivated contacts with the Anglican Church, the Old Catholics and Protestantism. His successor Germanos V (1913–18) initially fended off the restrictions placed on the patriarchate by the Young Turks, but he finally abandoned the search for a modus vivendi with the new rulers.

The unification efforts of Leo XIII and Pius X were rejected by the patriarchs. Anthimos VII (1895–97), in his synodal encyclical of 1895, spoke of the introduction of "countless impious innovations" through the bishops of Rome[78] and protested against the activities of Uniate priests. Joachim III disputed the Assumptionists' support of the union in an encyclical of 1907.[79]

In 1901, official statistics listed 78 metropolitan sees in the ecumenical patriarchate: 42 were located in the European section of Turkey, 20 in Asia Minor, 12 on the Turkish islands of the Aegean Sea and the Sea of Marmara, 4 in Bosnia-Herzegovina, including altogether 3 million faithful. The patriarchate was responsible for some monasteries on the Turkish islands and the Athos monasteries[80] in the Asian part of Turkey, which (in 1913) housed 6,345 monks in twenty large monasteries, twelve sketes, and numerous hermitages.[81]

---

[78] Schmidlin, PG II, 518–19; W. de Vries, Orthodoxie, 134.

[79] Schmidlin, PG III, 129.

The other three old patriarchal churches existed in the shadow of Constantinople. The patriarchate of Alexandria[82] had lost its significance in the early Middle Ages when the majority of the Orthodox converted to Monophysitism. The members who had remained loyal to the Byzantine Imperial Church were called Melchites by the Copts. The Melchite patriarch transferred his residence to Constantinople at the end of the sixteenth century because of the despotism of the Turkish conquerors. The number of his followers decreased rapidly and did not increase again until the nineteenth century (through the immigration of Greeks who were supported by Orthodox dignitaries in countries around the Danube River and Russia). General Muhammad Ali (1806–49), the almost autocratically ruling Turkish governor, made sure that the patriarch was elected by the native clergy (1846) and established residence in Cairo and also in Alexandria. In the middle of the nineteenth century, the patriarchal church had only ten old churches and two monasteries. Patriarch Hierotheos II (1846–58) established a council (συμβούλιον) to which he assigned the execution of secular and miscellaneous affairs. He and his successors succeeded in easing the tensions between the Greek and Arabic faithful, to fend off partially the intervention attempts of the patriarch of Constantinople, and to initiate an upsurge in religious life. Nikanor (1866–69) created a Holy Synod according to the Russian model. Sophronios IV (1870–99) restored both monasteries and initiated the construction of churches, schools, and charity centers. Photios (1900–25) furthered these efforts and founded a patriarchal printing press which published two theological periodicals after 1908. The four metropolitian sees of this patriarchate slowly developed into ecclesiastical centers.

---

[80] I. Silbernagl, J. Schnitzer, op. cit., 52–59; Le millénaire du Mont Athos 963–1963, études et mélanges, 2 vols. (Chevetogne 1964); P. Huber, Athos. Leben, Glaube, Kunst (Zurich 1969); P. M. Mylonas, Der heilige Berg Athos: Alte Kirchen und Klöster Griechenlands. Ein Begleiter zu den byzantinischen Stätten, ed. and transl. by E. Melas (Cologne 1972), 93–119.

[81] 3,243 Greeks, 1,914 Russians, 706 Bulgarians, 379 Rumanians, 89 Serbs and Montenegrins, 14 Georgians.

[82] I. Silbernagl, J. Schnitzer, op. cit., 36; J. Lacombe, "Patriarcat grec orthodoxe d'Alexandrie," ÉO 38 (1939), 174–81; E. Michailides, "Geschichte, Verfassung und Statistik des Patriarchats von Alexandrien," Ekklesia X (1941), 71–79; R. Janin, op. cit. (^{4}1955), 161–69; id., op. cit. (1957), 508–09; T. Mosconas, "Das griechisch-orthodoxe Patriarchat von Alexandrian Kyrios 1, rev. ed. (1960–61), 129–39; I. I. Totzke, Die alten Patriarchate (1959), 301–07.

From 1724 to 1851, the patriarchate of Antioch[83] was staffed by Constantinople with Greek prelates. They were met with scepticism by the majority of the Orthodox believers who were Arabic-speaking Syrians. In addition to these internal tensions, ecclesiastical life was hampered by political unrest, e.g., the attacks by Muslim fanatics under the leadership of the Druses (members of an Islamic sect), which were directed against all Christians in Lebanon and Syria. The patriarchal church in Damascus, its treasures, and its library burned down in 1860. The Holy Synod and an ecclesiastical national council including 4 metropolitans and 8 laymen tried to curtail the progress of the Uniate Melchites and to preserve the 15 dioceses, the 14 monasteries (with a small number of monks), and the seminary of the monastery of Belement, which existed since the middle of the nineteenth century. With the support of Russia, the Syrian Meletios II Doûmanî (1899–1906) was elected patriarch. He was not recognized by the other three Old Christian patriarchs. The resulting schism was only ended under his successor Gregory IV (1906–28). Since then, the Antioch patriarchate has called itself "Syrian Orthodox." The first two Syrian patriarchs used Russian funds to renovate the seminary in Belement, increased the parishes to 68, and made possible the publication of the periodical Mercy. The ruthless attacks of the Turks on the Orthodox population at the beginning of World War I threatened all ecclesiastical activities. Only the numerous congregations composed of members who had emigrated to North and South America were able to develop without interference.

The church of Cyprus, originally under the patriarchate of Antioch,[84] became autocephalous after the Council of Ephesus. Following the Turkish conquest of 1571, it began to approach the patriarch of Antioch again. It owed him new appointments to the episcopal see of Nicosia and to the five sees whose incumbents had been executed for their participation in the Greek uprising (1821–25). Archbishop Makarios I (1854–66) emphasized the expansion of parochial schools, their network being expanded even further under the English dominion (1878–1935). Archbishops Sophronios (1865–1900) and Cyril II (1909–16) were not spared conflicts with the occupational forces, but they succeeded in ensuring the independence of their Church and in blocking the attempts by the patriarchs of Constantinople and Antioch to restore their jurisdiction. In 1910 a seminary was established in Saint

---

[83] G. Bardy, L'Église d'Antioche (Paris 1918); Alexandros, "Das Patriarchat von Antiochien," Ekklesia X (1941), 80–92; I. Totzke, Die alten Patriarchate (1960) 203–12.

[84] J. Hackett, A History of the Orthodox Church of Cyprus (London 1901); Hippolytos, "Die Autokephale Apostolische Orthodoxe Kirche Cyperns," Ekklesia X (1941), 117–29; R. Janin, op. cit. (^{4}1955), 139–44.

George's monastery at Larnaca and a bimonthly, Ecclesiastical Messenger, was published. The Church constitution of 1914 regulated the duties and tasks of the Holy Synod, of the 4 bishops, the clergy, the monks (about one hundred in seven monasteries), and of the faithful (200,000).

The patriarchate of Jerusalem,[85] with several titular archbishops, was completely dependent on the patriarchate of Constantinople until 1860, and it was only able to survive through the financial support of the Russian Church. The Brotherhood of the Holy Sepulcher, which took care of the holy places in Jerusalem and the thirty-five monasteries (seventeen in Jerusalem), had to deal with the claims of other Christian congregations. Patriarch Cyril (1842–72) restored the patriarchal school of the monastery of the Holy Cross in Jerusalem (founded in 1736), and constructed churches and schools in various cities and towns in Palestine. In 1875 a patriarchal statute concerning the rights of the patriarch and the Holy Synod was passed. The differences between the Greek hierarchy and the largely Arabic-speaking faithful required two elections. Patriarch Damianos (1897–1931), himself a Greek but favorably inclined toward Arab demands, was temporarily suspended from office by the synod due to the pressure of Greek diocesan members (1908/09). The mixed council, created in 1911 through Arab pressures, was unable to eliminate the tensions.

The small church on Mount Sinai[86] directed by the abbot of the Saint Catherine monastery, had been autocephalous since 1575. Its archbishop, consecrated since 1782 by the patriarch of Jerusalem, was responsible for thirty monks and thirty Bedouins.

The Near Eastern National Churches

Aside from the Orthodox Churches, the Eastern Churches of the Nestorians and the Monophysites (Jacobites, Thomas Christians, Copts, Ethiopians, and Armenians), independent since Christian antiquity, must be mentioned.

Of the Nestorian Church, a missionary Church which had spread during the Middle Ages into Central Asia and the coast of Malabar in India, only a few faithful had survived through modern times in Northern Mesopotamia, in the area of Lake Urmia, and in the mountains of [85] T. E. Dowling, The Orthodox Greek Patriarchate of Jerusalem (London ^{2}1913); K. Meliaras, "Die Kirche von Jerusalem," Ekklesia X (1941), 95–114; R. Janin, op. cit. (^{4}1955), 153–61.

---

[86] H. L. Rabino, Le monastère de Saint-Catherine du Mont Sinaï (Cairo 1938); H. Skrobucha, Sinai (Olten, Lausanne 1959).

Kurdistan north of Mosul.[87] Its members, also called Assyrians, a term which derived from a truncation of the words Syrian Church, were suppressed by the Muslims and cruelly persecuted by Kurdish tribes, who reduced the hierarchy decade by decade. Around 1900, the Church consisted of eight metropolitans and several suffragan bishops. Their head was the patriarch or catholicos, as he was called in the Middle Ages; he resided in Kochânes. After 1450 the Mama family furnished this highest Nestorian dignitary, an uncle always succeeded by a nephew. The patriarchs tried to curtail the missionary successes of the Chaldeans,[88] the Presbyterians, the Anglicans, and the Orthodox Russians. In 1838 3,000 faithful converted to Orthodoxy and settled in Transcaucasia. In 1898 Bishop Mar Jonah of Sunurgan and Urmia converted to Orthodoxy together with his diocesan subjects, after which the Russian Church operated an Orthodox mission in Persia and intensified its propaganda. Catholicos Simon IX Benjamin (1903–17) in 1914 considered the conversion of all Nestorians to Orthodoxy. When the faithful hoped for liberation from Muslim pressures by Russia during World War I, they were persecuted by the Turks and Kurds as traitors. Almost half of the Nestorians died trying to migrate to Persia and defending themselves in the highlands; the catholicos was murdered by a Kurd. Even his successor, Simon XX Paul (1918–20) died a violent death. The Nestorian Church witnessed one of the most difficult periods in its history.

Nor could the decline of the Jacobite Church,[89] beginning in the late Middle Ages, be stopped.[90] Its hierarchy, which had included 20 metropolitan sees and 103 dioceses in the twelfth century, was composed of 8 metropolitian sees and 3 bishoprics at the beginning of the twentieth century. The patriarchs residing in Mardin or Diarbekr repeatedly asked the Russian Church for help and carried on unification negotiations which failed because of controversies over dogma. They could not prevent the victories of the unification movement and the effectiveness of Anglican missionaries. Patriarch Ignatius XXXIV Peter III (1872–94) turned to the Coptic Church in order to overcome the isolation. In

---

[87] I. Silbernagl, J. Schnitzer, op. cit., 245–73; P. Kawerau, "Die Nestorianischen Patriarchate in der neueren Zeit," ZKG 67 (1955–56), 119–31; R. Janin, op. cit. (1957), 536–37; B. Spuler, "Die nestorianische Kirche," Handbuch der Orientalistik, op. cit., 163–69; A. S. Atiya, op. cit., 282–88.

[88] See p. 375.

[89] The name of the Jacobites was derived from James Baradai (490–578) who was ordained as bishop of Syria and Asia Minor by Monophysite Patriarch Theodosios of Alexandria and laid the foundation for an independent ecclesiastical organization.

[90] I. Silbernagl. J. Schnitzer, op. cit., 302–16; B. Spuler, "Die westsyrische (monophysitische/jakobitische) Kirche," Handbuch der Orientalistik, op cit., 213–16; A. S. Atiya, op. cit., 212–18.

1882 he succeeded in being recognized by the Turkish government as the spiritual and temporal head of the Jacobites, which theretofore had been a function of the Armenian patriarch of Constantinople. The ecclesiastical constitution of 1913/14 granted laymen the right to participate in the Church administration. In spite of all external pressures and internal difficulties, some monasteries were able to survive. The political reorganizations in the Near East after World War I, which incorporated West Syrian believers into various states, and the movement toward autonomy of the Indian branch church created new burdens.

The Thomas Christians of Malabar,[91] on the Southwest coast of India, witnessed both unions and separations throughout their colorful history.[92] The series of metropolitans who submitted to the Jacobite patriarch can be dated back to the middle of the seventeenth century. Their goal of uniting all Thomas Christians under their tutelage failed because the Uniate Syrian Church of Malabar was able to consolidate its position, because the Anglican Church Missionary Society accomplished conversions after the beginning of the English dominion (1795), and because a large part of its members left under the leadership of Bishop Mar Athanasios (1843–77). They formed the Mar Thoma Church, which preserved the organization and the customs of the Monophysites, but changed internally by adopting Anglican doctrines. Pressured by the Metropolitan Mar Dionysius V (1865/66–1909), the Jacobite Patriarch Ignatius XXXIV Peter III came to Malabar and excommunicated Bishop Athanasios and his followers in 1876. At a synod he divided the metropolis into six dioceses and ordained several bishops as metropolitans. The Church constitution, adopted at the same time, normalized relations with the patriarchate. After Metropolitan Dionysius V's death, the patriarchal and the metropolitan party launched a feud. They were striving for a separation from the mother Church and for the establishment of their own catholicate. Patriarch Ignatius XXXVI Ebd' Allah III (1906–15) tried in vain to settle the dispute. In 1911, he excommunicated the Indian Metropolitan Dionysius VI (1908–34) and his followers, appointing Metropolitan Cyril Mar Curilos (1909–11) head of the Jacobite Thomas Christians. In 1912 the metropolitan party pronounced Mar Ivanios (as Basileios I) the catholicos of India and the East, with his seat in Kottayam. The catholicos was responsible for the ordination of the bishops and the chrism, while Metropolitan Dionysius VI was entrusted with the administration of Church estates. Next to this independent Syrian Orthodox Church of the Thomas Christians, which granted the Jacobite patriarch an honorary primate, existed the church which was directly subordinate to the Jacobite patriarch.[93] Both were divided into seven dioceses, had one seminary each, and took care of the same number of the faithful, about 250,000.

---

[91] I. Silbernagl, J. Schnitzer, op. cit., 317–21; E. Tisserant, Eastern Christianity in India. A History of the Syro-Malabar Church from the Earliest Time to the Present Day (London, New York, Toronto 1957), 147–57; B. Spuler, "Die Thomas-Christen in Süd-Indien," Handbuch der Orientalistik, op. cit., 231–39; P. J. Podipara, Die Thomas-Christen (Würzburg 1966); N. J. Thomas, Die Syrisch-Orthodoxe Kirche der Südindischen Thomas-Christen. Geschichte - Kirchenverfassung - Lehre (Würzburg 1967); E. R. Hambye, J. Madey, 1900 Jahre Thomas-Christen in Indien (Freiburg i. Ue. 1972), 45–50.

[92] Cf. B. Spuler, "Die Thomas-Christen in Süd-Indien," Handbuch der Orientalistik, op. cit., after 238, table: Thomaean groups.

The Coptic Church[94] became stable in the first half of the nineteenth century, when the Turkish governor Muhammad Ali (1806–49) ensured an orderly administration in Egypt and did not put any obstacles in the way of the development of the Christian community. Energetically the patriarchs continued the ecclesiastical renovation that had begun under Mark VIII (1796–1809). Peter VIII (1809–52) ordained a bishop for the Sudan and increased the dioceses to thirteen. Cyril IV (1854–61) contributed to the reform of the Church by founding schools, establishing printing presses and constructing churches. Under Demetrios II (1862–75) and Cyril V (1854–1927), a new self-awareness and internal consolidation of the Copts was demonstrated in the new editions of old Coptic works and in theological publications which dealt with dogmatic, historical, and canon law questions. Conflicts arose between the conservative forces, represented by the influential monks and Patriarch Cyril V, and the Coptic National Council of 1874, in which the laymen had participatory rights regarding Church administration. Efforts toward a better training of the clergy in two seminaries and at the theological faculty in Cairo, expansion of the dioceses, missionary victories among the Muslims, and the cooperation of eager laymen assured the Copts (in terms of numbers the strongest Christian sect in Egypt) a respectable position within the Monophysite Churches in the twentieth century.

The Ethiopian Church[95] was dependent on the Coptic patriarchate.

---

[93] For decades, there were trials concerning Church property and controversies about the legality of excommunications declared by the Jacobite patriarch. Not until 1958–59 did the two Churches come to terms and unite. Catholicos Mar Basileios III George II (1929–64) headed the "Orthodox Church of the South Indian Thomaeans" after 1959.

[94] I. Silbernagl. J. Schnitzer, op. cit., 274–93; J. G. zu Sachsen, Neue Streifzüge durch die Kirchen und Klöster Ägyptens (Leipzig, Berlin 1930); R. Strothmann, Die koptische Kirche in der Neuzeit (Tübingen 1932); R. Janin, op. cit. (1957), 532–34; M. Cramer, Das christlich-koptische Ägypten einst und heute. Eine Orientierung (Wiesbaden 1959); S. Chauleur, Histoire des Coptes d'Égypte (Paris 1960), 147–63; B. Spuler, "Die koptische Kirche," Handbuch der Orientalistik, op. cit., 299–308.

[95] I. Silbernagl. J. Schnitzer, op. cit., 294–301; H. M. Hyatt, The Church of Abbyssinia (London 1928); J. B. Coulbeaux, Histoire politique et religieuse d'Abyssinie depuis les temps

Its only metropolitan, the Abuna (our father), was appointed by the Coptic patriarch from the ranks of monks around him, ordained bishop, and placed at the head of the native, uneducated, numerous clergy, who considered him an intruder. Next to him, the native abbot of the monastery of Dabra Lebanos played an important role. He carried the honorary title Etschege (the one standing next to the throne). He directed the extensive monastic system and administered the estates. The spiritual adviser Abuna Salama (1841–67) was known for his infamous life style and his simony. He and his successors had little freedom within the State Church, which had been involved in the struggles of the small princes fighting for ultimate power. Not until the domestic political situation was cleared under Emperors John IV (1872–89) and Menelik II (1889–1909), did state initiatives bring about renewal within the Church. In 1881 Emperor John IV asked the patriarch for four bishops and assigned them to certain territories. One of them, Matthew, later rose to Abuna (1889–1926) and transferred his see, according to Menelik II's wish, from Gondar to the imperial residence of Addis Ababa (1893). After his death, the monarch succeeded in reforming the Ethiopian Church and separating it from the mother church.[96]

Since the Middle Ages, the Armenian catholicate had been divided into five branch churches,[97] whose catholicates, or rather patriarchates, were Echmiadzin, Constantinople, Agthamar, Cilicia, and Jerusalem. The catholicos of Echmiadzin was the head and representative of all Armenians, and the other high dignitaries recognized his honorary primacy. The Armenian monks obeyed the rules of Saint Basil. The bishops, supported in their diocesan administration by a council composed of clergy and laymen, ordained priests, deacons, and "vardapets" (preachers and teachers). In 1828 the main area of Armenia (Greater les plus reculés jusqu'à l'avènement de Ménélik II, 2 vols. (Paris 1929); R. Janin, op. cit. (1957), 534–36; B. Spuler, "Die äthiopische Kirche," Handbuch der Orientalistik, op. cit., 314–18; E. Hammerschmidt, Äthiopien. Christliches Reich zwischen gestern und morgen (Wiesbaden 1967); F. Heyer, Die Kirche Äthiopiens. Eine Bestandsaufnahme (Berlin, New York 1971).

---

[96] Under Haile Selassie (after 1928 negus, after 1930 emperor), four native bishops were ordained in 1929. Cyril (1929–50) was the last Coptic abuna. After the death of Coptic Patriarch Cyril VI (1959), the Ethiopian Church was declared an independent patriarchal church, granting the head of the mother church only an honorary rank.

[97] I. Silbernagl, J. Schnitzer, op. cit., 214–44; M. Ormanian, The Church of Armenia. Her History, Rule, Discipline, Liturgy, Literature, and Existing Condition (London ^{2}1955); R. Janin, op. cit. (^{4}1955), 345–52; id., op. cit. (1957), 528–31; B. Spuler, "Die armenische Kirche," Handuch der Orientalistik, op. cit., 259–68; J. Mécérian, Histoire et institutions de l'Église arménienne. Évolution nationale et doctrinale, spiritualité - monachisme (Beirut 1965); A. K. Sanjian, The Armenian Communities in Syria under Ottoman Dominion (London 1965).

Armenia, Yerevan) was incorporated into the Russian Empire, which had previously intervened in the election of the catholicos of Echmiadzin. A basic law, enacted by Nicholas I in 1836, subjected the Armenian Church to his control. A synodal council, an imperial commissioner, and an administrative adviser for secular affairs exercised the same funtions as the Holy Synod and the chief procurator in the Russian Church. Nicholas II in 1896 and 1903 nationalized the entire Church property, which was partially restored in 1905. Catholicos Georg V Surenian (1911–30), who was responsible for seven dioceses in Russia and two in Persia, achieved the independence of the Armenian Church when the Russian Revolution enabled the formation of the Soviet Republic of Armenia.[98]

The sultan had assigned the supervision of all Armenians in his Empire to the Armenian patriarchate of Constantinople (Millet system), making it responsible for the three areas of jurisdiction in Aghtamar, Cilicia, and Jerusalem. Regarding the administration, he was assisted by three councils (one clerical, one secular, and one mixed council), whose competencies were precisely defined in a national statute of 1860. Through the formation of new Southeastern European states in the second half of the nineteenth and in the beginning of the twentieth century, the patriarchate lost several dioceses; in 1914, it still included 12 archbishoprics, 27 bishoprics, and 6 monasteries. Thousands of people lost their lives when, in 1894/96 and 1909, fanatical Turks ruthlessly threatened the Armenians because of their language and religion, charging them with Russophilia at the beginning of World War I. Mass deportations, forced conversions to the Muslim religion, and emigrations weakened the patriarchate tremendously.

Even the small catholicate of Aghtamar on Lake Van suffered from such persecutions. Catholicos Katchadar Chirojan (1864–95) had no successors. The last vestiges of his area of jurisdiction were taken over in 1895 by the patriarchate of Constantinople and in 1915 by the catholicate of Echmiadzin.

The catholicate, or rather patriarchate of Cilicia in Little Armenia (2 archbishoprics, 10 dioceses, and 2 monasteries) was incorporated into the patriarchate of Constantinople according to the national statute of 1860; it was able, however, to preserve a certain measure of autonomy in spite of pressures by the Turkish government.

The patriarchate of Jerusalem, which took care of the Armenians in Palestine, Syria, and on the island of Cyprus, was divided into 5 dioceses. When the patriarchate of Constantinople took power, it was limited to the administration of the diocese of Jerusalem, whose spiritual center was the Jacob Monastery.[99]

---

[98] After a short time, the successful reconstruction of the Church was threatened by persecutions, which all religious communities in the Soviet Union had to suffer. They did not cease until the catholicos was willing to declare his loyalty toward the regime and to serve Soviet foreign policies.

This summary of the internal and external situation of the independent Eastern Churches shows what paralyzing effect the pressures by Russia, Turkey, and other states had on Church organization and the life of the believers. Reform movements can be found among the Orthodox, e.g., in Russia and on Cyprus, and among the Monophysites, e.g., in southern India and Egypt. However, they did not have the strength to break the shackles imposed on them by the states. Therefore their efforts toward mutual communication and collaboration in the ecumenical movement remained futile.[100] Some Church dignitaries cultivated contacts with the Anglican and Old Catholic bishops; however, the centuries-old prejudices and dogmatic differences disclosed deep rifts. Church historians and liturgical scholars of Eastern and Western Christianity studied its past, so rich in traditions, and recognized the value of preserving Old Christian treasures. However, the desire for closer relations between the Orthodox, Nestorian, and Monophysite congregations and for contact with the separated Christians of the West did not emerge until after World War I and after the breakthrough of the ecumenical movement in the following decades.

The Uniate Eastern Churches

In spite of all the schisms between the Eastern and Western hemispheres of Christianity, the Popes tried to restore unity. When they finally succeeded in concluding union treaties with the Orthodox Churches in Eastern Europe at the end of the sixteenth and in the seventeenth century, they expected to reduce the hardened barriers between the papacy and the Christian East, and unions with the Near East, Ethiopia, and India were established.[101] But in spite of some success they had to endure backlashes. The pontificate of Leo XIII, oriented toward the future, opened new perspectives toward unification.[102] Around 1900, approximately 8 million believers[103] were jurisdictionally assigned to the Armenian patriarchate of Cilicia, the Maronite, Melchite, and Syrian patriarchates of Antioch, the Chaldean patriarchate of Babylon, the Uniate Coptic patriarchate of Alexandria, and to several archbishoprics and bishoprics in eastern and southern Europe, in Lower Italy and in southern India.[104] On the basis of their liturgical languages they were divided into five groups: the Byzantine, Alexandrian, Antiochic (West Syrian), Chaldean (East Syrian), and Armenian rite. They were defined by the liturgies within and without the Byzantine Imperial Church in Christian antiquity.

---

[99] Regarding the present day jurisdiction of the Armenians, cf. M. Krikorian, J. Madey, "The Armenian Church. Extension, Hierarchy, Statistics," OstkSt 21 (1972), 323–25.

[100] K. Lübeck, op. cit., 193–206; C. Lialine, La position spéciale de l'Orthodoxie dans le problème œcuménique: 1054–1954. L'Église et les églises, op. cit. II, 389–413; G. Florowski, op. cit., 231–96; N. Zernow, op. cit., 317–58; F. Heiler, op. cit., 402–05.

[101] Cf. G. Zananiri, Catholicisme orientale (Paris 1966), 241–50: chronology; Atlas zur Kirchengeschichte. Die christlichen Kirchen in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. by H. Jedin, K. S. Latourette, J. Martin (Freiburg, Basel, Vienna 1970), 132: the development of the Catholic Eastern Churches and the most important unification efforts.

The Byzantine Rite

The different versions of the Byzantine rite, also called Greek rite, were most popular among the Ruthenians, Russians, Rumanians, Hungarians, Serbs, Bulgarians, Greeks, Melchites, and Georgians.

The inclusion of the Orthodox metropolis of Kiev and all of Ruthenia into the Catholic Church through the Union of Brest in 1595/96 was the foundation for the reunification of the Ruthenians (Ukrainians) with the Roman center. The efforts in this respect were continued in Uzhgorod (1646), including the Carpatho-Ruthenians, Slovaks, Hungarians, and Rumanians.

Russia, penetrating into eastern central Europe in the eighteenth and nineteenth century, forced the Ruthenians living under its rule to convert to the Orthodox Church. In 1875 the only remaining diocese, Chelm, was dissolved.[105] In spite of ruthless persecutions, 50,000 believers remained loyal to the union and in 1904 sent a delegation to Pius X. Their expectation that Nicholas II's edict of toleration would be applied to them was not fulfilled. They were only allowed to convert to Roman Catholicism.

In the Habsburg Monarchy, in Galicia, in Hungary, and in Transylvania, the Ruthenians were able to develop their Church organization. In the archbishopric of Lemberg (Lvov), a second bishopric (Stanislav) was formed within the suffragan bishopric of Przemyśl. The reform of the Basilian order, the Provincial Synod of Lemberg of 1891, the founding of the Ruthenian College in Rome in 1897, the two archbishops Sylvester Cardinal Sembratovitch (1882–98) and Duke Andreas Szepticki (1900–44) led to the golden age of their Church[106] (counting over 3 million believers within its three dioceses). The golden age was documented by the establishment of new orders (the Studites, an eastern branch of the Redemptorists, the female Basilians, the female Studites, the congregation of the Servants of the Immaculate Virgin Mary), new theological institutions, periodicals, schools, and charity centers. Basilian Archbishop Szepticki[107] was known beyond Galicia's borders for his pastoral and missionary ambitions, his patronage, and primarily for his efforts regarding unification. His pastoral letters of 1907 and 1908 dealt with the theme of unity, which he tried to realize in the spirit of tolerance and love. After 1910 he was president of the Welehrade Union Congress.[108] He became one of the outstanding figures of the union movement and was admired as the patriarch of the Ruthenians.

---

[102] See above, pp. 336–43.

[103] Atlas zur Kirchengeschichte, 138–39.

[104] Basic information about the history of the unions, cf., in addition to the chapter bibliography, A. Ehrhard, op. cit., 24–45; I. Silbernagl, J. Schnitzer, op. cit., 325–85; K. Lübeck, op. cit., 30–39; P. Werhun, "Die orientalischen Riten und kirchlichen Gemeinschaften," Der christliche Osten, op. cit., 350–68; W. de Vries, Der christliche Osten; R. Janin, op. cit. (1957), 538–44; C. Korolevskij, Liturgie in lebender Sprache. Orient und Okzident (Klosterneuburg near Vienna 1958); R. F. Esposito, op. cit., 42–361; P. Hofmeister, "Die Kultsprachen der Ostkirchen," OstkSt 11 (1962), 196–203; A. Brunello, op. cit., 499–521; F. Heiler, op. cit., 406–14.

[105] See above, p. 172.

Szepticki supported White Russian students in order to restore the torn ties between the Ukrainian and White Russian people. In 1907 he traveled incognito to White Ruthenia, to the Russian Ukraine, and to Moscow. Through talks and negotiations, he initiated a new union movement of the Byzantine Slavic rite, which was expressly approved by Pius X the next year. Centers for the Russian Uniates[109] were Saint Petersburg and Moscow.

As in Galicia, the Uniate Ruthenians in Hungary's bishoprics of Munkacs (Slovak: Mukachëvo) and Eperjes (Slovak: Prešov) enjoyed an upswing through their own initiative and state aid. In the small bishopric of Kreutz (Croatian: Krizevci), established in 1777 for the Uniates of Croatia, Slavonia, and Batschka, almost half of the faithful were Ruthenians who had emigrated from Galicia and Carpatho-Russia to the south of Hungary.

---

[106] A. Korczok, Die griechisch-katholische Kirche in Galizien (Leipzig, Berlin 1921); T. Halusczynskyj, "Die gegenwärtige Lage der katholischen Kirche (ukrainisch-katholischer Ritus)," Ex Oriente, op. cit., 90–101; Die Kirche und das östliche Christentum. Ukraine und die kirchliche Union, ed. by the Catholic Emigrantenfürsorge Berlin (Berlin 1930); Documenta Pontificum Romanorum historiam Ucrainae illustrantia (1075–1953) II, ed. by A. G. Welykyj (Rome 1954), 453–515; L. Nemec, "The Rutheninan Uniate Church in its Historical Perspective," CH 37 (1968), 365–88; J. Madey, Le Patriarcat Ukrainien vers la perfection de l'état juridique actuel (Rome 1971).

[107] A. Szepticky, "Das russische katholische Exarchat," Ex Oriente, op. cit., 78–89; J. Drozd, "Andreas Šeptyckyj, metropolita Leopoliensis, praeses Academiae Velehradensis 1910–1939," Acta Academiae Velehradensis 18 (Olmütz 1947), 92–102; G. Prokotschuk, Der Metropolit. Leben und Wirken des großen Förderers der Kirchenunion Graf Andreas Scheptytzkyj (Munich 1955); J. Madey, Kirche zwischen Ost und West, 174–99.

[108] See above, p. 344.

[109] See chap. 11, above, p. 170.—In 1917, Szepticki convened the first synod for the Uniate Russians in Saint Petersburg, after three years of captivity. By authority of Pius X, he appointed Leonid Feodorov exarch for Russia. The new government recognized the new exarch at first, but later dismissed him from office and sent him to Siberia, where he died in 1935.

In Transylvania, in the church province of Alba Julia-Făgăras, with its suffragan bishoprics of Oradea Mare, Lugoj and Szamos Ujvár, the Rumanian Byzantine rite was used. Like the Uniate Ruthenians, the Rumanians expanded their educational system, their press, and their charity. But while trying to preserve their national identity, they had to struggle with the Magyarization measures of the administration.

The Uniate Hungarians,[110] belonging partly to the Ruthenian dioceses, partly to the Rumanian dioceses, after 1868 demanded their own ecclesiastical jurisdiction and introduction of Hungarian as the liturgical language. In 1873 the vicariate of Hadjudorog, composed of thirty-three congregations, was established for the Hungarian Uniates. Pressured by the Hungarian faithful and the government, Pius X through the bull Christi fideles Graeci ritus (1912) created the diocese of the same name[111] and demanded that it use Old Greek as the liturgical language. He approved Hungarian only for extraliturgical functions. Nevertheless, the liturgy was celebrated in the people's language. After World War I, the diocese was reduced by turning seventy-seven parishes over to the Uniate Church in Rumania, which also incorporated the archbishopric of Fogarasch and parts of the Slovak bishopric of Mukachëvo. The rest of this diocese and the bishopric of Prešov were given to Czechoslovakia.[112] After the end of the nineteenth century, many Uniate Ruthenians and Rumanians emigrated to South and North America, where they created their own hierarchy.

Bishop Josip Jurij Stroßmayer of Djakovo helped the Uniate Serbs and stood up for them even outside of his bishopric.

According to the census of 1910, the number of Uniates in Austria was 3.5 million, in Hungary 1.9 million, and in Bosnia-Herzegovina 8,000.

---

[110] AAS IV (1912), 429–35; G. Patacsi, "Die ungarischen Ostchristen," OstkST 11 (1962), 273–305; I. Žeguc, Die nationalpolitischen Bestrebungen der Karpato-Ruthenen 1848–1914 (Wiesbaden 1965), 113–16; G. Adrianyi, Friedrich Graf Revertera, 216–66, 310–12; id., "Die Bestrebungen der ungarischen Katholiken des byzantinischen Ritus um eigene Liturgie and Kirchenorganisation um 1900," OstkSt 21 (1972), 116–31; E. Weinzierl, Spannungen in der österreichisch-ungarischen Monarchie 1878–1914, see above, chap. 2.

[111] See above, p. 345.

[112] Immediately after World War II, the unions of eastern Central Europe were dissolved under Soviet pressure (1946 in western Ukraine, 1948 in Rumania, 1949 in Slovakia). Only the two dioceses of Hajdudorog in Hungary and Kreutz in Yugoslavia survived.

In Bulgaria the union movement, initiated by Titular Archbishop Joseph Sokolski (1860–61), could not develop because of Russian intervention. Under Raphael Popoff (1865–76), the movement took hold in Macedonia and Thrace, assisted by the Assumptionists, Lazarists and Resurrectionists. In 1883 Leo XIII established an Apostolic Administration in Constantinople, which was responsible for two vicariates apostolic in Macedonia and Thrace. The approximately 15,000 faithful suffered from the pressures of the Bulgarian exarch, the Orthodox bishops, and the Turkish government.

The Uniate Greeks had even less of a chance to expand. They owed their internal organization to Hyacinth Marango's efforts, who founded a periodical in Constantinople in 1865 and established two congregations. The Assumptionists continued his work in the seminary of Kadikoy and through the periodical Échos d'Orient. In 1909 John Papadopulos was appointed vicar general of the Apostolic Delegates of Constantinople for the Uniate Greeks. In 1911 he was ordained bishop and entrusted with the independent administration of the small congregations. Hyacinth Marango also made propaganda for the Uniates in the Kingdom of Greece, but because of the anti-Catholic animosities of the Orthodox population he was only moderately successful. Leo XIII's efforts regarding the educational institute in Athens patronized by him and the work of several orders essentially failed. The Catholic archbishop of Athens was responsible for 2,000 Uniate Greeks in his capacity as apostolic delegate.

The Italo-Greeks and the Italo-Albanians, centered in the Basilian abbey of Grottaferrata near Rome, in Calabria, and Sicily, were threatened by Latinization measures or mixtures of Latin and Byzantine liturgies, but their independence was supported by Leo XIII. He decreed the elimination of any liturgical additions which did not agree with the Byzantine rite.

The Melchites were headed by the patriarch of Antioch.[113] Maximos III Mazlum (1833–55) after 1838 also was the incumbent of the two Uniate patriarchal sees of Alexandria and Antioch. Gregory II Jussef Sayyur, whose jurisdiction over all Melchites was expressly recognized by Leo XIII in 1894, Peter IV Geraigiry (1898–1903), and Cyril VIII Geha (1903–16) improved the organization of the four archbishoprics and eight bishoprics with the help of the patriarchal vicars of Alexandria and Jerusalem. They provided a good education for the secular clergy in the Seminary of Saint Anna in Jerusalem and made sure that the orders could expand. Among others, the three Basilian congregations and the congregation of the Paulinists, founded by Archbishop Germanos Moakkad of Baalbek (died in 1912), excelled in their educational, charitable, and missionary activities. They succeeded in bringing together all the faithful scattered throughout the Near East and Egypt (1907: 140,000) and to affirm their loyalty to the Apostolic See, in spite of the social differences among the believers and demands from the laity for more participation, according to the Orthodox model. The Synod of Aïn-Traz in Lebanon (4 April to 8 July 1909) dealt with dogmatic and pastoral questions in order to improve religious life. The results of the thorough deliberations were defined in 1,017 articles,[114] which were sent to Rome in a Latin translation, but failed to be approved because of some questionable points. The Synod favored the further development of the Melchites in organizational and spiritual respects. The Arab paper The Good Will, whose publication was decided at the Synod, carried the basic concepts to the public.

---

[113] Silbernagl, J. Schnitzer, op. cit., 334–41; R. Janin, op. cit. (^{4}1955), 275–87; R. F. Esposito, op. cit., 61–78.

In Georgia, Theatines (after 1629) and Capuchins (after 1662) had solicited support for the union. In 1848, the 50,000 Georgian Catholics were subordinated to the bishop of Tiraspol. Ten thousand of them were Uniates, mostly Armenians, and only a small portion adhered to the Byzantine liturgy.[115] In 1886 the Russian government forbade this liturgy as well as the use of the Georgian language in sermons and public church service. After World War I, some priests took care of these faithful, who subsequently suffered the reprisals of the Soviet government.

The Alexandrian Rite

This group of liturgies includes the Uniate Copts and the Egyptians. The union of the Copts, initiated in the eighteenth century by the Franciscan Friars,[116] progressed when Leo XIII supported the union in his apostolic letter of 11 July 1895,[117] and when he responded to the request of a delegation under the leadership of Cyril Makarios of 26 November by restoring the Alexandrian patriarchate.[118] Aside from the patriarchal bishopric, he established the dioceses of Hermopolis and Thebes. In 1899 he made Cyril Makarios patriarch. With resolutions regarding the faith, liturgy, and hierarchy, the Synod of Cairo of 1898 laid the foundation for the organization of the Church.[119] Its reconstruction was interrupted when the ambitious patriarch resigned in 1908 and converted to Orthodoxy.[120] He was replaced by an apostolic administrator. The number of Uniate Copts increased from 4,630 (1897) to 14,576 (1907).

---

[114] C. de Clercq, op. cit., 790–831. These articles deal with worship (nos. 1–110), the hierarchy (nos. 111–546), the Sacraments (nos. 547–875), and problems of canon law (nos. 876–1017).

[115] S. Bathmanschwili, "L'Église catholique en Géorgie," Ex Oriente, op. cit., 152–58; R. Janin, op. cit. (^{4}1955), 320–21.

[116] R. Janin, op. cit. (^{4}1955), 490–92; S. Chauleur, op. cit., 163–66; R. F. Esposito, op. cit., 327–49.

[117] ASS XXVII (1894–95), 705–09.

[118] ASS XXVIII (1895–96), 257–60.

For the Uniate Ethiopians, who were cared for since the middle of the nineteenth century by French Lazarists and Italian Capuchins, Leo XIII, in addition to the two existing vicariates apostolic, created an apostolic prefecture for the area of Eritrea (1894), which had become an Italian colony in 1890. In 1896 he sent Cyril Makarios to Addis Ababa, who asked in his behalf for the release of Italian prisoners. In his correspondence with Emperor Menelik II (1889–1909) he tried to improve the situation of the Uniates which, for political reasons, was difficult. Pius X also appealed to him in 1906. In 1910, by order of the Pope, the first native Ethiopian, Abuna Kidana Maryam Kassa, was ordained as bishop of Asmara. After 1911 he headed the vicariate apostolic of Asmara for the 4,000 Uniate Ethiopians.

The Antioch Rite

This group of rites included the Uniate Jacobites and Maronites. After 1783 these Syrians (West Syrians)[121] from Syria, Mesopotamia, and Egypt had been subject to the patriarch of Antioch, who resided in Mardin after 1854. After the settlement of internal disputes at the Synod of Scharfa,[122] where the ecclesiastical situation was newly regulated, the patriarchs gave their Church a clearer profile. With the help of four metropolitans, six bishops, and foreign and native orders, they improved the training and material security of the clergy and expanded the educational system. Aside from Patriarch Cyril Behnam Benni (1893–97), Ignatius Ephraim II Rachmani (1898–1929) also contributed to the stabilization of the union through his historical and liturgical studies as well as the addition of a Syrian ritual. When the faithful in Turkey (80,000) were threatened by persecutions during World War I, their number decreased, and dwindled further through emigrations. The patriarchal see was moved from Mardin in Turkey to Beirut.

---

[119] C. de Clercq, op. cit., 759–80.

[120] In 1912, in Rome, he was restored to communion. He died in Beirut in 1921.

[121] R. Janin, op. cit. (^{4}1955), 387–393; W. de Vries, "Dreihundert Jahre syrisch-katholische Hierarchie," OsthSt 5 (1956), 137–57.—The West Syrian Rite was also used by a group of Thomaeans, who had separated from the Monophysite Church of the Jacobites in Southern India in 1930. For the Uniate Malankars, the archbishopric of Trivandrum was established (1933). Its faithful increased rapidly in the next decades (60,000).

[122] C. de Clercq, op. cit., 599–628.

The Maronites,[123] in the only patriarchal Uniate Church without a parallel separated Eastern Church, had strongly increased in the eighteenth century. But in 1861/62 many of them fell victim to the terror of the Druses. In 1885 there were 1,050 secular clergymen, 800 monks in 45 monasteries, and 8 convents. Around 1900 there existed 9 dioceses, 3 patriarchal seminaries, 6 diocesan seminaries, and a flourishing native order system, following the rules of Saint Anthony. Under Patriarch Paul Masad (1854–90) and Patriarch Elias Peter Huayek (1899–1931) the religious life of the Maronites improved (1913: 250,000), and was further strengthened by the Maronite College in Rome, which had been founded in 1584 and renewed by Leo XIII in 1891.

The Chaldean Rite

The Chaldean and Maronite rites belong to the East Syrian group of liturgies. The center of the Chaldeans[124] (Uniate Nestorians) was located in Mesopotamia. Under their Patriarch Joseph II Audo (1848–78), residing in Mosul, an internal crisis broke out. It began with the patriarch's attempt to extend his jurisdiction over the Uniate Malabars, and the crisis was intensified through the Holy See's interventions in the administration of the Chaldean Church, reaching its climax in 1869 when Joseph II Audo refused to ordain two bishops appointed in Rome. In 1870 Pius X offered him the alternatives of either consecrating the bishops or resigning. Even though he yielded in this matter and in regard to controversies about the wisdom of the definition of infallibility, new tensions developed pertaining to the Uniate Malabars. These tensions first decreased under Elias XII Abolionan (1879–94) and Joseph Emanuel II Thomas (1900–47), when Leo XIII assured them of his benevolence. Under those two patriarchs, many Nestorians found their way to the union, so that in 1914 100,000 believers belonged to the Chaldean Church in four archbishoprics and eight bishoprics. Aside from Dominicans, Capuchina, Lazarists, Carmelites, and Pallottines, two native congregations intensified the internal life of the Church.

---

[123] I. Silbernagl, J. Schnitzer, op. cit., 361–385; K. Friz, "Die christlichen Minderheiten im Vorderen Orient," Kyrios 3 (1938), 208–23; R. Janin, op. cit.(^{4}1955), 457–62; R. F. Esposito, op. cit., 268–84; B. Spuler, "Die Maroniten," Handbuch der Orientalistik, op. cit., 217–25; P. Dib, Histoire de l'église Maronite, 2 vols. (Beirut 1962); A. S. Atiya, op. cit. 389–423.

[124] I. Silbernagl, J. Schnitzer, op. cit., 350–57; W. de Vries, "Nel quarto centenario della chiesa cattolica caldea," Civ Catt 103 (1952), 236–52; R. Janin, op. cit. (^{4}1955), 422–29; R. F. Esposito, op. cit., 287–308; H. Schulte, Der Beginn. Eine Hilfsaktion für den christlichen Orient (Limburg 1966).

The Malabars had difficulty[125] disassociating themselves from their dependence on the Latin hierarchy. Patriarch Joseph II Audo's efforts to replace the Latin Carmelite missionaries with Bishop Mar Rocco as head of the Malabar Church failed. In 1874–76 about 24,000 believers assembled around Chaldean Bishop Elias Mellus of Accra, whom his patriarch had sent to Southern India. They separated from the union[126] and joined the Nestorian Catholicate in 1907 (neo-Nestorian Church; 1914: 14,000 members). In 1887 Leo XIII withdrew the Uniates from the supervision of the Latin bishops and created for them the two vicariates apostolic of Trichur and Kottayam, which were at first entrusted to Latin prelates until, in 1897, the Pope filled three independent vicariates apostolic with native bishops. Their rites were cleansed from Latin additions. In the following years, their numbers rose from 200,000 (around 1900) to 300,000 (1914).[127]

The Armenian Rite

In 1867, when Pius IX combined the two Uniate Churches of Constantinople and Cilicia, a crisis broke out among the Uniate Armenians,[128] causing the nomination of a competing patriarchal candidate after the First Vatican Council and the conversion of numerous Uniates to Monophysitism. The crisis was finally settled when Leo XIII appointed Patriarch Anthony Peter IX Hassan (1867–80) cardinal of the Curia and Stephen Peter X Azarian (1881–99) his successor. At a synod in 1890 dogmatic, ritual, and organizational matters were discussed.[129] The Pope supported the reconstruction of the patriarchate (2 archbishoprics, 13 bishoprics) by erecting the Armenian College in Rome (1883), which had already been planned in 1584 by Gregory XIII, and by approving the constitutions of the Viennese Mechitarists (1885). He also helped those Armenians who were threatened by the Turks (1894–96). In 1911 new controversies erupted, ignited by the differences between Patriarch Paul V Peter XIII (1910–31) and the laity in the Church administration who demanded more participatory rights. The patriarch was expelled by the Turkish authorities. In 1911 he held a synod in Rome, which was unable, however, to settle the internal difficulties. The atrocities inflicted upon the Armenians during World War I, killing about 50 percent of their clergy, paralyzed the further development of the 100,000 believers in the Armenian patriarchal Church.[130] More favorable was their situation in the Armenian archbishopric of Lemberg (2,500), in Rumania (30,000), and in Russia (40,000).[131] After World War II, however, they succumbed to Soviet ecclesiastical policies.

---

[125] I. Silbernagl, J. Schnitzer, op. cit., 357–58; E. Tisserant, op. cit., 108–20; R. F. Esposito, op. cit., 309–26; E. R. Hambye, J. Madey, op. cit., 55–58.

[126] Elias Mellus joined the union again in 1889 and became bishop of Mardin (1893–1908).

[127] Finally, in 1923, a Church province was established for the Uniate Malabars, which has two archbishoprics and five bishoprics today with 1.5 million believers.

[128] C. de Clercq, op. cit., 719–52.

[129] I. Silbernagl, J. Schnitzer, op. cit., 342–49; R. Janin, op. cit. (^{4}1955), 355–64; R. F. Esposito, op. cit., 213–18; B. Spuler, "Die armenische Kirche," 264–66; A. K. Sanjian, op. cit.; P. Krüger, "Die armenischen Mechitharisten und ihre Bedeutung," OstkSt 16 (1967), 3–14.

The spiritual Latinization of the Eastern Churches was finally stopped by Leo XIII after the First Vatican Council.[132] He had recognized the unique qualities of the Uniates beyond their liturgical customs. The strengthening expected by the Pope, however, was hampered by internal and external difficulties. The superimposition of the Latin liturgy on the Syrians, Malabars, and Maronites continued to exist. The lay portion of the Church administration, customary in the independent Eastern Churches, caused tensions (e.g., among the Armenians). The possibilities of growth were curtailed by continuous state pressures, especially in Russia and Turkey, and by the persecutions of the Armenians, Chaldeans, Georgians, Maronites, and Syrians. Only the Ruthenians and Rumanians in Austria-Hungary, as well as the Malabars in Southern India improved their Church organization. All Uniate dignitaries tried to elevate the educational level of their clergy, to return to the original liturgy of their Churches and to devise contemporary spiritual care. The help they received from Leo XIII and Pius X had positive effect on their initiatives and defined the position of the patriarchs, bishops, and secular and regular clergy.[133]

---

[130] After World War I, the number decreased to 60,000 people who lived in Egypt, Lebanon, Persia, Syria, Turkey, and, after the emigration, especially in France. In 1928, an Armenian episcopal conference was held in Rome which reorganized the bishoprics and devised new guidelines for pastoral work in the diaspora. Regarding the current hierarchy of the Uniate Armenian Church, cf. M. Krikorian, J. Madey, op. cit., 325.

[131] A. M. Ammann, op. cit., 517–18, 535–36, 581–82.

[132] W. de Vries, in collaboration with O. Bârlea, J. Gill, M. Lacko, Rom und die Patriarchate des Ostens (Freiburg, Munich 1963), 232–37, 318–27; J. Hajjar, "L'Épiscopat catholique oriental et le Ier Concil du Vatican d'après la correspondance diplomatique française," RHE 65 (1970), 423–55, 737–88; id., Zwischen Rom und Byzanz, 221–52.

[133] C. de Clercq, op. cit., 1007–20.

PART TWO

Defensive Concentration of Forces

INTRODUCTION

Pius X, a Conservative Reform Pope

When the conclave which was to elect Leo XIII's successor opened, the Sacred College faced a situation much more complex than in 1878. A significant group of cardinals was convinced that the Pontifex Maximus, who had improved the reputation of the papacy to a great extent, was best replaced by electing his secretary of state, Cardinal Rampolla. They considered him to be intimately familiar with his thoughts; also he had collaborated in all prominent plans and activities of the last fifteen years. This was the opinion of those Church dignitaries who desired a continuation of the conciliatory policies which the deceased Pope had exercised toward contemporary philosophy and modern institutions; this was also the conviction of one segment of the intransigents who held Rampolla in esteem for being a relentless opponent of the Italian government. But the failure of Rampolla's French policy was not in his favor. Many cardinals thought it necessary to take an entirely different path, though they were not always in agreement as to the direction. Some, likewise contemplating political expedience, wished the Holy See to take a less rigid stance toward Italy because they considered it idle to speculate on its impending collapse. They also preferred the Church to rely on the assistance of Catholic Austria and the German Center Party rather than on Orthodox Russia, whose increasing influence in the Near East they feared; instead, they suggested taking a chance on anticlerical France. Others, who were more concerned with the principle at stake, worried about the liberal trends in exegesis and theology, about the danger of democratic ideas as propagated by the secretary of state threatening the principle of authority, and about the extent of the concessions he was ready to make to governmental authority in order to solicit its support or at least its neutrality. Therefore, they demanded a return to intransigence, the hallmark of Pius IX's pontificate. Still others, conservatives as well as reformists, believed that after so many years of giving preference to the "Ministry of Foreign Affairs" it was high time to think of the "Ministry of the Interior." Therefore they desired a pope who had matured in the office of bishop and would be most interested in pastoral questions, in a better administration of the dioceses, and in the improvement of ecclesiastical works.

Of the candidates nominated by Rampolla's opponents, Cardinal Serafino Vannutelli was mentioned frequently. For years, Austria's friends had assembled around him, and he was, as everyone knew, well disposed to the Quirinal. Named most often was Cardinal Gotti, prefect of the Propaganda, a Carmelite who was conservative in regard to doctrine, yet liberal in respect to Church policy and a very able administrator. Some, however, spoke of the saintly patriarch of Venice, Cardinal Sarto, who was not well known to the public and the foreign cardinals, but had been discreetly and repeatedly named by Leo XIII as his successor. He was also supported by those Italian cardinals who did not belong to the Curia, especially since they knew that the government approved his candidacy and considered him the "the more pliable of the inflexible candidates."

The problem was further complicated by the significant role which the diplomatic factor played. In 1878 the great powers arrived at the conviction that the Pope's function in the European political configuration had ceased to be significant since the Papal State had been dissolved. Therefore, they limited themselves to the request that a man be chosen who was moderate and committed to conciliatory settlements of the conflicts between Church and state. However, due to Leo XIII's intelligent policies, the great powers had to admit once again that the moral support of the Pope, meaning the Vatican, was still potentially of great value. Consequently they were not as indifferent toward the election of the new Pope as they had been twenty-five years ago. The French, of course, preferred Rampolla as Pope, since he had always supported, possibly even advanced the Francophile policies of Leo XIII. Likewise, the Spaniards fondly remembered the time when he was nuncio in Spain. The government in Vienna was less favorably disposed to him and criticized him for insufficient sympathy toward the Triple Alliance, for his pro-Slavic Balkan policy, and the support he had given the opposition of the Christian Socialists in Austria and Hungary. The Viennese hesitated to use their ancient right of veto. Finally, however, the Emperor decided to take this step, pressured by Cardinal Puzyna, the archbishop of Cracow, who maintained that the election of Rampolla would have negative effects on the Church and charged him with having sacrificed Polish interests for the sake of his pro-Russian policies.[1] The influential Cardinal Prince-Bishop Kopp of Breslau, who was informed about Puzyna's mission, preferred that the veto not be used. Therefore he tried to arrive at a compromise with Rampolla and come to an agreement concerning an acceptable candidate, but Rampolla eluded his efforts. Kopp thereupon tried to persuade the French and Spanish cardinals to withdraw Rampolla's nomination, even though they had unanimously decided to give him their vote. But Kopp was not successful.

---

[1] Aside from F. Engel-Janosi, Revue belge de philosophie et histoire 29 (1951), 1135, n. 1, and 1137, see Z. Obertyński, op. cit., especially 183–84. Among other things, he quotes the cardinal's statement: "Austria did not use me, I used Austria" (p. 188); cf. chaps. 2 and 11.

Such was the situation when the cardinals—38 Italians and 24 foreigners[2]—entered the conclave. At the first ballot, on 1 August, 62 votes were cast; 12 went to 9 different candidates, 24 to Rampollo, 17 to Gotti, 5 to Sarto and only 4 to Vannutelli, whose chances had been diminished by the indiscreet campaign his brother had conducted on his behalf. In the afternoon, the distribution of votes changed: Rampolla's rose to 29 and Sarto's to 10, while Gotti only received 16. The Germans and the Austrians, who had hesitated a long time before they supported Gotti's Roman followers, were convinced that Gotti had lost his chance and they decided to follow Agliardi's advice to vote for Sarto. On the other hand, they considered it prudent to officially announce Vienna's veto against Rampolla. This was a totally futile gesture, since the former secretary of state had obviously received the highest number of votes he could expect. His followers were able, if they held together, to block any other candidature, but they had to give up all hope for his election. On the morning of 2 August, Puzyna fulfilled his mission and voiced his veto, even though Rampolla still had 29 votes, while Sarto's increased to 21. The papal cardinal chamberlain and even Rampolla himself protested immediately, and at the next ballot the victim of the veto received even one more vote. Numerous cardinals wanted to prove in this manner that they would not make allowances for such secular interference in the papal election. But this was no more than a token demonstration, because, as of the next morning, the number of votes cast for Rampolla decreased to that of the first ballot. His supporters suggested he choose the candidate to whom they could give their votes. He declined, explaining that he could not relinquish his candidacy because this would give the appearance of yielding to Austria. Without a doubt, however, he himself felt that he was in no position to turn the election in the direction he deemed desirable.

While Rampolla's followers made such futile efforts, the votes cast for Sarto rose from 21 to 24, and on the morning of 3 August increased to 27, surpassing Rampolla and practically eliminating Gotti. For a while, the cardinals feared Sarto would refuse to accept the responsibility which he himself felt exceeded his strength, but he could, in the end, be persuaded, and, on the morning of 4 August, he was elected, receiving 50 votes to the 10 cast by those who had remained loyal to Rampolla. Sarto declared that he would choose the name Pius X in memory of the

---

[2] 7 Frenchmen, 5 Spaniards, 5 Austrians, 3 Germans, 1 Portuguese, 1 Belgian, 1 Irishman, and 1 American. This was the first time Americans were represented in the conclave.

Popes of the same name "who, in past centuries, had courageously fought against sects and rampant errors." This indicated the direction he intended to take in his pontificate.

The new Pope was born in 1835 in a village of Venetia, the son of a simple family. He rapidly climbed the ladder of a pastoral career. He was coadjutor priest in a rural parish, pastor in a larger town, chancellor of the diocese of Treviso and at the same time spiritual director in the local seminary, and bishop of Mantua, an ailing diocese which he was able to restore within a few years to a model diocese, proving his pastoral strength. Finally, in 1893, he became patriarch of Venice and cardinal. Wherever he was active, he left the impression of a virtuous and diligent spiritual adviser, indeed, almost of a holy man of great benevolence; yet at the same time he was energetic, moved by a strong sense of duty, and highly intelligent. He did not think much of innovations, such as the new trends in the area of exegesis and apologetics originating in France, as well as the program of the young Italian Christian Democrats who had assembled around Murri. As bishop he tried to inspire his priests, especially in regard to instruction in the catechism, preaching, and frequent Communion, and he encouraged the laity to get involved as much as possible in ecclesiastical activities, insisting, however, that this collaboration was subject to the strict control of the clergy. From the clergy, in turn, he demanded absolute obedience, even toward the minor directives of their bishops. A devoted reader of Cardinal Pie's works, who branded the liberal Catholics "wolves in sheepskin" in his pastoral letters, Sarto was intensely interested in socialist charges against the traditional religious foundations of society and did not hesitate to descend to the level of city politics and demand an alliance between the Catholics and the moderate liberals in Venice in order to erect a dam against the rising flood of radicals.

This course of action gave rise to the expectation that the new Pope would take a more conciliatory stance toward the new Italy than his predecessor. And indeed, his pontificate inaugurated a slow but gradual improvement of the relations between the Vatican and the Quirinal. The question which attitude the Pope would adopt in regard to the Roman question was highly interesting to the Italian journalists and politicians. However, this aspect was only secondary in the spiritual orientation of the Pope because the concepts which guided his pontificate differed drastically from those of this predecessor. While Leo XIII derived pleasure from the delicate games of diplomacy and politics, Pius X did not enjoy them at all and was not willing to succumb to the compromises which are part of the game. In his estimation, Leo XIII's policy of reconciliation with the governments and royal courts had generally failed, and he was determined to concentrate on the problems of the Christian apostolate and religious life. Moreover, there was a glaring difference between the new Pope and his predecessor in all other respects, even physically, but particularly in essential matters. Leo XIII was known as the "Pope of the royal courts, the chancelleries, the bishops"; his successor, in contrast, would prove to be the "Pope of theology and canon law, of the simple folk and the pastors" (J. Fèvre). Leo XIII was an intellectual with a thorough education and a speculative spirit, finding pleasure in synthetical constructs with broad perspectives. Pius X was a pragmatic spirit, deeming a bird in the hand worth two in the bush and having a good sense for detail. A comparison between his and Leo XIII's encyclicals is revealing: Pius's theoretical part is shorter, but he elaborates in detail passages dealing with advice and practical experiences. However, one should not be deceived. Pius X liked to portray himself as the "good rural pastor" and his opponents were quick to take him at his word. Unquestionably, he lacked a university education, which would have allowed him to be more receptive to the critical method in the crisis of modernism and to be more independent of the narrow-minded opinions of his informants. But everyone who had contact with him was astonished at his intelligence, certainly a "rather more robust than subtle intelligence" (Baudrillart), but one which functioned clearly and precisely, grasping the essential point of a problem and supported by "a healthy common sense, almost a man of genius" (Briand). Prince Bernhard von Bülow declared that he rarely encountered such penetrating insight into human nature and into those forces which dominate the world and modern society.

No less remarkable were his moral qualifications. Many of the characteristics reported by eye witnesses leave the compelling impression that this man possessed a wealth of virtues ranging all the way to heroism. Thus, the ceremony of his canonization in 1954 merely officially confirmed what many of his contemporaries had felt spontaneously. One point above all must be emphasized: the deep commitment he felt toward his responsibility as spiritual director enabled him to become a man of prayer as well as of action, a man of relentless will, ready to bear the criticism of the public if he felt the interests of the Church to be at stake. He carried this so far that some asked whether he was not excelling by virtue of strength rather than by virtue of intelligence, and often his energy could have been enhanced by a good measure of flexibility.[3] The often rather pressing awareness of his responsibility may explain the rather authoritarian government of this otherwise friendly and social man,[4] who "prepared the dictatorship that would save the Church," as one adviser of Cardinal Mathieu said.[5] Indeed, Pius X was firmly convinced that the service of God and the salvation of the faithful required a serious change in many areas.

---

[3] "The persecution does not bother him. The supernatural element in his personality is confusing. I have seen an honest, strong, and beautiful holiness," Lemire wrote after an audience (J. M. Mayeur, L'abbé Lemire [Paris, Tournai 1968], 318).

Pius X instinctively mistrusted progressive endeavors. It was clear to him that the liberal policies of his predecessor regarding the modern world should not be condemned in principle, but these seemed to him to have been conducted with insufficient precautions and to have run risks which would shortly incur regrettable consequences. Thus he considered a certain reactionary policy absolutely necessary, giving his pontificate from the start the hallmark of retreat into "wholesome isolation" and a "Catholic defensive," which was reflected mainly in relations with various governments, in the attitude toward the Christian Democrats, and in the suppression of modernism.

Regarding the governments, with the exception of Italy Pius X returned to a rigid and inflexible stance. Relentlessly and without consideration of political expedience or eventual, direct, and harmful consequences, he insisted on the rights of the Church. This was most apparent in the case of France: with regard to the separation of Church and state, he prohibited any settlement via negotiations or arbitration, in spite of the opposing views of a considerable segment of the episcopate and the public. Also in Spain and Portugal, his policies of decisiveness and inflexibility prevailed. In both countries, he risked an actual break in relations. Even communication with England and Russia took a turn for the worse. That this did not result in an open quarrel was due to the fact that the Vatican supported the demands of the Catholic minorities in Ireland and Poland, which Leo XIII had sacrificed more than once to the necessities of his policy. In a similar refusal to submit to any kind of negotiations and compromises when he thought truth to be at stake was rooted the serious incident with Germany caused in 1910 by the encyclical released on the occasion of the three hundredth anniversary of the canonization of Charles Borromeo, the pioneer of the Counter Reformation, in which the Pope elaborated on Luther and Protestantism using vocabulary which was anything but ecumenical.[6] In spite of his sympathy for the old Emperor Franz Joseph, Pius X was at one time on the verge of breaking off diplomatic relations with Austria because the government in Vienna hesitated to suspend from office a professor of canon law in Innsbruck who openly sympathized with modernistic trends. This again confirms how far the Pope was willing to remain inflexible if matters of religion seemed to be at stake.[7] [4] He was able to listen patiently to his assistants, but he demanded above all that they be loyal executives. In the Vatican, he was said to have made the following remark: "Basta che la testa l'abbia il Papa," quoted in C. Confaloniere, Pio XI visto da vicino (Turin 1957, German: Aschaffenburg 1958), 172.

---

[5] E. Renard, Le cardinal Mathieu (Paris 1952), 411.

[6] The intransigence toward Protestantism caused another incident (in 1910) with the former president of the United States, Theodore Roosevelt, who was informed that the Pope would only grant him an audience if he would abandon a visit of the Methodist congregation in Rome. Naturally, Roosevelt declined (cf. F. Zwierlein, Th. Roosevelt and

At first glance, the Pope's reaction to the Christian Democrats was even more puzzling. After all, he had sprung from the common people and had always been a friend to the poor. He found it simply impossible to accept the fact that there were Catholics who wanted their social action to be more independent of the hierarchy and more self-reliant, or that some priests tried to orient social action more and more toward the political arena. Here lie the reasons for the fundamental reorganization which the Pope forced upon the Opera dei congressi at the beginning of his pontificate, for his disapproval of Romolo Murri's Azione popolare, followed by a formal condemnation, and later for the rejection of the new trends perpetuated by the Sillon group in France. Compromises with both the modernistic movement in Italy and proclamations in France, too undefined and doctrinaire, partly justify the interventions of ecclesiastical authority. However, the formulation of various papal acts regarding these questions and problems, and the more flexible attitude toward the Action française unquestionably demonstrate the Vatican's temporary devaluation of democratic ideas in favor of a paternalistic solution to social problems. The Pope also expressed preference for a hierarchal conception of society and at the same time demanded intensified attempts to keep the professional organizations of workers under the strict control of the clergy. All these aspects are rather characteristic of the ecclesiastical climate in Venetia, which Pius had never left before his election.[8]

In regard to the suppression of modernism, it is unquestionable that there are troublesome aspects to the various reform movements at the beginning of the twentieth century and that the dishonest action of many a pioneer of these movements forced the Pope to call to mind certain principles and warn of blunders. However, one has to admit that Catholics [St. Louis 1956], 343–50). Typical of the anti-Protestant attitude of the Vatican under Pius X was a remark made by an Austrian diplomat after a conversation with the secretary of state regarding the candidate for the throne of Albania in 1913: "Finally, the cardinal slipped in a remark which one would have to interpret to mean the following: 'Rather another Muslim than a Protestant!' " (Österreich-Ungarns Außenpolitik V [Vienna 1930], 468).

---

[7] Concerning L. Wahrmund, see chap. 2, n. 61 and above.

[8] R. Colapietra spoke about a "venetismo ammodernato, mento temporalista ma più pugnacemente confessionale" (RStRis 55 [1968], 328).

the various measures employed to hold back the tide of modernism must be assessed negatively. Many men loyal to the Church were mercilessly banned and only few were relatively quickly rehabilitated, such as Father Lagrange. But more serious than these personal fates were other facts: for a long time the undifferentiated suppression of modernism kept the majority of the clergy from pursuing intellectual investigations. This prevented a gradual clarification of the intellectual processes taking place in the Catholic intelligentsia until around 1900 and kept them from learning to differentiate the constructive from exaggerations or even errors. The gap between Church and modern culture widened. The solution of fundamental problems was postponed, and by simply ignoring them nothing was won, but, on the contrary, harm was done.

The way in which Pius X pursued his main interest, that is, concentrating on the internal affairs of the Church, and the way in which he insisted under any circumstance on "demanding for God's sake omnipotent power over man and beast" (inaugural encyclical), disregarding political or diplomatic contexts, and primarily the spirit of the methods with which he pursued this program, especially in the last years of his pontificate, caused and are still causing rather different assessments. Some critics praise the saintly Pope as the fearless defender of orthodoxy and of ecclesiastical rights. Others, in contrast, sharply criticize the stubborn intransigence and narrow-mindedness of the Pope, claiming that he did not know how to treat the grave problems confronting the Church from a new perspective; instead he tried, using more and more authoritarian methods, to preserve the Church's reactionary and clerical concepts, which were in flagrant contrast to the historical development. Whatever the future judgment of Pius X's defensive actions may be, it would be historically incorrect if the meaning of this pontificate were limited to this hotly disputed aspect.

No matter how often the fact is emphasized that Pius X did not think much of the rules of politics and diplomacy so dear to his predecessor, one must not forget that he was by no means disinterested in the political dimension of these problems and that he even presented certain ideas in this regard which make him appear to be a forerunner. For Pius X, spirituality determined policies, and they had to be Christian policies Thus, he declared in his first consistorial address: "We are forced to deal with politics because the Pontifex Maximus, invested by God with this highest of offices, does not have the right to divorce politics from the realm of faith and morals."[9] With this decisive resolution toward a political theology, he rejected, on the one hand, the pretenses of the lay liberalism of the nineteenth century; on the other hand, because of his extraordinary restraint toward the tendencies of "political Catholicism," he was in agreement with many justified trends of that same liberalism. Not only did he have grave reservations toward the politically engaged priests, but he believed even less than Leo XIII[10] in the usefulness of denominational parties. He felt that they harbored the risk of compromising religion in purely secular conflicts in which, according to his opinion, the Church had no business getting involved. Thus, it is typical that a sharp critic such as Falconi should praise him, claiming "he was the first in history to practice an idealismo antitemporalistico, even after the memory of such idealism had gotten lost in the first centuries of the Church."[11]

---

[9] Address of 9 November 1903 (ASS 36 [1903–04] 195).

However, more significant and of fundamental importance is the fact that Pius X appeared to his contemporaries as not very modern and rather conservative, which indeed he was in many respects; yet in reality he was one of the great reform Popes of history. This explains, by the way, why he was enthusiastically welcomed by a great number of people who strove for religious renewal, at least during the first months of his pontificate. Their first impression was one of religious resurrection rather than return to obscurantism.[12] The motto of this Pope was instaurare omnia in Christo; and the restoration of the Christian community—this was the point in question[13]—included, in his opinion, a rigorous defense of the rights of Christ and the Church as well as positive reform activity and initiatives with essentially pastoral goals, intensifying the communities' internal life and ensuring a more effective utilization of its potential. To this end, he issued the decrees regarding frequent Communion and the Communion of children, measures to improve the instruction of the catechism and the sermon, reform of Church music and revision of the missal and the breviary, and reorganization of seminaries to improve the training of the clergy. Though inspired by an obsolete conception of the lay world, many guidelines and directives made Pius X a pioneer of Catholic Action in the modern sense of the word. In this context belong the adaptation and codification of canon law and the reorganization of the Roman Curia, intended to enable the central administration of the Church better to fulfill the more and more difficult tasks imposed on it by the development of ecclesiastical centralization. Pius X dealt with all these different problems utilizing forty years of practical experience in multiple areas of pastoral work far away from the Curia, a background that is rare for a Pope. Thus he was able to apply to his new office the experience and energy which he had already displayed as head of the dioceses of Mantua and Venice. He could not be held back by bureaucratic routine; rather, with authority he enacted reforms within a few years which had been requested for centuries or were considered almost revolutionary in his time.

---

[10] Cf. above, p. 239.

[11] I papi del ventesimo secolo (Milan 1967), 89; also 91–92.

[12] Cf. P. Scoppola, Crisi modernista e rinnovamento cattolico in Italia (Bologna 1961), 113–15, and L. Bedeschi, op. cit., 45–49.

[13] Cf. É. Poulat, Intégrisme et catholicisme intégral (Paris, 1969), 171–72, n. 164.

According to the unanimous testimony of all his advisers, Pius X played an important role in the design of such plans and in their rapid execution. Naturally, like every Pope, he had to rely on assistants. He made sure that they shared his ideal of religious renewal and therefore recruited them preferably from among the orders (but not only from the ranks of the Jesuits, as his opponents like to maintain). Consequently, the portion of religious priests increased in the Roman congregations. From among the bishops he chose co-workers whom he had known for a long time[14] to be opponents of liberalism of whatever version. They were virtuous and diligent men, but often narrow-minded. They were completely devoted to the Holy See, but their ambitions sometimes lacked the proper insight, and their understanding of the real situation of the Church and the intellectual processes beyond the horizon of the small Italian ecclesiastical world was small. Naturally, there were exceptions, one of them being Pietro Gasparri.[15]

Among the Pope's men, the four personal secretaries[16] deserve special credit. They enjoyed his full trust and, driven by "somewhat exaggerated ambitions" (Della Torre), they reinforced more than once the intransigent orientation of the papal decisions. In addition, several particularly influential cardinals played a great role: Francesco Segna, after 1908 prefect of the Congregation of the Index; Oreglia, dean of the Holy College had a vigorous opponent of Christian democracy; Benedetto Lorenzelli, a strict Thomist, and extraordinarily active in the Holy Office.

Of greatest influence, however, was the severely criticized triad of Vives y Tutó, Gaetano De Lai, and Merry del Val. First place must go to the Capuchin Vives y Tutó,[17] of the group of Spanish integralism which produced the book El liberalismo es pecado. In 1884 he was assigned to the Roman Curia and, during the crisis of the Italian Catholic Action, he supported the campaign of Paganuzzi. He was a hard-working man of outstanding knowledge, a favorite adviser of the Holy Office, and prefect of the Congregation of Orders from 1908 until 1912. One of his followers was the feared creator of the reform of the Curia, Cardinal De Lai,[18] an energetic and tireless organizer, who succeeded in concentrating in his hands a power unequalled in the history of the Curia. Since the time the Pope had been bishop of Mantua, De Lai had been his friend and he used this friendship to extend his already considerable power as prefect of the Consistorial Congregation by invading the authority of the Congregation of the Council. He dictatorially controlled the appointments of bishops and supervised the dioceses and seminaries. His principle was to proceed rigorously rather than softly when evil was to be eliminated. The third man in the triad was Cardinal Merry del Val,[19] secretary of state at thirty-seven years of age. He occupied this office throughout the pontificate and was envied by the Holy Office for having been assigned to this office at such a young age, particularly as a foreigner, which was something unheard-of. In contrast to the secretaries of state of the last two centuries, he was much more involved in the religious policies of the pontificate. Merry del Val was a devout and moralistic priest, a distinguished and polite aristocrat, and totally devoted to the Holy See. He faced the modernistic tendencies with an untroubled but rigid intransigence. According to D. Secco Suardo, he possessed the "positive and negative characteristics" of a Spaniard, which caused him at times to be carried away by his eagerness

---

[14] The fact that some of them came from Venetia caused Msgr. Duchesne to remark that the Pope had changed the boat of Saint Peter into a gondola.

[15] L. Bedeschi, op. cit., 115, also mentions Talamo, Faberi, Battandier, P. Lepidi, and others.

[16] Msgr. Bressan, supported by Pescini, Bianchi, and Gasoni. Since they made preparations with the proper authorities, they often caused short circuits in the Secretariate of State. This is the reason for their nickname La Segretariola. In regard to them, see: Disquisitio circa quasdam obiectiones, 25 and 51–52.

[17] In regard to Joseph Calasanz Vives y Tutó (1854–1913), who was given the nickname "Vives fa tutto" in Rome, see Antonio de Barcelona, El cardenal Vives y Tutó (Barcelona 1916), and Estudios francescanos 55 (1954), 531–34; 56 (1955), 5–42, 179–214; 57 (1956), 113–30, 161–81; 60 (1959), 247–66. Also L. Bedeschi, op. cit., 104–07, and D. Secco Suardo, Da Leone XIII a Pio X (Rome 1967), passim (see index).

---

[18] About Gaetano De Lai (1853–1928), see F. Crispolti, Corone e porpore (Milan 1934), 221–26, and L. Bedeschi, op. cit., 53, 94–95, 99–104.

[19] There are only biographies of a hagiographical nature regarding Raphael Merry del Val (1865–1930). Fairly acceptable is the one by P. Cenci (Rome 1933) and the one by J. M. Javierre (Barcelona ^{2}1966). Numerous documents and testimonies can be found in Romana beatificationis et canonisationis Servi Dei Raphaelis card. Merry del Val informatio (Vatican City 1957). See also A. C. Jemolo, Chiesa e Stato in Italia negli ultimi cento anni (Turin 1948), 483–562; and L. Bedeschi, op. cit., passim, especially 88–94. He was the son of a Spanish diplomat and an Irish woman, raised in England and Belgium. He was still very young when he gained Leo XIII's favor. From 1900 until 1903, he expertly directed the Accademia dei nobili ecclesiastici, where prospective nuncios were trained. Pius X had chosen him for good reasons, that is for his outstanding intellectual qualities, his knowledge of many languages, and his diplomatic capabilities (which were more theoretical than practical, however), as well as for his greater independence, which he expected because Merry del Val had no ties to Italy.

to defend orthodoxy and to cover up denunciations which did not redound to the honor of the secretariat.[20] He was more familiar with abstract principles than with the complex conditions of reality and, moreover, fairly isolated within the boundaries of the Curia. Thus he often gave the impression that he was unable to keep up with the times.[21] However, Pius X respected this diligent, unconditionally loyal co-worker, who was from the start receptive to his own ideal of Catholic renewal and shared his conception of an authoritarian Church government. Thanks to his intimate relationship with the Pope, Merry del Val possessed immense power, which assisted him in extending the Secretariat of State's rights of intervention, which in turn resulted in more incisive reforms of the Curia. This created many enemies for him, even in Rome. He was charged with being a tool in the hands of the omnipotent Societas Jesu, which is exaggerated, even though his relations to the general of the Jesuits and the leaders of the Civiltà Cattolica were very close.[22] He was further accused of having intensified the Pope's rigoristic inclinations when executing practical measures, forcing "an old man of angelic gentleness" to violent actions "worthy of the Spanish Inquisition." This requires a correction, however. One should not give in to the temptation of a hagiographer to justify Pius X in a generalizing fashion or to make excuses for him by blaming all unfavorable aspects of his pontificate on his surroundings. One should not forget that Merry del Val kept Giacomo della Chiesa as substitute of the Secretariat of State for four years, gladly relying on his judgment in matters of diplomacy, even though Della Chiesa continued to get advise from his former chief Rampolla. However, above all, É. Poulat's[23] publication of the dossier of the Sodalitium Pianum showed that Benigni, at least after 1911, constantly charged Merry del Val with undue restraint when applying papal directives and with a diplomatic temperament that was always willing only partially to execute a tough decision in the face of the resistance it caused.

These texts and various documents collected during the process of beatification contradict the "legend of the secretary of state who brainwashed a benevolent and pious Pope with intransigence, the same Pope who had entrusted him with the reins of government." Yet this does not mean that Pius X was not at all directed by his environment or that he was solely responsible for all measures taken, even the most draconic ones which accompanied the antiliberal reaction so characteristic of his pontificate. He was justified when he turned indignantly against everyone who quietly maintained that the Church was led by "three cardinals," and he repeatedly asserted his complete independence. However, these protestations only prove his good faith, as G. Martina observed;[24] they leave the problem of the real responsibility completely open. Today it cannot be disputed that many of his assistants were carried away by misguided ambitions, exceeding the Pope's intentions when applying certain decisions and using certain methods. On the other hand, it should be clear that the Pope based his decisions in more than one case on biased and tendentious information given to him by men in his trust. Holiness is no guarantee of the best ecclesiastical policies, and a Pope who thinks he has to make decisions for the Church single-handedly is unfortunately the prisoner of his informants and the executive body, loyal and devoted as they may be. An additional observation should be made: Many an assistant of Pius X may have exceeded his intentions; yet there were others who often countered his impulses with passive resistance or at least somewhat softened his intolerant directives. In the last months of his life, Pius X complained about this, especially when the antiintegralistic reaction became apparent even in Vatican circles. But at the beginning of his pontificate, several of his reform measures had encountered the passive resistance of the conservatives, who were just as opposed to the changes demanded by the highest authority as they were to the reformism of the progressives. In view of such cases, impressively illuminating Pius X's occasional difficulties in moving even those men toward obedience who considered themselves the pioneers of the defense against democratic anarchy, É. Poulat spoke of this Pope as having a "strong will and weak authority."[25] Even though this may be exaggerated, the wording shows that the problem of relations between the Pope and his assistants is much more complex than most of his admirers and his slanderers—each in the opposite sense—would care to admit.

---

[20] An example illustrating this can be found in Les fiches pontificales by Msgr. Montagnini (Paris 1908).

[21] The Austrian Ambassador Prince Schönburg-Hartenstein made the remark: "The cardinal knows how to centralize, but not how to be a center himself" (Engel-Janosi II, 130).

[22] Concerning the real influence of the Jesuits in the Roman Curia under Pius X, see the detailed presentation of L. Bedeschi, op. cit., 66–74.

[23] Intégrisme et catholicisme intégral (Paris, Tournai 1969), especially 76–77.

---

[24] RSTI 23 (1969), 232.

[25] Archives de sociologie des religions 29 (1970), 201.

SECTION ONE

The Reform Work of Pius X

Immediately following the death of Pius X, the London Times wrote: "It is not an exaggeration to say that J. Sarto instituted more changes in the administration of the Catholic Church than any of his predecessors since the Council of Trent." Even if one must note that most of the significant decisions of this Pope date from the first five years of his pontificate and that his reform program was slowed down by his excruciating efforts effectively to fend off the threat of modernism, it is nevertheless clear that he took numerous and versatile initiatives and even realized many of the relevant goals. Immediately after his election, he had taken several steps to attain the reorganization of the diocese of Rome and to eliminate the many abuses committed by the clergy of Rome.[1] However, this is merely an indication of the more general and urgent matters which he openly professed and which caused, initially, a great wave of hope among those who, after Leo XIII's "political" pontificate, expected a renovation of the Church in a more religious direction. These first decisions explain the initial confidence with which those who later on sharply criticized the reactionary stance of the Vatican could say: "Il papa farà eccelenti riforme." In the course of 1905, however, in this optimistic atmosphere, an entire series of pro-reform pamphlets appeared in close succession (Bedeschi only just recently pointed them out).[2] The exaggerated expectations of pro-reform groups, however, were disillusioned to such an extent that they often completely lost sight of the positive impact, by no means insignificant in spite of limitations, especially at the pastoral and institutional level.

---

[1] Cf. Fernessole II, 29–47. Throughout the whole pontificate, he observed the situation closely (cf. Schmidlin, PG III 38–39).

[2] L. Beschi, Riforma a religiosa e Curia all'inizio del secolo (Milan 1968); see especially 27–30.

CHAPTER 26

Reorganization of the Roman Curia and Codification of Canon Law

As pastor and bishop, Pius X often had occasion to discover that a reorganization of ecclesiastical institutions was urgently needed in order to better enable the clergy at all levels, from the top to the bottom, to fulfill their tasks. Thus, without much ado, he proceeded with this task, making good use of his organizational talent and the administrative experiences he had acquired in eighteen years as chancellor of the diocese of Treviso.

There is no need to list all the individual measures Pius X took in the course of his pontificate, even though they often had significant consequences.[1] Only two undertakings of great impact shall be treated in depth: the reform of the papal administration and the reform of canon law.

The organization of the Roman Curia, essentially instituted by Sixtus V, was in dire need of change.[2] In the course of three hundred years, it had turned into a heterogeneous assemblage of thirty-seven agencies whose rights and responsibilities were often totally undefined and who were constantly in conflict with each other, because each one dealt individually with administrative and judicial problems and controversies of the administration, and their areas of jurisdiction were often incompatible. Moreover, the elimination of temporal authority rendered some of these agencies totally superfluous. Pius IX and his successor had limited themselves simply to isolated reforms. On the other hand, however, the progressing Roman centralization in the course of the nineteenth century and the expansion and improvement of the possibilities of communication had essentially strengthened the contacts between the center and the periphery, making the development of certain offices desirable. Furthermore, the administrative methods were completely obsolete, inflexible, out-of-date, and quite costly, in spite of Leo XIII's modest attempts to lower the expenses of the Holy See. Moreover, many did not consider work within the Curia a challenging and demanding ecclesiastical pastorate conducted in the service of God's people, but rather a career promising the cardinal's hat, provided everything went well.

The idea of reform was in the air and not only in progressive circles, as was recently proven by a newly discovered plan which had been devised in the Vatican a year before Leo XIII died. However, this reform idea offended the principle Quieta non movere, honored by all administrations of the world, and it was rejected by all who saw their interests threatened. Facing a difficult financial situation,[3] Pius X hurried to remedy the most glaring abuses, but that was not all. He began with several partial reforms which seemed especially urgent. On 17 September 1903 he suspended the obsolete special congregation De eligendis episcopis, founded by Benedict XIV and renewed in 1878 by Leo XIII. The Holy Office became responsible for the appointment of bishops in those countries which were not dependent on the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith (the Propaganda) or subject to the regulations of a concordat. On 26 May 1906 he also suspended the two relatively new congregations Super disciplina regulari and De statu regularium, with the result that everything concerning the members of religious orders was concentrated in the Congregation of Bishops and Regulars. But he had already planned a much more extensive reform, as was requested by several prelates who had assembled around Cardinal Agliardi. His intentions were probably impelled by the idea of stopping the criticism of the radical front by taking the wind out of its sails. The radicals had begun to question the insufficient functioning of the Curia as well as its fundamental right of existence because they saw it as an obstacle between the Pope and the bishops. In the early summer of 1907 he decided to take steps which introduced a rapid development of the matters at hand.

---

[1] It should suffice to mention two: the constitution Vacante Sede Apostolica (25 December 1904) regarding the Pope's election (cf. M. Scaduto, "I precedenti di una reform e le leggi di Pio X sul Conclave," CivCatt V [1944] 6–20); the change of the Acta Sanctae Sedis into the official publication of the Holy See (23 May 1904), and later its replacement with the Acta Apostolicae Sedis (cf. AAS 1 [1909], 5–6, and N. Hilling, op. cit. I, 33–34).

[2] Cf. F. Roberti, "De Curia Romana ante pianam reformationem," Rom. Curia, 13–34.

A commission of cardinals was to be created to which Gaetano De Lai, secretary of the Congregation of the Council was assigned; De Lai was the chief supporter of this reform from the beginning to the end. According to the directives personally drafted by the Pope, the commission pursued the following goals:[4] the abolition of superfluous offices and agencies and the creation of appropriate new ones as necessitated by the development of the situation; the separation of administrative and judical responsibilities; the absolutely clear and rational definition of the responsibilities of each dicastery (assigning to one single organ all affairs pertaining, among others, to the bishops, the clergy, the orders, the sacraments, the missions, the simplification and thus the efficiency of the activities of individual offices; the assignment of a certain number of consultants to prepare resolutions; the coordination of criteria needed to come to a unanimous conclusion, and, finally, the standardization of fees and salaries of officials, which had been different depending on the individual functionary. The first plan drawn up by the Pope himself was presented to the commission in November. Concerning the Roman congregations, he relied extensively on a draft by Monsignor De Lai.[5] In regard to the Secretariat of State, he followed Cardinal Merry del Val's standpoint: On the one hand, several countries were incorporated into the area of responsibility which had been subject to the Propaganda, even though they were no longer mission countries (Great Britain, the Netherlands, the United States, Canada); on the other hand, the Secretariat of State was assigned two previously independent agencies: the Congregation for Extraordinary Ecclesiastical Affairs and the Secretariat of Briefs. These expansions increased the significance of the Secretariat of State considerably. Finally, in order to separate the administration and the judiciary, the Pope revived the old medieval jurisdiction of the Rota Romana, which had been hobbled through the proliferation of the congregations equipped with judicial power to such an extent that its responsibility had been confined to liturgical questions (since 1870). In the course of the next months, the basic draft was repeatedly revised, but the changes did not impair the economy of the original plan: The Congregation of Matrimony became the Congregation of the Sacraments; the section of the former Congregation of Bishops and Regulars which had charge of the bishops was incorporated into the Congregation of the Consistory, so that all questions pertaining to the members of religious orders were now handled by a special congregation (the case of the Congregation of the Missions caused debates); the Congregation of the Index, at Pius X's request, was separated from the Holy Office "in view of the great number of books to be examined";[6] the Congregation of Rites and the Congregation of the Canonization of Saints were combined in one congregation.

---

[3] Cf. P. Scoppola, Crisi modernista e rinnovamento cattolico in Italia (Bologna 1961), 120, n. 126.

[4] Text: Rom. Curia, 38–42.

On 29 June 1906 the constitution Sapiento consilio[7] was published. The experts admired the "constructive and simplifying genius of Pius X" reflected in it (Torquebiau). From now on, the Curia was to include a triad of agencies: eleven congregations, three tribunals, and five offices. Within the area of congregations, the Congregation of the Sacraments was completely new. The former Congregation of the Council had been remodeled so drastically that it was also practically new; at the time of its establishment, it was to supervise the execution and interpretation of the decrees of the Council of Trent; but in the future it was to be in charge of the general discipline of the clergy and the faithful. The consistorial congregation's functions were considerably extended; it was even assigned the supervision of seminaries (in 1915, Benedict XV entrusted this function to the Congregation of Studies, whose only responsibility had been universities). The competence of the Propaganda was now limited to the mission countries in the true sense of the word;[8] moreover, it had to relinquish all matters regarding marriage to the Rota and problems pertaining to sacraments to the Congregation of the Sacraments. For jurisdiction there were to be three responsible agencies: the Rota and the Apostolic Signature (as court of appeal) were to deal with the external forum, which had gradually been taken on by the Sacred Penitentiary; the internal forum was to be the responsibility of the Penitentiary. The five offices included the Apostolic Chancery, the Apostolic Datary, the Apostolic Camera (with very limited responsibilities), the Secretariat of Briefs, and the Secretariat of State as the most important. The constitution, which was amended by a detailed Ordo servandus[9] (all together about eighty pages of small print), outlined precisely the functions of the new organs: appointments to the respective offices, schedules and statutes, the specific dispositions of the many subdivisions, and frequent reports, which often had to be presented to the Pope himself before a decision would be made. In order to facilitate the speedy preparation and execution of matters it was required that only the most important problems were to be submitted to the plenary session of the respective congregation. Other affairs were to be handled by the Congresso, a committee limited in number and consisting of high officials and the cardinal prefect of the congregation.

---

[5] De Lai's plan reduced the congregations from eighteen to eleven, even though he proposed the creation of a new congregation De re matrimoniali and the separation of the old Congregation of Bishops and Regulars into two different dicasteries. In addition, he suggested to change the "old and despised" name of the Inquisition (which he compared to the Congregation of the Index) to Congregation de fide tuenda. Pius X preferred to keep the traditional name.

[6] Cf. Rom. Curia, 58, 67. Benedict XV returned to the original idea and changed the Index into a special section of the Holy Office (AAS 9 [1917], 161–66).

[7] Text: AAS 1 (1909), 7–19.

The practical application of the new regulations began immediately and was closely observed by the Pope himself. The fact that De Lai, who was created cardinal in December 1907, was given responsibility for the reorganization in a special commission was received with some amazement. Though many believed that the conservative Pius X proved to be rather revolutionary, the reform was generally received with satisfaction. Of course, the desire for a clear separation of administrative responsibilities and judicial functions was only partially fulfilled. The court of the Rota, indeed, confined itself to matters of matrimony; however, the congregations continued to handle controversies in other areas and issue penalties via administrative channels. Unquestionably, the basic structure of Sixtus V's organization was not as decisively changed as would be the case half a century later under Paul VI on the occasion of the reform of the Curia. For Genocchi rightfully complained that the spirit of the "old machine" had not been trenchantly altered, and the men who were asked to set this machine in motion and to keep it running were essentially bureaucrats without pastoral experience, isolated from the world outside and its problems. Among other things, there was no mention of giving bishops who actually responsibly managed a diocese a position in the sections of the congregations dealing with practical matters. But even considering these obvious limits and shortcomings of Pius X's reform, the point must be clearly made that for the first time since the sixteenth century the entire Curia was reorganized according to, all in all, truly rational criteria.

---

[8] There was talk about removing the apostolic vicariates located in the areas of common law; however, the urgent intervention of Cardinal Gasparri, the leading authority in canon law, resulted in the relinquishing of this plan (cf. Rom. Curia, 66–67).

[9] This Ordo servandus was published in two parts on 29 June and on 29 September 1909 (text: AAS 1 [1909], 36–108).

These measures did not only possess a unique character, they were also of symbolic significance. They appeared to anticipate another highly crucial undertaking, the general reorganization of ecclesiastical law, in preparation since the beginning of Pius X's pontificate.[10]

For several centuries, the idea prevailed of revising canon law and formulating a code that would systematically compile the entire body of law adapted to the contemporary situation. This code was to replace the immense, often inaccessible and obsolete collections of papal decrees. At the Vatican Council, a number of bishops had made certain requests in this respect; and shortly before this council convened, Pope Pius IX had issued the constitution Apostolicae Sedis (12 October 1869), thoroughly revising the legislation regarding ecclesiastical censures. Leo XIII[11] had annulled or amended numerous obsolete regulations and even undertaken some partial codifications, using certain schemes prepared in view of the upcoming Vatican Council. His changes primarily affected the constitution Officiorum ac munerum (25 January 1897), codified and moderated in the legislation regarding censorship of books, and the constitution Conditae a Christo (8 October 1900), which finally afforded the religious congregations with simple vows a precise legal statute. Private canonists[12] had made several attempts: G. de Luise in [10] In his first instructions in the beginning of the summer of 1907, Pius X expressly specified: "Questa riforma deve farsi subito per essere messa in esecuzione al più presto in via di esperimento, onde colle eventuali mutazioni, che seranno suggerite dalla pratica, venga definitivamente pubblicata nel nuovo Codice," (quoted in Rom. Curia, 41).

[11] Cf. N. Hilling, "Die Gesetzgebung Leos XIII. auf dem Gebiet des Kirchenrechts," AkathKR 93 (1913), 8–31, 254–76, 460–83, 623–37; 94 (1914), 75–95, 252–64; Cf. here, p. 292.

[12] DDC III, 915–17.

1873, E. Colomiatti in 1888, H. M. Pezzani in 1893, F. Deshayes in 1895, and mainly A. Pillet, whose Ius canonicum generale distributum in articulos (1890) had proposed legal regulations according to the model of the civil code of law, proving that a complete codification of canon law is indeed possible. Even though German canonists kept quiet on this matter, the international Catholic congresses after 1891 constantly received reports suggesting that the Church legislation be revised and codified.

"Two or three days after his election" (Merry del Val), Pius X was already expressing a desire to follow this path of reform.

He was strongly encouraged by Monsignor Gasparri, one of the best canonists of his time, and by Cardinal Gennari.[13] On 19 March 1904 the Pope announced through his motu proprio Arduum sane munus the formation of a commission of cardinals, to be aided by a certain number of consultors, which was to adjust ecclesiastical legislation to the present circumstances and to codify it. In the following week, a letter was sent to all archbishops asking them to consult with their suffragan bishops regarding the main changes which were to amend the present law and to send their recommendations to Rome, including additional nominations for consultors. A few days later, he also solicited the cooperation of Catholic universities throughout the world.

The announcement of this plan caused totally different reactions: satisfaction from those who witnessed in daily life the many-sided disadvantages of the present system; scepticism from the many scholars, mainly in Rome and Germany, who had better insight into the difficulties and thus predicted failure. The latter were supported by the famous editor of the Corpus Iuris Canonici, the Protestant Emil Friedberg, who charged the Pope with (among other things) attempting to extend in this way his power even further.[14] Others feared that the sections dealing with ecclesiastical civil law and with the relations between Church and state could appear in a new edition of the Syllabus and lead to new confrontations with governments. Other Catholic groups, e.g., in Spain, criticized the project for attempting to copy the Napoleonic codes of law, which were considered an expression of liberal individualism.[15] But Pius X remained unperturbed and made sure that everyone set to work at once.

From the very start, the chief promoter of this undertaking was Monsignor Gasparri,[16] secretary of the Congregation for Extraordinary Affairs. The Pope appointed him secretary of the papal commission and president of the College of Consultors, and he was the heart and soul of the project until its conclusion.

---

[13] Cf. N. Hilling, "Von wem ist der Plan der Abfassung des Codex iuris canonici zuerst ausgegangen?," AkathKR 116 (1936), 88–91.

[14] DZKR 18 (1904), 1–74.

[15] Cf. L. de Echeverría, Miscellanea in memoriam Petri card. Gasparri (Rome 1960), 327–41.

To speed up the work, the consultors were divided into two commissions working next to each other. One was led by Gasparri with Eugenio Pacelli as secretary; the other one was headed by Cardinal De Lai with F. A. Sapieha as secretary. As of 13 November these commissions met weekly, comparing and discussing the editorial drafts for each chapter, which were presented by two, sometimes even three or four consultors working completely independently of each other. Proceeding from the different texts and opinions voiced, the president wrote a new draft, which was again discussed and reworked. Usually, this procedure was repeated at least three or four times, occasionally even ten or twelve times. To save time, the texts were first sent to the consultors for their critical examination and written comments. When they finally agreed on one version, Gasparri presented it to the commission of cardinals, which did not reveal its comment until after it had studied the text twice.[17] The entire process took place in strict secrecy. One or two chapters or paragraphs, however, were published in the form of a papal constitution or a decree of a congregation either because the Pope considered the matter urgent or because he wanted to test the effectiveness in real life, trying to find out how the texts were received. For instance, among others this was the case with the constitution Sapienti consilio, through which the Curia was reorganized, and with the following decrees: the Eucharistic decrees Ne temere (2 August 1907), which cancelled the exemptions of the Tridentine legislation regarding matrimony in force since the sixteenth century (can. 1094–1103); A remotissima (31 December 1909), regarding the Visitatio liminum (can. 340–342a); Maxima quidem (29 August 1910), regarding the transfer of pastors (can. 2147–2167); and Cum singulae (16 October 1911), regarding the dismissal of members of religious orders (can. 646–672).

By 1912 many parts had been amended to the point that Gasparri was able to propose sending them to the bishops and heads of the orders asking them for their comments. In spite of the resistance of several cardinals fearing new delays, the Pope agreed. This consultation, where the bishops, in turn, could confidentially consult with two or three men in their trust, proved to be very useful. On 20 March 1912 Books I and II were delivered; on 1 April 1913 Book III; on 1 July Book V; and finally on 15 November 1914 Book IV. At that time Pius X had already been dead for three months. The final, conclusive version would take two more years. However, at the time of Pius X's death, the major work had already been accomplished, consistently inspired by the Pope who had personally followed its progress step by step. Therefore, according to Gasparri, he deserves a great deal of credit for this work.

---

[16] Pietro Gasparri (1852–1934) was a man of amazing energy, "another, but more active and effective Raymund de Peñaforte." Concerning him see: Il card. Pietro Gasparri (Rome 1960); J. Denis, Actes du congrès de Droit canonique. Cinquantenaire de la Faculté de droit canonique (Paris 1950), 239–45; H. Tüchle, Die Außenminister der Päpste, ed. by W. Sandfuchs (Munich 1962), 94–108; G. Spadolini, Il card. Gasparri e la Questione Romana (Florence 1973). Concerning his activities as secretary of state under Benedict XV and Pius XI, see Pt. III.

[17] The successive plans remained inaccessible in the dark corners of the archives, with one exception: F. Roberti, Codicis Juris canonici schemata Lib IV De processibus, I De judiciis in genere (Vatican City 1940).

Doubtless this project had its limits. Today, we see it as a new step in the direction of centralization and extreme uniformity of the Latin Church.[18] Some, however, regret that it fails to make reference to the Holy Scriptures or the Church Fathers, in contrast to the ancient canonical collections. Even from a strictly juridical standpoint, a threatening insecurity in the terminology itself can be found, even regarding concepts which are expressly defined" (G. Schwaiger), in spite of abundant discussions and subsequent revisions. Concerning the main content, a more radical further questioning of certain positions inherited from medieval law or from modern absolutism would have been desirable.[19] However, one must admire the extent of a task executed in record time. After all, this work represents a well-structured summa, including the entire legislation of the Latin Church, excepting a portion of the liturgical material and excluding the particularly delicate problem of the relations between the Church and the respective state. It distinguishes itself through clarity and precision of style and seems to be inspired by civil codes of law rather than imitation of the rhythmic phraseology and rhetorical verbosity characteristic of the previous texts, including those of Leo XIII. It reveals the attempt (proving that Pius X was not antimodern on principle) to synchronize the various segments of canon law with the demands of modern times and to give it the benefit of achievements in the field of learning and of the accomplishments of contemporary juridical practice. One must also praise Pius's interest in cooperating, from the beginning to the end, with the episcopate throughout the world and with the non-Roman canonists. Proof of his realism and moderation are the decisions made between the overly specialized position of the theoreticians and the extreme pragmatism of many a practitioner. Along these lines, one must not forget the absolutely pertinent observation of the Protestants Stutz and Feine, who saw in the new code the expression of "the progressive and increasing spiritualization of the Roman Catholic Church," which had become more and more apparent during the pontificates of Pius IX and Leo XIII. Thus the two authors, who certainly were not admirers of Pius X, agree that the code was an epoch in the history of ecclesiastical law.

---

[18] The code is not valid for the Eastern churches united with Rome.

[19] U. Stutz introduces his chapter about the "New Elements in the Code" with the following words: "The code has basically few new elements" (op. cit., 57). Cf. H. E. Feiner, op. cit., 707: "The character of the work is rather conservative. The real innovations are limited to the most essential issues." Regarding these innovations, which should not be underestimated, cf. ibid., 709–19.

CHAPTER 27

Eucharistic Decrees and Liturgical Renewal

At the beginning of the twentieth century, a clearer perspective in favor of frequent Communion had been conceived. Yet the disputes between its advocates and opponents continued. Even Leo XIII's encyclical Mirae caritatis (1902),[1] encouraging the "frequent use of the Eucharist" and protesting against the "contrived reasons for relinquishing Communion," did not succeed in settling the controversy, which was especially intense in France and Belgium. Following the moral theologian E. Génicot, S.J., and the canonist Gasparri, Abbé F. Chatel and the Redemptorist Godts stressed the absolute necessity of doing away with premeditated venial sin before one could expect to be admitted to frequent Communion. Others advocated the concept of Monsignor de Ségur, according to which the Eucharist is not "a reward for achieved virtue, but on the contrary, the means of achieving virtue." From this perspective, they strictly distinguished between the absolutely necessary and the desirable spiritual disposition. They were supported by Cardinal Gennari in Rome and Monsignor Heylen, the Bishop of Namur and new president of the Eucharistic congresses; and they could refer to several responses in their favor by the Roman congregations (mainly to the decree Quemadmodum of the Holy Office of 17 December 1890 for the benefit of nuns). Thus their number was especially great in Italy, where the rigoristic tradition never had had a strong impact; but they also had followers north of the Alps, above all among the Jesuits.[2]

---

[1] ASS 34 (1901–02), 641–44.

[2] Among others, the French Jesuit P. L. Cros, who had settled in Spain. Disregarding the objections of the hierarchy, he enthusiastically developed a program including four points: comulgar (communicate), cada día (daily), sin confesarse (without confessing), hasta la muerte (until death).

As an admirer of Don Bosco, who had been an enthusiastic defender of the frequent and early Communion of children, Giuseppe Sarto had made the development of the celebration of the Eucharist the key issue of his program as bishop. Thus it was not surprising that as Pope he tried to realize this program for the Church at large. In a period of only two years, between 30 May 1905 and 14 July 1907, he issued twelve interventions in this regard (decrees, letters, or addresses). On the occasion of the international Eucharistic Congress, convened in Rome in June 1905, he approved a prayer "for the propagation of the pious custom of daily Communion," bringing to mind that "Jesus meant to be the daily remedy and the daily food for our daily shortcomings." The most decisive act, however, was the decree of the Congregation of the Council of 20 December 1905, De quotidiana SS. Eucharistiae sumptione,[3] which provided the appropriate settlement of the impending controversy, specifying that two conditions for receiving Holy Communion be sufficient: the state of grace and the proper intention. At the same time, the faithful were asked to communicate "frequently and even daily." By order of the Pope, this decree was sent to all bishops and heads of orders, instructing them to "send it to their seminaries, parishes, religious institutions, and priests and to let the Holy See know what they had done to assure its execution." In the course of the next few months, other decrees encouraged the communicants by granting absolution (14 February 1906), by dispensing the sick confined to bed for more than one month from the Eucharistic rule of fast (7 December 1906 and 6 March 1907) and by defining the term "all faithful" used in the decree to include the children who had attended First Communion (13 September 1906).

The "age of reason" required for First Communion continued to be controversial. Frequently consulted about this disputed question, the Congregation of the Sacrament prepared a decree for which the Pope showed great interest, even though he anticipated strong resistance. After discussing the problem from a historical, dogmatic, and practical point of view, the decree Quam singulari (8 October 1910)[4] declared that it is sufficient for children to be able "to recognize the difference between the Eucharistic Bread and common bread, and that it is unnecessary to postpone First Communion until the age of ten or twelve or even fourteen, as was done frequently at that time. This meant the new application of a principle on which all Eucharistic reforms of Pius X were based: Communion is not the reward for virtuous living, but the food to effect virtuous living according to the theological maxim ex opere operato.

---

[3] AAS 2 (1910), 894–98. See the comments of E. Barbe (Rheims 1905) and J.-B. Ferreres (Paris 1909).

[4] AAS 2 (1910), 577–83.

Issuing appropriate decrees was not enough. It was necessary to apply this legislation to practical life. By the way, the new regulations were not at all as revolutionary as they seemed to be at first glance. Nevertheless, they turned many old customs upside down and encountered definite resistance in many countries.[5]

Instigated by the Fathers of the Blessed Sacrament, a league of priests was founded in April 1905 for the purpose of enforcing the application of the decree about frequent Communion. Six years later, more than 50,000 priests had joined this league. Furthermore, immediately after the issuance of the decree Quam singulari, a Pious Union for the Communion of Children was founded in Rome, soon joined by many other national organizations (Italy, Spain, Belgium, South America, the United States, Canada). As of 1907 the Pope demanded the annual convention of a Eucharistic triduum in each diocese and if possible even in every parish. This was to draw the attention of the clergy and the faithful to the significance of the decree of 1905. In Belgium, in response to this triduum, the Jesuit Lintelo,[6] one of the most ardent apostles of frequent Communion, started Leagues of the Most Sacred Heart, whose members pledged regularly to receive Communion.[7] Similar leagues were founded in other countries under different conditions, for example in France by Father Bessière and in England by Father Leister.

Pius X also used the international Eucharistic congresses to promote the acceptance and propagation of the Roman decrees. Originally these congresses were meant to be public manifestations[8] to inspire the enthusiasm of the Catholics for all versions of the veneration of the Most Holy Sacrament and to liberate them from their fear of public judgment through clear and official testimony of Christ's Kingdom embracing all mankind (which was rejected by the followers of laicism). Typical manifestations of such triumphant posture were primarily the congresses of Montreal, Madrid, and especially Vienna, where the Emperor and the Archdukes marched in the procession wearing gala uniforms, surrounded by several thousand participants. Since the beginning of Pius X's pontificate, however, another aspect came to the foreground, which had been only faintly present under Leo XIII: the desire to encourage the faithful to receive Communion frequently, even daily. This was especially pertinent at the Congress of Metz in 1907, where Father Lintelo spoke about the duties of the preacher in regard to the decree. Reflecting certain reservations expressed by the bishop of Châlon, Father Lintelo was officially congratulated in the name of the cardinal legate. He confirmed that the "ideas and wishes of the Holy Father were most clearly reflected in his [Lintelo's] writings." From now on, congresses were unthought of without Father Lintelo's speeches. Based on rich personal experience, his report on the catechism and frequent Communion at the Congress of Madrid (1911), immediately following the decree Quam singulari, inspired the Eucharistic Children's Crusade, which was founded officially in 1914 on the occasion of the Congress of Lourdes and had already taken root two years later in fifty-four countries. Thus, all those were brilliantly refuted who had believed or sometimes even hoped that Pius X's death would ensure a relaxation of the decrees. On the contrary, their main content was even incorporated in the new code of canon law.

---

[5] After Cardinal De Lai, many would have wanted to appeal to the Holy Office (Disquisitio circa quasdam objectiones . . . [Vatican City 1950], 129); Pius X was charged with having made a decision regarding the Communion of children without consulting the episcopate.

[6] Regarding Jules Lintelo (1862–1919), see J. Severin, Vie du P. Lintelo, de la Compagnie de Jésus, apôtre de la communion quotidienne, membre du bureau des congrès eucharistiques (Toulouse, Brussels 1921).

[7] Some numbers may serve to illustrate the results of these efforts: the diocese of Mechelen, where the average number of Communions per inhabitant and per year fluctuated around 2.7 between 1870 and 1900, reached around 5.1 in 1911 and even 7.6 in 1912 (F. Houtart, Collectanea Mechliniensia 42 [1957], 595).

[8] Cf. above, pp. 260ff.

The utilization of the Eucharistic congresses bore increasingly rich fruit because their effect on the public grew considerably during the pontificate;[9] the number of participants, their reputation and influence rose tremendously: in 1914, no less than six cardinals and two hundred bishops came to Lourdes, which approached the total number of participants of the first congress in 1881. Above all, the congresses became more and more international in character; of the first fifteen congresses, nine had taken place in France, four in Belgium, and one in Switzerland, areas which were generally considered an extension of France. To be sure, the Congress of Jerusalem in 1893 had been an exception, but one must not forget to what degree France had felt at home in the Levant. Nevertheless, Pius X, always very interested in the program of the congress, decided to hold it in 1905, the year of its twenty-fifth anniversary, in Rome. The next meeting places of the congress were determined: Metz (1907, German at that time), London (1908), Cologne (1909), Montreal (1910), Madrid (1911), Vienna (1912), and Malta (1913). Not until 1914 did the congress return to France, to Lourdes.

---

[9] Cf. L. de Paladini, Die eucharistischen Kongresse. Ursprung und Geschichte (Paderborn 1912), and E. Lesne, Cinquantenaire des congrès eucharistiques internationaux (Lille 1931).

Similarly, the significance of the foreign delegations attending the respective congresses increased. This expansion was needed in view of the fact that efforts had been made for several years (a direct result of the systematic propaganda activities) also to organize national Eucharistic congresses almost everywhere. Therefore the international congresses were forced to emphasize their difference from the national congresses more clearly and to obtain a higher degree of internationality.

The Eucharistic decrees of Pius X, independent of their liturgical context, interpret Communion mainly as food for the individual Christian. On the other hand, Pius X played an important role in the rediscovery of the real position that the liturgy should take in Catholic life. Monsignor Wagner and Monsignor Jounel agreed that the first significant reforms in the area of liturgy since the Council of Trent were owed to Pius X. Under his pontificate and partially under his influence, the so-called "liturgical movement," so far limited to a small elite and developing in the confinements of Benedictine abbeys, began to invade parishes.

One of the first acts of the pontificate of Pius X was the motu proprio Tra le sollecitudini of 22 November 1903,[10] on the subject of Church music. However, its significance by far extended this area so that it is justified to speak of it as being the "charter of the liturgical movement." As bishop, the future Pope Pius X tried to combat "orchestral opera music," which had infiltrated Church music (more so in Italy than elsewhere), replacing it with classical polyphony and mainly with Gregorian chants, that is, the traditional chorale of the Church, whose true character the monks of Solesmes had gradually retrieved from the numerous changes they underwent in the course of the centuries.[11] But he was not satisfied with such reforms instituted with the help of his conductor Perosi in his dioceses of Mantua and Venice. Thus in 1893 he proposed to the Congregation of Rites a motion about the reform of Church music, which text had been prepared (with the help of some monks from Solesmes) by Father A. De Santi, a Jesuit with connections with the Civiltà Cattolica; De Santi became more and more the "mover of the Gregorian reform" under Leo XIII's and Pius X's pontificates. Following the advice of Santi and with his assistance, a motu proprio was drafted in November 1903 which reiterated the text of the motion. It defined the true essence of Church music, its sources of inspiration, its exterior form, and its execution, and it banned from the ceremonies of worship everything that did not conform to these principles. Gregorian chant in "its original and pure form, to which it has been appropriately restored by recent efforts" was presented as the "perfect model of Church music": A church composition is more ecclesiastical and liturgical when it approaches Gegorian chant in its composition, its spirit, and its inner attitude; on the other hand, the more it deviates from this model, the less it is worthy of the house of God." However, even though Gregorian chant was propagated as the norm, Pius X inhibited its exclusive use, in contrast to many of the executors of his will who kindled illusions about the possibility of turning the monodic church chant into song truly accessible to the people, as subsequent experience was to show. Merry del Val's testimony belongs in this context: "He certainly did not simply push aside the local or national customs, provided the basic principle of preserving the religious and artistic character of Church music was conscientiously adhered to. Pius X did not want to ban polyphonic music from the Church; rather he accepted the works of modern composers with benevolence, demanding, however, that they strictly obey the prescribed rules, making their compositions as much as possible echos and extensions of the chorale. He certainly did not agree with the actions of some fanatics who went so far as to ban from our churches all music that was not compatible with Gregorian music. He declared this to be extremism."[12]

---

[10] ASS 36 (1904), 329–32.

[11] Concerning the work done in Solesmes regarding the revival of the Gregorian chant and the controversies resulting from the so-called "Medicean edition" of the Pustet publishing house in Regensburg, see chap. 18. See also chap. 18 regarding "Cecilianism."

Through a second motu proprio of 25 April 1904,[13] likewise inspired by Father De Santi,[14] Pius X entrusted the Benedictines of Solesmes with the preparation of an authentic Vatican edition of the Gregorian melodies, under the control of a special Roman commission led by Dom J. Pothier, who had become abbot of Saint Wandrille in 1898. He requested that the melodies "be restored in their integrity and purity according to the oldest manuscripts, but also with special consideration of the legitimate tradition which had permeated the manuscripts in the course of time and of the practical use in present liturgies." This statement, inspired by Dom Pothier, caused endless debates in the commission. As a matter of fact, there were two camps, and not only within the ranks of the theoreticians (there was a disagreement between Dom Pothier and his student Dom Mocquereau)[15], but mainly on the practical and pastoral level: Should one demand, as Dom Mocquereau and most of his fellow brothers of Solesmes did, literal adoption of the oldest manuscripts for an edition to be used in liturgy, even if these manuscripts did not agree with modern sensitivities, or should one request, as did Dom Pothier and the Germans (mostly Father Wagner), acceptance of the modifications and moderations later introduced by "living traditions"? The disagreements between the members of the commission were intensified by personal conflicts. Moreover, the question of whether the systematic study of the old manuscripts would not necessitate many years of scholarly research, thus postponing the publication of the official edition, which, according to the Pope's intentions, was to standardize the practice of Church music in the entire Catholic Church, was legitimate. In order to solve this problem, the Pope, actually favoring the second solution, decided to proceed from the edition published in 1895 by Dom Pothier. In 1905 Pothier was asked to take charge of the final preparation and completion of the new edition. The Vatican commission ceased its work. In October 1905, the Kyriale was published, followed in 1908 by the Graduale and in 1912 by the Antiphonarium. Several decrees of the Congregation of Rites reinforced the order to observe the regulations carefully,[16] and the bishops were forbidden to allow future editions whose melodies did not conform with the Vatican edition. The opponents of Solesmes believed it could be concluded from this that those editions would be prohibited which had been provided with rhythmic signs according to Dom Mocquereau's method. But in spite of often rather annoying intrigues, the Holy See rejected taking this step. Instead, the Pope took up a suggestion by Father De Santi and recognized the legitimacy of these editions as "private editions."

---

[12] Impressioni e ricordi (Padua 1949).

[13] ASS 36 (1904), 586.

[14] Cf. J. M. Bauduccio (biblio., chap. 18).

[15] The author, who had outlined his theory in vol. VII of his Paléographie musicale (1901), offered a detailed exposé in Le nombre musical, 2 vols. (Toulouse 1908–27). Concerning the more eclectic opinions of Dom Pothier offered in his Revue Chant Grégorien (Grenoble 1892ff.). see *LThK*² VII, 648–49, and U. Bomm, Festschrift Th. Schrems (Regensburg 1963), 63–75.

The significance that the Pope attributed to the restoration of Church music does not only have aesthetic reasons—"provide a prayer with a beautiful background," he said—but rests mainly in the desire to awake in the faithful love for the liturgy and for solemn Church prayer, which the Pope considered "the first and irreplaceable source of Christian strength," according to the wording of the motu proprio of 1903. This intention compelled Pius X, who had been a man of the Church all his life, to institute several liturgical reforms. From the perspective of the second Vatican Council, they may seem rather modest, but they required a certain measure of courage and, in any case, provided the first, not insignificant guideline for the great liturgical awakening of the twentieth century.

---

[16] A letter of 18 February 1910, addressed to Msgr. Haberl, president of the Cecilia Society of Germany, criticized the so-called mensuralism in the execution of the Gregorian chant.

The expedience of certain liturgical reforms or at least their revision had been in the air since the Vatican Council, which had offered the opportunity of a series of vota regarding the reform of the breviary.[17] This matter, frequently discussed in professional journals, was brought up again by the publication of the Geschichten des Breviers by Father Batiffol (1893) and Suitbert Bäumer (1895). Furthermore, the progress of historical studies in Catholic circles during the last decades suggested a revision of the martyrology and certain readings of Matins. For this purpose, Leo XIII had founded a Historical-Liturgical Commission (1902), whose membership was composed of L. Duchesne, J. Wilpert, F. Ehrle, G. Mercati,[18] and others. Pius X was not indifferent to this problem, and the benevolence with which he treated the school of Solesmes was partly due to the fact that this school endeavored to restore the purity of the old Roman music on the basis of thorough studies of the manuscripts. His interest in the liturgical discipline, however, was primarily of a pastoral nature. This can be demonstrated by the solution, for example, in favor of which he had decided in the controversy between Dom Mocquereau and Dom Pothier. Moreover, the reform, which he began after successfully concluding the restoration of Church music, was not primarily designed to eliminate the historical errors contained in the breviary, but rather to upgrade the prayer of the weekly psalter and to restore Sunday to its rightful place in the liturgical cycle.

The festivals of saints or other more recent feasts with their own unique attributes had increased to such an extent that the Sunday or ferial office was rarely celebrated, consequently, numerous psalms were not recited any longer. Recently, Leo XIII had made the situation worse by conceding the votive office ad libitum,[19] practically destroying the liturgical yearly cycle. Various undertakings led to the establishment of a papal commission to reform the psalter (July 1911): two brochures by Monsignor Isoard,[20] published at the instigation of Rome in 1900 and 1901; several articles appearing in the following years in the German journals Pastor Bonus, Theologie und Glaube, and Der Katholik, and an essay by the Benedictine Abbot Dom Guépin in 1908[21]; the urgent necessity of a new edition of the breviary; but primarily, however, several interventions addressed directly to the Pope by the liturgy professor Father Piacenza, whose ideas on liturgy were progressive and liberal. This commission was ordered to work independently of the Congregation of Rites, whose tendency to cling to tradition would have made any serious reform impossible. The commission was also to work independently of the historical-liturgical commission which Leo XII had established. This documented the wish not to let objections by the historians get in the way. The commission was chaired by the new secretary of the Congregation of Rites, C. La Fontaine, a pastor who was intimately familiar with the liturgy but not with its history. The commission went to work at once. Working according to his own unique method, only assisted by a few advisers (in this case Monsignor Piacenza[22]), Pius X was able after several months to publish the bull Divino afflatu (1 November 1911).[23] It not only undertook the restructuring of the Divine Office in the spirit of tradition, but it also paid attention to the reasonable request to ease the burden of the breviary for the priest serving a parish. Matins was shortened from eighteen psalms on Sunday and twelve on weekdays to nine psalms or pieces of psalms. No holy days were suspended, but Sundays took a special place from now on; on most holy days, the ferial office was to be used along with the hymn of Matins, the lessons, and the concluding prayers. The Proprium de Tempore was restored to significance, readings of the Holy Scriptures were allotted more time, and the entire Office became more varied, even though it was considerably shortened and simplified, unfortunately sacrificing many traditional elements.

---

[17] Mansi XLIX, 446–48, L, 602, 626–27, 636–38, 652, 669–70, 679, LIII, 331–52, 466, 470. The commissions were of the opinion that the question belonged in the personal area of papal responsibility (ibid., L 930–31, LIII, 674, 687). Cf. J. W. Corcoran, Meinrad Essays 12 (1961), 4, 33–41.

[18] Cf. A. P. Frutaz, La sezione storica della S. Congr. dei Riti (Vatican City 1963), 9–10, 33–35.

[19] Decree of the Congregation of Rites of 5 July 1883 (Decreta authentica C.S.R. [Rome 1898ff], no. 3581); cf. H. Vinck, op. cit., 52–54.

[20] "Le saint Bréviaire et son avenir" and "Nouvelles observations sur le saint Bréviaire."

However, this was only the beginning. Despite the opposition of Monsignor La Fontaine, who claimed that an incisive reform required the consultation of the episcopate, Pius X adopted the more far-reaching concept of Piacenza and extended the duties of the commission to include a complete reform of the breviary and the missal. The execution of such an extensive program required thorough studies. The pressures by the publishers anxious to publish the new model edition of the breviary as soon as possible finally forced the Pope to find a temporary solution which emphasized the Sunday and ferial office, especially during Lent (motu proprio Abhinc duos annos of 23 October 1913). In the beginning of 1914, the reform of the missal was begun; however, the death of the Pope brought everything to a standstill, especially after the commission was strongly criticized for its working habits. The liturgical historians charged that it had sacrificed many time-honored values, for example, the prayer of Psalms 148–150, recited every morning at dawn.[24] The pragmatists thought that the revisions, forced upon the concerned groups without consulting them, had been made "hastily" (Della Chiesa), without paying sufficient attention to the difficulties of application.

---

[21] "De ratione breviarii romani-monastici eiusque emendatione Commentarium"; cf. NRTh 76 (1954), 413.

[22] His role, for a long time insufficiently assessed, was represented correctly by H. Vinck, thanks to unpublished documents (op. cit.). He shows primarily—as opposed to O. Rousseau (Miscellanea liturgica in onore card. Lercaro I, 525–50)—"that it was thanks to him and not to Beauduin that Sunday came back to favor again (1913)."

[23] AAS 3 (1911), 631–36; cf. P. Piacenza, In constitutionem "Divino afflatu" . . . commentarium (Rome 1912), and F. Cabrol, La réforme du bréviaire et du calendrier (Paris 1912).

The role Pius X played in the restoration of the liturgy is not confined to his legislative work, as significant as this may have been for the reevaluation of the celebration of the Christian mysteries in the context of the annual cycle. In his motu proprio of 1903, regarding Church music, the Pope said that the first source to feed the Christian life of the faithful was to be found in "active participation in the mystery of worship and in the common and solemn prayers of the Church."[25] From this statement the Belgian Benedictine Lambert Beauduin derived the inspiration and the foundation for founding the liturgical movement of Mont-César (Louvain) on the occasion of the Congress of Mechelen around 1909. He was supported by Cardinal Mercier. Since Beauduin possessed remarkable organizational talents and a contagious optimism, he succeeded (in his own special way) in interesting the parishes in the liturgical life. He distributed among the masses tens of thousands of pamphlets containing the translation of all Sunday Masses and their annotations. At the same time, he trained the pastors with both a journal, doctrinal in character, and the Questions liturgiques. He also organized yearly liturgical conventions, which grew more and more successful until the outbreak of the war. These meetings contributed a great deal to the spread of the movement for the liturgical pastoral outside of Belgium. It was to reach its peak in the course of the next quarter of the century.[26]

---

[24] See mainly the essays by A. Baumstark, Roma e l'oriente 3 (1911–12), 217–28, 289–302; 4 (1912), 93–96. F. Cabrol is more positive, in spite of some regrets.

[25] The official Latin translation of this passage of the Italian original is not quite correct; cf. QLP 32 (1952), 161.

[26] The strength of the movement started by Dom Lambert Beauduin was partly due to his sensitivity for pastoral realities, and partly to his efforts of basing his pastoral work on a solid doctrinal and historical foundation. He collected his thoughts in the classical little book, La piété de l'Église (Louvain 1914).

CHAPTER 28

Concern for Pastoral Improvements: Seminaries, Catechetical Instruction, Catholic Action

All popes of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries were intensely interested in improving the spiritual and moral level of the clergy and inspiring their pastoral enthusiasm. No pope was more systematically devoted to this task than Pius X. He continuously issued new memorandums and offered advice in this matter and again and again took new practical measures.

In March 1904, on the occasion of the thirteen hundredth anniversary of the death of Gregory the Great, he defined in an encyclical "the ideal of the true priest," as Gregory had described it in his Regula pastoralis; and he ordered for all of Italy apostolic visitations which were to bring to light the shortcomings of the clergy in order to eliminate them.[1] A few months earlier, he had recommended to the priests joining the Unio apostolica, a fraternity of priests "whose usefulness and excellence he had tested himself." The questionnaire, prepared in 1909 by the consistorial congregation under his direction, focused on the clergy's observance of their duties and the situation in the seminaries.[2] The bishops were to answer this questionnaire during their visitatio liminum. In view of the reaction of the national episcopate, Pius X did not make the wearing of the cassock mandatory all over the world, and he did not introduce everywhere the Italian custom of prohibiting the seminarians from returning to their families during vacation (in order to better protect them from worldly indoctrination). But he constantly reminded the bishops to use stricter standards when recruiting priests and to expel those young seminary candidates whose spirit of obedience gave cause for serious doubts.[3] He urgently wanted the priests to concentrate on their ultimate religious task, and he took several measures for the purpose of releasing them and preventing them from participating in all activities of an economic or political nature. In order to improve the spiritual guidance of the clergy, he did not hesitate to ease the traditional rules regarding the tenure of the pastors.[4] [1] Encyclical Iucunda sane (1 March 1904); ASS 36 (1903–04); brief of 11 February and 7 March 1904: ibid., 532–43. The Regolamento personale e questionario del visitatore apostolico (26 pages) is very important. It was published by L. Bedeschi, Lineamenti dell'Antimodernismo (Parma 1970), 145–62.

---

[2] AAS 2 (1910), 21–22, 26–28.

[3] On the other hand, it should be noted that Pius X, prompted by disputes over the book La vocation sacerdotale (Paris 1909) by the French seminary professor J. Lahitton, appointed a commission of cardinals, which approved his essential theses on 2 July 1912: (1) Nobody has the right to ordination before the free nomination by the bishop; (2) the appointment as priest is not "necessarily and usually" based on inner leanings; (3) the only indispensable requirements are honest intention, capability, purity of life and doctrine, justifying the hope that the candidate will be able to perform his office as priest and to do his duty (cf. AAS, 4 [1912], 485; also 5 [1913], 290). About Lahitton, see Catholicisme, V, 1626.

Several of these measures may give the impression of a sort of police system of surveillance and espionage, and of an overestimation of obedience at the cost of a free exchange of opinions. However, in spite of these weak points, to which we are especially sensitive today, we must not forget that Pius X was always guided by a very high, positive ideal. This ideal found an especially remarkable and eloquent expression in Haerent animo (4 August 1908),[5] an urgent reminder to the clergy, representing the true spiritual charter of the priesthood and remaining authoritative for a long time to come. It was written entirely by the Pope himself on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of his ordination as priest, and it took only "about fourteen days of the few moments of free time at his disposal" (Merry del Val). He drew a truly traditional picture of the priesthood; but he incorporated the rules of the priest's office which evolved in the course of the nineteenth century, challenging the clergy to follow them zealously. This does not change the fact that this saintly Pope, with his totally unique flair for challenges, instilled in the pastoral ministry a new spirit, the effects of which could be felt long after his death.

Impelled by the desire to improve the quality of the clergy, Pius X dealt particularly with the question of the seminaries, including the preparatory seminaries; except in German-speaking countries and in Belgium, they trained most candidates for the priesthood from ages twelve to thirteen. The instruction offered in these seminaries was completely antiquated. The situation was worsened by the fact that most teachers were autodidacts. They were in no position to prepare future priests for coping with the problems of the modern world. These grievances had been pointed out for several years by various people. For example, the superior of the seminary of Boston, Father John Hogan, discussed them in his book Clerical Studies (1898), which was translated into French in 1901 and inspired the archbishop of Albi, Monsignor Mignot, when he wrote his sensational "Lettres sur les études ecclésiastiques" (1900–01). Especially in Italy reforms were urgently needed, because the great number of small dioceses made the situation worse. Many bishops of this country faced the dilemmas of financing and recruiting the faculty. Shortly before his death, Leo XIII discussed this problem before the episcopate in a motu proprio of 8 December 1902;[6] Pius X was completely open-minded toward these problems; after all, in Treviso and as bishop of Mantua he had tried hard to improve the diocesan seminaries. He may also have been influenced by the measures taken by a former German Franciscan, Monsignor Döbbing, in his dioceses of Nepi and Sutri.[7] During the apostolic visitation ordered for March 1904, the real circumstances in the diocesan seminaries were to be uncovered. According to the judgment of a biographer who can hardly be charged with prejudice toward the Curia, even in Rome itself "everything was in need of repair or restoration, materially and spiritually, in terms of staff and education."[8] In the rest of Italy, conditions were no better. In January of 1905 the bishops were asked to think about the interdiocesan reorganization of the seminaries, and a papal commission was ordered to prepare reform plans analyzing and utilizing the reports of the inspectors. The papal adviser responsible for this project was Father Pietro Benedetti.[9]

[4] Decree Maxima cura of 20 August 1910: AAS, 2 (1910), 636–648.

[5] ASS 41 (1908), 555–77.

After three years of work carefully observed by the Pope, a program of studies was published (10 May 1907), followed by norms for the organization of the seminaries in regard to education and discipline (1 January 1908).[10] It paid attention to minute details. All in all, the proposed reforms were too weak and increased the shortcomings of an educational system leading a ghetto life without contact with the outside world. Eventually some improvements were made. Among them were: the consolidation of smaller institutions, adaptation of the high school curriculum to that of state institutions, introduction of a preparatory year at the beginning of theological studies, emphasis on the significance of a spiritual adviser and on the genuineness of vocations (especially urgent in countries where the clerical profession often meant social advancement). A new group of apostolic visitors was ordered to supervise the consequent execution of the Roman regulations. Unfortunately, the reform did not produce the results expected, especially in southern Italy. Qualified staffs were lacking, and the radical purge in reaction to modernism reduced the number of suitable men. The establishment of regional seminaries proved to be more difficult than had been expected, even though the Holy See financially assisted many bishops who did not have the necessary means at their disposal.

---

[6] ASS 35 (1902–03), 257–65.

[7] Cf. L. Hardick, "Bischof Bernhard Döbbing (1855–1916). Ein deutscher Bischof in Italien, seine innerkirchliche Reformtätigkeit," WZ 109 (1959), 142–95. He was appointed bishop in 1900 and Pius X called him "the pearl of the Italian episcopate."

[8] P. Fernessole, Pie X II (Paris 1953), 45.

[9] G. Gremigni, Cuore e testa. Mgr. Pietro Benedetti, missionario del S. Cuore (Rome 1939), 193–200. Regarding the archives of the commission, see M. Guasco, op. cit., n. 32.

[10] ASS 40 (1907), 336–43, 41 (1908), 212–42.

All these measures pertained only to Italy, but in the opinion of the Pope they could be taken as models elsewhere. All instructions received by the congregation entrusted with the control of the seminaries required that the regulations initially issued for Italy also be applied worldwide. Certain explanations in this regard specified the Pope's intentions. For example, when the archbishop of Rouen was widely criticized for having applied to his diocese the regulations intended for the Italian bishops "regarding books to be handed to the seminary students," he was praised in a Roman document "for having understood that these regulations were also valid for the seminaries in other countries."[11]

Pius X's restoration efforts regarding a more effective pastoral extended over other areas as well. Holding the conviction that good bishops are a must if one wants good priests, he did not confine himself to pious reprimands, as contained in the encyclical Communium rerum (21 April 1909), in which he represents Saint Anselm of Canterbury as a model pastor, fervently drawing the picture of the ideal bishop.[12] He also tried to improve the recruitment of the episcopate by revising the methods of appointments. He issued precise directives for the maintenance of the candidates' personal file, studying each one personally before making a decision. On the other hand in order to increase his control over the activities of his bishops he tightened not only the rule on the periodical visitatio liminum whereby every bishop was obliged, according to a strictly determined alternating schedule, to appear at the Vatican every five years. The bishop was now obliged to present a detailed report on the conditions in his diocese based upon a minutely detailed questionnaire.[13]

Instruction in the catechism was also one of Pius X's concerns. Clearly recognizing the situation, the Pope drew attention to the fact "that it is much easier to find a brilliant speaker than a catechist who is an excellent teacher." He did not grow tired of reminding the priests to present Christian doctrine clearly and simply, and to deal thoroughly with the catechesis for adults, which had been greatly neglected in the nineteenth century because the instruction of children took precedence. As always, he did not confine himself to issuing a solemn encyclical regarding this problem,[14] rather, he devised a series of measures, demanding, among other things, the more frequent employment of lay catechists, a novelty at this time. His words were followed by his example and, as he used to do, he personally explained the catechism every Sunday. Listeners came by the thousands wanting to hear the Pope who had not forgotten that he was also the bishop of the diocese of Rome.

---

[11] C. Cordonnier, Mgr. Fuzet (Paris 1950), II, 330.

[12] AAS 1 (1909), 333–88.

[13] AAS 2 (1910), 13–34.

[14] Encyclical Acerbo nimis (15 April 1905): ASS 37 (1904–05), 613–25.

Pius X also instigated the preparation of a new catechism, pointing out the elements which were to be considered. After examining the draft personally and correcting it with care, he introduced this catechism as the required text in the ecclesiastical province of Rome. At the same time, he expressed a wish to adopt it in all dioceses,[15] because he was interested in fulfilling the desire for a universal standardized catechism which had been repeatedly voiced after the First Vatican Council.

The interest in catechismal instruction, which Pius X had displayed continuously as a young priest and in later life, was in line with contemporary concerns. In 1889 the first Italian catechetical congress had taken place in Piacenza. But it was primarily in German-speaking countries that an active movement in search of new directions emerged. In 1875 a journal called Katechetische Blätter had been founded in Munich. This was followed in 1878 by the Christlich-Pädagogische Blätter in Vienna and in 1888 by the Katechetische Monatsschrift in Münster. These journals, especially the first two, found good response even in non-German-speaking countries and the catechetical societies, whose mouthpiece they were, organized important congresses in Munich (1906) and in Vienna (1912). Gradually, under the influence of H. Stieglitz, a new method was developed which had been inspired by the Protestant pedagogue Johann Friedrich Herbart and was known as the Munich catechetical method: an inductive method no longer proceeding from the text, which is explained, but from what the child knows already or perhaps (but at that time rarely) from a story of the Bible[16] that was to be added to the text of the catechism. However, some time passed before the majority of catechists adopted the new ideas, and it took even more time before interest in the pedagogical problems related to the method were replaced by the more fundamental question of the content to be taught: What should really be taught, a religious knowledge verbalized in scholastic terms or a message of salvation in Christ as presented in the Holy Scriptures?

---

[15] AAS 4 (1912), 690–92. Regarding this catechism, see in C. Bellò (Geremia Bonomelli [Brescia 1961], 180) the critical comments of the bishop of Cremona, who charged him, for instance, with maintaining a scholastic vocabulary and, in regard to morals, neglecting love of his fellow man. It should be noted that all catechisms since Deharbe had deviated from the traditional sequence. They had inserted the morals in between the exposé about the credo and the Sacraments. Pius X returned to the sequence outlined by the Council of Trent.

[16] Of all the men who helped to restore the significance of the "Salvation and Passion of Christ" in religious instruction F. J. Knecht needs to be mentioned. His Kommentar zur biblischen Geschichte (1882) reached its twenty-fifth edition in 1925 (Cf. H. Kreutzwald, Zur Geschichte des biblischen Unterrichts [Freiburg i. Br. 1957], 161–62).

It has already been pointed out that Pius X requested the frequent employment of lay catechists. But instruction in the catechism was not the only area in which he appealed to the laity. A conversation which Monsignor de Bazelaire reported is frequently mentioned: Speaking with some cardinals, the Pope asked the question: "What is most essential for the salvation of society?" "The construction of schools," said one cardinal. "No! Build more churches!" answered another. "No! To activate the recruitment of priests," suggested a third. "No! No!" declared the Pope. "Today, it is most important that every parish have at its disposal a group of enlightened, virtuous, decisive, and truly apostolic laymen." As a priest and bishop, Pius X knew from experience what effective help laymen, aware of their Christian responsibility, could provide the clergy regarding the vitalization of a parish and the modification of society. He did not neglect repeatedly to solicit this assistance from the laity, for example in the encyclical Il fermo proposito (11 June 1905).[17] It would not be difficult to find those passages in this encyclical which could be discarded as obsolete according to today's standards. Nevertheless, this encyclical can be accepted as the charter of the organized Catholic Action as well; because it did not just challenge the Catholics to practice their personal virtues, but also appealed to them to "pool all their vital forces in order to reinstate Jesus Christ to his position in the family, the school, and the society."

Emphasizing the importance of the organized lay apostolate, Pius X may indeed appear to be a forerunner. Yet he proved to be conservative in the way he tried to implement this idea. "The activities assisting the spiritual and pastoral office of the Church . . . must be subject to Church authority in every detail. . . . But even the other works undertaken to restore the true Christian civilization in Christ and forming Catholic Action in its aforementioned significance cannot be understood without the counsel and the high leadership of the ecclesiastical authority." This passage from the encyclical Il fermo proposito is characteristic of Pius X's viewpoint: he was aware of the indispensable effort of the laity to instill Christian principles into secular life; but he did not yet realize the specific character of the action of the Catholics within society, seeing it almost exclusively as an expansion and extension of the action of the clergy. He was inspired by certain formulas which had been successful during his time in Venetia, and he propagated an organization of Catholic Action according to a more or less uniform model which did not grant the laymen more than the role of an executor under the very strict control of the bishops. The Catholics were to join in certain groups in order to begin their various activities not only in the area of the religious apostolate, but also in the area of the social organizations, the press, or even political elections. But those were always strictly denominational organizations, incorporated into the framework of the parishes and the dioceses and dependent on the episcopate, which, in turn, was subject to the directives from Rome. By necessity, such a clerical conception of Catholic Action was bound to encounter clandestine or open resistance almost everywhere, depending on the situation. The most sensational oppositions of this kind were the crisis of the Opera dei congressi in Italy, breaking out in the first months of his pontificate, the affair concerning Le Sillon in France a few years later, and finally the conflict pertaining to the Christian trade unions in Germany.

---

[17] ASS 37 (1904–05), 740–67. The encyclical had been edited by the Jesuits of the Civiltà cattolica (L. Bedeschi, La Curia Romana, 68). It has the title De actione cattolica, a phrase, more or less technical in meaning, which had emerged in Italy during Leo XIII's pontificate and was usually applied to the Action in the social area. This phrase was not used on the other side of the Alps until after World War I.

SECTION TWO

The Modernist Crisis

It is increasingly clear that the definition of modernism in the encyclical Pascendi offers in abstract terms a uniform system which is rightfully declared to be in conflict with the Catholic faith, offering the historian nothing but a somewhat inadequate framework, because, while the theologian assesses documents and formulas from an absolute perspective, the historian has to make an attempt to understand mankind in its actual multifariousness, its deeper aspirations, and its spiritual concerns. However, there is another reason: The Jansenism of the seventeenth century was nothing more than the marginal phenomenon of an often absolutely orthodox, but sometimes simply anachronistic Augustinian movement. Likewise, the restoration movement, developing within the Church at the turn of the nineteenth century, showed rather different kinds of tendencies: Some of them were certainly legitimate, even though they may have confused people moving along in traditional ways; but other tendencies were dangerous because of their lack of proper distinctions, even though they may have had sound principles. Others were extremely heretical and in some cases completely lacking in Christian content.

The term "New Catholicism" (later "modernism")[1] embraced a series of concepts reflecting, in the opinion of contemporaries, the liberalism of the nineteenth century: renewed questioning of the traditional conception the Church had of the political and social order; the aggiornamento of the ecclesiastical institutions, the forms of the pastoral and the life style of the Christians living in and committed to this modern world; and the restoration of exegesis, theology, and religious philosophy. In this very general sense, modernism could be defined as "the meeting and confrontation of a long religious past with a present which found the vital sources of its inspiration in anything but this past" (É. Poulat). In this respect, the effects of modernism could be seen in Christian socialism and even in Christian democracy, in Sillonism, in

---

[1] Regarding the origin and the history of the term "modernism," confirmed by the encyclical Pascendi, see A. Houtin, op. cit., 81–95, and J. Rivière, op. cit., 13–34. In the same strict sense in which the encyclical uses the term, it appears again in Italy around 1904, at first used by journalists (the first one may have been G. Sacchetti in his disputation against Murri), later by the theologians.

Americanism (at least in the French version),[2] and in the many different, often independent currents of an ecclesiastical reform movement as it appeared around 1900 in Germany, Italy, and France. Several of these efforts and their effects have been discussed elsewhere in this volume. One chapter in this section is entirely devoted to German Reform Catholicism, because in this area, especially at the beginning of the twentieth century, tendencies came to light originating in the confrontation of Catholicism with the currents of a changing society. Most of all we must investigate the religious and cultural crises transpiring primarily in France, occasionally in Italy, and in some Catholic groups in England, caused by the unexpected collision of traditional Church doctrine with modern religious studies that had developed independently of and often even in opposition to the control of the churches.

The crisis with which we must deal at this point is comparable to the one that broke out half a century earlier in the churches of the Reformation under the name of "liberal Protestantism." However, this crisis was on a much larger scale. While certain groups, often called "Progressives," confined themselves to placing the newest discoveries of religious studies into the service of the traditional faith, other, more radical groups (the modernists in the true sense of the word) considered it necessary to give this faith a new form of expression, which was to do justice to the changes of the human mind, whose symptom and driving force was precisely the very development of these new studies. Such attempts were considered by certain adventurous minds as the dawn of a new era. To others, especially to most of the ecclesiastical authorities, they appeared to be the beginning of an impending catastrophe.

Here are the roots of the bitter antimodernistic reaction which will be the subject of the last chapter in this section. This bitterness cannot be solely explained by the methods of Church leadership and the delight of the contemporary press in sharp polemics. It was also caused by the realization that the Church felt deeply shaken and that, aside from some particularly acute men, no one could anticipate, sixty years before the Second Vatican Council, that the outcome of this renewed questioning, induced by a collective change of mind, would not necessarily lead to a total elimination of the essence of the Christian faith.

---

[2] Regarding the Americanist crisis, which was but a tempest in a teacup in the United States and in France, on the whole, nothing but a hérésie fantôme (F. Klein), see above, chap. 24.

CHAPTER 29

Reform Catholicism in Germany

Since the German clergy received a much more thorough training than the clergy in Latin or Anglo-Saxon countries, Germany was practically untouched by the phenomenon of modernism in the true sense of the word. However, in the two decades preceding the outbreak of World War I, the Catholic intellectuals were seized by a liberal current and a reform movement which wanted to reverse German Catholicism's trend of retreating within its own confines. This isolationism, the consequence of resistance to the Kulturkampf, had resulted in a kind of reaction that was inimical to the modern spirit and especially to its manifestation in German national liberalism.[1] But these movements also wanted to combat clerical and authoritarian tendencies which had permeated the Church since the victory of ultramontanism under Pius IX's pontificate, and they planned to be more open-minded toward the modern world and its aspirations. Also called "present-day Catholicism" or "critical Catholicism," (in contrast to a blind submission to Church authorities), these reform efforts in the German Catholic Church toward the end of the nineteenth century and throughout the first half of the twentieth century were usually described by the term "Reform Catholicism," coined by Josef Müller in his publication of 1899, even though Müller, a priest in Bamberg and editor of the journal Renaissance, was not representative of the phenomenon at large. It was precisely this term, by the way, which contributed to its ill repute among those who were intent on emphasizing the differences between the Catholic Church and the Evangelical Reformation.

It is true that the term "Reform Catholicism" is a "collective name for many diverse, mostly unrelated tendencies" (Hagen), including: liberal elements who wanted to instill Christianity with the rationale of the natural sciences or strove for a diminution of authoritative dependence in theological research; theologians and philosophers who were interested in an exchange with modern thought and therefore disapproved of the pressure Rome exercised in favor of Neo-Scholasticism; historians who were sensitive to the evolutionary aspect of things, thus provoking the majority of the ultramontanes, who wanted to keep the thought and life of the Church prisoner of the norms which had been determined in the Middle Ages or at the time of the Counter Reformation; opponents of the centralistic Church regime who had not followed the Old Catholics in their schism with Rome but agreed with many of their demands; heirs of the reform movements in the area of the liturgy (use of the German language), of Church discipline (among other things, the question of clerical celibacy), of the training of future priests, heirs, therefore, of ideas which had been posed and supported by followers of the earlier ecclesiastical enlightenment and, in the course of the first half of the century, by men like Hirscher; laymen who had involved themselves in the life of the Church and wished for more independence, especially in regard to social and cultural affairs and decisions, often also in regard to the organization of life in the parish or in the selection of pastors; patriots who were proud of the growing power of the new German Empire and wanted to reintroduce to the Church the rich heritage of German cultural and intellectual life, seemingly alienated from German Catholicism since the middle of the nineteenth century; religious men, partially rooted in the tradition of German Romanticism, who wanted to replace the legalistic Church, mired in organizational matters and Church politics, with the apostolic Church of love or the Church of the spirit, as they called it. All of them shared a certain anti-Roman, especially anti-Jesuit attitude, often even an animosity to the "political Catholicism" organized in the Center Party, and furthermore a "naive overestimation of the scholarly characteristics of the nineteenth century."[2] They also shared their loyalty to the Catholic Church and, in contrast to the modernists in the true sense of the word, the intent to respect unconditionally the basic structures of the faith and the Church. Some aspects of their demands and efforts were unquestionably narrow-minded and dictated by the circumstances of the time, but they "were loyal to the revelation and the Church, even though they dealt with the problems of the time more decisively and sometimes more obstreperously than their contemporaries."[3] [1] Concerning this situation, see F. Fuchs, "Die deutschen Katholiken und die deutsche Kultur im 19. Jahrhundert," Wiederbegegnung und Kultur in Deutschland (Munich 1927), 9–58, and P. Funk, "Der Gang des geistigen Lebens im katholischen Deutschland unserer Generation," ibid., 77–126. Also O. Köhler, "Bücher als Wegmarken des deutschen Katholizismus," Der katholische Buchhandel Deutschlands. Seine Geschichte bis zum Jahre 1967 (Frankfurt a. M. 1967), 11–90.

---

In all these efforts, certain parallels can be detected to the demands voiced by men such as Monsignor Ireland or Father Hecker in the

---

[2] J. Spörl, HJ 57 (1937), 5; F. Heiler judges from his perspective: "Like the earlier efforts of the theology of enlightenment and of Old Catholicism, these reforms were often too rationalistic and doctrinal; they did not emerge from the religious center of the Catholic Church, the mystery of Christ, and the desire for holiness" (*RGG*² IV [1800]).

[3] G. Schwaiger, Geschichte der Päpste im 20. Jahrhundert (Munich 1968), 64. See also J. Spörl, op. cit., 6: "Many things that have now become the common property of the German Catholics thanks to the Catholic youth movement had to be fought for fervently at that time."

United States, the disciples of Americanism, some Sillonists in France, F. von Hügel in England, Monsignor Bonomelli, the followers of Rosmini or the Milan group of the Rinnovamento in Italy whose work had some response in Germany. All in all, German Reform Catholicism developed rather independently of the foreign reform movements of that time. It was oriented toward the tradition of German Catholicism, its own situation after the Kulturkampf, and its subsequent problems.

In view of the multiplicity of phenomena, the polemical terminology was especially disastrous. Thus, Ludwig Pastor recorded in his diary in 1895: "In Munich a new liberal Catholicism began to emerge around Grauert and Hertling."[4] That was the language of Pastor, for Grauert and Hertling can hardly be called "liberal." In the course of the following years these undefined efforts gained ground, but they were confined to certain academic circles, mainly in southern Germany, and they were usually unrelated. They were represented by three outstanding personalities: F. X. Kraus, H. Schell (above all) and later A. Ehrhard.

Franz Xaver Kraus,[5] a brilliant professor of Church history and essayist, was at that time "the head and soul of the theology faculty in Freiburg" (H. Schiel) and one of the respected informants of the government in Berlin as far as Church policy was concerned. With unending loyalty he stood by the Church, no matter what his opponents maintained; but he was unable to understand the viewpoints of those who did not adhere to his ideas. He judged the general policies of the Church on the basis of his personally inimical sentiments. He was convinced that the future of the Church was threatened by the narrow-minded attitude and the fanaticism of the ultramontanes, and he branded them the Pharisees of our time, who "placed the Church before religion and were willing to sacrifice a clear decision of their conscience in favor of the decisions of an external authority." As a "liberal" in the sense that the word had in the nineteenth century" (C. Bauer) and with the Dantean distinction between "religious" and "political" Catholicism, he sharply opposed the policies of the Roman Curia and the Center Party, not only in numerous anonymous articles, but also in his ecclesiastical-political "Spectator Letters," which appeared from 1896 until 1900 in the Allgemeine Zeitung.

---

[4] Tagebücher, ed. by W. Wühr, 288. The historian H. Grauert (cf. HJ 44 [1924], 169–96) was responsible for the Historische Jahrbuch after 1884. Pastor charged him with systematically denouncing the Catholic historians of ultramontane leanings (see, for instance, Tagebücher, 244). G. von Hertling, philosophy professor and one of the main leaders of the Center Party, was the president of the Görres Society. At the Congress of Constance the following year, he warned the participants of the German Catholics lagging behind regarding the sciences.

[5] Regarding Franz Xaver Kraus (1840–1901), Church historian and pioneer in the field of archeology and in Christian art, professor in Freiburg after 1878, author of an extensive work about Dante (1897), for a long time considered an authority in Germany, see, in addition to his diaries (ed. by H. Schiel, [Cologne 1957]) revealing, as expected, his deeply religious soul: H. Schiel, Im Spannungsfeld von Kirche und Politik, F. X. Kraus (Trier 1951); id., F. X. Kraus und die Tübinger Katholische Schule (Ellwangen 1958); id., TThZ 61 (1952), 5–20; id., AMrhKG 3 (1951), 218–39; C. Bauer, Deutscher Katholizismus (Frankfurt 1964), 93–136; H. Tritz, Spicilegium hist. congr. SS. Redemptoris 11 (1963), 182–232; also O. Köhler, Bewußtseinsstörungen im Katholizismus (Frankfurt a. M. 1972), 225–38. The author of the article "In Canossa," signed "v. S.," published in the Allgemeine Zeitung on 3 August 1881, could only be identified after Kraus's literary estate had been released. Interested in the episcopal see of Trier, Kraus had agitated in this article against M. F. Korum: see H. Schiel, Die Trierer Bischofskandidatur . . . (Trier 1955).

Even though Kraus moved away from the Reform Catholicism J. Müller had praised as the "religion of the future,"[6] and even though "his own ecclesiastical-political principles and concerns dealt principally with questions other than the struggle of the antimodernists,"[7] his dissatisfaction with the existing situation and his sharp criticism of ultramontanism earned him the honor of carrying the banner for those liberal Bavarian Catholics who had founded, in 1904, under the name Krausgesellschaft, a "society for the advancement of religion and culture," which combined a naive admiration of "independent scholarship'" with strong anti-Roman accusations and prejudices.[8]

Herman Schell,[9] after 1884 professor of apologetics, Christian art history, and comparative religious studies in Würzburg, attracted many enthusiastic admirers. He was an outstanding intellectual of tireless energy, anything but a polemicist, but a sincere and original philosopher and theologian, who has been discovered today as a forerunner of Christian existentialism because he emphasized the personal and vital aspect and the inwardness of Catholicism without in the least denying the visible and hierarchical aspects of the Church. He developed theories which were somewhat unfamiliar to the theology of his time, for example, about religious freedom, the apologetics of immanence, the role of the Holy Spirit, and the position of the laity in the Church; and he introduced religious studies to the ecclesiastical disciplines. Within a few years, he published amazingly varied and voluminous works, whose audacious constructs were often subject to justified criticism, but it was to his credit that he presented the traditional doctrine in personalistic categories, and that he was inspired by the continuous desire to "baptize" modern philosophy and science and to prove that they were by no means incompatible with Catholic belief. From this perspective he published in 1897 a pamphlet with the title Katholizismus als Prinzip des Fortschritts, in which he declared that the Church had to ally itself with progress in whatever form, requesting that Catholics not be forced to behave like "mental eunuchs." These sensational declarations were made in the name of an "ideal Catholicism" and supplemented by a program for applying his theses to the areas of religious, intellectual, and political activities. Schell had not received sizable public attention so far, but this pamphlet unleashed a storm of indignation. He responded to the criticism with a second publication, entitled Die neue Zeit und der alte Glaube. In it he criticized the methods of the Church government even more directly, and he expressed his conviction that the Church, provided its core was unchangeable, must rejuvenate itself continuously through dialogue with the world. On 15 December 1898 both pamphlets and his most important works were put on the Index.[10] Schell submitted, and he was allowed to continue teaching. His prestige grew. However, the bitter polemics against him continued in an "unworthy manner" (Schwaiger), his loyalty and his fatith were doubted, and as a matter of fact, he was charged with planning "to revolutionize the clergy." According to his doctor, all these intrigues impaired his health, and he died in 1906, only fifty-six years old. At the academic obsequies, S. Merkle delivered the funeral oration. He also organized a committee, joined by the representatives of Reform Catholicism, which was responsible for erecting a tombstone.

---

[6] The pamphlet, published in 1898 under this title, was expanded in the following year to two volumes dealing with the topics: "Die wissenschaftliche Reform" and "Die praktischen Reformen." The author made demands in favor of the synods, proposed plans for the training and organization of the clergy and for a greater participation of the laity in ecclesiastical life, criticized Church intervention in the political arena, the work of the Congregation of the Index, and Neo-Scholasticism, concluding with a charge against the Jesuits (II, 101–54). The little work was put on the Index on 7 June 1901.

[7] H. Schiel, Tagebücher, xix.

[8] A record of its activities can be found in Das Neue Jahrhundert 6 (1914), 265–71.

[9] Concerning Herman Schell (1850–1906), see H. Hasenfuß, H. Schell als existentieller Denker und Theologe (Würzburg 1956); id., *LThK*² IX, 384–85; V. Berning, Das Denken H. Schells (Essen 1964); id., MThZ 19 (1968), 102–20; P. Wacker, Glaube und Wissen bei H. Schell (Paderborn 1961); id., Theologie als ökumenischer Dialog (Paderborn 1965); O. Schröder, op. cit., 370–92. His main works: Katholische Dogmatik (4 vols. 1889–93); Gott und Geist (2 vols., 1895–96); Apologie des Christentums (2 vols., 1901–05); Christus (1903).

In the meantime, other progressive voices were making themselves heard. There were even attempts made to organize the liberal forces. In 1901 a former colleague of Schell's, patrologist Albert Ehrhard,[11] published not just a pamphlet, but a larger, scholarly work with the significant title Der Katholizismus und das 20. Jahrhundert im Licht der kirchlichen Entwicklung der Neuzeit. Based on his solid knowledge of the past, this work attempted to prove the thesis that it is possible to overcome the conflict unquestionably present between Catholicism and the modern world of thought, provided that, on the one hand, modern thought relinquish its anti-Christian prejudices, and that, on the other hand, the Church cease to conceptualize the Middle Ages in absolute terms. In Ehrhard's opinion, the Middle Ages do not represent the climax of Christianity's development. Its religious institutions had only relative value, and Neo-Scholasticism would have to fail if it was conceived merely as an unqualified restoration of the past. He also had reservations about the Society of Jesus and had several desires; for example, he wished to give the national languages an appropriate place in the liturgy. His work was very successful (twelve editions in one year), but almost the entire Catholic press in Germany and Austria criticized Ehrhard. He was especially vehemently opposed by the Redemptorist A. Rössler (supported by Cardinal Archbishop Gruscha of Vienna), who called him an "anti-Catholic." Albert Ehrhard, not faced with any critics of his caliber, responded harshly with his new ingenious work: Liberaler Katholizismus? Ein Wort an meine Kritiker (1902).

---

[10] The official report was published by K. Hennemann, Widerrufe H. Schells? (Würzburg 1908), 82–86.

[11] Regarding Albert Ehrhard (1862–1940), professor of Church history in Würzburg (1892–98), Vienna (1898–1902), Strasbourg (1903–18), and Bonn (1920–27), specialist for Old Christian literature, see A. Dempf, A. Ehrhard. Der Mann und das Werk (Colmar 1944); K. Baus, Bonner Gelehrte. Kath. Theologie (Bonn 1968), 114–22; NDB IV, 357; DHGE XV, 62–65; O. Schröder, op. cit., 392–407.

Several other less prominent professors joined in the controversy in the following years, taking Ehrhard's side: O. Sickenberger published several belligerent writings between 1902 and 1904, charging the Catholics mainly with their extreme anti-Protestantism (however, his authority was somewhat impaired by his notorious resistance to the celibacy of the clergy); a colleague of Schell's, F. X. Kiefl, a man of speculative talent and very pugnacious, who, between 1904 and 1905, repeatedly opposed the vehement criticism of Schell voiced by the Jesuit Stufler; M. Spahn, history professor in Strasbourg and brilliant essayist, who was concerned with rescuing the Catholics from their ghetto existence, whose often rather discerning, yet too severe biography of Leo XIII was considered a manifesto.

After 1901 the avant-garde gathered around several journals: Renaissance (1901–7), published by the aforementioned, not very talented J. Müller; Zwanzigstes Jahrhundert (1902–9), whose motto was: "religion, Germanity, culture," perpetuated by an active minority of young Bavarians. Hochland had an entirely different format (1903–71; forbidden in 1941, continued in 1946). This journal, published by C. Muth, opposed the criticism which, thanks to the powerful organization of the Borromeo Society, dominated most of the Catholic literary productions and was perpetuated by the clergy. Instead, Hochland advocated a literary evaluation, which emphasized aesthetic aspects over moralizing concerns.[12] This journal greatly benefitted the alleviation of the ghetto mentality of German Catholicism, aside from its contributions to good literature.

The reactions of the hierarchy toward reforms were mostly of a negative nature. The hierarchy, interested in preserving its structures and strict orthodoxy and fearing the religious confusion of the masses, resisted change as such. This was also true in view of Reform Catholicism at the beginning of the twentieth century. The problem was aggravated by the fact that the latter, aside from justified demands and healthy efforts, succumbed to ill-advised or vague proposals and exaggerated criticism. This gave rise to the occasional, but usually completely unjustified question of whether these men, if only de facto, worked hand in glove with the Away-from-Rome movement raging through Austria at that time, and whether they were not striving for a Christianity practically independent of Rome. Even Bishop P. W. Keppler of Rottenburg, a prelate who was certainly not considered a reactionary (formerly professor in Freiburg) and who had approved, though with reservation, the publication of Ehrhard's disputed work, thought it necessary to intervene in the controversies with a public lecture "About the True and False Reform" (1 December 1902). He conceded that certain things in the Church needed improvement. However, his sharp, barely disguised criticism of men such as Kraus, Schell, and Ehrhard was astonishing. This lecture was fatefully influenced by the very successful writer Julius Langbehn (the "Rembrandt German"), an anti-Semitic forerunner of the "conservative revolution."[13] To the dismay of the ultramontanes, Rome kept quiet for a long period of time. However, Pius X was more and more disturbed by the developments in Germany,[14] especially by indications that the reform efforts were gaining ground. One such symptom was the founding of a society in Münster in the spring of 1906 which was joined by an elite of Catholic laymen (such as several leaders of the Center Party) and pursued the goal of prompting the Holy See to change the Index procedures.[15] Another symptom was the support given to two bishops, about thirty seminary professors, and prominent laymen by a committee established for the purpose of erecting a memorial for Schell. After the Austrian theologian E. Commer had published an extremely aggressive book against Schell following his death, the Pope sent him a brief on 14 June 1907, praising him for the great service he had done for the Church. In this same brief, he charged the advocates of this memorial with "laboring under a misapprehension of the Catholic truth" and "resisting the authority of the Holy See."[16] The appointment of the former Dominican General Frühwirth as nuncio in Munich at the end of 1907 was to serve both as a bulwark against the feared progressing decline of Catholic Germany toward liberalism and as an introduction to a reevaluation of the situation.[17]

---

[12] The "literature controversy," as it was termed at that time, began with the pamphlet by C. Muth (1867–1944): "Steht die katholische Belletristik auf der Höhe der Zeit?" (1898). The main opponent in the other camp was the Austrian journal Der Gral (1906ff.), managed by R. von Kralik. Concerning the "literary controversy," see F. Rappmannsberger, "C. Muth und seine Zeitschrift Hochland als Vorkämpfer für die innere Erneuerung Deutschlands," (diss., Munich 1952); A. W. Hüffler, C. Muth als Literaturkritiker (Münster 1959); LThK^{2} V, 399–400, and VI, 1082; StL^{6} IV, 112–14.

[13] Regarding this lecture, see A. Gisler, op. cit., 150–53; H. Schiel, ThQ 137 (1957), 296–98; A. Donders, Bischof Keppler (Freiburg i. Br. 1935); Keppler's introduction to: M. Nissen, Der Rembrandtdeutsche (Freiburg 1926), 1–6, where Keppler speaks of terms coined by Langbehn "which I prefer not to see in our language today."

[14] Cf. below, pp. 477–79, and 500–7.

However, the turbulence and polemical controversies did not cease. They were even reignited through the disputes over the encyclical Pascendi and later over the antimodernist oath.[18] In 1909 the Zwanzigstes Jahrhundert was renamed Das neue Jahrhundert with the significant subtitle: Organ der deutschen Modernisten. After a few months, however, a change occurred under the leadership of Philipp Funk,[19] an idealistic young layman from the Catholic youth movement who was characterized by "a mixture of belligerence and religious inwardness" (Spörl). He turned away from the purely negative and polemical tendency of the journal, differentiating it sharply from French modernism and the Austrian Away-from-Rome movement and declaring that Reform Catholicism had to remain "a matter disputed within the confines of the Church."

---

[15] Concerning this Society for Christian Culture, whose arguments against the Index coincided with those that Cardinal Frings had carried through at the Second Vatican Council, see K. Bachem, Vorgeschichte, Geschichte und Politik der deutschen Zentrumspartei VII (Cologne 1930), 187ff; A. ten Hompel, Indexbewegung und Kulturgesellschaft (Bonn 1908).

[16] Texts in A. Michelitsch, Der neue Syllabus (Graz 1908), 53–55. L. Pastor went so far as to say that the dedication of the memorial could become an occasion to convene a "council of reformers" (cf. Tagebücher, 461). Aside from Merkle, the members of the committee were, among others: Julius Bachem, H. C. Cardauns, A. Dyroff, E. Eichmann, H. Finke, F. X. Funk, H. Grauert, F. von Hügel, C. Muth, J. Sauer, J. Sickenberger, M. Spahn. The memorial is a marble bust with the inscription: Vivas in Deo (cf. K. Hennemann, H. Schell im Lichte zeitgenössischer Urteile [Paderborn 1909]).

[17] Tagebücher by L. von Pastor, 482 and 485. See also A. Walz, Andreas Kardinal Frühwirth (Vienna 1950), 304–05.

[18] Of the few Germans who openly professed Modernism, the following should be mentioned: J. Schnitzer (1859–1939), professor in Munich and author of remarkable works about Savonarola (cf. F. Heiler, "J. Schnitzer, ein Vorkämpfer des deutschen Reformkatholizismus," Eine heilige Kirche 21 [1939], 297–313); K. Gebert (1860–1910), a Neo-Kantian, president of the Krausgesellschaft; H. Koch (1869–1940), who rejected the dogma regarding the pope on the basis of his studies concerning Saint Cyprian (cf. *RGG*³ III, 1687); and mainly T. Engert (1875–1945), an exegete and student of Schell, who was in charge of the Zwanzigste Jahrhundert; in 1910, he converted to Protestantism (see Gesammelte modernistische Vorträge [Würzburg 1909–10]; cf. DHGE XV, 492–93).

[19] Regarding Philipp Funk, a former seminarian of the diocese of Rottenburg, after World War I member of the Hochland group and after 1926 professor of history at the University of Freiburg, see J. Spörl, HJ 57 (1937), 1–15, and A. Hagen, Gestalten aus

Of all the personalities involved in Reform Catholicism around 1910, one man stands out for his energetic, unique character and his fearless and unconditional advocacy of the truth: S. Merkle,[20] professor of Church history in Würzburg, whose lectures had incited conflicts between the boards of seminaries and the episcopal administration. In 1902 Cardinal Steinhuber had complained that most of the Munich "reformists" came from the ranks of Merkle's students.[21] Merkle was the pioneer of a new, more positive Catholic evaluation of Luther and the ecclesiastical enlightenment. His viewpoints had not been accepted amicably in ultramontane circles whose dismay climaxed in 1912 when he opposed their plans for an exclusively Catholic university, instead defending theological faculties incorporated into the state universities. One of his chief arguments for maintaining the faculties was that they contributed greatly to the preservation of religious peace in Germany, but the effect of the indignation stored up during the Kulturkampf intensified the denominational differences among the heirs of the Mainz faction. They felt strengthened in their convictions by the support Pius X had given the opponents of the interdenominational trade unions during the trade union controversy. Thus the political and social conflicts in Germany on the eve of World War I intersected with the controversies over Reform Catholicism, as had been the case several years before in France in the course of the modernist controversy.

---

dem Schwäbischen Katholizismus III (Stuttgart 1954), 244–83. He described his reform program in: Das geistige Erbe von F. X. Kraus (1912); Von der Kirche des Geistes (1913); Der religiöse Schell (1916). New subtitle of the journal: Wochenschrift für religiöse Kultur.

[20] Concerning Sebastian Merkle (1862–1945), who had gained prominence in the world of scholars through his edition of the records of the Council of Trent (I, 1901; II, 1911), cf. also H. Jedin, ThQ 130 (1950), 1–20, and A. Bigelmair, Lebensläufe aus Franken VI (Würzburg 1960), 418–35.

[21] Tagebücher of L. Pastor, 396.

CHAPTER 30

The Beginning of the Crisis in France

With justification Loisy wrote: "The Histoire du modernisme by Houtin rests on fiction: on the agreement of Duchesne's ideas about the early history of the Church conceived between 1881 and 1889 with my thoughts on the history of the Bible and Hébert's concepts of philosophy."[1] It is a matter of fact that there was initially no concentrated action, even on a purely national level. Rather, there existed various concepts that had spontaneously developed during the last years of Leo XIII's pontificate and were favored by the general atmosphere of reconciliation between the Church and modern society, a climate seemingly confirmed by several papal initiatives. The controversy over Americanism[2] had been in this respect symptomatic.

Influenced by Neo-Kantianism and believing to have found their ultimate master in Maurice Blondel, whose ideas were often falsified, philosophers strove to replace scholastic intellectualism with a doctrine that would include the forces of the heart and the actual processes of life. Some of them remained under the vague influence of a religious symbolism based on Schleiermacher, combined with the evolutionism of Hegelian or Spencerian inspiration. They declared that theology has to relinquish unalterable concepts and devise new interpretations in order to preserve contact with steadily progressing life. Philosopher Marcel Hébert,[3] priest and director of a large Paris college, joined this movement, which was strongly affected by A. Sabatier's work Esquisse d'une philosophie de la religion d'àpres la psychologie et l'histoire (1897), a book disseminating the concepts of German liberal Protestantism even in France.[4]

Parallel to this philosophical movement, publicized through the Annales de philosophie chrétienne, young theologians, familiarized by Duchesne with historical criticism, discovered that German non-Catholic scholars, applying the principles of historical criticism to the documents and history of the beginnings of Christianity, had called in question certain traditional interpretations, such as those pertaining to Moses' work, to the history of Israel's religion, to the teachings of

---

[1] Mémoires I, 535.—Regarding Duchesne, see chap. 22, n. 17.

[2] See above, chap. 24.

[3] Concerning Marcel Hébert (1851–1916), see A. Houtin, M. Hébert (Paris 1925), and A. Vidler, A Variety . . . , 63–75.

[4] See some of the data provided in J. Fontaine, Les infiltrations kantiennes et protestantes et le clergé française (Paris 1902). The book is lacking in details.

Christ, and to life among the first Christian generations. From this arose the problem of the compatibility of Catholic belief with the results of modern exegetic scholarship. The encyclical Providentissimus, issued by Leo XIII in 1893,[5] had provided several principles for solving these problems, but certainly not all of them. The Pope's warnings against exaggerated criticism encouraged even the conservative forces to brand all attempts to apply the critical methods to inspired texts as thoroughly infested with rationalistic prejudices. Yet more and more exegetes upheld the conviction that the application of the critical method to this field was not sacrilege. On the contrary, intellectual righteousness and honesty demanded the application of the tested principles of historical method to studies of the Holy Scriptures, even at the risk of consequently having to change traditional postures in the controversies between believers and rationalists by making new fundamental distinctions between the (sometimes acceptable) literary and historical results of critical investigations and a conception of Israel's history and the origins of Christianity that would systematically erase the supernatural aspect.

From this perspective, Duchesne's student Alfred Loisy (1857–1940) devoted himself after 1883 to the study of the Old Testament and then the gospels, and M.-J. Lagrange founded in 1890 the École Biblique in Jerusalem, publishing two years later the Revue biblique. Lagrange confined himself to the world of experts and was intent on demonstrating the identity of his research results with the official doctrine of the Church (which did not prevent his critical appraisal by the conservatives and denunciation in Rome). Loisy and several of his collaborators, on the other hand, were less cautious. Convinced that Catholic apologetics, in view of the progress made by so-called "independent" criticism, had to completely revise its concepts, they did not hesitate to abrogate, even in popular journals, a great number of traditional doctrines. That even in 1896 an open-minded man such as Batiffol would speak of "superfluous intrepidities" and later of "intellectual anarchy," "agitating at this very moment the philosophical and scholarly elite of the French clergy,"[6] explains the anxiety of the ecclesiastical authorities, who, unfortunately, were hardly able to deal competently with the problems at hand.[7] In spite of his efforts not to impede the progress of the investigations, Leo XIII deemed it necessary to send a letter to the bishops of France warning them, among other things, of "the alarming tendencies attempting to invade the exegesis of the Bible."[8] This document incited the French Jesuit J. Fontaine to rebuke the "Protestant infiltrations" of the French clergy in a series of articles. He turned mainly against the Revue d'histoire et de littérature religieuse, founded in 1896 by Loisy, and against Loisy's articles concerning original revelation, the development of Israel's religion, or the development of dogma, published for the general public in the Revue du clergé français. Both the death of Cardinal Mazzella (1900), prefect of the Congregation of the Index and revered by the conservatives who were especially numerous and active in the Society of Jesus, and several interventions by the Pope (such as the one in favor of the bishop of Albi, Monsignor Mignot) caused a certain détente. This was shown through the creation of the Pontifical Biblical Commission at the end of the summer of 1901 (officially constituted in October 1902).[9] The appointment of the Franciscan Fr. Fleming as secretary of the commission, the first consultants, largely chosen from the ranks of the progressive exegetes, and the original plan to make the Revue biblique the public relations channel of the commission illustrate the constructive rather than repressive character of this initiative. However, this was merely the calm before the storm. Several weeks later a new intervention by Loisy rekindled the controversy even more violently.

---

[5] Regarding this document, the circumstances inititating it, and the reactions it caused, see chap. 23.

[6] Letter addressed to P. Lagrange, quoted in P. Fernessole, Pie X II (Paris 1953), 171; letter addressed to Chanoine of January 1901, quoted in BLE 67 (1966), 271. He added: "Like you, I have no sympathies for the curialists, the Mazzellas and tutti quanti; but don't Loisy and his friends, without intending to, work in the interest of those very same curialists?"

Loisy was a scholar of extraordinary intellectual prominence. Thoroughly informed and endowed with a penetrating critical mind, he was also a talented writer, possessing a very unique gift for words. Because of the encyclical Providentissimus he was forced to relinquish his chair at the Institut Catholique in Paris. He utilized the time afforded him through this suspension from office in transferring his research from technical exegesis to the more general problems posed by Holy Scriptures, investigating the divine truth and the value of the Church expressed and preserved therein. The French translation of Adolf Harnack's lectures on "The Essence of Christianity," published in 1902, gave him the opportunity to present a synthesis of the systems of Catholic apologetics that he had prepared shortly before. He promulgated this in a small book entitled L'Évangile et l'Église in November 1902; it caused more sensation and excitement in the world of religion than all but a few other books (F. Klein).

---

[7] The decree of the Holy Office of 13 January 1897 regarding the authenticity of the Comma johanneum (ASS 29 [1896–97], 637), which wanted to authoritively explain a question of text criticism, is a typical example of the attitude in the Roman circles.

[8] Encyclical Depuis le jour of 8 September 1899 (ASS 32 [1899–1900], 193–213). The year before, in the letter addressed to the general of the Minderbrüder on 25 November 1898 (ASS 31 [1898–99], 264–67), he expressed regret over "a daring and far too liberal form of interpretation" in the area of exegesis.

[9] See A. Loisy, Mémoires II, 84–90, and M.-J. Lagrange, M. Loisy et le modernisme, 119–35.

Like the famous Protestant historian Harnack, Loisy was convinced that the content of a critically interpreted Gospel and the various forms of historical Christianity were not necessarily identical. However, he wanted to prove that this disagreement was not a distortion, as claimed by the Protestants. Quite the contrary, the evolution of Catholicism, showed in three respects (institution, dogma, and cult), based inextricably in the authentic message of Jesus Christ, how this identity could be restored through history. However, this continuity differed fundamentally from that upheld by traditional apologetics.

Loisy was inspired by the thinking of the German eschatological school, revising their arguments in a novel way and declaring at length that it was not Jesus' intent to organize a new religious community to continue his work on this earth; rather, he endeavored to proclaim the impending establishment of the kingdom of heaven. However, things turned out differently than planned: "Jesus announced the coming of the kingdom and what transpired was the Church." Yet the Church sustained messianic hope, assuming the responsibility of nurturing and organizing this expectation, since the hour of salvation was a long time coming. From this adaptation of the term "kingdom" to the variable conditions of time and place, Loisy said, arose the successive formulations of Church dogmas, the development of its hierarchical institutions and the deployment of its sacramental rites. These experiences of the past show, Loisy added, that the essence of Christianity had to be seen in its evolution, not in a rigid core, as Harnack proposed. Consequently the future harbored the possibility, even the likelihood of new discoveries. Since the dogmas of the Church reflected "the general state of the knowledge of the times and the people who devised them," the conclusion was justified that a profound change in the state of scholarship could necessitate "a new interpretation of old rules," especially since it was obvious that "dogmas are not truths descending from heaven" but merely symbols of the eternal truth.

Those who were familiar with the difficulties which Loisy wanted to solve generally reacted positively to his theses: finally, here was someone to prove, on the basis of a strictly scientific method and in the face of the arrogant appraisals of liberal Protestants, that the Catholic Church was indeed the only legitimate fruit of the Gospel. Other readers objected primarily to the nonconformism of this new branch of apologetics, raising the question to what extent it was compatible with Catholic orthodoxy. They objected to many of his constructs, in spite of the various precautions which the author took to indicate rather than clearly define them. Thus praise was quickly infused with criticism and rejection, voiced not only by the conservatives, whose "strong language often concealed complete ignoratio elenchi,"[10] but also by open-minded experts such as Lagrange and especially Batiffol, who turned his Institut Catholique of Toulouse into a "stronghold of the struggle against modernism," contributing to the embitterment of this struggle for reasons as yet indiscernible.[11]

On 17 January 1903, pressured by Cardinal Perraud, Cardinal Richard, archbishop of Paris, condemned Loisy's work, claiming that it threatened "to confuse seriously the faithful's belief in the fundamental dogmas of the Catholic Church." However, the episcopate at large preferred, with four or five exceptions, not to take issue; so did Leo XIII. The atmosphere in Rome changed during the summer after the election of Pius X, who had anxiously observed the theological and exegetical dissent in France for a long time.

The controversy flared up again even more seriously in the fall, when Loisy published a new volume justifying the first book: Autour d'un petit livre. Loisy's main concern in this book was the liberation of Catholic historians from a tutelage that he called anachronistic, expressly confirming the autonomy of biblical criticism of theological doctrine. But this was not all. He stated with even more precision, contradicting the pretentions of classical apologetics, that Christ's divinity evades history; so does his resurrection, his conception by the Virgin, or any other personal intervention of God in the course of human affairs. According to Loisy, the subject of history is not the existence of the resurrected Christ, but solely the disciples' belief therein, a belief undergoing progressively precise definition. While suggesting differentiation between the Christ of history and the Christ of faith, he did not declare, in contrast to the assertions of his Catholic opponents, that faith deemed true what seemed to be false to the historian. Though he believed, on the one hand, that the impact of faith acting in Christian consciousness did not just mean a development of ecclesiastical institutions, but also an idealization of the person of Jesus Christ, he also held the notion, on the other hand, that this phenomenon of a collective consciousness and its objective basis are commensurable.

---

[10] J. Rivière, op. cit., 169. To be noted is the statement of É. Poulat, Histoire, dogme et critique, 291: "Though scientifically they were not prepared to solve the existing problems, theologically they were sufficiently informed to pinpoint them and to emphasize the seriousness of the differences of opinion."

[11] É. Poulat, op. cit., 363–92. Poulat even asked the question: "What part had the progressivist school [that is, the school of Batiffol and Lagrange] in the condemnation of Modernism?" (p. 366).

However, these declarations did not alleviate the anxieties; on the contrary, they intensified them; and this time, the little book encountered the almost unanimous opposition of the theologians and the episcopate. On the other hand, interventions in favor of Loisy were offered in Rome by Baron von Hügel, a long-time admirer, and by Monsignor Mignot, one of the few French prelates who conceded that it was absolutely essential to make room for these new critical methods in the framework of eccesiastical studies.[12] Nevertheless, on 16 December 1903, the Holy Office condemned Loisy's works, but used rather ambivalent terms apparently indicating that the Vatican still hesitated to get seriously involved. Shortly afterward, Loisy made known that he would submit. For three years, he held aloof from the controversies he had incited, but, in seclusion, he devoted himself to the preparation of his great commentary on the Synoptic Gospels (1907–8).

Later he declared repeatedly that he had lost faith in the divinity of Christ and even in the existence of a personal God long before the publication of L'Évangile et L'Église, but he had preferred to conceal his true opinions, hoping to initiate more successfully a reform of the Church from within, deeming it useful for humanity. His biography by Houtin,[13] who knew him well, seems to confirm his declaration at first glance. Houtin's text, unpublished for a long time, was edited by É. Poulat, some of whose discerning statements suggest that it was precisely the existence of this manuscript (of which Loisy knew more or less without ever having seen it) that partially explains the reconstruction of his religious development, which he wanted to promulgate a posteriori, after having abdicated all positive faith. This impairs the trustworthiness of the exegete's statements about the exact date when he ceased to believe, and it proves that many people were only too eager to believe his own explanations. In any case, the fragments of letters and his memoirs, published by R. de Boyer de Sainte-Suzanne under the title

---

[12] Concerning Friedrich Baron von Hügel, see chap. 31. Regarding Msgr. Mignot (1842–1918), see L. de Lacger, Mgr. Mignot (Paris 1933), to be supplemented by É. Poulat, Histoire, dogme et critique, 448–84, and by the letters recently published by M. Becamel in BLE 67 (1966), 3–44, 81–114, 170–94, 257–86; 69 (1968), 241–68; 71 (1970), 262–73.

[13] Concerning Albert Houtin (1867–1926), a priest and historian, progressively turning away from the Church and the Christian faith, who had published (in 1902) an ironical report entitled La question biblique chez les catholiques de France au XIX^{e} siècle, mercilessly exposing the weakness of the answers that rationalistic exegesis had been faced with before the appearance of Loisy and his school, see É. Poulat, op. cit., 332–63.—Regarding the question of the Bible under the pontificate of Leo XIII, cf. chap. 23.

Loisy entre la foi et l'incroyance, confirm his distance from Renan, whose scientistic rationalism he despised, or from Houtin, who was an evil spirit in many respects.[14] In 1900 Loisy already differentiated clearly between foi and croyance, between faith and belief. But today, progress in the sociology of religious cognition, in the theology of faith, and in hermeneutics enables us to understand the complex psychology of the modernists better than at the beginning of the century.

Whatever Loisy's personal opinions may have entailed, it is a matter of fact that he became the catalyst of the anxiety spreading among the Catholic intelligentsia and that his two "little books" and their condemnation incited a dispute which rippled outward after 1908 and extended far beyond France's borders. To the conservative theologians, Loisy appeared as a new Renan, perhaps worse; but his defenders called to mind the trial against Galileo, charging that a "Dreyfus Affair of the clergy" was in progress.

These revolutionary ideas found a resounding echo in certain intellectual groups, especially among the young clergy. They were fascinated by these suggestive concepts, fundamentally differing through their sensitivity toward the diversity of historical truths from the superficial character and the naivete of the "Lives of Jesus" and the stories about early Christianity available to the Catholic public. The (often misunderstood) thoughts of Newman concerning the development of the Christian doctrine and on the relationship between faith and reason, propagated at that time by Bremond[15] in France, seemed to them a guarantee—the guarantee of a cardinal—for the new apologetic path Loisy had described and for his less abstract conception of revelation. In addition, they had a presentiment of the entire terrifying implication of the assurance that the Gospel was no historical scripture in the true sense, but a document of a catechetic nature expressing the belief of the first Christian generations as it was trying to formulate itself. Their misgivings were compounded by the realization of some Christian democrats that, on the one hand, their efforts to integrate the Church into modern society were comparable to Loisy's work of restoration on the theological level, and that, on the other hand, his demands for the autonomy of the exegete or the historian of dogma from the ecclesiastical teachings paralleled their own demands for the autonomy of the laity and bourgeois society from the clerical autocracy. Symptomatic of this attitude was the weekly paper Demain of Lyon (1905/07), managed by two young laymen.

---

[14] Cf. É. Poulat, Une œuvre clandestine d'H. Bremond, 21–22: "In reality, Modernism was in the center of tendencies, the rights of which were represented by the progressivism of Msgr. Batiffol, P. Lagrange, P. Grandmaison, etc., and which encountered on the left the rationalism of men such as Turmel, Houtin, and Sartiaux. The continuous communication with Loisy of the latter two and the undifferentiated opposition of the former could cloak the depth and the significance of their differences, which were not always a matter of temperament."

[15] Between 1904 and 1906, he published three volumes of translated excerpts about the development of the dogma and the psychology of faith and Newman, essai de biographie psychologique. Concerning Henri Bremond (1865–1933), see DSAM I, 1928–38 Entretiens sur H. Bremond, ed. by J. Dagens, M. Nédoncelle (Paris, The Hague 1967), esp. 43–98; É. Poulat, Une œuvre clandestine d'H. Bremond (Rome 1972). Regarding his relations to the modernist movement, in addition to this last work, Loisy's opinion should be noted: "Bremond was not closely involved in the modernist struggle. He rather joined in the service of the Red Cross: he collected the dead bodies and attended to the wounded."

Many of Loisy's enthusiastic admirers thought like Bremond, who responded to the deluge of rationalistic criticism with the following words: "He is a true Noah, and the Church should be happy to possess his ark."[16] However, many were worried, and not only in the conservative camp, as was proven by the volume of letters compiled by R. Marlé. Many a progressive agreed with Loisy as to the need for an incisive revision of traditional Catholic apologetics and to a series of his critical conclusions. Yet they refused to agree to his radical idea of the total autonomy of criticism from ecclesiastical teachings and to question, as he did, the basic concept of orthodoxy. This was the case with Batiffol, for instance, who apparently just wanted to restore his reputation in Rome, and with Blondel, whose articles entitled Histoire et dogme emphasized the true concept of tradition in the Catholic system and still appear to be especially acute, even though Blondel shared the philosophers' usual difficulties of comprehending the problems of the historians and did not always understand the extent of the difficulties exposed by Loisy.

Even though Loisy was the focal point of the controversy animating the world of Catholic intellectuals in the first decades of the twentieth century, and even though it may be justified to call him "the father of modernism" (Heiler), the question of the Bible and dogmatic history were not the only areas at that time to incite fundamental controversies, which some considered indispensable to rescue what could be rescued of Christianity, while others believed that they would destroy the essence of the Christian faith as they understood it.

---

[16] H. Bremond, M. Blondel, Correspondance I, 494 (23 May 1904). Concerning this enthusiasm among the youth, see É. Poulat, Histoire, dogme et critique, 270–315, quoting the testimony of Msgr. E. Amann, etc.: RevSR 10(1930), 676–93, esp. 685. See also the report by M. Rifaux of 1906 about Les conditions du retour au catholicisme (Paris 1907); concerning this, see J. Rivière, op. cit., 258–61.

The controversies over Blondel's proposals at the end of the nineties regarding a renovation of apologetics by using the philosophical method of immanence (immanence apologetics) gradually subsided. One of his students, Lucien Laberthonnière,[17] revived these disputes and extended them to include the entire complex of the problem of religious cognition. In two collections of articles entitled Essais de philosophie religieuse (1903) and Le réalisme chrétien et l'idéalisme grec (1904), which Loisy called a work by "Maurice Blondel translated into French," Laberthonnière criticized the philosophy of "essences," intending to replace them in the name of a moral dogmatism with a philosophy of action and personal inspiration. At this point, he also discussed one of the fundamental questions raised by the modernists: the question regarding the originality and character of Christianity as a revealed historical religion. However, his conception of philosophy compelled him to subject Thomism, which he hardly knew, to a radical appraisal and to correlate the natural order and the supernatural so closely that it appeared as if he wanted to fuse them. He was also inspired by Blondel's critique of "extrinsicism," charging the Church with proceeding in too authoritarian a manner. He gave theologians adhering to tradition good reason to oppose him, especially when his influence began to grow (around 1905) after he had accepted the management (together with Blondel) of the Annales de philosophie chrétienne[18] and founded the Association d'études religieuses, an association which regularly brought together Christian philosophers and scholars open toward modern thought.

A member of this very group, Édouard Le Roy,[19] a mathematician, philosopher, and a student of Bergson, preoccupied with religious problems, incited one of the most passionate disputes of these troubled years between Catholic theologians and philosophers, "a real turmoil," according to Rivière. At the beginning of 1905, he published an article entitled "Qu'est-ce qu'un dogme?"[20] challenging philosophers and theologians to think about the impact that the dogmatic rules offered to the faithful by the Church may have on a modern scholarly mind. Once again he questioned the classical conception of the dogma, which he felt was related to the Scholastic philosophy inherited from the Middle Ages and to its static concept of an eternal truth. He stressed the radical incommensurability of the mysteries and the human spirit and suggested assigning to dogmas an essentially pragmatic significance. Consequently it would no longer be a matter of speculative conceptions to be forced upon us, but one of rules pertaining to ethical and religious actions. Presenting us with such dogmas, the Church would merely ask us to believe that the religious reality indeed contained the arguments for justifying the obligatory mental attitude. Outstanding thinkers such as the Jesuit de Grandmaison or the Dominicans Sertillanges and Allo showed understanding; but most theologians reacted adversely to this "pragmatism," taking it, in ignorance of Le Roy's constructs, merely as profound agnosticism. Therefore they vehemently opposed this trend, particularly since Le Roy did not conceal the fact that he considered a series of Loisy's conclusions to be certain, and moreover, since he did not hesitate, once again in the name of the demands posed by a modern attitude, to bring the traditional concept of the miracle and its apologetic significance up for debate.[21]

---

[17] Concerning Lucien Laberthonnière (1860–1932), Oratorian, see E. Castelli, Laberthonnière (Paris 1931); L. Passaglia, Educazione religiosa e libertà umana in Laberthonnière. La formazione di un pensiero (Milan 1967); T. Perrin, Le P. "Laberthonnière" (diss., Paris 1970); A. Ngindu, "Le problème de la connaissance religieuse dans la crise moderniste. L. Laberthonnière" (diss., Kinshasa 1972); Laberthonnière. L'homme et l'œuvre, ed. by P. Beillevert (Paris 1972).

[18] See the first article of the new series entitled Notre programme (vol. 151, 5–31).

[19] Concerning Edouard Le Roy (1870–1954), see Études philosophiques 10 (1955), 161–210, and T. Tshibangu, Théologie positive et théologie spéculative (Louvain, Léopoldville 1965), 250–67.

[20] In La Quinzaine 63 (1905), 495–526; resumed with significant additions in his book Dogme et critique (1907), providing a bibliography about the disputes caused by the article (pp. 359–63).

Thus within a few years, "the Tridentine peace of an entire Church world" (A. Dupront) was suddenly and almost simultaneously shaken in regard to a whole series of essential issues: the nature of revelation, the inspiration of the Holy Scriptures and religious cognition, the person of Christ and his true role in the birth of the Church and its sacraments, the nature and role of oral tradition within the Catholic system, the limits of dogmatic development, the authority of ecclesiastical teachings and the true meaning of the term "orthodoxy," and the value of classical apologetics. Those were indeed serious questions calling for an answer. The answers provided by Loisy, Laberthonnière, and Le Roy contained acceptable and often leading elements, as was proven through the subsequent development of theology and certain initiatives taken by the Second Vatican Council. But these positive elements were not sufficiently thought through and often presented without the imperative detailed differentiations or with inappropriate vocabulary, causing the nonconformists to be confused and bewildered. Moreover, (especially in Loisy's case) sometimes truly ambiguous affirmations had to be dealt with, which could either be interpretated as erroneous and, in the final analysis, destructive to any Christian belief, or as being concerned with innovations, yet basically orthodox and really liberating in view of rather pertinent difficulties caused by the progress of religious studies. Those men defending the innovators believed that the latter had paved a promising path through obscurity, notwithstanding their rashness and their insufficient clarifications. Their opponents saw only the first possibility of interpretation and presumed that the ambiguous wording corresponded to the true thoughts of the authors. Their battle against these tendencies became increasingly fierce because the initial confusion turned more and more into blind panic. This panic had its origin in the ambiguous literature which was carrying the existing controversies (without clearly defined positions) into wider and wider circles. The consequences were devastating, especially among the clergy, who, because of very superficial training in the seminaries, were ill prepared to remain cool and whose increasing "outbursts" pleased the observers.[22] Considering that Church authorities at that time had to fend off particularly vehement anticlerical offensives and that the emergence of socialism gave impetus to the right wing to resist any kind of innovation, the almost all-embracing confusion of responsible Catholics can be better understood, especially since the opposition took on progressively international dimensions.

---

[21] Annales de philosophie chrétienne 153 (1906–07), 5–33, 166–91, 225–59.

---

[22] Above all, A. Houtin, whose book La crise du clergé (Paris 1907) was successful, as demonstrated by new editions and translations.

CHAPTER 31

The Crisis in England

In contrast to its manifestations in France and Italy, modernism in England displayed some unique characteristics. Even when the movement had reached its peak, the modernists there comprised a modest group;[1] this is also true if the term "modernism" is defined in the sense of abstract immanentist heresy used in the encyclical Pascendi. Such a condition was to be anticipated in a country where Catholics were in the minority, including, in turn, a small minority of intellectuals. Yet on the continent and particularly in Italy, British modernism, by virtue of its quality, exerted an influence disproportionate to its numerical strength.[2] If Loisy, on the one hand, deserves to be called the "father of Catholic modernism" due to his accomplishments in the area of exegesis and dogmatic history, the question arises whether Tyrrell does not deserve this title for his achievements in the area of fundamental theology and religious philosophy. On the other hand, all historians agree that von Hügel is the most prominent link between the modernists and the progressives of various countries and, at least at the beginning of the crisis, between the progressives and the ecclesiastical authorities. After all, again in contrast to French and, to a lesser extent, Italian modernism, no respected British modernist leaned toward an agnostic rationalism. The British modernists affirmed to the very end the definition Tyrrell, who has been more accurately appraised by recent scholars than by those of previous generations, had espoused in Christianity at the Cross-Road: "I understand a modernist to be a Christian of any denomination who is convinced that the essential truths of his religion and the essential truths of modern society can enter into a synthesis." At this point, the definition formulated by Maud Petre may be added: "Modernism is not only searching for a synthesis of modernity and religion, but also of modern religion and the Church."

---

[1] This does not mean that one should confine the movement to two or three people, which was often the case. M. Petre's remark (Congrès d'histoire du christianisme III, 233) is correct: "One must not believe that the faithful, who do not specifically deal with history and other disciplines, are always completely satisfied with the theological doctrine presented to them. Many secret struggles take place in their simple hearts. The doctrine and the Sacraments of the Church are indispensable means of spiritual life; yet, some find elements in this doctrine which offend their most noble feelings. These are the unassuming modernists."

The struggle for a synthesis between loyalty to the Catholic Church on the one hand, and the affirmation of modern culture and academic freedom on the other hand, had already in the sixties of the past century caused tensions within the core of British Catholicism, the so-called Rambler group; tensions that relaxed rather quickly, however. After a recess of about two decades, religious liberalism awakened again to new life under the pontificate of Leo XIII. In 1892 the Catholic journalist E. J. Dillon had begun to criticize the policies of the Roman Curia in the Contemporary Review. In 1896 Wilfrid Ward,[3] son of the pioneer of the strictest ultramontane movement, had founded the Synthetic Society in reaction to the ghetto mentality of his religious brothers, a society in which Catholics joined with Anglicans and Protestants. In 1897 F. von Hügel, highly respected in the British Catholic world, had presented to the international congress of scholars in Fribourg a report concerning the sources of the Hexateuch, essentially following Wellhausen's viewpoints. In the course of the next years, he succeeded in soliciting within his circle more and more disciples of Loisy,[4] with whom he communicated regularly by mail. The disputes over Americanism and later, at the beginning of 1900, the abdication of the Old-Catholic scholar St. George Mivart,[5] representing a moderate transformism within "Mivartism," and, finally, the turbulence created by all of this in the press were new indications of the emergence of a pro-reform attitude among certain Catholic circles. Hoping to seize control again, the bishops issued a joint pastoral letter dealing with "The Church and Catholic liberalism,"[6] proclaiming the defense of the Roman congregations and emphasizing the difference between the "teaching Church" and the "learning Church." The predominantly negative character of this document only increased anxieties,[7] in spite of an affirmative brief by the Pope.

---

[2] In addition, he had a rather remarkable influence on certain Anglican circles.

[3] Cf. above, p. 142.

[4] In 1903, "L'Évangile et l'Église" by P. Lucas, published in the Jesuit journal The Month, and W. Ward and Dom C. Butler in The Tablet were assessed positively. See also "Voces catholicae, The Abbé Loisy and the Catholic Reform Movement," Contemporary Review 83 (1903), 385–412.

A prominent figure among the progressive Catholics in England at the beginning of the twentieth century was Friedrich Baron von Hügel (1852–1925), about whom Maud Petre wrote: "He was not only a modernist, but an arch-modernist, and since he was certainly the pioneer of modernism in England . . . , he was the teacher of us all."[8] For a long time, Baron von Hügel was quite critically appraised by the Catholic historians for his unquestionable sympathy toward the fundamental tendencies of the emerging modernism and for the devoted support he gave for many years to its most prominent leaders, even the most compromised ones. For these efforts, Paul Sabatier called him "the lay bishop of the modernists." In the meantime, his well-deserved rehabilitation was in progress, and more and more he appeared to be one of the most illustrious religious personalities of his time. He always stood apart from the religious subjectivism of several of his friends and from their efforts to reduce religion to the human problem of the inner self.[9] He described his own ideal in a letter of May 1903: "Not only as simple a thing as honest scholarship, but also as complex, costly, and consoling a thing as honest scholarship must be lived and created in and with a sincere religion deeply anchored in history, and in and with a living Catholicism."[10] More understanding than original, he felt better than most how important it is to remain equally loyal to the demands of a tradition embodied in an ecclesiastical community and to the demands of a thoroughly honest rational criticism, knowing at the same time how necessary it is to witness in the depths of one's personality as a human being and as a devout Christian the tension between those two aspects, instead of striving for a close balance of the two. This openness toward all true values may have been the most characteristic feature of Baron von Hügel's rich personality. His concern not to lose any of these values explains his will never to destroy the bridges to and to preserve the bonds with even those who were in error, in his opinion, for their exclusive claims, but who deserved credit for having drawn attention to an aspect of reality or a real problem that should not be ignored.[11] [5] Concerning this affair, see J. W. Gruber, A Conscience in Conflict, the Life of St. G. J. Mivart (New York 1960).

---

[6] Text of this "Joint Pastoral" of 22 December 1900: The Tablet 97 (1901), 8–12, 50–52.

[7] Regarding the reaction to the "Joint Pastoral," see M. Ward, op. cit., 134–43; M. Petre, Autobiography and Life of G. Tyrrell II, 146–61, and L. Barmann, op. cit., 149–53.

[8] Congrès d'histoire du christianisme III (Paris 1926), 227, 233.

[9] The best proof of this is his main work, The Mystical Element of Religion as Studied in St. Catherine of Genova and her Friends (1908), which was written during the climax of the modernist crisis. It must be noted that W. Temple, in 1925, declared that this work "could be considered the most significant theological work written in the English language during the last half century" (quoted by M. de la Bedoyère, op. cit., 223).

[10] Selected Letters, 123.

Friedrich von Hügel was the son of an Austrian diplomat and a Scottish mother who lived in London after 1871. In his youth he overcame a severe spiritual crisis thanks to the aid of Abbé Huvelin, who gave him the guideline: "For you, nothing but the truth, never orthodoxy." Therefore, he was deeply concerned throughout his life with preserving the independence of scholarly research within the Church. This rationality did not prevent him from being deeply pious and invincibly loyal to the Church, because he believed life in the Church, administering the sacraments, to be an indispensable source of any truly religious life.[12] He was an autodidact, like many aristocrats of his generation. His religious education exceeded that of many clergymen. He combined German thoroughness with the English empirical method, thus becoming a forerunner of the "existentialist" thinkers of the following generation. He was no expert in any special field, but, rare at that time, he was equally competent in the area of biblical criticism, religious philosophy, and the history of spirituality. He also possessed the very special talent of shaking up spirits and souls, stimulating people, through restraining criticism as well as inspiring exhortation, to search sincerely for the truth. It is even more remarkable that he was able to utilize his complete fluency in the major international languages in the service of establishing constructive relations between exegetes, theologians, and philosophers searching for such truth in France, England, Germany, and Italy. For this purpose, he carried on an extensive correspondence and made frequent journeys to foreign countries. Many of these men stimulated von Hügel's thinking and became his best friends, while he, in turn, tried to help them with unequalled understanding, perspicacity, and sensitivity. He was not as erratic as many of them, looking for balance and rejecting radical concepts on principle. Thus he succeeded in evading condemnation,[13] probably assisted by his social rank. He did his best to defend his friends to the bitter end; he rejected the improper and often superficial criticism that some of his friends were exposed to by the conservative wing, and he felt the Vatican's authoritarian methods to be shocking to a religious person of the twentieth century.

---

[11] A letter, written after the crisis, reveals the intent of these efforts: "I try to do everything I can to make my old Church intellectually as acceptable as possible, not because reason is the most important thing in religion, but rather because my old Church already possesses all the knowledge necessary to guide spiritual life; while, for reasons that would fill a whole volume, it is less equipped to deal with the needs, the rights, and the duties of rational life. This second aspect of my ambition includes the ardent desire and sincere hope to serve the wounded and embittered Catholics who have fallen or are about to fall away from the faith, to dress their wounds and return them to the fold of the Church" (Letters to a Niece, no. 60, of 9 December 1921).

[12] "No book is worthy of such a sacrifice as that of the Sacraments of the Church," he told Miss Petre one day.

George Tyrrell (1861–1909) was a respected preacher and spiritual leader, author of devotional books of rare sensitivity and writer of apologetic essays reflecting in a remarkable way the attitude of his contemporaries; perhaps he would have adhered to this line of activities throughout his life had he not met von Hügel. Mainly through his influence he became familiar with biblical criticism and Neo-Kantian philosophy. Having turned to these pursuits, he began questioning a series of essential theses of fundamental theology. In this regard, as Bremond perceived correctly, one must not overlook the influence that was exerted upon Tyrrell by the English liberal Protestants of the nineteenth century, particularly by M. Arnold. Tyrrell was of Irish descent. To his Celtic temperament he owed the critical spirit that occasionally played tricks on him, but also endowed him with the astonishing capability of investigating the secret depths of the suprarational forces nurturing religious experience. At the age of eighteen he converted from the Anglican to the Catholic Church, joined the Society of Jesus, and, in 1896, was assigned to the editorial staff of The Month. Soon he was one of the best-known collaborators of this journal.[14] Two prayer books, Nova et Vetera (1897) and Hard Sayings (1898), establishing his friendship with Baron von Hügel, and a collection of spiritual lectures given to the students of Oxford, "External Religion, its Use and Abuse" (1899), established him as a writer. But precisely at that time he encountered difficulties with ecclesiastical censorship. Tyrrell, overly sensitive and irritable by nature, even more irritable because of the first symptoms of Bright's disease, of which he eventually died, was highly incensed by the narrow-minded limitations imposed upon his intellectual pursuits. Consequently, he began to doubt the authority of the ecclesiastical hierarchy. The extensive reform movement developing on the continent inspired him in his questioning. At the same time, other matters entered into his awareness: the all-too-frequent identification of the Catholic faith with its medieval forms of expression, the unique character of the individual's approach to truth, including religious truth, and, finally, the contrast between the static conception of dogma espoused by the Scholastics and the significance of the development of Christian doctrine in the context of history, all of which he had been exposed to through new books. From then on he was of the opinion that the classical concepts of the depositum fidei, the inspiration of the Bible, and revelation had to be analysed from an entirely new perspective, placing emphasis on the mystical element of religion. With moderate restraint, he tried to prove that Christ did not appear as a teacher of orthodoxy and that Catholic theologians were mistaken when they considered faith to be a spiritual affirmation of the historical and metaphysical assurances given by a theology that was apparently revealed and miraculously saved from error; dogma was merely a human attempt to express the divine force within man in intellectual formulations. Under the pseudonym E. Engel, he promulgated these ideas in a brochure entitled Religion as a Factor of Life (1902), dedicating it to a friend with the words: "Something that preserves the strength of my faith under the rubble of my orthodoxy."[15] A year later, under another pseudonym (Hilaire Bourdon), he published a more extensive book, the most radical of all his works, The Church and the Future. In it he opposed the system of despotic authority concentrated in the Roman Curia and the conception of the Church as an official institute of truth; according to him, the Church must be seen as nothing more than a "school of divine love on this earth" and its only task is continually to translate the inspirations, which the divine life effects in the hearts of its members, into new temporary rules. These publications found wide response in the modernist circles of France and Italy. At first, Tyrrell was left alone. However, one day in 1906, when it became known through the indiscretion of the press that he was also the author of an anonymous brochure in which he had espoused similar ideas,[16] he was expelled from the Jesuits. Lex credendi (1906) and Through Scylla and Charybdis

---

[13] Except for an indirect reprimand for a secondary affair, which was not justified, (cf. M. de la Bedoyere, op. cit., 191). Regarding von Hügel's attitude toward the ecclesiastical authorities on the eve of Pascendi, see his letters to Tyrrell and Loisy, analyzed in ibid., 188–89. Concerning his attitude in 1907, see L. Barmann, op. cit., 183–209.

[14] In The Month he published thirty-nine articles in seven years. Some of them are compiled in a book entitled The Faith of the Millions (2 vols., 1901). The title refers to Tyrrell's concern not to confine himself to the problems of an intellectual elite, as did the modernists in many cases, but rather to reevaluate the problem of faith, facing the masses of the Christian population.

---

[15] Lettres de G. Tyrrell à H. Bremond, 129.

[16] A Letter to a University Professor (1904), reprinted by Tyrrell in 1906 under the title A Much-Abused Letter, with an introduction and footnotes.

(1907), two works which he published in the following months in an effort to find a middle way between the extreme dogmaticism of the theologians and the all-too-human pragmatism of certain philosophers, did not contain anything particularly subversive; in fact, the former was praised in a review in the Month. His vehement protests against the encyclical Pascendi, published in the national press, and his opposition to the inquisitorial attitude expressed therein resulted directly in his excommunication. A few months later, Cardinal Mercier called him the typical representative of philosophical and theological modernism branded in the encyclical. Tyrrell responded with a small book entitled Medievalism (1908), sharply criticizing papal absolutism and traditional Catholicism.[17] At the same time, he intensified his communication with the modernists of the continent, above all in Italy, where he had numerous admirers, trying to organize a "strong force of excommunicants who were to form a living protest against the papacy."[18] But the submission of the majority and the inclination of most others toward a socialist humanitarianism or toward an immanentist rationalism were bitter disappointments to him. Moreover, his progressing disease deprived him of the ability to continue to play an active role. On 15 July 1909, death prematurely concluded the tragic career of a man who was for many years one of the most promising figures of British Catholicism.[19]

In spite of his narrow-mindedness toward spiritual problems, Cardinal Bourne (after 1903 bishop of Westminster) avoided dramatizing the modernist danger. For a long time he declined to oppose Tyrrell. He supported the modern orientation that Wilfrid Ward tried to give the Dublin Review, protected several Catholic thinkers who had been denounced by people suspecting heretics in every corner, and helped prevent a condemnation of von Hügel. As was mentioned at the beginning of this chapter, modernism in England involved but a small segment of the Catholic public. This is proven, for instance, by the lack of journals modernistic in nature or at least somewhat open to modernist interests. There is no reason to believe that modernism in Britain died with Tyrrell. Maud Petre,[20] devotedly caring for Tyrrell in the last years of his life, was not the only one to refuse to take the antimodernist oath demanded by the bishop and continued her opposition, even though she was denied the sacraments in her diocese. How important the number of allies was is demonstrated by the fact that A. Vidler was capable of devoting a whole chapter of his book on the modernists to the "Lesser Lights and Fellow Travellers."[21] He drew attention to the generally little-known case of the famous scholar Edmund Bishop,[22] who, like von Hügel, always remained a loyal and devout Catholic. But in 1908 he wrote to von Hügel: "I was a modernist even before modernism," confirming once again how historically ill-defined the concept of modernism really is.

---

[17] Regarding the emotions under the influence of which he wrote this work in only a few weeks (it had a sensational success: four editions and one translation into French), see G. Daly, The Month 228 (1969), 15–22. His less aggressive work, completed shortly before his death (Christianity at the Cross-Road), seems to confirm, no matter what Rivière may say about it, that he remained closer to Catholicism (particularly from the perspective of the Second Vatican Council) than was often declared (see, for example, M. Nédoncelle, op. cit., 22–23). Regarding the book and its modernist leaning, see, in opposition, A. Kolping, ThRv 59 (1963), 1–8.

[18] Letter to Buonaiuti of 23 April 1908, quoted in id., Le modernisme catholique, 144.

[19] His funeral caused an incident that has become famous in the history of antimodernist reaction. After his friend, Abbé Bremond, said a liturgical prayer at his grave site, he was immediately punished with a suspension a divinis, which was not annulled until after exhaustive negotiations (see M. Petre, Autobiography and Life II, 420–46; M. de la Bedoyère, op. cit., 231–33; Lettres de G. Tyrrell à H. Bremond, 302–15; Correspondence Blondel-Valensin II, 73–92; A. Loisy, G. Tyrrell et H. Bremond [Paris 1936], 1–46).

---

[20] Concerning Maud Petre (1861–1942), see J. A. Walker, The Hibbert Journal 41 (1943), 340–46, and Lettres de G. Tyrrell à H. Bremond (index).

[21] A Variety . . . , 153–90.

[22] Regarding Edmund Bishop (1846–1917), see N. Abercrombie, The Life and Work of E. Bishop (London 1959), and A. Vidler, A Variety . . . , 134–52.

CHAPTER 32

The Crisis in Italy

The restoration of the world of Catholic intellectuals in Italy around the beginning of the twentieth century proved to be more urgent than the one in France. Caused by the timid, negative attitude of the intransigents toward the liberal revolution, the cultural stagnation had left a void; on the other hand, a longing for greater intellectual freedom that gradually developed in the course of two generations could be felt among those persuaded to defend the new cause. The first indications of such awakening became visible during the last few years of Leo XIII's pontificate. This awakening was accelerated by various foreign influences: by exegetical publications in France and through Tyrrell's works, whose impact in Italy was much stronger than that of Loisy; by the personal impact of Monsignor Duchesne, who had settled in Rome in 1895; and above all by Baron von Hügel, who often sojourned in Italy. For too long the originality of this restoration movement, contemptuously called a "by-product" by Rivière, was belittled. The conclusions of recent research and the publication of documents, both of which greatly increased in the last decade, have illuminated the unique characteristics of Italian modernism. Firstly: this modernism rested in a long tradition which followed the risorgimento and stood for political liberation and religious reform. Two aspects of this tradition have particular significance: the desire for liberation from ecclesiastical tutelage, felt to be more oppressive in Italy than elsewhere, and an effort to present the Church as a community of the faithful, replacing the traditional concept that was oriented toward the hierarchy. Secondly: the French modernists were mainly interested in bringing ecclesiastical studies up to par by attempting to find solutions to the new problems that had emerged from the development of religious studies. Italian modernism, however, was characterized by extensive efforts to propagate the new discoveries among the masses, which partially explains why the contacts between the modernists and the Christian Democrats were closer there than in France. There is another difference: while the French modernists put the emphasis on reason, serving as a guideline for the modern academic culture, many Italian modernists were rather fascinated by the mystery of the charismatic Church and inspired by the ardent desire to return to original Christianity.

Within the Italian reform movement, developing in the first years of the twentieth century, roughly three tendencies can be distinguished: 1) young priests and friars, especially numerous in central Italy, tried to bring ecclesiastical studies up to date: 2) fanatics trained in the ranks of the intransigent Opera dei congressi realized the practical shortcomings of this movement and its ideological limits and tried to overcome them by developing the cultural foundations of a true Christian democracy; 3) against this movement, several young laymen, mainly from Lombardy, joined the liberal and national trends, trying to forge a link between Catholicism and the tendencies of the modern world.

Within the first group, scriptural studies were (for the most part) represented by three individuals: Giovanni Genocchi[1] and Umberto Fracassini,[2] two brilliant Catholic scholars, whose great intellectual open-mindedness was coupled with strict loyalty to the Church, and

---

[1] Regarding Giovanni Genocchi (1860–1926) of Ravenna, superior of the Roman procurature of the Missionaries of the Most Sacred Heart of Jesus, in spite of his progressive viewpoints in the field of exegetics highly respected by Pius X, see V. Ceresi, Padre Genocchi (Vatican City 1934).

[2] Regarding Umberto Fracassini (1862–1950), superior of the Seminary of Perugia, from which he was recalled in 1907 under suspicion of dangerous doctrinary attitudes (after he had been appointed consultant of the Bible Commission in 1903), see DHGE XVII, 1367–69, and C. Pizzoni, Vangelo, Chiesa, Civilta nel pensiero di Mons. U. Fracassini (Perugia 1963).

Salvatore Minocchi,[3] a young, courageous priest, who did not intend, however, a reform to exceed the framework of the Catholic system. One of his contemporaries said about him: "This man has something of Danton within him, moderated through ecclesiastical expedience and Italian smoothness." In 1901, in Florence, Minocchi had founded a journal entitled Studi religiosi, whose subtitle precisely defined the program: Rivista critica e storica promotrice della cultura religiosa. This journal offered space to all ecclesiastical studies, including religious philosophy, but the main portion was reserved for scriptural studies. Without question, the journal often merely translated eloquently the thoughts of Loisy, Lagrange, von Harnack, Houtin, Tyrrell, Blondel, Laberthonnière, and Le Roy, sometimes elaborating upon them. However, Minocchi possessed the art of indulgently making allowances for the sensitivities of the guardians of orthodoxy, while also stressing that readers of his reviews of new books contemplate the insufficient solidity of numerous traditional positions. In spite of the criticism voiced by the Civiltà cattolica, Minocchi's journal soon became the center of the enlightened and progressive young priests.

One of them was Ernesto Buonaiuti,[4] a brilliant mind, endowed with extensive knowledge and possessing an extraordinary gift for assimilation besides. He was to become the most outstanding figure of Italian modernism.[5] In 1905, Buonaiuti published, directly in Rome, a similar journal, the Rivista storico-critica delle scienze teologiche. Apparently, its purpose was to take a via media, a middle-of-the-road between the progressivism of the Studi religiosi and the conservatism of the Civiltà cattolica, providing more room for scholarly erudition. However, in reality, the young, eminently dynamic editor strove for leadership of the entire Italian reform movement. Emphasis was primarily placed on the history of dogma and of the Church, rather than the question of Scripture.

---

[3] Regarding Salvatore Minocchi (1869–1943), professor of Hebrew language and literature at the universities of Florence (1901–9) and Pisa, who left the Church in 1908, see A. Agnoletto, S. Minocchi. Vita e opera (Brescia 1964).

[4] Regarding Ernesto Buonaiuti (1881–1946), professor of Church history at the Roman Seminary, from which he was recalled in 1906, leader of the resistance against antimodernism, due to his diplomatic skills able to remain in the Church until 1926 (in spite of two excommunications in 1921 and 1924), held the chair for the history of Christianity at the University of Rome from 1915 until 1926, see, in addition to his autobiography entitled Pellegrino di Roma (1945), the two studies by V. Vinay, E. Buonaiuti e l'Italia religiosa del suo tempo (Rome 1956; amicable; biblio.), and D. Grasso, Il cristianesimo di E. Buonaiuti (Brescia 1953; hostile), to be supplemented by P. Scoppola, op. cit. See also M. Ravà, Bibliografia degli scritti di E. Buonaiuti (Florence 1951); E. Buonaiuti, Die exkommunizierte Kirche, ed. and introduced by E. Benz (Zurich 1966), esp. about the relation to the Eranos circle, 43–52; F. Parente, E. Buonaiuti (Rome 1971; biblio.); F. Margiotta, Broglio, "E. Buonaiuti," Storia contemporanea 2 (1971), 803–23.

[5] The most prominent, but not the most typical figure of modernism after P. Scoppola, who (op. cit., chap. 6) expressly mentions the fact that Buonaiuti found himself quickly isolated in the modernist movement due to his leaning toward radicalism. The main advocates of modernism were reformists with often quite independent attitudes, who considered a denial of their affirmation of the Catholic dogma out of the question.

One of the leading collaborators of Minocchi and Buonaiuti deserves mention: Giovanni Semeria,[6] an extraordinarily gifted friar, whom Cardinal Siri today considers the "best instrument to preserve the faith in the bourgeoisie of Genoa," even though Semeria was branded by his contemporaries as one of the leaders of Italian modernism.[7] Close to Baron von Hügel and several personalities of the academic world in foreign countries, he played an important mediating role in the field of the early history of Christianity as well as in religious philosophy, since he was more successful than most in assimilating the results of contemporary research and in presenting them in a series of brilliant lectures, immediately published in book form, to the general public.

Disregarding the different viewpoints and levels of education, we surprisingly find in all these agents of the intellectual renewal of Italian Catholicism one common and apostolic concern, which distinguished them from similarly inclined Frenchmen, who appeared rather to be bookworms. The Italian modernists were less interested in competing with Protestant or rationalistic scholarship, but rather in improving the religious education of the average Catholic, knowing full well that the lack of religious education was the cause of the superficiality of Italian religiosity.

Similar concerns of a cultural nature are visible in one of the most prominent figures of Italian modernism, in the young democratic priest

---

[6] Regarding Giovanni Semeria (1867–1931), Barnabite, talented apologist, famous preacher and speaker, received in Belgium by Cardinal Mercier in 1912 when the antimodernist reaction forced him to leave Italy, who devoted the last part of his life to the care of war orphans, see, in addition to his memoirs (above), E. Vercesi, Padre Semeria servo degli orfani (Amatrice 1932); F. Sala, Padre Semeria, barnabita (Turin 1941); A. Schenardi, "Un orateur sacré au XXe siècle, le P. Semeria" (unpubl. diss., Paris 1957); V. Lupo, "L'itinerario spirituale di P. Semeria," Humanitas 23 (1968), 610–34, 702–32; E. Passerin d'Entrèves, Storia contemporanea 2 (1971), 825–42; the extensive introduction by A. Gambro in his Saggi clandestini, ed. by C. Argenta (Alba 1967), and the bio-bibliography by V. Colciago, ibid. II, 371–500.

[7] One day, Pius X charged him with having abused his outstanding talents "by writing books that do not agree with the doctrine of the Church." When he responded that he did so in order to make religion more accessible, the Pope replied: "You enlarge the gates in order to bring in those who are outside, driving out those who are inside" (Positio super virtutibus [Vatican City 1949], 256.)

Romolo Murri.[8] He joined the modernist movement rather late, and his membership was simply a transitional episode in his stormy career.[9] He started in the Opera dei congressi, where those antiliberal Catholics assembled who longed for a society of theocratic character. Murri was not very interested in the tendencies that inspired Minocchi, Buonaiuti, and their friends; however, he was convinced that the lack of intellectual maturity disabled the Italian Catholics and, above all, the members of the clergy in dealing effectively with the problems confronting the Christian in regard to the activities of his public life. In his journal published after 1898, pretentiously entitled Cultura sociale, he was already extending the democratic movement to all areas of thought. He also adopted the premature conclusions of religious criticism in order to be able to preach, surrounded by the halo of a prophetic message, the spiritual and religious renovation of a Catholicism reconciled with the modern world in the worship of freedom.[10] In a famous lecture, given on 24 August 1902 in San Marino, he treated the topic "Freedom and Christianity," invoking the work of Tyrrell, Ehrhard, and Mignot, as well as the rejuvenation of exegesis and historical research, dreaming of a "great liberation." By "returning to the Gospel," Catholicism was to be liberated from all its obsolete elements: "from the warmed-over semiheathen customs, from the juridic concepts derived from Roman Law, from the decadent monastic institutions that are incapable of rejuvenation, and from the abstract categories that kill like the letter of the law."[11] Thus, his orientation intensified in proportion to the development of his social and political activities and gradually merged with an atmosphere of total intellectual and disciplinary freedom outside of the control of the hierarchical authority. His ideas attracted a number of priests who demanded more or less radical reforms in the Church, e.g., reduction of the number of dioceses, modification of the Index procedures, reform of the seminaries and traditional apostolate methods, suspension of sacerdotal celibacy, etc.[12] The progressing development of a simple reform movement in the direction of a so-called "social modernism" finally compelled many to proclaim, at first rather awkwardly, the "autonomy of the temporal realm," as it is called today. Yet they later considered religion a problem of the inner self, so to speak, and the Church a civilizing and morally progressive factor rather than an institution of supranatural salvation. These ideas were also espoused by the group of the Socialismo cattolico, founded by G. Quadrotta and F. Perroni, to whom Buonaiuti lent his support after the promulgation of the encyclical Pascendi.[13]

---

[8] Concerning him, see chaps. 5 and 34. Regarding his relations to the modernist movement, see the two works (biblio., chap. 32) by Guasco and Bedeschi, in addition P. Scoppola, op. cit., 133–62, 249–60.

[9] This point was clearly made by M. Guasco, op. cit.

[10] His most outstanding articles were published in book form: Battaglie d'oggi, 4 vols. (Rome 1901–04). Above all, see vol. II.

[11] Text in Il Domani d'Italia, no. 35 (31 August 1902), and in F. Magri, L'azione cattolica in Italia I (Milan 1953), 184–90. It should be noted that Murri adhered to Thomism throughout his development. Thomism was brought into discredit by all those who more or less professed the modernist movement (this was emphasized by P. Scoppola, op. cit., 155–62).

[12] For example, D. Battaini, who published for the German-speaking part of Switzerland a pioneering paper: Cultura moderna. This reformist trend can also be found among Fundamentally different in origin was the group of reformists from Lombardy, the heirs of liberal Catholicism from the period of the risorgimento. Among them were men of action, such as the promoters of the Opera Bonomelli, a charitable institution for Italian emigrant workers. These men did not exercise as much restraint as the old bishop whose patronage they enjoyed. But most of the disciples of this group were intellectual laymen, passionately interested in religious problems, rare in Italy at that time. Most attractive to the general public was Antonio Fogazzaro,[14] a brilliant writer full of mystical idealism, who stood in close contact with Semeria, Genocchi, and von Hügel, and was a great admirer of Loisy, Blondel, and Tyrrell, but also strongly influenced by Rosmini and his ideals of a religious reform movement as described in his book Cinque piaghe della Chiesa. Fogazzaro was also interested in coordinating Darwin's theory of evolution with Catholic dogma. In 1905 he published the novel Il Santo, whose hero appointed himself the apostle of a reform based on the spirit of love, love that was to permeate all areas of religious and social life. This novel contains numerous remarks about the nature of religious feeling, about the role of the priest, about the true Christian spirit, and the formalism of Catholic worship. However, the climax of this work is a long discourse on reform, addressed to the Pope, in which the four evil spirits, having invaded the Church, were branded: the spirit of dishonesty, closing his eyes to the light of modern scholarship and indicting the best defenders of the truth; the spirit of omnipotent power, changing paternal authority into a some laymen; e.g., in the Neapolitan lawyer G. Avolia, director of the journal Battaglie d'oggi, who finally preached a "lay priesthood" in the perspective of Christian socialism (cf. É. Poulat, Journal d'un prêtre d'après-demain [Tournai, Paris 1961], 131–37).

---

[13] Regarding this group, the mouthpieces of which were the journals Nova et Vetera (1908) and Cultura contemporanea (1909–13), see P. Scoppola, op. cit., 261–326.

[14] Regarding Antonio Fogazzaro (1842–1911), poet and writer, who, in 1873, reading Gratrys, converted, and was senator after 1896 (in spite of the non expedit), see, in addition to the work by O. Morra, op. cit., T. Gallarati-Scotti, La vita di A. Fogazzaro (Milan 1920, ^{3}1963); P. Nardi, A. Fogazzaro (Milan 1938); L. M. Personè, Nuova antologia 481 (1961), 327–44; DHGE XVII, 696–700.

terrible dictatorship; the spirit of avarice, a mockery of evangelical poverty; and, finally, the spirit of rigid adherence to tradition, fearing any kind of progress and driving the Jewish rabbis to reject and condemn Jesus. (This comparison was made by Tyrrell.) The novel became a great success and was translated into several languages. However, it also led to violent controversies.

Less spectacular, but more profound, was the effect of the journal Il Rinnovamento. It was founded at the beginning of 1907 by a few young Milanese encouraged by Fogazzaro and Semeria.[15] One of its main patrons, Stefano Jacini, was in close contact with the forerunners of German Reform Catholicism. He was especially interested in liberal Protestantism, particularly in Eucken and Troeltsch. The journal emphasized the primacy of conscience over external authority, without negating the rights of the latter.[16] In addition, it promoted freedom of scholarly research and the position of the laity in the life of the Church. Following post-Kantian philosophy, it stressed the significance of subjectivity, which was badly neglected by Scholastic thinking. True to liberal traditions, it espoused a new conception of the relations between Church and state in reaction to the "confusionism" of the previous centuries. The staff of the journal tried to extricate the values of secular education from all areas and to give them practical applications in the fields of philosophy, history, research methods, and law. At the same time, its publishers attempted to awaken interest in religious problem, since most intellectuals of that time found religious indifferentism to be a matter of course. Though being as open-minded as possible toward the contemporary trends and the solid accomplishments of religious studies, these intellectuals were nonetheless to remain loyal sons of the Roman Catholic Church, forming, so to speak, a "third" party, that felt its way around between the incomprehension of the integralists and the exaggerations of the radicals. As part of the latter, the group of young idealistic philosophers from Lugano, led by G. Rensi, deserves special mention. Their journal was the Coenobium, founded in 1906.

As in France, the ideas proclaimed by the leaders of the movement to renovate ecclesiastical studies found a positive response among the young clergy in Italy. Around 1906 it often happened in central Italian seminaries that when a priest was ordained, not only were works by Semeria and Lagrange chosen as gifts, but also those of Loisy and Tyrrell.[17] Since the hierarchy in Italy was even less equipped than that in France to effectively deal with contemporary problems (in Italy, there was not a single prelate who could be compared to Mignot), their confusion was even greater. And as always in such cases, reaction raged against everything that deviated in the slightest from the traditional paths, that is, against the moderates as well as against the radicals. Even a man so above suspicion as Francesco Lanzoni[18] became the target of allegations and denunciations simply because he wanted to apply the principles of historical criticism to the study of hagiography. The moderates, mostly loyal followers of the Church, submitted quietly; the more progressive, however, tried to organize resistance. To that end, they attempted to unify, both outwardly and inwardly, the movement that aimed at cultural and religious renovation, to give it a unity it was largely lacking, as we have already seen. For the purpose of such unification, Murri, Buonaiuti, and Fracassini called a meeting in the summer of 1907 in Molveno, that was also attended by Baron von Hügel.[19] A week later, the encyclical Pascendi was issued; it forced the group to attempt to coalesce its divergent opinions and concepts, resulting in its dispersal.

---

[15] Regarding this amicable and at the same time reserved attitude of Msgr. Bonomelli, see F. Fonzi, RStRis 56 (1969), 188–92, 220–22.

[16] The subsequent behavior of the editorial staff on the occasion of the strict disapproval of the prefect of the Congregation of the Index in May 1907 is typical. See the commentary by P. Scoppola, op. cit., 212–20.

---

[17] M. Guasco, Fermenti nei seminari del primo '900 (Bologna 1971), 178–79.

[18] Regarding Francesco Lanzoni (1863–1929), rector of the Seminary of Faenza from 1890–1917, author of numerous local hagiographical studies and a fundamental work about Le diocesi d'Italia dalle origini al principio del sec. VII (Rome 1927), see the collection of articles Nel centenario della nascita di mons (Faenza 1964), and L. Bedeschi, Lineamenti dell'antimodernismo. Il caso Lanzoni (Parma 1970).

[19] Regarding this meeting, which has been a secretive affair for a long time and was often incorrectly seen as a sort of council of European modernism, see P. Scoppola, op. cit., 235–44, and L. Bedeschi, Humanitas 24 (1969), 658–77; 25 (1970), 482–91.

CHAPTER 33

Intervention of Ecclesiastical Authority and the Integralist Reaction

Roman Intervention

The solemn condemnation of modernism did not take place until 1907. However, there were plenty of indications of the impending papal ban. During the first months of the pontificate, on 13 December 1903, Loisy's main works were put on the Index. Some months later, the encyclicals Ad diem illum (2 February 1904) and Iucunda sane accidit (12 March 1904) urgently warned against the novarum rerum molitores, who, with great scholarly efforts, questioned the history of early Christianity.

In December of the same year, the Pope admonished the bishops to practice uncompromising severity toward seminarians with overly liberal attitudes who lacked the proper respect for the scholarly efforts made "by our great teachers, Church Fathers, and interpreters of revealed doctrine."[1] Similar warnings were contained in a letter, addressed to the rector of the Institut Catholique in Paris at the beginning of the following year,[2] and in a lecture to the students of the French Seminary in Rome[3] containing a rather overt reference to Loisy. In the fall of 1904 two excellent exegetes, Father Genocchi of the Roman Seminary and Father Gismondi of the Gregoriana, were replaced by two professors who fundamentally rejected the application of critical methods to the text of the Holy Scriptures. One of them, Father A. Delattre, had just sharply criticized Father Lagrange and the "new exegetical school." In August 1905 Father Fleming was replaced as secretary of the Biblical Commission by Dom L. Jannsen, a scholastic theologian who did not possess specific competency in the field of exegesis, and overtly conservative consultants were appointed, eliminating the original balance between the various factions. The consequences of these changes were soon noticeable. While the first two reports of the commission regarding actual sayings in the Bible (13 February 1905) and biblical stories that only seemed to be historical (23 June 1905) handled the problem with moderation,[4] the subsequent conclusions regarding the Mosaic authenticity of the Pentateuch (27 June 1906) and the Johannine authenticity of the fourth Gospel were much more reactionary in nature.[5] Both schools, even in Rome, negated each other, because one recommended tolerance and patience in order not to discard the wheat with the chaff, while the other was uncompromising, focusing on the most radical viewpoints. This school more or less enjoyed the trust of the Pope, especially since the imprudence of many of the Italians who disseminated the new ideas had led him to believe that orthodoxy, for which he carried the responsibility, was seriously threatened, even though he had to admit that, in the field of exegesis, circumspective open-mindedness was prudent.[6]

---

[1] Address of 12 December 1904 (ASS 37 [1904–05], 435).

[2] Letter of 22 February 1905 (ASS 37 [1904–05], 555–57).

[3] A. Houtin, La question biblique au 20ᵉ siècle, 215–16.

[4] ASS 37 (1904–05), 666; 38 (1905–06), 124–25.

[5] ASS 39 (1906–07), 377–78; 40 (1907), 383–84. The first of these responses inspired a little book written by von Hügel, The Papal Commission and the Pentateuch, about which Bollandist Delehaye wrote: "Let us hope that it will open the eyes of the Father of all faithful, who is truly compromised due to the mediocre tools he is using" (1 December 1906, quoted by M. de la Bédoyère, The Life of Baron von Hügel, 187).

[6] See especially Le Père Lagrange au service de la Bible, 158–59.

After 1904, in Rome, the Swiss K. Decurtins launched a vehement struggle against Blondel, Laberthonnière, and others. By the end of 1905 Loisy and the progressive exegetes had particularly attracted the curiosity of the Holy See. But the wave of the reform movement in Italy vacillated, enlarging the list of urgent concerns and drawing attention to other problems that were discussed more and more frankly. In December 1905 the bishops of the provinces of Turin and Vercelli issued a joint pastoral letter, which, for the first time in an ecclesiastical document, used the word "modernism." The admonishments contained therein were taken to heart by many other bishops.[7] The following year brought additional measures: While the Congregation of the Index, on 14 April, condemned the novel Il Santo by Fogazzaro and Laberthonnière's books, by now several years old, Monsignor De Lai and Cardinal Gennari instigated systematic control of the Italian seminaries. Several professors were recalled from their teaching chairs without being granted an opportunity to defend themselves. Thus a gloomy atmosphere of suspiciousness developed in Rome. Everywhere, the approaching storm was felt.[8]

This storm finally broke in the course of 1907. Within a few months more and more solemn acta were issued. On 17 April, in the context of a consistorial address,[9] Pius X turned rigorously against the neo-reformismum religiosum, which was spreading with increasing audacity. At the end of the same month, the prefect of the Index Commission issued a warning to the Milan group of the rinnovamento.[10] On 14 June Pius X sent a brief to the Viennese Professor Commer,[11] congratulating him for having hacked to pieces the errors of the main representative of Reform Catholicism, Herman Schell. On 17 July the decree Lamentabili sane exitu was published by the Holy Office,[12] over which it had been brooding for several years, containing a revealing list of statements which two Parisian theologians had extracted from Loisy's "little books."[13] The decree condemned sixty-five theses concerning the authority of the ecclesiastical teaching office, the inspiration and historical value of the books of the Holy Scriptures, the terms revelation, dogma, and faith, certain aspects of Christological dogma, which had been questioned in recent disputes, the origin of the sacraments, the constitution of the Church and the nature of Christian truth in general.[14] And finally, on 8 September, the encyclical Pascendi was issued.[15] Since its intent was not to describe exactly the thoughts of the individual instigators of modernism, but rather to present the reflection of their ideas in the consciousness of the community, it started out with a somewhat contrived synthesis of modernism, blaming the various errors on agnosticism, which disputes the value of the rational argumentation in the religious realm, and on the philosophy of immanence, which ignores that the origin of religious truth rests in the needs of life. This philosophy created the dogma unfolding in the course of life on the basis of reason and experience. Likewise, the need "to give religion a corpus perceivable through the senses" created the sacraments; the books of the Holy Scriptures contain the experiences collected by the faithful of Israel and by the first disciples of Christ; the Church is a fruit of the collective consciousness, and the only task of authority is to give expression to the emotions of the individual. The encyclical stigmatized the modernistic conception of biblical criticism and the purely subjective methods of apologetics, as well as the demands of reform modernism. It concluded its third, disciplinary part by enumerating a series of practical measures ("remedies") to halt the further spread of evil, above all in the seminaries (renewed obligation to study scholastic philosophy and theology, supervision of reading material, consilia vigilantiae in every bishopric).

---

[7] Analysis of these pastoral letters and quotations from them in the brochure Un allarme dell'episcopato italiano contro ii reformismo religioso (Genoa 1906).

[8] Regarding the atmosphere in Rome during 1906, see also Correspondance Blondel-Valensin I, 262–63, and M. de la Bédoyère, op. cit., 181–82.

[9] ASS 40 (1907), 266–69.

[10] Text in Rinnovamento 1 (1907), 610. Cf. P. Scoppola, Crisi modernista, 212–16.

[11] ASS 40 (1907), 392–94.

[12] ASS 40 (1907), 470–78. Cf. F. Heiner, Der neue Syllabus Pius' X. (Mainz 1907). Regarding the theological value of the document, cf. J. Rivière, op. cit., 341–46.

[13] Cf. P. Dudon, BLE 32 (1931), 73–96, and R. Aubert, EThL 37 (1961), 557–78.

The encyclical was immediately greeted with exuberant expressions of joy by the conservatives, who had desired it for a long time.[16] Many moderates deplored the purely negative tone of the encyclical, yet they were glad that ambiguities, which gradually threatened to become dangerous, had been eliminated. Those who were attracted by the exponents of modernism reacted much less vehemently than had been expected, even though they almost unanimously considered the encyclical "a caricature rather than a picture of modernism" (Sabatier). Tyrrell believed himself able to predict that the encyclical would compel the "right wing of modernism to align itself more closely with the left wing," since the encyclical did not differentiate between reasonable progressivism and the "rendezvous of all heresies" based on agnosticism and immanentism, simply schematically reconstructing both. In reality, the opposite happened: For some, this painful condemnation by the Pope was the criterion revealing to them the fact that they implicitly stood outside of the Church. Consequently, they openly broke with the Church, depending on the individual case, with more or less restraint; and since they had to abandon hope of being able to reform the Church from within, some carried the radicalism of their viewpoints even further, quickly ending up in pure rationalism.

---

[14] About fifty theses came from Loisy's works (regarding the exactness with which they reflected his viewpoints, see É. Poulat, Histoire, dogme et critique, 109–12); three theses were taken from Houtin, one from Le Roy, and one from the Newman disciple Dimmet, whose work Le pensée catholique dans l'Angleterre contemporaine was put on the Index a few days later, as was Dogme et critique by Le Roy.

[15] ASS 40 (1907), 593–650. See A. Michelitsch, Der biblisch-dogmatische Syllabus Pius' X. samt der Enzyklika gegen den Modernismus (Graz, Vienna 1908; in the appendix are several articles from the German and Austrian press that had been devoted to the two papal documents). Frequently, the edition of the encyclical Pascendi was ascribed to P. Billot, Msgr. Sardi, and others; however, today we know who the real editors were: P. J. Lemius, O.M.I., was responsible for the dogmatic part (after the Pope had discarded as unsatisfactory several drafts prepared by other theologians), and Cardinal Vives y Tutó for the pragmatic part (cf. BLE 47 [1946], 143–61, 242–43). Regarding the theological value of this document, see J. Rivière, op. cit., 364–67.

[16] This was to be anticipated, and Cardinal Maffi, one of the few relatively open-minded Italian prelates, indulged in an illusion when he declared: "Let us hope that the positive impact of the encyclical will not be spoiled by the zelanti, who are finding new excuses for their violent excesses and their customary gripes" (F. Crispolti, Pio IX . . . Ricordi personali [Milan 1932], 128).

In most of them, however, loyalty to the Church was victorious. Thus most everyone submitted, creating the impression later on that the modernist crisis had simply been a matter of individual, rather isolated personalities. Unquestionably, the masses of believers had not been seized by the wave of modernism. But at least in France and, to a lesser extent, in Italy, the clergy who were informed about the development of scriptural studies, and a number of young Catholic intellectuals had felt strongly attracted to the new movement. These people were dissatisfied with the theological training at that time and conscious of the need for adjusting to the circumstances. Therefore they were enthusiastic over the pioneers who had paved the way. In contrast to some of these very pioneers, they would never have thought of continuing their research outside of the Church. For example, É. Poulat compared the attitude of Loisy with that of his young pupil Abbé L. Vénard, who never considered following Loisy's refusal to submit to the Roman condemnations, and he analyzed correctly their fundamentally different reactions: "While Loisy, with the certainty of a technician, draws the plan (of a necessary development), anticipating its various stages, Vénard wants to cling to the authority of the Church. For the Church, he boldly reconnoiters as a guerrilla who is aware that he is not the whole army and that he is nothing without the army. An expert who grates on the nerves of the ignorant, Loisy follows his blueprint precisely, only paying attention in order to calculate correctly and to leave nothing out. Vénard, in contrast, gives preference to his mind, while adjusting his steps to the awkward pace of the Church, differentiating between justified criticism and the slow process of adjusting to its accomplishments. Loisy conceptualizes and analyzes a historical process of change, Vénard participates in a process of organic adaptation. Both may have the same ideas, but they are not equally in agreement with the Church as an external institution."[17]

The agnostic and immanentist system, superficially reconstructed by the encyclical, was so obviously in contradiction to traditional Christian belief that it was fully normal for many true progressives to depart openly from it and renounce it. Even though submission to the anathema of the encyclical took place within a large framework, it was nevertheless extremely painful for many who observed an increase of hope for an impending adjustment of Catholicism to the changing attitudes, and therefore felt the danger of a more profound schism between the Church and the intellectual world of the West.[18] Many shared the opinion of the "Erasmus of modernism" (J.-M. Mayeur), Monsignor Mignot, who had declared: "There is no Christian conscience that does not reject with the whole force of its faith all errors condemned by the encyclical."[19] However, he also wrote that this encyclical erred in "limiting itself to condemnation without defining what one can say without being a modernist."[20] Or they thought like the philosopher V. Delbos, a marvelous Catholic layman: "The encyclical has one all-too-visible lacuna: it consists of the negligence toward or the ignorance of the deeper causes which incited the so-called modernist movement."[21]

---

[17] É. Poulat, Histoire, dogme et critique, 313–14. This analysis considers "the amazing psychological flexibility of the religious consciousness, which is not a matter of weakness caused by the lack of logic, but rather a matter of numerous capabilities at its disposal to express itself." This flexibility was clearly illuminated by the most recent progress made in the humanities. Thus, the analysis requires an elaboration of the strict appraisal by T. Gallarati-Scotti, who ascribed the great number of submissions to the povertà di coscienze e di caratteri (Vita di A. Fogazzaro, 493). Especially in Italy, this element was important, but it is not the only and not even the main explanation.

[18] Vicar General Birot wrote this in metaphorical language to his friend G. Frémont, who considered the exposé of the encyclical "excellent" (A. Siegfried, L'abbé Frémont II [Paris 1932], 505): "It condemns the most absurd naturalistic system ever devised, but I submit with sadness because this doctrinary sternness is based on contrived ambiguity because it condemns friend and foe alike. The Pope is like the colonel of the artillery shooting from the top of a hill into the troops of both fronts engaged in heavy fighting down in the plains and simultaneously destroying his own best troops" (quoted by É. Poulat, op. cit., 443).

[19] Semaine religieuse d'Albi (28 September 1907), 553–55.

[20] Letter to F. von Hügel, 5 October 1907, quoted in É. Poulat, op. cit., 480, n. 89.

[21] Letter to J. Wehrlé, 30 September 1907, quoted in Correspondance Blondel-Valensin I, 357–64. He did not feel touched personally, but the tone of the encyclical thoroughly upset him: "How can one persuade that many souls . . . not to doubt the benevolence of the Church?" Regarding the edition of the declaration of submission of the Annales de philosophie chrétienne to the encyclical, see ibid., 367–70.

Even though almost everyone submitted to the ecclesiastical authority, there were a few residual pockets of resistance. Loisy published a new little book, Simples refléxions sur le décret Lamentabili et l'encycle Pascendi, the tone of which was as ironical as it was aggressive. In order to stress the significance of the booklet, he published simultaneously two thick volumes on The Synoptic Gospels, which were far more radical than his previous studies. But it was precisely this development which caused many of his former admirers to fall away; and his excommunication on 7 March 1908 made him a loner. Tyrrell suffered the same fate, after having already been denied the sacraments by his bishop at the end of October 1907, following the publication of several articles in opposition to the encyclical in the Times and in the Italian press. At first Minocchi submitted, announcing he would discontinue the publication of his Studi religiosi. But after having been charged by his friends with servility, he soon held a public lecture on the earthly paradise and the dogma of original sin. He achieved a great deal of attention because he negated the historical character of the first chapter of Genesis. After the suspensio a divinis, Tyrrell rejected submission, and in October 1908 he took off his clerical garb. From then he strove for a more socialistic humanitarianism, seeing in Christianity nothing more than a contingent form of the religion of the absolute. In Germany and Austria, a number of leading personalities of Reform Catholicism also protested against the encyclical: Monsignor Ehrhard, professor at the theological faculty of Strasbourg, turned against the practical measures forming the last part of the encyclical, since they prohibited, in his opinion, any kind of scholarly work; Professors Schnitzer of Munich and Wahrmund of Innsbruck opposed in harsher terms the misdeeds of ultramontanism and Roman absolutism, but these were overt manifestations of academic liberalism and not doctrinary modernism.[22]

Aside from these open protests, there was a series of anonymous criticisms.[23] The most remarkable, though rather superficial throughout, were, in France, the brochure Lendemains d'encyclique, in which Monsignor Lacroix, the very liberal bishop of Tarentaise, had collaborated,[24] and particularly, in Italy, Il Programma dei modernisti—Riposta all'enciclica di Pio X, a document published on 28 October 1907 and quickly translated into French, German, and English. Monsignor Fracassini collaborated on the scriptural section, but the author was Buonaiuti,[25] who, in contrast to other leading modernists, preferred to stay in the Church in order to continue from within the reform work that he had started. It is uncertain where the true Buonaiuti really revealed himself, in the Programma, the tone of which was rather moderate, or in the much more radical Lettere di un prete modernista, published several months later, likewise behind the veil of anonymity.[26]

---

[22] Msgr. Ehrhard, who had declared that the doctrinary system ascribed to the modernists by the encyclical was incompatible with dogma, confirmed again, in a memorandum to the press, his Catholic loyalty, and the Holy See was satisfied with removing his prelature. Professor Schnitzer, being much more critical, was initially suspended a divinis, later excluded from receiving the sacraments. Regarding the Wahrmund case that resulted in diplomatic tensions between the Vatican and Vienna, see Engel-Janosi II, 87–103. Regarding the rare cases of modernism in Austria, ibid., 143–44.

[23] Regarding the frequently exaggerated significance of the anonyms and pseudonyms in modernist literature, see É. Poulat, op. cit., 621–77, esp. 640–42.

[24] Regarding the brochure Werk eines Pfarrers der Diözese Autun signed Catholici, see J. Rivière, op. cit., 379–81, and É. Poulat, op. cit., 650. At the instigation of the Kraus

These pockets of resistance, which, in spite of the unrest in the first few months, was rather insignificant, inspired the antimodernist reaction that had long remained sporadic and isolated. But since the modernist movement was confined to the circles of intellectuals, only a very few bishops deemed useful the effort of devoting a pastoral letter to it.[27] Nevertheless, with the exception of Germany, they organized the consilia vigilantiae required by the encyclical in order to prevent suspect publications by the clergy. There were also isolated attempts to expose the modernist authors hiding behind a pseudonym. The greatest attention was caused by the fact that L. Saltet attributed the articles against the Trinitarian and Marian dogmas, signed by A. Dupin and G. Herzog, to Abbé Turmel.[28] On the other hand, numerous theologians dealt with commentaries on the papal documents, but their refutations usually

---

Society, it was translated into German under the title Antwort der französischen Katholiken. Regarding Msgr. Lucien Lacroix (1854–1922), founder of the Revue du clergé français, who contributed several anonymous articles, liked to call himself "the bishop of the modernists," and resigned as bishop of Tarentaise after the issuance of the encyclical, see M. Hudry, "Un évêque républicain au moment de la Séparation," Vieux Conflans, nos. 65–66 (1965), 3–37, and A. Vidler, A Variety of Catholic Modernists, 105–8.

[25] Concerning the Programma dei modernisti, see D. Grasso, Il cristianesimo di E. Buonaiuti (Brescia 1953), 28–35, and P. Scoppola, op. cit., 269–73. Against Fracassini's will, Buonaiuti revised his pages.

[26] Regarding the Lettere, see V. Vinay, E. Buonaiuti, 43–53, and P. Scoppola, op. cit., 273–79.

[27] Except in Italy, where modernism was given attention for its reforming and social aspects. The episcopates of Prussia and Bavaria published a joint letter in January 1908. In French-speaking countries, the most popular document was the pastoral letter by Cardinal Mercier, who defended Scholasticism against Kantian philosophy, which he perceived to be the root of modernist errors (Œuvres pastorales I [Brussels 1911], 363–82; reprinted in brochure form: Le Modernisme [Brussels 1908], German translation [Cologne 1908], including a lecture dealing with the same topic given at the University of Louvain).

[28] Regarding the affair involving Turmel, not resolved until 1929, see, in addition to his biography by F. Sartiaux (Paris 1931), J. Rivière, op. cit., 486–505. About P. Lejay's case, see ibid., 501–2, n. 5.

referred to abstract modernism as presented in the encyclical. Only a few seemed to have recognized the real problems that were maladroitly posed by the modernists; and even if their studies intended to exceed the level of mere general comprehension, their arguments frequently appeared to be rather simplistic.[29] Among the laudable exceptions in France were the articles of the Jesuits Lebreton and de Grandmaison, as well as the Lettres sur les études ecclésiastiques by Mignot, in which he tried to prove to what extent the condemnation of modernism justified new scholarly studies; in Germany, the exceptions were an article by F. X. Kiefl published in Hochland and a collection of lectures held some time later at the University of Freiburg and published under the title Jesus Christus.

The systematic suppression of the modernist movement's last vestiges after the issuance of Pascendi was mainly the work of the Holy See itself, living for several years in an atmosphere of panic. With more and more reactionary leanings, the Index Commission[30] as well as the Biblical Commission[31] intensified their activities. Furthermore, new apostolic visitations in the Italian seminaries directly responsible to the Curia were decreed and suspect teachers were recalled, often merely on the basis of unfounded denunciations.[32] Even though, according to Loisy's own words, modernism was in a state of "complete dissolution,"[33] two years after its condemnation in 1907, Pius X was still greatly worried about the continued existence of certain clandestine operations, which were extremely exaggerated. Thus he believed the Church was still "in a state of siege" and he deemed it necessary to take further measures. On 1 September 1910, in his motu proprio Sacrorum antistitum,[34] the Pope demanded from all the clergy a special oath, the so-called antimodernist oath. This involved a statement of faith that had been adjusted to the already condemned versions of modernism, including the statement formulated by Pius IV. The first section formulated in five points the proof for the existence of God, the value of the basis for faith, the founding of the Church through Christ, the immutability of dogma, and the intellectual character of the act of faith. A second part demanded submission to the decree Lamentabili and the encyclical Pascendi and called for their affirmation. This text did not add anything essential to the acta of Pius X, however it was an official summary, the goal and purpose being to request from every priest his expressed solemn affirmation, in order to expose the crypto-modernists. The clergy submitted without much open resistance. In the Church at large, there were not more than approximately forty exceptions.[35] In Germany, however, this measure caused considerable unrest in the name of scholarly freedom; and finally, upon the request of the episcopate, the German theological universities were relieved of the oath.

---

[29] For example, see the appropriate criticism of the De immutabilitate traditionis contra modernam haeresim evolutionismi (1907), written by P. Billot, in H. Holstein, La Tradition dans l'Église (Paris 1960), 129–34.

[30] Cf. A. Boudinhon, Revue du clergé français 75, 215–27. After it was translated into Italian, the Histoire ancienne de l'Église by Msgr. Duchesne was condemned on 22 January 1912, in spite of the imprimatur of schoolmaster S. Palatii.

[31] Cf. J. Levie, La Bible, parole humaine et message de Dieu (Bruges, Paris 1928), 88.

[32] Aside from the works of L. Bedeschi, see M. Guasco, Fermenti nei seminari, 121–54.

[33] In RH 102 (1909). Regarding the weakness of Italian modernism, quickly dispersing into small groups with the most varied tendencies, see the letter of S. Jacini to von Hügel written at the very moment the journal Rinnovamento ceased publication around the end of 1909 (RStRis 56 [1969], 245–47). One of the many other signs of the inevitable decline of modernism after 1907 was the failure of the plans for the creation of an international information agency that had been drawn up by Msgr. Lacroix and Paul Sabatier (a liberal French Protestant who had observed the movement from its inception with passionate interest). Even the founding of the Revue moderniste internationale in Geneva in 1910 was but transient ardor.

[34] AAS 2 (1910), 655–80.

But not only the Germans feared the disastrous consequences of the anti-modernist suppression upon Catholic scholarship. Today there is agreement that the rejuvenation, commenced under Leo XIII, was seriously hampered throughout a whole generation.[36] Primarily in Italy, where suppression was particularly relentless, almost the entire clergy was prohibited from serious studies, enlarging the critical shortcomings in the area of contemporary culture that have remained one of the great weaknesses of Italian Catholicism to the present day. But elsewhere the fear that Christian scholarship could possibly move in directions considered adventurous by Church authorities caused numerous Catholic theologians to withdraw to strictly historical work, or, even worse, to confine themselves to the reiteration of textbook formulas, speculating only on harmless marginal matters in the framework of a rather narrow-minded Neo-Thomism.[37]

---

[35] One more detail should be noted: Pius X personally empowered Frs. Semeria and Genocchi to take this oath with a proviso. Even more peculiar: he allowed Semeria to publish in certain well-controlled journals, but under a pseudonym. In this manner, he placed Semeria's talents in his service, deflating his influence at the same time.

[36] In order to demonstrate that he was not an opponent of scholarly work, Pius X had announced in his encyclical Pascendi the establishment of an international institute for progressive research. Its members were chosen on the basis of rather one-sided criteria, causing the institution to be stillborn (some information in L. von Pastor, Tagebücher, 482–511).

[37] The twenty-four theses of the Congregation of Studies of 27 July 1914 concerning the basic doctrine of Saint Thomas are a typical manifestation of this attitude. More open-mindedness was reflected in the founding of the Rivista di Filosofia neoscolastica in 1909 by P. Gemelli, O.F.M., and, in Louvain, the efforts of Msgr. Deploige, who tried to integrate sociology into Neo-Thomism (M. Defourny, Annuaire de l'Université catholique de Louvain 81 [1927–29], XCVII–XCVIII).

The results on the whole were not as negative as is sometimes maintained. Even in the field of exegesis, where serious studies were largely condemned to sterility in spite of the founding of the Pontifical Biblical Institute in 1909,[38] some remarkable achievements were made: In 1908, Biblische Zeitfragen was founded, a popular collection; in 1912 there followed the founding of the Alttestamentlichen und Neutestamentlichen Abhandlungen, edited by J. Nikel and M. Meinertz; the publication of La théologie de S. Paul by F. Prat, S.J., (1908–12); and the commentary of Father Lagrange regarding the Gospel of Saint Mark (1911). In the area of patrology and dogmatic history, French authors were gradually able to compete with names like Ehrhard, Bardenhewer, and Rauschen: J. Tixeront, a student of Duchesne, published, between 1905 and 1912, a Histoire des dogmes, which, for its time, was not without merit. Father J. Lebreton did pioneering work with his Origines du dogme de la Trinité (1910). The same applies to J. Lebon in Louvain and his Monophysisme sévérien (1909). The growing interest in Near Eastern Christian literature was reflected in the Corpus scriptorum christianorum orientalium, continued by the Catholic universities of Louvain and of America after its establishment by J.-B. Chabot in 1902. In 1907 the Görres-Gesellschaft under the leadership of Monsignor Kirsch opened a Section for Archaeology, aimed at furthering Christian, classical, and Near Eastern archeological studies and the research of problems posed by religious history. In 1912 F. J. Dölger at the University of Münster established a new teaching chair for General Religious History and Comparative Religious Studies, and he investigated in his lectures the extent to which Christian thought and the original Christian rites felt the influence of the paganism surrounding them.[39] A year earlier, while in France the first Catholic textbook on the history of religions, Christus, was published under the direction of P. Huby, P. W. Schmidt, S.V.D., founder of the journal Anthropos (1906), had collaborated in Louvain with Father Bouvier, S. J., in the organization of the first Catholic Week for Religious Ethnology;[40] and another German, J. Schmidlin, had founded the Zeitschrift für Missionswesen and the first Catholic Institut für Missionswissenschaft.[41] Literary history was brilliantly represented by the German Baumstark, the Englishmen Bishop and Fortescue, and the French Benedictines Cabrol, Férotin, and Leclercq. The last mentioned published, in 1907, the Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, followed by the Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques in 1912. The appearance of new journals was another sign of the scholarly activities in these difficult years. Worth noting are the historical journals, such as the Zeitschrift für schweizerische Kirchengeschichte (1907), the Revue d'histoire de l'Eglise de France (1910), the Archivum franciscanum historicum (1908), and the Archivo iberoamericano (1914), but also strictly theological journals such as Theologie und Glaube (1909) of the Philosophical Theological Institute of Paderborn; but above all, the Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques (1907) of the French Dominicans of Le Saulchoir,[42] and the Recherches de science religieuse (1910) of the Jesuits of the province of Paris.[43]

---

[38] The Pontifical Biblical Institute was entrusted to the Society of Jesus under the direction of the very conservative P. J. Fonck. It was to be the counterpart of the École Biblique in Jerusalem directed by Father Lagrange, who was under suspicion by Rome. Cf. S. Pio X promotore degli studi biblici, fondatore del Pont. Istituto biblico (Rome 1955), 23–42.

[39] Regarding Franz Dölger (1879–1940), the first Catholic theologian who took account of the history of religion school, see T. Klauser, F. J. Dölger, Leben und Werke (Münster 1956).

[40] Cf. RHE 13 (1912), 747–51.

[41] Cf. 50 Jahre katholische Missionswissenschaft in Münster, 1911–1961, ed. by J. Glazik (Münster 1961).

The modernists had posed real problems for discussion, problems that could not be solved by merely condemning modernism. After all, they questioned the relationship between theology and its sources (the Bible, documents of the old tradition, decisions of the ecclesiastical teaching office) and the nature of their homogeneity with divine revelation, down to its technically most sophisticated form.

Of the few theologians trying to find a positive answer to the questions raised by Loisy, Tyrrell, and Le Roy, two merit special mention: Father de Grandmaison, S.J.,[44] who, in this difficult time, helped with his moderate and reasonable (in the opinion of Blondel and Loisy) articles to lead the confused public through the treacherous cliffs of modernism and integralism, however without totally penetrating the problems; and primarily Professor Father Gardeil, O.P.,[45] who, despite his limitations, appears more and more as the forerunner. His influence was initially confined to France, but later, thanks to his students, radiated far beyond French borders. His work reached a peak in the two studies of apologetic and theological methodology long to remain classics: La crédibilité et l'apologétique (Paris 1908, second completely revised edition: 1910), which became the object of vehement controversies, above all on the part of Blondel; and Le donné révélé et la théologie (Paris 1910), a study intended to resume the work done by Cano regarding the problems of the beginning of the twentieth century. Germany and Austria, the first to deal with historical theology, did not contribute a lot to these methodological discussions. Highly respected at that time, the work of the Viennese Professor Commer or that of the Jesuit C. Pesch (for example his Theologische Zeitfragen, 6 vols., 1910/16) seems very disappointing today. The contribution of the Latin countries was practically nonexistent.

---

[42] Cf. M. Jacquin, RSPhTh 40 (1956), 632–35. Concerning the leanings of this school, that was first inspired by Father Gardeil and later by Father Lemonnyer, cf. M. D. Chenu, Une École de théologie, le Saulchoir (Kain, Étiolles 1937).

[43] Cf. J. Lecler, RSR 48 (1960), 7–39.

[44] Regarding Léonce de Grandmaison (1868–1927), director of the Études and founder of the Recherches de science religieuse, see J. Lebreton, Le P. L. de Grandmaison (Paris 1932). His main articles are compiled in the volume Le dogme chrétien. Sa nature, ses formes, son développement (Paris 1928).

[45] Regarding Ambroise Gardeil (1859–1931), see H. Gardeil, L'œuvre du P. A. Gardeil (Paris 1956). Also R. Aubert, Le problème de l'acte de foi (Louvain ^{2}1950), 393–450; M. D. Chenu, RSPhTh 40 (1956), 645–52; Y. Congar, DThC XV, 443.

Integralism

Hand in hand with the suppression of modernism by Church authorities went a campaign of denunciations that increased throughout the pontificate and poisoned the atmosphere of its last years. It may seem peculiar that this campaign unfolded from the very moment when modernism, after the condemnations of 1907, seemed to be in the process of decline. One of the most active early proponents of orthodoxy, A. Cavallanti,[46] explained this fact in the following manner: "Arianism, Pelagianism, and Jansenism, having disappeared after their condemnation by the Church, left a trail of errors even more subtle and less obvious than that of modernism, errors that became known as semi-Arianism, semi-Pelagianism, and semi-Jansenism. Likewise, today, modernism, fatally exposed, has left after its departure other kinds of errors, sprouting all over like seeds and threatening to ruin, or ruining, many a good Catholic. . . . I repeat, there is a semimodernism that, although not as ugly as its antecedent, is much more deceptive and insidious, a modernism that proposes to be a synthesis of all heresies."[47]

Where did "semimodernism" begin? And where, moreover, did the "modernistic tendencies" and the "modernistic mental constitution," as the Corrispondenza romana called it, begin? The danger of abuse was particularly great because most of these irresponsible censors were not very competent in the area of theology and especially in the field of exegesis. Furthermore, they belonged to those minds who are completely indifferent to foreign ideas. Several months after the publication of Pascendi, Cardinal Ferrari already had to take a strong stance against the excesses, writing in his pastoral letter of Lent: "It is sad that some are obliged, even publicly, to act excessively, detecting modernism almost everywhere and denouncing it, and that they even want to suspect men of modernism who are far from it." There was hardly a single Catholic scholar who was not exposed to their attacks in the course of these years, to accusations that violated, in many instances, justice as well as love of one's fellow man. Even many deserving institutes were victims of such regrettable polemics, such as the École Biblique of Jerusalem, the theology faculty of Fribourg (almost suspended by Pius X), the Institut Catholique of Paris, numerous seminaries that had made efforts to improve the quality of studies, and many others.

---

[46] Concerning him, see CivCatt (1917) III, 370; also É. Poulat, Intégrisme, 434–37.

[47] Lecture of 16 November 1908, summarized in La critique du libéralisme 1 (1908–09), 421–23. On 5 February 1909, the Corrispondenza Romana wrote similarly: "Today, the danger lies in propaganda trying to be modern rather than in the radically modernistic propaganda." In 1913, Msgr. Benigni protested against those people who wanted to reduce modernism to its most radical form, stating: "As if fever is only present when forty degrees centigrade are measured" (quoted by É. Poulat, Intégrisme, 340).

These zealots have entered history under the nickname of "integralists." They called themselves "integral Catholics": in contrast to the efforts of liberal Catholics and modernists (whom they often threw in one and the same pot) wanting to water Catholicism down, they intended to confirm "the integrity of their Romanism: the entire Roman Catholicism (doctrine and praxis) and nothing but."[48] Whatever their debatable methods may have been, many of them were more than just theologians envious of competitors who might want to deprive them of the favor of the younger generation. In view of the dangers threatening their faith, they simply considered their crusade a sacred duty, and the repeated encouragements they received from the Pope were bound to strengthen their convictions.

On the one hand, the integralists had no scruples over denunciations, clandestine methods, and even espionage;[49] on the other hand, they fought with their visors open: with books and brochures, like those of the Jesuit J. Fontaine, whom É. Poulat considered "a remarkably well-preserved witness of an intellectual species, whose role is supposed to have been important,"[50] and with a series of journals (with rather limited circulations) controlled more or less by the integralists. In Italy, there was the Unità cattolica, financially supported by Pius X, Verona

---

[48] Declaration of the Agence internationale Roma (AIR) of 19 June 1913, quoted in É. Poulat, Intégrisme, 132. One of the main press channels of the movement, the Vigie, wrote on 5 December 1912: "We are integral Roman Catholics, which means that we prefer over everything and everybody not only the traditional doctrine of the Church in regard to absolute truths, but also the directives of the Pope in the area of pragmatic contingencies. The Pope and the Church are one." Poulat pointed out (op. cit., 522) that "the most ambitious successors of Pius X often showed rather less enthusiasm for Leo XIII."

[49] Often covered up by those in high places, as was shown in the Perciballi affair (cf. É. Poulat, Intégrisme, 588–89).

[50] DHGE XVII, 819–21.

fedele and the Riscossa of the Scotton brothers; in France, La foi catholique by B. Gaudeau and La critique du libéralisme by É. Barbier, both appearing in 1908, L'Univers, looking for revival in integralism, and, after 1912, La Vigie, both journals dependent on the Assumptionists, thanks to Father Salvien;[51] in Belgium, the Correspondance catholique of the lawyer Jonckx; in the Netherlands, De Maasbode, whose chief editor M. A. Thomson was the soul of Dutch integralism; and in Poland the Mysl Katolicka.

To what extent were all these activities coordinated and directed by one center and what role did the Holy See really play? In view of the fact that the integralists worked partly in the dark, the answer has remained unclear for a long time, especially since the Roman archives were made accessible to the general public with considerable delay. But the curtain was partly lifted in 1921, though under circumstances which did not completely appease the conscientious historians. New information was provided in 1950 on the occasion of the beatification of Pius X. A tremendous step toward the illumination of the situation was recently made by É. Poulat with exemplary professional conscientiousness. He succeed in analyzing the workings of the "international antimodernist secret operations" that had been organized by Monsignor Benigni,[52] a prelate of the secretariat of state: the Sodalitium Pianum, often simply referred to by its initials S. P., or by the camouflaging name La Sapinière, which Benigni wanted to fortify with an institutional religious basis in the manner of today's secular institutes. After the discovery of 1921 there was a tendency to consider Benigni as the soul of the entire integralist movement; he was supposed to have acted without the knowledge of Pius X, who is said to have known nothing of his often disputable methods. La Sapinière was regarded as a pressure group with remarkable but secret powers in the Church. Today the reality appears much more modest and at the same time more official than had been presumed. Except for the Correspondance de Rome, which was to provide the world press with religious news written in "the right spirit," the confidential bulletins promulgated by Benigni were but a "cascade of unfortunate attempts," and the S. P. had never more than about fifty members in all of Europe. However, the group was in contact with a number of individuals who formally did not belong to it, but shared its convictions, mainly with Abbé Barbier and Father Salvien, who had great influence in the Bonne Presse. With other opponents of modernism, however, the relations of this group were a lot more reserved. The documents published in the meantime have thrown a completely new light on the often rather fundamental differences separating the minds summarily labelled with the collective term "integralists." Wanting to avoid any kind of political exposure and to move exclusively on religious grounds, Benigni distanced himself from the Action française and its members. He considered men like Cardinal Billot and Abbé Gaudeau too soft. He mistrusted Abbé Thompson, the German Kaufmann, and the Austrian Maus. He was on bad terms with Merry del Val, since the secretary of state adroitly applied the brakes to the headlong initiatives of Benigni, who, in turn, charged him with diplomatic restraint.[53] Benigni's relations to the Society of Jesus grew increasingly cooler as well, even though many of its members defended the most traditional positions with narrow-minded intransigence until the end of the pontificate.

---

[51] Regarding P. Salvien, A.A., whose proper name was Charles Miglietti (1873–1934), and who served the Maison de la Bonne Presse from 1896 until 1923, see É. Poulat, Intégrisme, 286–87.

[52] Regarding Msgr. Umberto Benigni (1862–1934), raised in the spirit of the "counterrevolutionary" Catholicism of the Syllabus and the non expedit, who tried with tireless energy to form, together with a few friends, the dernier carré des incorruptibles, see Disquisitio circa quasdam obiectiones . . . , 197–204) É. Poulat, Intégrisme, 61–70.

In his investigations, É. Poulat succeeded in dispelling the myth about the infamous integralist conspiracy. He discovered that the situation was much more complicated than had been presumed for a long time; mainly, he was able to "reduce the S.P. to its real dimensions" and to prove that the ideological world of integralism went far beyond the circle of the Sodalitium Pianum and its sympathizers.[54] It was also proven that there was no longer a reason to maintain that Pius X had no knowledge of Benigni's activities. It is certain that the Pope supported La Sapinière and that he not only knew of the activities of its founders, but also approved and encouraged them. Benigni informed him daily through Monsignor Bressan and was regularly ordered to make delicate inquiries. It also seems to be obvious that the Pope never reprimanded Benigni seriously for the manner in which he conducted the tasks entrusted to him, as he had often done with other militant integralists, for example in the case of Abbé de Töth of the Unità cattolica; and that he personally covered up a sort of ecclesiastical secret police, one which does not seem permissible to us today,[55] but which he appears to have deemed justified in view of the dramatic situation that he felt the Church was entangled in.

---

[53] After analyzing the new documents, Poulat came to the following conclusion: "We definitely must relinquish the fairy tale: Benigni, the man of Merry del Val; the secretary of state who tries to persuade a good and devout Pope, having given him the reins, to be unyielding" (op. cit., 77).

[54] It is easy to forget that the initiative for these sanctions did not always come from Rome. M. Bécamel recently demonstrated this (BLE 72 [1971], 258–88) in regard to the recall of Msgr. Batiffol from his post as rector of the Institut catholique of Toulouse in 1907: mainly responsible for this were the archbishop and his entourage (pressured by the local reactionary circles). See also J. Daoust, MSR 9 (1952), 251–62, regarding the role that the archbishop of Rouen, Msgr. Fuzet, played (his campaign against Msgr. Baudrillart was not approved by Pius X).

The integralistic reaction reached its climax during 1912 and 1913. In 1912, Father Lagrange, among others, was forced to leave Jerusalem, and the Revue biblique almost had to cease its publication.[56] At the beginning of 1913, the entire fifth series (1905–13) of the Annales de philosophie chrétienne was put on the Index, a measure that was intensified a few weeks later when its director, Father Laberthonnière, was prohibited from publishing anything whatsoever, without being given the opportunity to defend himself.[57] The same decree of 5 March 1913 had also put the Sainte Chantal of Abbé H. Bremond on the Index, a condemnation which was less serious, but nonetheless significant. Bremond also attempted a renewal in the field of hagiography, that is, he wanted to replace the traditional picture of a saint with a human face, but now, every attempt at renovation was suspect; this attitude applied not only to areas directly involving the faith but also to the manner of representing Church history or the life of the saints, if these manners were inspired by "secular methods." The Bollandists narrowly avoided condemnation[58] (something Monsignor Duchesne failed to accomplish), only because of the powerful protection of Cardinal Mercier.

For the integralists, the danger of innovation and secularization did not exist only in the fields of exegesis, theology, philosophy, or Church history, but also in the area of relations between the Church and society, at that time called "sociology." In the efforts of the Christian Democrats, no matter of what persuasion, they saw the spirit of liberal Catholicism, stigmatized by Pius IX in the Syllabus, revived in a new version. Unfortunately, they made no distinctions between men like Murri, the French Abbés démocrates, the Sillon group or the trade-union headquarters in Mönchen-Gladbach. The program, presented to the collaborators of the Sodalitium Pianum, climaxed in the following declaration: "We are opposed to the exploitation of the clergy and the Catholic Action with the intention of luring them from the sacristy and rarely allowing them to return."[59] At first glance, one may be surprised at such a viewpoint when observing that several integralistic leaders, such as Benigni in Italy, Maignen in France, Decurtins in Switzerland, and many others had been ardent admirers of Rerum novarum. But it is precisely Leo XIII's first program of social Catholicism to which they remained loyal. In this program, the Pope expressly contrasted, for the benefit of the bourgeois world which had emerged from the revolution of 1789, the Christian social order resting on Christ's Kingdom over human society to "social atheism." These men charged the Christian democrats of the new generation with increasingly using their social concerns and their conviction of the independence of secular life as a pretense to liberate themselves from ecclesiastical tutelage.

---

[55] We may assume that he did not know everything and, "had he been better informed, would have objected to certain measures." If one were to appraise Pius X's course of action in the suppression of modernism, certain distinctions would have to be made. First, in regard to time: during the first few years of his pontificate he was intent on not annoying those people who deserved, in his opinion, a reprimand (see, e.g., the letter of 1906 quoted in P. Stefanini, Il card. Maffi [Pisa 1958], 277). From 1910 on, the anxiety which permeated his life ("the error spreading these days is much more murderous than that of Luther," he wrote in 1911 to Msgr. Bonomelli [Dal Gal, Il papa S. Pio X, 183]), compelled him to present himself more and more uncompromisingly and to extol the opinion that "the danger of the evil justified the extraordinary means" (É. Poulat, Intégrisme, 218). By the way, Pius X tried to respect the rights of the bishops as much as possible (several times, he charged the integralists with not taking them sufficiently into account). On the other hand, he had a very authoritarian concept of the rights of the hierarchy in regard to the common priests: This explains the often harsh procedures against them when he was of the opinion that he had to defend sound dogma.

[56] See the autobiographical pages entitled L'année terrible in Le P. Lagrange au service de la Bible, 200–15.

[57] Some details in A. Blanchet, Histoire d'une mise à l'Index, 149–55. The dossier that resulted in the condemnation had been handed in by the Action française.

[58] An encyclical of the Congregation on Studies announced that the Légendes hagiographiques of P. Delehaye were not to be used in Italian seminaries.

These facts, in the context of which the term "pragmatic modernism" was sometimes used, increasingly engrossed the integralists, and, even the Holy See, especially after the condemnations of 1907 had diminished the threat of doctrinaire modernism. It is interesting to find that problems of such a nature were the almost exclusive subject of Benigni's international correspondence, which has recently become available.

Naturally, in the various countries these incidents, labelled "blunders," were more varied than had been the case in regard to the problems of dogma. In Italy, attention was first directed toward the action that Murri and his disciples, who will be discussed in the next chapter, intended to carry on in the political arena. After they had failed and the ecclesiastical authorities had regained control of the Catholic movement, the Catholic press became their main concern. As mentioned in chapter 12, there were two opposing opinions regarding the press: According to one opinion, the Catholic newspapers, under direct control of the clergy, were to be official interpreters of the Holy See's thoughts and to preach to "a peaceful audience of devout citizens" (M. Vaussard) a strict policy of "religious defense," in agreement with the Catholic "thesis" regarding the rights of the Church within society; according to the other opinion, the Catholic press was to try to reach the ear of the upper class, which had largely adopted the liberal concept of society in order to make it familiar with the Catholic viewpoint concerning problems at hand. The controversy was: stampa di concentrazione or stampa di penetrazione. The Pope preferred the first solution, as represented by newspapers such as Osservatore Romano and the Voce della verità in Rome, the Unità cattolica in central Italy, and the Difesa in Venetia. Around 1907, under the direction of a former president of the Catholic movement, Count Grosoli, a society was formed that was generally called Il Trust. It published newspapers with other, much less parochial tendencies, such as the Corriere d'Italia and the Avvenire d'Italia.[60] These newspapers became the target of the integralist groups. Because of one such newspaper, the Unione of Milan, a regrettable collision of opinions occurred in 1911 between Pius X and Cardinal Ferrari.[61] On 2 December 1912, the Pope officially condemned the papers published by Il Trust.[62]

---

[59] Quoted in Disquisitio circa quasdam obiectiones . . . , 265–66.

In France, numerous attacks were launched against "social modernism," supported by the Action française and others. Through the assistance they received from Rome, many victims finally succeeded in evading a condemnation, as for example the Jesuits of the Action populaire.[63] But there were also rather painful incidents: For example, F. Anizan, the superior general of the Brothers of Saint Vincent de Paul, was denounced in Rome by a priest from his own congregation, and, in 1914, after an apostolic visitation, he and his entire council were suspended from office.[64]

In view of the international interest that the case of Le Sillon aroused then and continues to arouse today, Le Sillon is still worth a closer look. This movement owes its founding to a few young people who, like many other students, strove for reconciliation between Catholicism and a society indoctrinated by the ideas of 1789. One of these young men was Marc Sangnier,[65] who, having a profound influence on his comrades, turned the original study group into an active movement (1899). He took various initiatives which, due to his extraordinary energy and his noble eloquence, were immediately very successful. He founded circles for social studies, in which young intellectuals and young workers got together on a basis of equality. He established institutes which entered into competition with the socialist peoples' universities, and he organized public debates about problems and questions of the day. The movement, thanks to some strong local personalities also invading the provinces, quickly took on the form of a crusade aiming at the re-Christianization of democracy by winning the masses back for the Church and by reconciling the Church with the Republic. At first, the movement kept its distance from the liberal Catholics, being too far removed from the world of the workers, and from the Christian democrats, whom it charged with doing little more than preferring reforms of the institutional order to the more urgent task of morally educating the individual, in whom, assisted by the indispensable intellectual forces, the true spirit of democracy should be developed, without which democratic institutions would be delivered to a disastrous fate. On the one hand, a blustering Messianism was expected to sweep people off their feet through the impact of a charismatic spell, and therefore it was suggested that they be simply assembled in a fraternal community where no rigid organization would be able to suffocate their creative energy. On the other hand, many members patiently and gradually wanted to transfer the Christian ideal to the present social order; the existing organization was to obtain control over the responsibility for leading the state. This difference of opinion caused a serious crisis during 1905. However, the internal disputes did not impair the impact of Le Sillon. A more serious crisis appeared on the horizon after 1906, when the movement began to be active in politics, propagating a program according to which Christians in a pluralistic democratic society were to strive for a particularly strong influence, of course with mutual respect for different opinions. This new orientation changed the denominational group, essentially based on the apostolate, into a movement that invited, often in a rather provocative manner, non-Catholics, Protestants, even freethinkers to participate (Sangnier called this new institution le plus grand Sillon). By necessity, this development had an unsettling effect on the ecclesiastical authorities who tried to keep the Catholic youth under their exclusive control. Young priests and seminarians joining a movement that wanted to constitute itself without any official sanction by the hierarchy posed new problems, especially since many of them utilized Sangnier's declarations about the citizen's freedom of conscience in order to justify their independence from their superiors in other areas as well. Several bishops had already reacted to the new situation in 1907, and from this moment on the Vatican also acted. At first, Pius X had expressed his sympathy for these young Catholics' idealism, oriented toward religious activities; but he grew increasingly uncertain, especially since he was informed rather tendentiously. To be sure, there were incidents that justified concrete charges, such as the relentless criticism with which Le Sillon attacked those Catholics who did not share in its enthusiasm for republican democracy, or the intention to declare this democracy an obligation derived from Christian morality rather than the subject of free elections. Carelessness in terminology and Sangnier's increasingly harsh procedures completely compromised the movement. In February of 1909, Cardinal Luçon, the archbishop of Rheims, sent a serious reprimand to Sangnier, which resulted in the intensification of the campaign launched for months against him by the conservative press headed by the integralists. Encouraged by Benigni, Abbé Barbier took great pains to create the suspicion that Le Sillon smacked of modernism, since it paid homage to the concept of democratic authority condemned in the encyclical Pascendi. On the other hand, Pius X considered the new orientation of Le Sillon, with which it wanted to evade the ecclesiastical authority, unacceptable. For the Pope, any plan aiming at a modification of society was a matter of the moral order for which the Church alone was responsible. On 25 August 1910 he sent a letter to the French episcopate,[66] in which he defined three kinds of errors on the basis of authentic Sillonist texts, which had been frequently "distorted or simplified" (J. Caron) because they were taken out of their objective or historical context: 1) statements that are not in agreement with the traditional Catholic doctrine of society, since they are reminiscent of the "theories of the so-called philosophers of the eighteenth century, of the Revolution, and of liberalism, which had been often condemned"; 2) an illegitimate demand for autonomy from the ecclesiastical hierarchy in regard to areas belonging to the realm of morals, a demand worsened by the eclecticism of the alliance with non-Catholics;[67] 3) finally, as a consequence of this work, "promiscuity": modernist infiltrations which would compel the Sillonists to forget Christ's divinity and to "speak only of His sympathy for all human suffering and His urgent appeals to love thy neighbor and to practice brotherhood," and which would result in the Sillonists forming only "a scarce tributary to the great flow of apostasy which had been organized in all countries for the purpose of establishing a world Church that would have no dogma, no hierarchy, and no rules governing the spirit."

---

[60] Cf. (A. Giorgi), G. Grosoli (Assisi 1960), 83–103; L. Bedeschi, "Significato e fine del Trust grosoliano," Rassegna di politica e di storia (1964), 7–24; R. Aubert, "Premessa ad una storia dell' 'Avvenire,'" Humanitas 22 (Brescia 1967), 488–512.

[61] Regarding this serious incident that is often quoted as an example of the excesses resulting from the antimodernist suppression, see Disquisitio circa quasdam obiectiones . . . , to be supplemented and refined by the article by M. Torresin, utilizing the diocesan archives of Milan: Memorie storiche della diocesi di Milano 10 (1963), 37–304.

[62] AAS 4 (1912), 695.

[63] The affair can be recapitulated on the basis of numerous unpublished documents compiled by P. Droulers, op. cit.

[64] Cf. É. Poulat, Intégrisme, 419–22.

[65] Regarding Marc Sangnier (1873–1950), see, in addition to the work by J. Caron (cf. biblio., this chap.), M. Barthelemy-Madaule, M. Sangnier (Paris 1973).

---

[66] AAS 2 (1910), 607–33. Regarding the sources on which these documents seem to rest, cf. J. Caron, op. cit., 707–11.

[67] As a practical solution, the Pope demanded the division of the movement into strictly denominational diocesan groups subject to the bishop. M. Sagnier and his friends submitted without any reservation. However, the suggested solution resulted in the disappearance of the very element that had made the movement so original. Consequently, it quickly faded away.

Received with enthusiasm by the entire rightist press, this condemnation was taken by the leftists as a confirmation of the incompatibility of the Church and the modern tendencies within society. This impression was fortified by the fact that numerous influential circles in Rome and Pius X himself were benevolent toward the Action française, a royalist group of the extreme right that was led by Charles Maurras and usually supported the integralist opponents of Christian democracy. "It advocates the principle of authority, it defends the order," the Pope told the Catholics of the left who saw the Action française as an un-Christian conception of the state, aimed at elevating the reason of the state to the ultimate value. The Pope was grateful to Maurras for his sarcastic assaults on the kind of democracy perpetuated by the anticlerical parliaments of France and Italy and he was grateful that he had created a "teaching chair for the Syllabus" in order to preach a counterrevolutionary concept of society based on tradition and the hierarchy. He even went so far as to call this agnostic "a good defender of the Holy See and the Church,"[68] without taking into consideration the fact that Maurras had praised the Catholic Church for having succeeded in moderating the destructive content of the message of the "Hebrew Christ" through wisdom derived from ancient Rome. In 1913, after another offensive against Maurras that was supported by several bishops, "leading personalities" interceded with the Pope, presenting the denunciations as "a trap set by the demo-liberals." Nevertheless, after initial hesitation, the Pope sent Maurras's works to the Congregation of the Index; yet, though the congregation unanimously agreed on a condemnation (26 January 1914), he did not issue it,[69] because he was afraid that a condemnation of the journalist who, in his opinion, was one of the strongest opponents of the modernists and the anticlerical groups, would only serve their cause.

Germany, scarcely affected by the modernist crisis in the true sense of the word, did not have to suffer too much from the antimodernist reaction on a doctrinal level, even though some Catholic scholars were subject to measures which hardly seem justified today.[70] In the last years of Pius X's pontificate, Germany was violently shaken by integralist assaults of a political and social nature. Details about the so-called Center controversy and the opposition crystalizing after 1904 within the trade unions will be discussed later (chap. 35). This opposition was dealing with tensions between the Berlin group that had remained loyal to the old formula of the Catholic worker association and the much stronger Cologne group demanding interdenominational trade unions that would be willing to cooperate with the Socialists to defend professional interests. This double conflict required a fundamental decision as to what extent the laity was able to take on responsibility for its activities in the secular realm without the hierarchy's intervention. The integralists were convinced (and Pius X agreed) that religion was indeed the foundation of social order. Therefore, if one were to solve the political and social problems outside of the control of the ecclesiastical authorities, one would question the traditional concept of the "Christian civilization" and thus run the risk of committing an error in the area of doctrine. Consequently, the Christian trade unions, organized as they were everywhere in western Europe around the turn of the century, were charged with emphasizing their economic and social tasks instead of their ultimate moral and religious purpose. They were especially indignant about the Cologne group going so far as to organize the defense of the workers on a neutral professional basis, enabling cooperation with non-Catholics and even with Socialists.

---

[68] But not a defender "of faith," as C. Bellaigue had written absentmindedly. He postdated by one year the declaration delivered on 6 July 1913 (cf. A. Ansette, Études 279 [1953], 391–92).

[69] See the content of the dossier in the Index librorum prohibitorum, ed. of 1930, pp. XXVIII–XXXI. Concerning the condemnation, see A. Latreille, Cahiers d'histoire 10 (1965), 388–401.

On the one hand, Pius X wanted to uphold the principles that, in his opinion, should guide every Christian society, and therefore he assailed the efforts to declericalize secular life. On the other hand, he had to take into account the strength of the Cologne group, which was backed by the majority of the German episcopate and enjoyed the clandestine support of the nuncio in Munich.[71] For those reasons, the entire situation was fundamentally different from that of Le Sillon. Therefore, the Pope looked for a compromise and, in September 1912, issued the encyclical Singulari quadam,[72] unconditionally sanctioning the Berlin proposal, but conceding that the other plan could also be "tolerated" to prevent a more serious malady, that is, thesis and hypothesis. However, this papal intervention did not succeed in easing the controversies raging over several years; on the contrary, it agitated the situation even more, since both parties had reason now to cheer. The conflicts also flared up again in France. There, the integralists took advantage of the encyclical, using it to revive their assaults against Christian democracy.[73] Then the Civiltà cattolica published two articles by P. G. Monetti,[74] a theologian to whom the Pope liked to listen. These articles were directed against the principle of the trade-union system and culminated in the statement: "It includes many things absolutely opposed to the true spirit of the Gospel, and there is no use in baptizing it Christian; when two terms are so ill-matched, one should not try to combine them." This article was obviously inspired. It was a test, a prologue for a new, much more pointed papal document. This document was intended to warn the Christian trade unions of a development that would drive them gradually away from the social ideology which Pius X considered the only legitimate one, since it agreed with the Catholic concept. However, this was denied by several apologetic historians. Those people, who were convinced that the Pope had been victimized by an obsolete "model" in the sociological sense of the word and was intent on proceeding with the adjustment of the Church to the development of modern society, tried to forestall this new threat. Cardinals Maffi and Mercier, the general of the Jesuits, Fathers Wernz, Toniolo, Harmel, and others discreetly interceded, and Pius X himself finally preferred to postpone the scheduled measures. Thus, the Christian democrats had finally been victorious over their integralist opponents in this "last great battle of the pontificate" (É. Poulat).

---

[70] When F. Maier accepted the invitation to write the commentary for the first three books of the Gospel for the so-called Bonner Bibel prepared by F. Tillmann, his solution to the synoptic problem was considered daring, and after several fascicles he had to be replaced by another man.

[71] Regarding the mitigating action of the nuncio in respect to the various controversies that had been incited under the flag of the antimodernist reaction (his measures were not always appreciated by many a Roman group), see A. Walz, Andreas Kard. Frühwirth (Vienna 1950), 328–47. Regarding the history of the encyclical, see L. Hardieck, WZ 109 (1959), 169ff.

[72] AAS 4 (1912), 657–62.

At that time, the excesses of the "witch hunt" had gradually caused a resistance that, in contrast to frequent appraisals, did not wait for the pontificate of Benedict XV in order to manifest itself more or less openly.[75] This resistance progressively focused on a few prelates who had been concerned for years over the development of the situation and the direction it had taken,[76] and around a number of Jesuits who had anticipated that Pius X's successor was bound to continue this development and that this turn of events also had to be anticipated. Several respected journals of the Society of Jesus such as the Stimmen der Zeit, publicly risked protests after 1913,[77] in which Father Lippert brandished the "hunt for heresies" as one of the most regrettable phenomena of the antimodernist reaction. Likewise, the Civiltà cattolica published the complaints, issued by Prince zu Löwenstein on the occasion of the Congress of Metz, regarding the assaults of "certain" integralists against the social Catholics.[78] A little later, the French Jesuit journal severely criticized the "denunciations without any kind of discernment."[79] For those who were informed, it was no secret that the Jesuits, reacting in this manner to the excesses of the integralists, were backed by the general of the society and two of his main assistants, Fathers Ledóchowski and Fine.

---

[73] An official letter by Cardinal Merry del Val to A. de Mun of 7 January 1913 (see R. Talmy, Les syndicalisme chrétien, 122–24) was the first success for them; however, during the following months, the tensions eased.

[74] CivCatt (1914) I, 385–99, 546–99. Regarding the affair and its consequences, see A. Zussini, L. Caisotti de Chiusano e il movimento cattolico dal 1896 al 1915 (Turin, 1965), 154–96.

[75] The letters of Msgr. Benigni (published by É. Poulat) clearly show that the integral Catholics grew increasingly anxious about the development of the situation after 1913, and that their encouraging pleas in view of the "liberal" counteroffensive became more and more numerous.

Pius X, whose bitter complaints about his "isolation" in the struggle on behalf of the integralist orthodoxy can be better understood in this context, did not conceal his dissatisfaction. In October 1913 he had assigned the management of the Civiltà cattolica to Father Chiaudano, who wholeheartedly shared his opinion, and of whom the integralist paper La Vigie wrote that he would lead the Roman journal back to the "relentless determination" from which it wanted to depart and that he would "revive the beautiful days of Pius IX."[80] The brief addressed to the Society of Jesus on the occasion of the centennial celebration of its restoration did not leave any doubt, by virtue of the indifference with which it was composed, about the Pope's disappointment about the "blunders" with which he felt compelled to charge the Society. It appeared as if he even contemplated relieving Father Wernz of the direction of the Society and replacing him with Father Matiussi, who had close contacts with the integralists.[81] But at this very moment, the almost simultaneous death of the "white Pope" and the "black Pope" brought an end to this particularly painful aspect of the suppression of modernism by the antimodernists.

---

[76] Among others, Cardinal Piffl, archbishop of Vienna; Cardinal Amette, archbishop of Paris; most German bishops; Cardinal Mercier, the archbishop of Mechelen; in Italy the Cardinals Maffi, Svampa, Capecelatro, Richelmy, and even the cardinals of the Curia, Casetta, prefect of the Congregation of Studies, and Steinhuber, S.J., prefect of the Index.

[77] 85 (1913), 358–62; cf. 87 (1914), 249–58.

[78] 1913, III, 612. Concerning this intervention of the Civiltà, see G. de Rosa, L'Azione cattolica II (Bari 1954), 132–38).

[79] "Critiques négatives et tâches nécessaires," Études 138 (1914), 5–25. Cf. J. Lebreton, Le P. L. de Grandmaison (Paris 1932), 187–93.

[80] Cf. É. Poulat, Intégrisme, 335–37. It is remarkable that Pius X, on the occasion of his appointment, expressed the desire that the Civiltà should serve as a model to all sincere et integre catholici journalists.

---

[81] Cf. G. Cassiani Ingoni, Vita del P. W. Ledochowski (Rome 1945), 71–73, and Disquisitio circa quasdam obiectiones, 10–11.

SECTION THREE

The Holy See and the European Governments

CHAPTER 34

The Roman Question and Italian Catholicism
The Non expedit in the Pontificates of Pius X, Benedict XV, and Pius XI (until 1925)

Giuseppe Sarto, later Pope Pius X, participated as bishop of Mantua and subsequently as patriarch of Venice in the struggle of active integralism regarding the Roman question and the critical, aloof attitude toward the unified Italian state. However, he was quite sensitive toward the basic problems of the political society of Italy being dominated, after the bloody incidents of May 1898 and the King's assassination in 1900, by anxieties, antagonism, and accusations. The Pope was worried that during the elections the Socialists would support the radicals who stubbornly continued their anticlerical campaign, inspired by the Freemasons, and refused to allow the Church to influence social life (education, schools, social welfare, charity) with respect to the essential internal national aspect of the "Roman question." In order to create a counterweight against such alliances between the radicals and the new social forces in the spirit of more open-mindedness for the democratic authorities, but also of a more aggressive laicism, Cardinal Sarto approved agreements for the purpose of defending religious values and institutions, to be concluded with the Liberals on the occasion of the administrative elections. Moreover, in Mantua and Venice, Sarto had an opportunity to observe and appraise personalities, situations, and programs of the militant Catholics, and he did not entirely reject contacts with "transigent" and arbitrating groups.

Also as Pope, Sarto adhered to his guidelines of "conservative reformism" in the face of Catholic activism (Aubert); he was amicable toward the demands of the most ardent activists, but only within clearly defined limits and in a certain framework, thus keeping in check the initiatives and the men who perpetrated them and put them in action. As far as the Catholic movement in Italy is concerned, Pius X forced those men who had supported the policies of Leo XIII to step into the background, and he introduced new methods of government that were oriented toward direct, unbureaucratic relations with the leading figures of the movement and the spokesmen of various factions. These contacts were made via the secretariat of state. Officially, however, the secretariat of state continued to be responsible, even though Pius X knew that its new leader, Cardinal Merry del Val, was not familiar with Italian Catholicism and was primarily anxious to preserve its authority, the discipline, and the direction from above.

In this manner, Pius X mainly preferred the personal leadership of men of his special trust who stood outside of the Secretariat of State and its offices. Among these advisers, some Fathers of the Society of Jesus were given particular responsibility. Moreover, as editors of the Civiltà cattolica, they obtained increased influence for this journal by making it the voice of the papacy. These men were Fathers Santi, Passavich, and Brandi. They had direct access to the organization and the successes of the organized Catholics, one of them in regard to Germany, the second one in regard to Belgium and France, and the third in regard to the United States. They were ordered to prepare drafts of papal documents and served as intermediaries between the papacy and the leaders of the Catholic movement, obtaining reports and declarations and passing on suggestions and reprimands.

It was the wish of Pius X as well as his predecessor that the decisions made at the top, according to his concept of papal authority, should emanate from the people; however, the laity and the active circles of the clergy were in disagreement and tried to drive a wedge between the members of the Curia and the Pope himself, causing the official directives to be somewhat contradictory and ambiguous. In 1904 it was decided that the Opera dei congressi, celebrating its thirtieth anniversary, be suspended. At the same time, the dependence of the Catholic movement and its organizations on the ecclesiastical authority was increased through instructions for the reorganization of the centralized cadres, based on the encyclical Il fermo proposito (11 June 1905).[1] The Pope found himself bitterly disappointed as far as the people and institutions acquiescing in his intentions were concerned.

Also in regard to the formally approved Non expedit, Sarto began to introduce innovations; case by case, mitigations and exceptions were permitted aiming at the elimination of radical and socialist candidates. At the general elections, the liberal candidates were supported, provided they had agreed to assent to the demands of the Catholics regarding schools, family (rejection of divorce), and the religious institutions. By backing the liberal deputies constituting the parliamentary majority of Prime Minister Giolitti, Pius X wanted to make a gesture of détente toward the Italian state. In return, he expected some kind of willingness to oblige in the Roman question, if only in two respects: in regard to the bilateral regulation of the position of the Holy See in Rome and in regard to a mutual agreement about the definition of the legal status of ecclesiastical institutions in Italy.

---

[1] Text: Insegnamenti pontifici no. 4; Il laicato, 201–31, nos., 323–74.

However, the expectations were not fulfilled. The prime minister from Piedmont indeed pursued a policy of cooperation, assisted by an obliging parliamentary majority despite opposition throughout the country and in the Chamber of Deputies. He listened to the demands and employed ecclesiastical spokesmen in his service. Yet in regard to relations between Church and state, and consequently the relations to the Holy See, he adhered to the customary attitude. He upheld the theory that state and Church could be compared to parallels determined to run abreast of each other without ever meeting. Therefore, the Vatican also returned to its formal and rigid stance. Concerning the Catholic movement, this resulted in a stronger emphasis of its dependence on the Holy See, but also in an intensification of the public activities of Catholics in the communal administrations and in economic and social organizations (savings and loan banks in the country, worker auxiliaries, emigrant welfare, community halls, the political-religious and popular-polemical press, professional organizations, e.g., of elementary school teachers). All these activities resulted in more and more frequent contacts with the world of politics; in public opinion and in peoples' representations, the programs were synchronized and there were meetings pursuing the goal of exerting pressures on the official authorities in favor of the groups that were represented.

Thus, on the level of administrative elections (which had been strongly supported all along) as well as in the area of "political" elections (handled more indirectly), the problem of elections became the priority of the movement, whereby, aside from the "economic-social union," an "election union" was particularly significant during the preparations for the elections.

One of the last decisions made by Leo XIII was the appointment of a new president of the Opera dei congressi, Count Grosoli of Ferrara, a man who was sympathetic toward the ideas of Toniolo and to the demands of youth. As the editor of Catholic daily papers, he was bound to occupy an outstanding position. This meant that Leo XIII had begun to employ more venturesome principles of social democracy, and that he finally regarded as a social movement what had seemed to him to be a religious-clerical movement. At the Catholic Congress of Bologna (November 1903), the new democratic spirit had had an opportunity to assert itself through motions and democratic ballot procedures, persuading everyone that the groups had moved closer and that the progressive ideas and their authors had found followers. This was not the case within the traditional five actions. On the contrary, following Paganuzzi, who had been replaced by Grosoli, the "old ones" had incited an alarmist campaign against the new leadership, and in the following year they succeeded in taking the majority of the central committee of the Opera dei congressi away from Grosoli. Nevertheless, the Pope confirmed him; but shortly afterward (19 July 1904), the Osservatore Romano disapproved of a letter which Grosoli had sent to the Catholic Committees on 15 July 1904. Referring to the statement that "the matter of absolute, effective freedom and independence from the Holy See was the main goal of Catholic Action," Grosoli had insisted in this letter that the Catholics were subject to the authority of the bishop not only in regard to their religious, but also their economic and social initiatives, and that they were to abstain from political elections. However, significantly evoking their national consciousness and referring to demands regarding changing realities, he said: "Within the inalienable rights of the Holy See, Catholics consider historical epochs and events milestones on a path leading into the future and they are intent to assure that their work, carried on in this life, not be hindered by matters that are dead in the national consciousness."[2]

Grosoli again handed in his resignation, and this time it was accepted. Subsequently, in a letter by Cardinal Secretary of State Merry del Val to the Italian bishops, the Opera dei congressi was declared suspended, with the exception of its second section, which was still chaired by Medolago Albani. The Catholic Action was to be dependent on the hierarchy of the Church. It had to relinquish the principle of determining the leadership through elections and to forego regional autonomy, thus returning to rigid Roman centralism and an organization of dioceses. "At general congresses and at smaller meetings, parliamentary procedures had to be abandoned and decisions could no longer be made through plebiscite."[3]

Grosoli did not succeed in persuading Murri to return to the organization and to adopt the guidelines of the Opera dei congressi. Through the problems he had raised, he had caused a crisis of conscience among the militant Catholics. This was not only of concern to the organization, its goals and methods, and forced it to decide whether Catholics were to follow the directives of the Opera dei congressi or Christian democracy; but it also called into question the validity of the Non expedit and the restrictive measures of the Vatican regarding the democratic activity of the Catholics.

At this point in time, in July 1904, the social movement showed a balance that was impressive even after being divided regionally: a total of 2,432 organizations, 642 of them in Venetia, 677 in Lombardy, 106 in Tuscany, 27 in Umbria, 99 in the Marches, 37 in Latium, 17 in the Abruzzi mountains, 37 in Campania, 17 in Apulia, 5 in the Basilicata, 8 in Calabria, 3 in Sardinia, and 125 in Sicily. These 2,432 organizations consisted of 774 associations established for the purpose of mutual assistance, 21 people's secretariats, 107 productive and consumer-oriented associations, 170 professional unions or workers' associations, 33 farm labor societies, 43 farmers' associations, 29 associations for collective tenants, 69 banks, 855 rural loan associations, 40 workers' banks, 154 cattle insurance federations, and 187 democratic propaganda societies.[4]

---

[2] A. Gambasin, Il movimento sociale . . . , op. cit., 552.

[3] Ibid., 552–54.

The Catholic movement was now facing a dilemma: on the one hand, it had to continue and intensify the multiplicity of social work, and the organizations and their organizers had to take into account the demands raised by the world of workers and farmers. These groups were primarily affected by industrialization, subjected to new living conditions, and repeatedly overrun by crises emanating from the existing world-wide crises. Moreover, the Catholics wanted to establish themselves according to the model of the socialist organizations, trying to show them that Christianity possessed the social strength to liberate the masses from their misery and utilizing all means at their disposal. On the other hand, Catholic activism, by virtue of its loyalty to the Pope, had to follow the papal directives that were spelled out in Il fermo proposito of 1905 and in the new "statutes" that had been painstakingly prepared by laymen in 1906. These statutes were the result of intensive consultations with Pius X's advisers and obviously tried to copy many aspects of the Catholic organizations with experience in foreign countries.

The overall structure had been simplified; in place of the five sections of the Opera dei congressi, three great national unions were formed. The biggest and most extensive union was the People's Union, comparable to the Volksverein of the German Catholics. It consisted of individual members and intended to train them socially and religiously through the traditional values of piety and love. It replaced the first section of the Opera dei congressi, unfolding its activities during the Social Weeks, according to the French model. The second section of the Opera dei congressi had been essentially retained under the new name Economic Social Union and had the task of educating people as to the principles of an economic order (based on Christian ethics rather than liberalism and socialism) and of creating the appropriate organizations. The activities of the Catholics in the administrative field, gaining more and more significance, were to be furthered and directed by a third organ that was significantly called the Election Union of the Italian Catholics. In regard to practical procedures, the main emphasis was placed on the disciplinary element, which was to curb the drive toward extensive social action and toward political involvements.

---

[4] Ibid., 558.

The task of adjusting the movement to these structures and the duty to obey the directives of the hierarchy, without sacrificing its vitality and impetus, were challenges to leaders and groups alike. In the spirit of Murri, the more active and impatient ones among them subsequently broke away from the movement and divorced themselves from the Catholic Action, ultimately joining forces with the radicals and socialists. This precipitated the loss of many members. The most crucial point troubling them was the matter of autonomy. It caused the most tensions, if only because the demand for autonomy included the limitations imposed by the encyclical Non expedit, with all its principle and tactical requirements. In 1905, autonomous groups of "Christian democracy" were formed.

In view of the election of deputies in 1904, some people who, like Bishop Bonomelli under Pope Leo XIII, had pleaded for reconciliation with the government, asked the new Pope to cancel the Non expedit. They were joined by laymen who were more successful as spokesmen of the well-meaning, yet impatient activists from the provinces. One of them, Bonomi, the future deputy of Bergamo, was also asked to mediate the issue by advisers of Minister President Giolitti and Minister Tittoni, who compared the degree of Catholic voting in the administrative elections to the degree of abstention in political elections and took account of the political strength of the Catholics.[5] In a conference dealing with the Non expedit, Bonomi was told by Pope Pius X: "Follow your conscience, the Pope will be silent."[6] Subsequently, the Catholics participated in the parliamentary elections in Bergamo, Cremona, and Milan, gaining several chamber seats for Catholic deputies, thanks to agreements with the Liberals.

On the part of the Holy See, this was a small concession, eventually resulting in the suspension of the Non expedit. The Vatican reserved the right to grant dispensations whenever the bishops deemed them necessary and demanded them. This was a consequence not so much of sympathy with the Liberals as of fear of the advancement of socialism, which was considered a threat to the religiosity of the people and to the stability of the foundations of the Italian state, a state that was now felt to be stable and in need of protection from the turmoils of revolution.

---

[5] At the supplementary elections in Bergamo in June 1904 under the regime of the Non expedit, 2,465 had voted in favor, 3,875 had withheld their vote; the radical candidate, with the help of the Socialists, had received 1,330 votes, and the moderate candidate 924. Cf. D. Secco Suardo, Da Leone XIII a Pio X (Rome 1967), 384.

[6] P. Zerbi, Il movimento cattolico in Italia da Pio IX a Pio X. Linee di sviluppo (Milan 1961), 85.

The Catholic movement continued to take a defensive stance. It protested against any kind of assault on the authority and reputation of the Church, as well as on the religious convictions and customs of the common people. It charged liberal principles with such assaults and showed its strength in unanimous cooperation with the Pope. Not without tensions, this strength consisted of several factors, such as class identity, the progressive ascent of the lower classes, religious devotional enthusiasm, and the pastoral policy of the hierarchy. The leadership was dominated by those who loyally upheld the faith and wanted to lead it to victory. These factors also affected the political action in regard to its spiritual as well as its practical application. In regard to political activity, which was particularly emphasized under Pius X through the mitigation of the Non expedit, the offensive attitude crystallized in various forms; so did the intention to exert influence on the social, economic, and religious structures in the spirit of the Church and according to its requirements.

This line was particularly extolled by the moderate clerical group that was part of the Catholic movement and of the Italian politics dominated by Giolitti and his governmental methods. It had a parallel in the so-called "reformist" tendency of socialism, provided that this kind of socialism wanted to take the democratic route toward the realization of its economic and social goals and distanced itself from revolutionary syndicalism and anarchism. The moderate clerical group was a result of the meetings of Catholics and Liberals that took place under the auspices of the journal La rassegna nazionale (founded in 1879), an official mouthpiece of the Catholics favoring reconciliation. Under Pius X this journal was brought into ill repute for its sympathies toward Reform Catholicism. Advocates of an election alliance with the Liberals were conservative "intransigents" who were concerned with the economic and social order threatened by the collectivist program and the syndicalist agitation of the Socialists, as well as with the so-called "progressive intransigents," who felt driven to political action in order to be able to influence the official institutions in the spirit of Christian social ethics. The alliance's criteria pertaining to the characteristics expected of the candidates were defined by the Pope himself in 1908 when he said to the future bishop of Bergamo, Radini Tedeschi: "If they are neither sectarian nor socialist candidates, if they offer sufficient prospects for being elected and pledge to uphold the principles of order and public welfare, they should be supported; if Freemasons, anticlerical, socialist, or even worse candidates run for election, Catholic candidates agreeable to amicable factions should be nominated."[7] These directives can be found in the so-called Patto Gentiloni, which was signed prior to the elections of 1913 (the first elections in which all men, i.e., 24 percent of a population that had increased to 36 million, had the right to vote). The Patto was given the name of Gentiloni, the current president of the Catholic Election Union. It demanded of the liberal candidates the following: the private educational system is not to be burdened with difficulties; the introduction of religious instruction in community schools is to be favored; the institution of divorce is to be rejected; social legislation is to be furthered; and the candidate should be concerned with representing the Catholic professional associations in governmental employment bureaus. Customary defensive concerns took precedence over the social program. This reflected consideration for the liberal allies, as was demanded by the conservative wing, but not condoned by the Catholics, who had a socially more progressive attitude. Gradually the Christian trade-union system, supported by laymen and young priests, made itself felt through unions of farm laborers and of male and female workers, especially in the textile factories of northern Italy, who were accustomed to agitations for wage demands and knew how to use strikes as a weapon. Thanks to the Gentiloni pact, thirty-three Catholic representatives moved into Parliament and, no less significant, about two hundred deputies of the government party were elected due to the votes of Catholics.

Several Catholic groups in the southern part of Italy leaned toward political action as a natural consequence of the social movement, yet were predisposed against an alliance with the Liberals. Their spokesman was a Sicilian priest, Don Luigi Sturzo (born in 1871 in Caltagirone), who justified the opposition of the Catholics against the lay state based on dissatisfaction with the economically disadvantaged south, which was dominated by shrewd businessmen. Sturzo's restraint toward the liberal state rested on the fact that this state was engaged by Giolitti for the purpose of power in a system of business interests and such corruption that the prime minister from Piedmont was named "minister of corruption" by Socialists who also came from the south. Out of opposition against this centralistic, bureaucratic state, Don Sturzo recommended furthering the local autonomy of the communities and counties under the regime of the Non expedit. Wishing greater regional autonomy, he actively worked toward this end by founding, for instance, an association of communities.[8] According to his intentions, the incorporation of

---

[7] D. Secco Suardi, op. cit., 558.

[8] Cf. L. Sturzo, "La croce di Constantino." Primi scritti politici e pagine inedite sull'azione cattolica e le autonomie communali, a cura di G. De Rosa (Rome 1958), (cf. above all 263–300, Il programma municipale dei cattolici).

Catholics into political life was to proceed in an autonomous manner, and one was to work towards the goal of "preparing with restraint." This goal was reached in 1919 with the founding of a nondenominational (formally not subject to the hierarchy) Italian People's Party (Partito Popolare Italiano).

Murri proceeded from a different position, totally rejecting the liberal, lay state and sharing in this regard the ideas of the intransigent circles. However, he soon planned to create, in opposition to the Risorgimento government, a political organization within the Catholic movement that was to put into action the Catholic social program by seizing power through elections. In a sensational campaign, Murri, the priest from the Marches, rejected the structural, hierarchical rigidity of the Catholic Action precipitated by the "instructions" of Pius X. Murri founded a denominational Catholic party, the Lega democratica nazionale, giving it a program that was aimed not only at a reform of the state but also of the Church. Through this, he risked two condemnations: a religious-political condemnation, following the collapse of Catholic unity, and the dogmatic condemnation threatening him as a disciple of modernism. With the support of the radicals, Murri was nominated as a parliamentary candidate. But in 1907 he was suspended a divinis and in 1909 excommunicated, even though personalities of the Curia, such as Cardinal Agliardi, continued to give him respect and understanding.

This National Democratic League was soon abandoned by intellectuals, trade-union leaders, and members of community and provincial administrations who could not accept Murri's "political modernism." In 1911, supported by Don Sturzo, they founded the Christian Democratic League; it was one of the elements from which the Italian People's Party subsequently emerged.

There was another significant meeting between the Catholic movement and political organizations: Catholic personalities and representatives of institutions patronizing the missions and the care of Italians in foreign countries met with the proponents of the new nationalist tendencies who considered such institutions instruments of national significance to be utilized in the age of colonialism for purposes of foreign politics. This resulted in the furthering of several Catholic works that were concerned with religion and culture in foreign countries and especially with the care of Italians who had emigrated to North and South America (in 1911 alone, the number of emigrants amounted to over half a million). The consequence of this were closer relations between Catholic leaders and the Risorgimento state.

Nevertheless, the active Catholics were still distrustful of and disappointed with the Italian state. The religious-social efforts of the Catholics encountered resistance and the Giolitti government was determined to keep the Catholics, in contrast to the Socialists, from advancing in politics. Therefore, it avoided making concessions to the Vatican that could have compelled Pius X to give the activity of the organized Catholics more leeway. The conciliatory gestures of the bishops and Catholic organizations on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the unified state in 1911 entailed reprimands of the Vatican that sounded almost intransigent.

The Catholic movement had in the meantime invaded the cultural realm. In academia, it was represented by Toniolo and Contardo Ferrini, professor of Roman law, who was sympathetic to the Milan circles, as well as by the philosophers Petrone in Naples, Acri in Florence, and Bonatelli in Padua. Highly respected even in university circles were the conciliatory Cardinal Capecelatro, the astronomer Cardinal Maffi of Pisa, and Monsignor Talamo who was trying to establish contact between the Neo-Thomist renaissance and social studies in the Rivista internazionale di scienze sociali. Finally there was the young biologist Agostino Gemelli, who had converted from militant atheism to become a Franciscan friar. After 1909, he emphasized that the Catholic movement must also permeate the universities, thinking of his own plan of a Catholic university which he indeed founded in 1921. The problems of religious consciousness appeared also in literature committed to the cause, such as in novels by Fogazzaro, or works by poets such as Giulio Salvadori, and they found expression in avant-garde journals of the early twentieth century like La voce and L'acerba of Papini and Prezzolini. The plea for a merging of modern culture and Christianity in the area of historical studies and Scriptural exegesis grew increasingly more intense within the circles of the movement. The most representative groups were those of Buonaiuti, Genocchi, and Fracassini in Rome and the Milan group gathered around the journal Il rinnovamento and including T. Gallarati Scotti, A. Casati, and A. Alfieri, who were in contact with the Barnabite Father Semeria and Bishop Bonomelli.[9] However, this cultural orientation of the Catholic movement fell victim to the suppressive measures against antimodernism because it was reminiscent of concepts that were condemned by the encyclical Pascendi. The Catholic movement for decades to come was affected by these steps.

As the Catholic movement knew how to interpret the currents in the educated classes as well as in the masses, it succeeded in assuming leadership in the social and political upswing. From then on, its own development coincided more and more with the history of Italy as it emerged from the Risorgimento. Its exponents in both chambers, in the administrative bodies, in the press, in the pastoral management of dioceses and parishes soon faced the world conflict that confronted Italy with a choice between war and peace. At first, the Catholics were inclined toward neutrality, in part because of solidarity with the new Pope, Benedict XV (Della Chiesa), who decisively announced his neutrality. People who played an outstanding role and circles that were politically most committed, especially those who were close to the nationalists, were carried away by the appeals to intervene in the war and to fight on the side of the Allies against the Central Powers, on the grounds that this would bring about the completion of national unification. Remembering the spirit of the Risorgimento, the Catholics found intervention in the war to be an opportunity to prove their loyalty to the state. The government soon realized the political weight of the practicing Catholics and took their representative Filippo Meda into the Boselli Cabinet (1916).

---

[9] N. Raponi, T. Gallarati Scotti tra politica e cultura (Milan 1971).

In August 1917 the Pope called for a peace that would know neither victors nor vanquished, terming war "a senseless slaughter." This reflected negatively on the Catholics and raised doubts about their loyalty, even though, in agreement with the attitude of the Holy See (declarations of Cardinal Secretary of State Gasparri in 1915), they had rejected attempts of foreign powers to raise the Roman question to an international level.

Willing to deal with the problems of the postwar years pertaining to religious, moral, and socio-political issues, the exponents of the Catholic movement in 1919 founded the Italian People's Party (Partito popolare italiano). They approached the problems at hand with a concept of state and society that had matured in the course of their study of the struggles and experiences of the previous four decades.[10] With the approval of the Holy See, the party declared itself "non-denominational," thus removing the last obstacle set up by the Non expedit. As a result of Catholic Action under the direction of the bishops, the various Catholic organizations were able to pursue their responsibilities to the different sectors of religious education and culture. Members of the People's Party were all Catholic representatives, the leaders and active members of Catholic societies and "white" trade unions. From this time on, their influence was obvious. It was not coincidental that this very same year, at the Peace Conference of Paris, the first deliberations over negotiations regarding the Roman question took place between Prime Minister Orlando and Monsignor Cerretti.[11] These talks were interrupted by the government crisis and the stubborn resistance of certain anticlerical elements.

---

[10] St. Jacini, Storia del Partito Popolare Italiano (Milan 1951).

[11] Cf. E. Orlando, Su alcuni miei rapporti di Governo colla S. Sede (Rome 1930); F. Margiotta Broglio, Italia e S. Sede dalla granda guerra alla Conciliazione (Bari 1966), 43–58 (political and juridic aspects).

The success of the Catholics, due to the proportional representation of 1919 in the elections (the People's Party furnished over one hundred deputies), gave the Catholics a very strong position and the equally responsible task of aligning the parliamentary majority behind the government in the event of a major economic and political crisis. At the same time, in complete independence, the "white" trade-union organization unfolded, but not without slogans of class struggles and a radicalism that negatively affected the People's Party and relations to the hierarchy. The Catholics had to accept sharing the responsibility for the government in an atmosphere that was tense because of the emergence of new political forces and factionalism, which prevented the emergence of any dominant majority. In the elections of 1921, under Prime Minister Giolitti, the People's Party refused to enter into agreements with the liberal government party. Strengthened (with 107 deputies), it returned to the chamber and forced a compromise regarding a temporary government that was rejected by Giolitti. Pressured, on the one hand, by socialists who had in mind the model of the Russian proletarian dictatorship and, on the other hand, by Fascist combat veterans who were soon assisted by the economic and political right wing, a government crisis emerged in which Catholic solidarity broke down. The conservative faction that had allies in the hierarchy and even in the Vatican, refused to align itself with the Socialists in Parliament, instead pressing for the acceptance of the alliance offered by the Fascists and their supporters. The Fascist program had, on the one hand, antidemocratic and nationalistic features, but was, on the other hand, ill disposed toward the Freemasons and benevolent toward the institutions and personalities of the Church.

Under the new Pope, Pius XI (Ratti), who was raised in a middle class and tolerant environment, the Vatican lessened the impact of the coup d'état of October 1922, legalized by King Emmanuel III, and allowed the formation of a wing of "national" Catholics in the People's Party that favored the new political course. Leaders of this wing joined Mussolini's "national" government in 1922.

The revision of the anticlerical traditions of the Risorgimento state had been initiated by the Catholics; the Italian People's Party had continued it systematically through legislation and administrative measures. However, now it seemed as if the renovation in important areas was conducted by forces that were unrelated to the Catholic movement or actually stood in opposition to it. Thus it was Mussolini's government that had the Cross installed in schools and courtrooms, reintroduced religious instruction in elementary schools, made denominational schools equal to public schools, officially recognized the Catholic University of Sacro Cuore in Milan, increased the state subsidies for the salaries of the clergy, exempted the higher clergy from military service, increased state subsidies for ecclesiastical buildings, paid greater respect to Church dignitaries, and participated in the great religious celebrations. The new government was also willing to revise the legislation regarding the Church system according to the wishes expressed by the clergy. In view of these concessions offered to Church life in Italy, the Holy See simply consigned the People's Party to the fate of an opposition party, its purpose, in the eyes of the Vatican, having been the political defense of religious ecclesiastical interests. Its leader, Don Sturzo, was asked to resign. In his capacity as priest, he was not to give rise to misunderstandings but clearly demonstrate that the Vatican, despite the opposition of the People's Party, took a benevolent and reserved stance toward Mussolini's government.

The maintenance of religious ecclesiastical interests toward the state was assumed by the hierarchy, and the new government indicated that it preferred to deal with ecclesiastical authorities rather than the representatives of an opposition party. But the attitude of the Holy See was not without reserve. In 1924, for the benefit of Mussolini's government, the Pope reprimanded the anti-Fascist collaboration between the popolari and the Socialists that resembled the collaboration between the Center Party and the Social Democrats in the German Empire and specifically in Prussia, but distanced himself from the government by condemning the Fascist violence that was perpetrated on individuals and institutions of the Catholic Action and by voicing his objections to the new totalitarian trade-union legislation, which resulted not only in the termination of the People's Party but also in the end of the Catholic workers' movement. When Minister A. Rocco set up a commission for the reform of the law on ecclesiastical matters, to which, with the tacit agreement of the Holy See, three clergymen were to belong, the Pope personally emphasized (in an address on 18 February 1925) that no decision by this commission could be accepted as long as the Roman question was not solved, whereupon the Minister announced (May 1925) that the problem would be taken up again on "a broader basis."

This implied a confirmation of the Non expedit, i.e., of papal control over Italian politics. This resulted in a new climate for a bilateral examination of the Roman question, which was regularized eventually in the Lateran treaties of 1929. In the meantime, directly through the bishops, the Holy See intensified its influence on Catholic attitudes and institutions. Even the structure of the Catholic Action underwent a reform that on the basis of a Non expedit emanating from the other side limited the Catholic movement. But the Catholic movement continued to exist, though with somewhat abated energy, especially among the youth and the student associations which were willing to offer resistance to the harassments of the government and Fascist violence. Dissatisfaction with and accusations against the hierarchy even reached the Lateran treaties,[12] which introduced (in a certain sense) yet another phase in the Catholic movement of Italy, the phase of reconciliation (Conciliazione), which was interpreted and experienced in different ways.

---

[12] Cf. G. L. Ferrari, L'azione cattolica ed il regime, edizione postuma a cura di E. Rossi (Florence 1956), and shorter: M. Bendiscioli, La politica della S. Sede 1918–1938 (Florence 1939), 74ff. Its thirtieth anniversary served as an occasion to critically review the Conciliazione. Significant is the contribution of the Oratorian from Brescia, Cardinal G. Bevilacqua, "Trent'anni dopo i patti lateranensi," Humanitas (February 1959), 182–90.

CHAPTER 35

German Catholicism between Kulturkampf and World War I

In 1886/87, peace[1] in the matter of Church policies was restored, and until the end of the Empire it would not be seriously questioned. Bismarck's successors Caprivi (chancellor of the Reich from 1890 until 1894), Hohenlohe (1894–1900)[2] and Bülow (1900–09) successfully wooed the Center Party; Caprivi, who tried to alleviate the internal tensions that had built up under Bismarck, made concessions to Poland. In 1891, a Polish prelate, Florian von Stablewski (1841–1906),[3] who was committed to his nation, was assigned the episcopal see of Gnesen. Some of the severities of the retained sections of the Kulturkampf legislation were moderated. In 1890 the Expulsion Law was repealed and the exemption of theologians from active military duty was granted. In 1891 the Prussian dioceses were repaid the funds that had been suspended during the Kulturkampf. In 1894 the Redemptorists and the Holy Ghost Fathers, who had also been included in the Jesuit Law, were allowed to return; however, the efforts of the Center Party regarding the suspension of this exception law were only partially successful: In 1904 at least ARTICLE 2, which had permitted the internment and expulsion of individual Jesuits, was stricken.[4] In 1902 a Catholic theological faculty was established at the Imperial University of Strasbourg. It soon received papal approval. However, the resistance of the Liberals to the Elementary School Bill drafted by Minister of Cultural Affairs von Zedlitz-Trützschler (1892) in agreement with the Center and the Conservatives showed all too clearly the limits of the compromise; reverting to the most ardent Kulturkampf polemics, this opposition involved the struggle "against the obscurantist spirit" and was finally successful.

---

[1] Cf. chap. 3, pp. 70–73.

[2] Cf. chap. 1, p. 34.

[3] H. K. Rosenthal, "The Election of Archbishop Stablewski," Slavic Review 28 (1969), 265–75.

[4] Regarding the arguments about the Jesuit law continuing into the last phases of the Empire, see B. Duhr, Das Jesuitengesetz (Freiburg 1919).

In spite of this, the process of normalization was probably furthered by Wilhelm II and Pius X alike. During his thirty years in office, the Emperor stressed in his many often ill-conceived statements the Protestant character of his House and the Empire; but he also found understanding words for the Catholics and for Catholic institutions. He sincerely wished the mitigation of the denominational differences.[5] He was particularly interested in the Benedictine order and the Catholic missions, since they were also useful in terms of colonial policy.

The state's right to participate in the appointment of high Church officials, as well as the election of bishops and the nomination of voting cathedral canons during the "royal" months was still exercised,[6] but the bishops' elections that had burdened the relationship between Church and state until the Kulturkampf were not interfered with any longer.[7] The government of Wilhelm II successfully effected the elevation of Prussian bishops to cardinals,[8] and the Emperor himself had a vital interest in the improvement of the German influence in Rome, which had always been minor. His wish to have a German cardinal appointed to the curia was not fulfilled, because the Emperor's own adviser on Church policy, Cardinal Kopp, skillfully opposed this plan. Kopp had refused since the conclusion of the Kulturkampf to share his role of mediator between Rome and Berlin with anyone.

---

[5] See mainly K. Bachem, Zentrumspartei VI, 262–77, and R. Morsey, Katholiken und Nationalstaat, 40–43. Not very informative: M. Buchner, Kaiser Wilhelm II., seine Weltanschauung und die deutschen Katholiken (Leipzig 1929), and S. Merkle, Die katholische Kirche: Deutschland unter Kaiser Wilhelm II III (Berlin 1914).

[6] See mainly N. Trippen, Erzbischofswahlen in Köln, 294–463; also: A. G. Scharwath, "Eine staatliche 'Nachweisung' geeigneter Bischofs- und Domherrenkandidaten der Diözese Trier aus dem Jahre 1902," AMrhKG 20 (1968), 335–46; G. Knopp, "Kirchliche Personalpolitik im Düsseldorfer Reichspräsidium vom Ausgang des Kulturkampfes bis zum Ende der Monarchie," AHVNrh 173 (1971), 157–81; F. G. Hohmann, "Bischofswahlen in Paderborn," WZ 122 (1972), 265–82.

[7] Such interventions were initiated by the Curia, which, in the wake of the perfected centralism, tried to limit the chapter's suffrage. This prepared the initiative regarding the law of free papal appointments which the Curia had enacted following the overthrow of the Central European monarchies that had a voice in such matters. In Germany, Nuncio Pacelli participated in this offensive (N. Trippen, op. cit., 448f.).

[8] In 1893 and 1903 respectively, Kopp (Breslau) and Krementz (Cologne) were appointed. Krementz's successor Fischer and von Hartmann were appointed in 1914. In spite of efforts in Berlin, only Krementz's direct successor Hubert Simar was not elevated to cardinal during his short time in office (1899–1902); this was partly due to Leo XIII's impression that his election had been too much influenced by the government (Trippen, op. cit., 294–344).

In spite of concentrating on internal Church reforms, Pius X never neglected diplomacy, and thus he endeavored to establish good relations with the antirevolutionary Empires of Austria and Germany.[9] On several occasions he demonstratively assured Wilhelm II and Bülow, the guarantors of the existing order, of his sympathy, which survived the break of the Center Party with the Chancellor (1906). The Vatican repeatedly confused the political with the ecclesiastical sphere. This was the case when Erzberger and other Center Party deputies criticized the imperial colonial administration, causing a break (that was also provoked by Kopp), and when the Vatican reprimanded them for ingratitude toward the Chancellor, who was friendly toward the Church.[10] Supported by Kopp, Bülow entertained good relations with Rome. All in all, the example set by Bismarck in the septennate controversy continued to have an effect in Berlin: The Reich's government often tried to solicit internal political assistance from the Vatican and to preserve or increase the distance between the Curia and the growing democratic tendencies. Bülow's successor Bethmann Hollweg (after 1909) adhered to the ecclesiastical political balance. A temporary cooling off between Rome and Berlin only occurred because of the backlash that was caused in Germany by the struggle of the Curia against modernism.[11] The efforts of Pius X (less intense than those of his predecessor) regarding the establishment of a nunciature in Berlin were not successful. They failed because of the opposition of the Berlin imperial court and many influential Protestant circles; but Cardinal Kopp and the Center Party, still fearing for their independence, did not want a nuncio in Berlin either.

After the nineties, the German Catholics and their political representatives began to integrate the Church into the national state. In spite of earlier scepticism, Windthorst had made the first steps in this direction. His successor Ernst Lieber (1838–1902)[12] led the party completely out of the opposition into which it had been forced during the Kulturkampf, making it an indispensable support for the policies of Caprivi, Hohenlohe, and Bülow.[13] In pursuit of this aim Lieber disengaged himself from the governmental minority, consisting predominantly of noblemen from Silesia and supported by Cardinal Kopp, and introduced more national, but at the same time more democratic policies. In the spirit of Windthorst, Lieber's course aimed at strengthening the Reichstag and at the complete parliamentarization of the Empire, from which his party could expect the most effective increase of its influence. Moreover, there were tensions among the right wing that had already come to the fore in the trade-union controversy and resulted (after 1918, when the majority of the party had begun to favor the republic) in the migration of the Catholics of the right toward the German Nationals. Following the end of the Kulturkampf, the number of Catholics voting for the Center Party slowly and steadily decreased.[14] The essential motives for the existence of the party were no longer valid. Frequently, political and economic interests began to take precedence over the appeal for denominational solidarity.

---

[9] Schmidlin, PG, 94ff; cf. also Engel-Janosi II, 55, 149–52.

[10] Cf. Bülows Denkwürdigkeiten II (Berlin 1930), 272f.

[11] Only recently, statements by Bethmann and his adviser Kurt Riezler have been discovered that are directed against the Vatican's antimodernism, but favor the Center (K. Riezler, Tagebücher, Aufsätze, Dokumente, intr. and ed. by K. D. Erdmann [Göttingen 1972], 170–74).

[12] Biographies by M. Spahn (Gotha 1906), H. Cardauns (Wiesbaden 1927), and K. Wolf, Nassauische Lebensbilder 4 (1950); E. Deuerlein, StL^{6} V, 393f.

Peter Spahn (1846–1925), Adolf Gröber (1854–1919), and Georg von Hertling, bourgeois notables like Lieber, continued after his death the policy of "national cooperation." The role of opposition, with which the Center, after the break with Bülow, had to content itself, did not bring a change of course. This break was particularly significant because a new type of leadership emerging from the lower middle class and the workers, exemplified in Matthias Erzberger (1875–1921),[15] began to assert itself.

The Center Party did not only support the social policies of Wilhelm II because they were compatible with its old objectives. Only the Center's approval enabled the enactment of all the great "national" legislative bills, ranging from Caprivi's trade treaties, the Civil Code, and the improvement of the navy, to the imperial budget reforms under Bülow. The sanctioning of Wilhelm II's navy policy was an expression of the unconditional will to fulfill a national duty. This was an understandable reaction to the earlier charges of "hostility toward the Empire," a reaction that reflected the mood of the citizens at that time, yet was doubtful in terms of its impact.[16] Nonetheless, the Center Party on the basis of its experiences collected during the Kulturkampf continued to promote civil rights, a significant contribution to the constitutional development of Germany.[17] The Catholic association system, especially the Volksverein, also supported the democratization of society.

---

[13] Very extensive presentation: K. Bachem, Zentrumspartei VI; summary: R. Morsey, Katholiken und Nationalstaat, 48–57.

[14] J. Schauff, Die deutschen Katholiken und die Zentrumspartei (Cologne 1928).

[15] K. Epstein, Matthias Erzberger und das Dilemma der deutschen Demokratie (Berlin, Frankfurt 1962); R. Morsey, Zentrumspartei 1917–1923, passim; id., StL^{6} III, 36ff.

[16] Equally dubious parallels occurred in France and Italy. The Catholics wanted to prove their patriotism, which was questioned by the majorities in those countries where they

The Center Party managed to enter "the antechamber of power" by way of its national policy, but it did not proceed further.[18] The leadership positions in the Empire and Prussia remained inaccessible to the Catholics; and also in the other areas of state administration, they were unable to achieve participation on an equal footing.[19] Even in Bavaria it was not until 1912, after forty years of liberal regimes, that Hertling, an exponent of political Catholicism, occupied the highest position of government. Weighty remnants of Kulturkampf legislation continued to exist. It was not until 1917 that the Jesuit Law was completely suspended. The Center Party's so-called toleration proposal failed to introduce to the imperial code of law the guarantees for ecclesiastical liberty provided by the Prussian constitution that had been suspended during the Kulturkampf. Consequently it also failed in suspending the restrictions to which the Catholic Church in some predominantly Protestant federal states (e.g., Saxony, Mecklenburg, Brunswick) was still subject.[20]

The most prominent figure in the Prussian episcopate until World War I was Cardinal Kopp. It was only in the last years of his life that he was increasingly isolated, mainly because of his inflexibility in the trade-union controversy. The differences between him and the bishops of the Rhineland, a remnant of the last phase of the Kulturkampf, had been moderated. After all, the bishops had to concede that the mediation of Kopp, criticized by them, was totally compatible with Leo XIII's were in the minority or had been pushed aside by the recent political development. Therefore, they aligned themselves with the aggressive nationalism that led to World War I.—The problem as a whole needs to be researched. Important information, although treating the German development too isolatedly, is to be found in H. Lutz, Demokratie im Zwielicht, 21, 24ff., 33ff., 43–52. Cf. also the collective volume prepared by G. Rossini, Benedetto XV, i Cattolici e la prima guerra mondiale (Rome 1963), passim.

---

[17] Thus, the Center resisted the anti-Semitism invading the right wing. Cf. P. G. J. Pulzer, Die Entstehung des politischen Antisemitismus in Deutschland und Österreich 1867–1914 (Gütersloh 1966), 219–23, etc.; R. Lill, Kirche und Synagoge, ed. by K. H. Rengstorf, and S. von Kortzfleisch, II (Stuttgart 1970), 380–85.

[18] R. Morsey, Katholiken und Nationalstaat, 53–56.

[19] Cf. A. Klein, Die Personalpolitik der Hohenzollernmonarchie bei der Kölner Regierung (Düsseldorf 1967), 75–114, 125–29.

[20] K. Bachem, Zentrumspartei VI, 101–25, 225–35, 291–94. Cf. among the extensive literature of brochures: M. Erzberger, Der Toleranzantrag der Zentrumsfraktion des Reichstages (Osnabrück 1906).

intentions. Korum, Kopp's opponent in the game of Church policies at that time, was later to become Kopp's frequent ally. The integralism they had in common brought them together. Kopp's relations with Cardinals Krementz and Antonius Fischer of Cologne (1840–1912, in 1902 archbishop, 1903 cardinal)[21] remained cool, even though both sides were in agreement about most ecclesiastical matters. The archbishops of Cologne and the majority of their suffragans were largely influenced by the Center Party of the Rhineland and the Volksverein with its democratic tendencies, as far as their political and socio-political stance was concerned. They also supported the Christian trade unions that had emerged in the nineties from the Catholic workers' associations in western Germany and continued to be backed predominantly by Catholics, though they were interdenominational. The militant atheism of the free (social-democratic) trade unions had caused the formation of the new organization. They enabled the Catholic and Protestant workers efficiently to represent their professional interests while respecting their religious convictions. The workers' associations led by priests now dealt only with the spiritual care of their members. The Christian trade unions employed all means necessary for the workers' struggle, even the strike. But since they only strove for evolutionary improvements rather than revolutionary change of the existing system, they were supported by the Prussian government in many instances. Their public relations were handled by the Volksverein. This reformism of the West, often merging with the remnants of critical distance toward the Prussian state, went too far according to Kopp's opinion. He insisted on patriarchal authoritarian concepts and wanted to integrate Catholicism unconditionally into the state of Wilhelm II and its rigid backward social structure. He was assisted by those magnates whose influence on the Center Party's politics was fading. Kopp knew how to deal with the power of the Center. However, his relationship to the party leadership, from which he frequently tried to extricate the representation of ecclesiastical interests in the political arena, was always tense and grew increasingly worse after Erzberger's rise.

In Bavaria,[22] Archbishop Franz von Bettinger of Munich (1850–1917, archbishop after 1909)[23] supported the Volksverein and the Christian trade unions. That he did not become cardinal until 1914 was due to governmental doubts about his leanings. The government would have preferred the elevation of the younger, more intelligent and at the same time more conservative Bishop Michael von Faulhaber (1869–1952)[24] of Speyer, who owed his office to royal nomination. Among the bishops of southwest Germany, Paul Wilhelm Keppler (1852–1926, since 1898 bishop of Rottenburg),[25] respected by his contemporaries as a religious writer, must be mentioned. He had inaugurated a constructive biblical and homiletical renewal, but occupied a very conservative position in the controversy over Reform Catholicism. Cultural inferiority, the most crucial inheritance of the Kulturkampf, was a heavy burden for the Catholics.[26] That it grew worse for a while had two causes: The perpetuators of the predominantly Protestant or liberal national culture denied the Catholics full participation. For example, academic teaching positions were generally difficult to obtain. Moreover, most Catholics remained, often preferred to remain, in the self-sufficient isolation that they had escaped to from the onslaught of the liberal offensive. The authoritative defensive of papal doctrine that had climaxed in Pius X's struggle against modernism aggravated or hindered the new ideas of the modern world. Thus the German Catholics were initially unable to provide adequate answers to the growing self-criticism of liberalism. Instead, they retreated into a superficial adaptation of the sham culture of the Wilhelmian era. The criticism of capitalism voiced by apologists and social reformers, such as Franz Hettinger, Georg Ratzinger, and Albert M. Weiß,[27] remained defensive and espoused obsolete concepts of society. The anti-liberalism of the convert Julius Langbehn, temporarily supported by Bishop Keppler, contained, aside from the irrationalism and voluntarism which initially affected the developing youth movement, ambivalent elements that appeared in different places around the turn of the century and eventually paved the road for totalitarian ideologies.[28]

---

[21] Biography by J. Schmitz (Cologne 1915); Trippen, 358–423, etc; J. Torsy, *LThK*² IV, 155.

[22] K. Möckl, Die Prinzregentenzeit (Munich 1972), 228–344.

[23] Biography by K. von Preysing (Regensburg 1918); M. J. Hufnagel, *LThK*² II, 323.

Likewise, around the turn of the century, an active minority took up a more adequate rational confrontation with the intellectual forces of the time. The initiatives were provided by the representatives of Reform

---

[24] M. von Faulhaber was elevated to cardinal in 1921.

[25] A. Donders (Freiburg 1935); A. Hagen, Rottenburg III, 94–97, 119–29, etc; P. Bormann, *LThK*² VI, 118f; cf. above, p. 428.

[26] Two objective accounts: G. von Hertling, "Der deutsche Katholik und die Wissenschaft," Jahresbericht der Görres-Gesellschaft für das Jahr 1896 (Cologne 1897); speech of Deputy Fehrenbach at the Catholic Convention in Bonn: 47, 1900.

[27] Well-known works: F. Hettinger, Aus Welt und Kirche, 2 vols. (Freiburg ⁵1902), Apologie des Christentums, 5 vols. (Freiburg ¹⁰1914–18); G. Ratzinger, Die Volkswirtschaft in ihren sittlichen Grundlagen (Freiburg ²1895); A. M. Weiß, Apologie des Christentums, 5 vols. (Freiburg ⁴1904–08), Die religiöse Gefahr (Freiburg 1904), Liberalismus und Christentum (Trier 1914). Cf. chap. 12.

[28] Langbehn's main work, Rembrandt als Erzieher (Leipzig 1890), had several editions. Cf. O. Köhler, *LThK*² VI, 783f.

Catholicism,[29] some of whom, out of opposition to papal centralism as well as to political Catholicism, had ventured too far into nationalism. The most significant contributions were provided by Carl Muth and his friends, who initiated in Hochland, founded in 1903, the liberation of Catholic belles lettres from an apologetical and backward-looking parochialism. Their opponent in the ensuing literary controversy was Richard von Kralik, representing the traditional concepts in Gral.[30]

The controversy over Reform Catholicism and Hochland carried on throughout the last decade led to vehement disputes over the political or denominational character of the Center Party and over the permissibility of interdenominational Christian trade unions.[31] These had partially grown out of older, aforementioned differences, but were also caused by the integralism of Pius X and his disciples. The liberal-democratic "Cologne Faction" and the patriarchal-integralistic "Berlin-Breslau Faction" confronted each other in the "Center Party controversy" as well as in the "trade union controversy." Members of the first group were the West German Center Party with its paper Kölnische Volkszeitung, the Volksverein, the Christian trade unions, and the West German Catholic workers' associations. A minority was integralist, chiefly the association of Catholic workers' societies, located in Berlin, that claimed to represent their members socio-politically, but actually served the interest of the employers through its patriarchalism and by neglecting to utilize the weapons of the trade unions. Its leaders were Roeren, Bitter, and Duke Oppersdorff (deputies of the Center who later left the party) and von Savigny. The integralists were supported by Cardinal Kopp and Bishop Korum. Through Kopp, as well as through the international organization of Prelate Benigni,[32] they had contact with the Vatican, whose full approval they enjoyed.

The papal historian Ludwig von Pastor, an integralist on friendly terms with Pius X and living in Rome at that time, interpreted the interdependence between the various controversies with the following words: "The controversy between Kralik and Muth dealt with the same question that was the object of the controversy between the disciples and opponents of the Kölnische Volkszeitung. Some, and I am one of them, look for salvation in a courageous and frank confession of the Catholic point of view; the others, and Muth belongs to them, want to adapt to the opponent by acquiescing to the utmost. . . ."[33] The implication contained therein is typical of the integralists who thoughtlessly doubted the loyalty to the Church of people who disagreed with them. The leaders of the integralists, especially Benigni and his assistants, were known to have spied on their internal ecclesiastical opponents and to have accused them of heresy. Theological modernism, which developed primarily in France, Italy and England, was condemned in 1907. After this date, they turned their full attention to German developments. The procedures of the Cologne faction were considered just as dangerous as the theological innovations that had not gone quite as far. As a matter of fact, the Center majority pursued the declericalization of public life feared by the integralists, and the objective separation of the spiritual and the temporal. Pius X considered this a serious danger. He insisted that all organizations sustained by Catholics should remain in direct dependence on the hierarchy.

---

[29] Cf. chaps. 29 and 15.

[30] Literature controversy: A. W. Hüffer, Carl Muth als Literaturkritiker (Münster 1959); F. J. Schöningh, StL^{6} IV, 112ff. Cf. also the contributions by F. Fuchs, J. Nadler, M. Ettlinger, P. Funk, and F. Herwig, Wiederbegegnung von Kirche und Kultur in Deutschland, Festgabe für Carl Muth (Munich 1927), esp. 38–56, 61–75f., 86–110, 375ff.

[31] Center and trade union controversies most extensively described in K. Bachem, Zentrumspartei VII, 156–325. See also Schmidlin, PG III, 98–104, 158f., 164ff.; E. Deuerlein, ThQ 139 (1959), 40–81; id., StL^{6} III, 943–46; E. Ritter, Katholisch-soziale Bewegung, 313–51; R. Morsey, Zentrumspartei 1917–1923, 33–41; É. Poulat, Intégrisme, 198ff., 234–44, etc.; O. Schröder, Aufbruch und Mißverständnis, 353–68.

[32] Cf. chaps. 33, 490.

When the Center Party was founded, the leadership and the majority insisted that it be a political party, claiming and obtaining independence from the ecclesiastical authority in political matters.[34] But after Lieber's death, an integralist minority again voiced the demand, favored by the new course Pius X had taken, for more consideration of Catholicism in regard to party policy. In order to counteract this, Julius Bachem (1845–1918), after 1869 editor-in-chief of the Kölnische Volkszeitung, in 1906 wrote the famous essay "Wir müssen aus dem Turm heraus," published in the Historisch-Politische Blätter. This caused a dispute. Bachem warned against unrealistic conceptions of the Christian state and against abuse of the denominational principle. He demanded political and socio-political cooperation between Catholics and Protestants and the expansion of the party toward an interdenominational Christian people's party. His proposal, based on Windthorst and the tradition of the Center Party and projecting the ideas of Stegerwald and Brüning, became the program of the Cologne Faction. Its forerunners, among them many clergymen, were of the opinion that the Church was to interpret the general norms of morality, but that their actual application to politics and socio-politics was a matter to be dealt with by Catholics versed in these areas. The main paper of the "Cologne Faction," the Kölnische Volkszeitung, was supported by most publications of the Center Party, by the Historisch-Politische Blätter and Hochland.

---

[33] L. von Pastor, Tagebücher, Briefe, Erinnerungen, ed. by W. Wühr (Heidelberg 1950), 508.

[34] Cf. chap. 1, p. 30; chap. 3, pp. 59f., 71f., 74.

The integralists accused the Cologne Faction of curbing papal authority, of wanting to deprive public life of ecclesiastical influence, and of threatening the integrity of Catholic Germany. Some, especially in the Benigni circle, went further. They took up Counter-Reformation slogans, maintaining that the Cologne group was propagating a national Catholicism that would lead to Protestantism. Pastor believed that the Cologne Faction was based on "Gallicanism."[35] Cardinal Kopp, encouraging and supporting the integralist offensive with the increasing stubborness of old age, spoke of the "infestation of the West,"[36] claiming "that Hochland was de-Catholicizing the educated classes, while the Volksverein was accomplishing the same within the lower classes through its support of the trade unions."[37] All in all, the Volksverein and the Christian trade unions were rejected most vehemently because they dealt with tasks the Church was claiming without, however, paying attention to the hierarchy. The trade unions were repudiated because they were interdenominational and used strikes, a weapon that was revolutionary in conservative eyes. The outcome of the dispute would have been clear had it been carried on in Germany only. The great majority of the politically active Catholics, especially in the west and south of Germany, rejected integralism. Bishops Kopp and Korum were unable to persuade their colleagues. Cardinal Fischer protected the Volksverein. Furthermore, in 1910, he effected the resolution of the Bishops' Conference in Fulda, permitting membership in trade unions, provided they did not violate Christian morality and would not meddle with religious matters.

But the integralists refused to recognize these limitations. It was to the advantage of the Church's opponents, who profited from the controversy. The integralists clung to the dispute and carried it to the Curia, involving it for the last time in an internal German ideological struggle. In Rome, the mood was different from Fulda. Pius X and Merry del Val disapproved of the Cologne Faction. They disapproved of the Kölnische Volkszeitung because it had contradicted the Curia in the controversy involving Ehrhard and Schell. In a sensational speech at the Catholic Convention in Essen in 1906, Cardinal Serafino Vannutelli had declared that those who obeyed the Pope had to obey him in all matters. However, numerous protests had compelled the Vatican to correct this statement. A papal brief addressed to Cardinal Fischer confirmed the freedom of the German Catholics in nonreligious matters. However, Pastor, following a papal audience in 1907, remarked: "I noticed clearly that the Pope did not approve of the German Center Party's request for absolute independence from any kind of ecclesiastical authority. Indeed, such political independence is too easily transferred to the ecclesiastical realm."[38] Five years later, at the peak of the trade-union controversy, Pius X, in a conversation with Pastor, reiterated "that he absolutely refused the efforts of Julius Bachem and his disciples. He said openly that his reprimand was not directed against the many loyal Catholics of Germany but only against those who followed the Kölnische Volkszeitung. It was not their opponents who were disturbing the unity of the Catholics, but rather this very paper." Merry del Val went even further, including in his criticism Cardinal Fischer and the majority of the German bishops, as well as Nuncio Frühwirth of Munich, who was said to lean too far toward the Cologne faction.[39] Frühwirth, the general of the Dominican Order until 1904, was quite antimodernistic. However, in Munich after 1907, he had become convinced that the belligerent manner in which the integralists conducted themselves in the controversies concerning literature, the Center Party, and the trade unions was not justified.[40] The Pope and his chief political adviser were not willing or able to examine critically the great amount of information that was forwarded. They believed only what they wanted to believe. Nonetheless, the Pope directly intervened in the Center controversy only once, in 1914, when the Cologne faction had essentially established itself. Derived from a lecture, the essay by the leader of the Center in Baden, Pastor Theodor Wacker (1845–1921),[41] and entitled "Zentrum und kirchliche Autorität," was put on the Index because its emphasis on the independence of the party could be misunderstood. The disproportional severity of this measure suggests that the men around the Pope had indeed waited for an excuse to act. In other respects, the Pope had to exercise restraint; on the one hand, because the political independence of the Center Party had been recognized by his predecessor and confirmed, after all, by himself after Vannutelli's speech; on the other hand, because the party acted with caution in regard to Rome, taking the initiative in ecclesiastical matters only after consulting with the bishops.

---

[35] Pastor, 549.

[36] Concerning Kopp's role in the trade union controversy, see R. Morsey, Kopp, 54ff. Cf. also C. Weber, ArSKG 26 (1968), 327–34.

[37] Pastor, 513.

Nonetheless, Pius X's course severely burdened the Church policies of the Center Party. For instance, the Vatican's intransigence in regard to the modernist controversy hampered the support of the toleration proposal. In particular, the party had to cushion the various vehement parliamentary debates that had been caused by the Borromeo encyclical and the antimodernist oath. The encyclical Editae saepe (29 May 1910),[42] issued on the occasion of the three hundredth anniversary of Borromeo's canonization, honored Saint Charles Borromeo as a model of a true reformer, as opposed to the false reformers such as the modernists and the men of the Reformation of the sixteenth century, against whom Borromeo had fought. The latter were charged in the encyclical with revolt against ecclesiastical authority and blind obedience to the sovereign. Quoting the Epistle to the Philippians, they were called "enemies of the cross of Christ . . . , whose mind is looking for things temporal . . . whose God is the stomach." This metaphor, taken from the vocabulary of the religious struggles of the sixteenth century and congealed into a cliché in the Curia, incurred the outrage not only of the German Protestants. The efforts toward interdenominational cooperation suffered a severe setback. Following protests of the governments of Prussia, Bavaria, and Saxony, and upon the recommendation of the German bishops, the Curia finally did not insist on the official publication of the encyclical in Germany. The Pope himself felt obliged to appease Germany: in several pronouncements he assured Germany and the German sovereigns of his respect. Through his secretary of state he explained that the Curia had not intended to insult the German nation. With respect to the antimodernist oath, a compromise was necessary also. This was almost as injurious to the reputation of the Curia as the previously employed sternness, and it could have been avoided had the situation been assessed more realistically. Following similarly vehement discussions, the theological faculties of the state universities were exempt from the oath. Even Kopp had supported this compromise, because otherwise the continuation of the faculties would have been seriously threatened.

---

[38] Pastor, 474.

[39] Pastor, 542, 544f.

[40] A. Walz, Andreas Kardinal Frühwirth (Vienna 1950), 328–47.

[41] Biography by J. Schofer (Karlsruhe 1921); H. Sacher, *LThK*² X, 906.

For the integralist efforts toward Roman intervention, the trade-union controversy, with its moral-theological implications, was more appropriate than the essentially political Center Party controversy. At that time, the Vatican was not sufficiently familiar with the problems of a modern economy. Following a trip to Rome, Cardinal Fischer believed it possible to announce in a pastoral letter the Vatican's neutrality in the controversy of the two German factions, but a papal pronouncement of May 1912 clearly sided with the Berlin group rather than the Cologne one. With insufficiently deliberated arguments the Pope reasoned that religion must penetrate the whole individual and therefore his economic enterprises as well. Cardinal Kopp and his allies almost obtained a formal papal condemnation of the Christian trade unions then struggling for a Christian as well as a democratic solution to the labor problem, offering at that time the only effective alternative to the antiecclesiastical workers' associations. At the last minute, Cardinal Fischer and his close ally, the Franciscan Bishop Bernard Döbbing, an adviser to the Pope, were able to reach a limited compromise.

---

[42] AAS 2 (1910), 357–80. Cf. Bachem VII, 330–75.

The encyclical Singulari quadam (24 September 1912),[43] concluding the controversy, began with a warning against the "undefined interdenominationalism" (that was not even espoused by the trade unions) and continued with the reiteration of the reminder, uncalled for in this context, of the principle, not even questioned by the German Catholics, that the social problems could not be solved without recourse to religion and moral law. The Pope unconditionally praised the ecclesiastical workers' associations, supporting their monopoly in Catholic countries. However, subsequently he conceded that in other countries Catholics were allowed to cooperate with non-Catholics in order carefully to elevate the working class (cautione adhibita) and that, in the exceptional case of Germany, interdenominational trade unions could be tolerated. He made the membership of Catholic workers dependent on their simultaneous membership in the Catholic workers' associations and on the proviso that trade unions would not interfere with the doctrine of the Church. The first of these conditions unnecessarily burdened the workers, the second one ignored the goals of the trade unions. At least, they were now able to continue with their activities. They had no difficulties adhering to the conditions of the Singulari quadam and to prevent further conflicts with Rome. In spite of the Vatican's sympathies for the integralists, the trade-union controversy helped the progressive faction in German Catholicism achieve partial success. But the distrustful tolerari potest of the Pope encouraged the integralists to continue to discredit the trade unions, thus causing more unrest. Shortly before his death (4 March 1914), Cardinal Kopp himself rejected a conciliatory interpretation of the encyclical. In 1913, the trade unions already had to defend themselves against assaults by the opposition in a sensational trial that was played up by the antiecclesiastical press.

Cardinal Fischer died on 30 July 1912. Thus he was unable to witness the results of the action initiated by him. Due to the Curia's drastic interference with the suffrage rights of the cathedral chapter of Cologne, he was succeeded by Bishop Felix on Hartmann (1851–1919, after 1911 Bishop of Münster),[44] who was close to the integralist, as well as to the national-conservative course of Cardinal Kopp, but who did not possess his leadership qualities. But even in this manner, full success could not be achieved: Hartmann tried hard to contribute to the preservation of the existing political and social structure, thus apparently establishing a good relationship with Wilhelm II. However, he had to pay attention to the realities of his new diocese and to be content with the activity of the Christian trade unions and the Volksverein.[45]

---

[43] AAS 4 (1912), 657–62. Regarding the history of the encyclical, see L. Hardick, "Bischop Bernhard Döbbing," WZ 109 (1959), 143–95, esp. 169ff.

[44] Trippen, op. cit., 448–63.

---

[45] Regarding the development on the whole, see W. Spael, Das katholische Deutschland . . . 1890–1945 (Würzburg 1964).

CHAPTER 36

Separation of Church and State in France

Voting on the Separation Law (1899–1905)

The emotions aroused by the Dreyfus affair had played a significant role in the failure of reconciliation. Likewise, the separation of Church and state in France was the result of a series of circumstances that gradually deteriorated the relations between the two powers. Basically, neither Pierre Waldeck-Rousseau nor Émile Combes, his successor to the ministerial office in 1902, intended a separation. However, they were led on this path by their personal decisions as well as by political measures demanded by the majority and the compelling force of circumstances. Certainly, many had long regarded the annulment of the concordat a natural consequence of the development, especially after the fateful outcome of the Ralliement. However, the internal and external reasons for avoiding the schism were just as strong during the time of the Republic as they had been twenty years before, even though the regime had meanwhile found stronger support among the Catholic voters. When Pius X categorically refused to recognize the law of 2 December 1905, a law introducing into France the "most radical separation system imaginable," the republican government was willing to make a few concessions in order to limit the effects of the law and to avoid at any cost the danger of a religious conflict.

An investigation must first deal with a series of legislative measures whose severe amendments resulted in the separation laws. The "logic of the laws" must not conceal the deep emotions with which these measures were enacted and applied. The ministries stood under the supervision of the majority in the parliament that was ready to strike as soon as the question of congregation and Church was raised. The elections of April 1902, which concerned this topic, resulted in a majority of 339 deputies who belonged to the "bloc" (composed of the Democratic Union, Socialists, Radicals, and Radical Socialists). The strong core of this "bloc" (200 deputies) was comprised of the representatives of the bourgeoisie of those medium-sized and small cities that were radically anticlerical. One of their loyal representatives was Émile Combes. Formerly a seminarian, he had left Catholicism and turned to medicine and propaganda for the Radicals. This brought him a senatorial seat in his department of Charente-Inférieure. The usual fanaticism of both parties, raked by the press with relentless personal assaults and caricatures, was not without influence on the attitude of the politicians. Preceeding the separation, the expulsion of about twenty thousand members of religious orders between 1903 and 1904 nourished radicalism on both sides. The population frequently supported the resistance of the order members. The demonstrations often ended in bloodshed (in Nantes in 1903, two people died, in Lyon on 8 December of the same year, one person was killed).

In November 1899 Waldeck-Rousseau proposed his bill on the religious congregations. He did not intend it as an aggressive interpretation of the policy of the défense républicaine. He had long desired to remedy the lack of any kind of regulation regarding the freedom of association in French law. His aim was to eliminate a new coalition, favored by legal uncertainty, between the nonauthorized congregations and an antirepublican social elite. He was intent on precluding the kind of threat to which the republicans had been exposed on 16 May 1877 and during the appeal of the Dreyfus trial. Moreover, as a statist jurist, he wanted to bring the various forms of ecclesiastical life under the control of the state. This was the background for the measures against the Assumptionists, the prohibition of bishops appointing members of orders to teaching posts and seminaries, and, finally, for the investigation of the property of congregations which he had ordered to be registered in the fall of 1900. In Toulouse, on 20 October, he reiterated the theme of Gambetta, that is, the statement on the clandestine social influence of the congregations on education and the upper echelons of government.

The bill proposed by Waldeck-Rousseau on associations required religious congregations to obtain a license from the government, but at the same time it opened up possibilities for numerous agreements. However, supported by a delegation of groups from the left, the commissions of both chambers gave the bill an expressly anticlerical character. From then on, the admission of congregations which, according to ARTICLE 14, were prohibited from playing an educational role required legal authorization. Strict control of their properties and forced liquidation in case of nonadmission were suggested. The law of 1 July 1901 was, in terms of its spirit, far different from the draft of Waldeck-

Rousseau. The religious associations were excluded from the freedom generously granted to others. This was "the beginning of the struggle." After the autumn, several congregations had dissolved themselves voluntarily, but 700 foundations of female congregations and about 150 male congregations had applied for their authorization. After the enactment of the law, the minister proved to be indulgent and obliging, after Théophile Delcassé had left him in no doubt that for reasons of foreign policy the French did not want a break with the Holy See.

The situation was different in the case of Delcassé's successor, Émile Combes (after 1902). Waldeck-Rousseau was quick to make clear that he did not want the religious struggle launched by Combes. On 27 June 1903, before the Senate, he declared his opposition to Combes's absolutely rigid and uncompromising policy of execution.[1] From all officials Combes demanded, in his words, "strict republican discipline." Contrary to the promises of his predecessor, he declared in June/July 1902 that all schools opened within the period of one year by congregations, even though licensed, were in violation of the law. All schools of nonauthorized congregations were, without exception, affected by this verdict. In the following months almost 12,000 schools were closed, resulting in spontaneous protests especially in Brittany. This total laicization was crowned by the law of 7 July 1904, which denied all members of orders the freedom to teach. Again, 2,500 schools, among them the popular ones of the Frères des Écoles chrétiennes, had to be closed. In regard to the congregations, the Chamber approved a government proposal which provided for the denial of all licenses, with the exception of five missionary congregations. The dissolution of congregations was planned for Easter 1903. Some congregations preferred to voluntarily dissolve themselves. However, many others exercised passive resistance in order to draw attention to the coercion concealed behind these measures. Often, the religious who decided to emigrate were cheered by demonstrations of sympathy by the local inhabitants, as was the case on 29 April 1903 with the monks of the Grande-Chartreuse near Grenoble. The government had overestimated the value of the monastery's properties and the treasury made little profit from them.

The vehement protests of the episcopate against all these measures compelled the government to attack the hierarchy. In the summer of 1902, after almost all seventy-four bishops had signed a petition for the purpose of defending the congregations and protesting the interpretation of the law regarding cooperatives, the officials resorted to the regulation that prohibited the bishops from joining together and presenting requests as a legal body. They turned all signatures en bloc over to the council of state which was applying the old and senseless procedure of the appel comme d'abus against the bishops. The income of the three initiators of the petition, the bishops of Seéz, Besançon and Nice, was canceled. Even the conciliatory bishop of Orléans, Monsignor Touchet, was included in this sanction. During the last months of Leo XIII's pontificate, the standing conflict over the the government's right to nominate bishops for elections also flared up again.[2] The rigid attitude of the aging Pope in this matter was symptomatic of his situation. Pius X, on the other hand, clearly meant to prove his desire for peace when he accepted the rule that officially sanctioned the nomination by the government. Nonetheless, in June 1904 Rome did not hesitate to summon the two bishops of Dijon and Laval who were charged by their subjects with excessive indulgence toward the state authorities and experienced difficulties in their relations with the clergy and the administration of their diocese. The government forbade the two prelates to travel to Rome.[3] These "summons" were issued a few weeks after a serious diplomatic incident had occurred on the occasion of Émile Loubet's (president of the Republic) visit to Rome. For the first time in the course of improving relations with Italy, the government had agreed to this official visit to the Quirinal, disregarding the advice Cardinal Rampolla had offered in the last months of the previous pontificate and giving no consideration to the Vatican. The sharp protest of the Vatican was published by Jean-Léon Jaurès. The fact that this document questioned the presence of the nuncio in Paris was considered a challenging threat by the left. With a majority of 427 votes, the Chamber resolved to recall the French ambassador to the Holy See. This was the prologue to the break in diplomatic relations following the citation of the two bishops of Dijon and Laval to Rome on 30 July.

---

[1] A. Latreille, R. Rémond, Histoire du catholicisme en France III (Paris 1962), 499.

Combes's ministry came to an end on 14 January 1905 when the Socialists refused to endorse the anticlericalism of the Radicals. Combes's bill of 10 November to separate Church and state was replaced by a new, more liberal one under his successor J.-B. Bienvenu-Martin. During the debate extending from March into the summer, Aristide Briand, reporting for the commission, pleaded for the absolute neutrality of the state in religious matters in order that the Church "be completely at liberty to organize itself, live, and develop in accordance with its rules." Things changed at the end of April when a large majority voted in favor of ARTICLE 4 (formulated by Jaurès, the leader of the Socialists). According to the article, religious communities were to follow the general organizational structure of their religion after they had announced their intention to adhere to its rules. This article reflected the lesson learned from the failure of the religious policies of the French Revolution. It precluded any attempt to form a state church that would have challenged the established churches. Instead, it amounted to a spiritualistic interpretation of the revolutionary tradition.[4]

---

[2] R. P. Lecanuet, L'Église de France sous la troisième République III (Paris 1930), 364–87.

[3] M. Denis, L'Église et la République en Mayenne, 1896–1906 (Paris 1967), 155ff.

The entire legislative package, approved by the Chamber on 3 July (with a vote of 341 to 233) and by the Senate on 6 December, was not applied until a year later. The law perpetuated the spirit of the legislation of the revolution: neutrality and complete continence on the side of the state in religious matters, including salaries and subsidies. The buildings were declared property of the state or the community. Partially, they were given to the communities to practice their religion, but in the case of conflict, the council of the state, whose hostile attitude was well known, had the right to make a decision.

Execution of the Separation Law (1906–24)

The majority of Catholics considered this law a predatory incursion devised by the state. They had reason to assume that this law created the basis for the destruction of religion and its social impact. Nonetheless, at the end of the nineteenth century, certain groups within Catholicism were still willing to establish contact with the democratic society. They were agreeable to cooperation with the liberal efforts of certain advocates of the law, hoping to achieve with their help a tolerant execution of the law.

Jaurès himself, whose role in the preparation of the law was described above, relied on the support of certain groups of the clergy, ". . . without having to go as far as Loisy . . . . with François Lenormant, the great Christian and scholar, or with Monsignor d'Hulst, or even with Abbé Duchesne, or with the Institutes of Toulouse and Paris, which tried, not without risks, to utilize some of the results of modern criticism for the benefit of traditional exegesis. If only some priests, enthusiastic democrats with liberal spirits, were to stand up and be supported by their religious communities. . . ."[5]

Around 1900, Marc Sangnier, a young engineer from the Parisian middle class, founded a study group that courageously appeared in public with discussion groups, congresses, as well as a project designed to educate the people. The group intended through spiritual indoctrination to prepare the faithful to practice personal responsibility in a democracy. In 1905, the Sillon movement had five strong regional groups outside of Paris: in the north, the east, in Limousin, Aquitaine, and Brittany. This movement, whose efforts included sound spiritual and intellectual education as well as social activities, gained some support among the lower and middle classes of the cities and in the rural areas of the east and Brittany. Since 1904, in the region of Lyon, the Chronique du Sud-Est had supplied the staff of the Semaine sociale, a sort of traveling university which conducted annual seminars on topical or fundamental issues. At that time, the Chronique included two hundred groups scattered throughout the Rhône Valley. In 1904, the Jesuit Fr. Leroy founded another movement in Rheims, whose purpose was to disseminate information and be active among the workers. Its Action populaire as well as the Semaines sociales exist to this day. The Catholic Action of the French youth also undertook a program of social and trade-union related activities.[6] This social involvement was enhanced by lively intellectual activities. When preparing the law, Jaurès had especially the centers of Paris and Toulouse in mind; but the École de Lyon that evolved around the new journal Demain (1905/07) should be included. The vitality of this group turned again to biblical (Lagrange), historical (Duchesne), and philosophical (Blondel and Laberthonnière) studies.[7] After the elections of 1902, the Action libérale, founded in 1901 by Albert de Mun and Jaques Piou, held its ground in the field of politics. The Action libérale populaire gained many supporters in the north and in Isère.[8]

---

[4] Regarding ARTICLE 4 and its comments, especially the comment of Jaurès of 20 April 1905, cf. J.-M. Mayeur, La séparation de l'Église et de l'État (Paris 1966), 61–76.

[5] J.-M. Mayeur, op. cit., 70.

These movements were forced to take a somewhat reserved stance toward the separation law. This restraint, in view of the conditions to which the Catholics were subjected, was also exercised by the best known representatives of these movements: M. Sangnier and (in the Chamber) Abbé J. Lemire. The Catholic press intensified its aggressiveness and, within the right wing, the Action française separated from Sillon at that time. The leading ranks had no difficulties convincing the rural population that the Republic was persecuting religion itself. This idea was also propagated by the majority of the clergy. Among the bishops, however, many shied away from a situation which entailed a complete break with the official authorities and, after the elections of 1906, many of them searched for a modus vivendi. The opposite opinion, rejecting any kind of concession to the political situation at hand and having come to terms with the predicted separation, was extolled by those prelates who referred to "liberal" traditions (François Turinaz, bishop of Nancy) as well as those who had taken an intransigent attitude (Anatole de Cabrières, bishop of Montpellier). Their number increased by the new bishops who were exclusively appointed and installed by the Pope, especially those seventeen bishops whom Pius X had appointed at the same time in 1906. In 1906 the antimodernist condemnations increased in Rome. They foreshadowed the encyclical Pascendi and the letter of 25 August 1910 in which the Pope asked M. Sangnier to dissolve the Sillon movement. The bishops lobbied for this intransigence because they were alarmed by the infiltration of modernist tendencies, which found disciples among the seminarians and the younger clergy. In view of these conditions, the forces of resistance from the leading ranks of the French Catholics down to the common people had a great deal of significance. However, restraint had to be practiced in this regard, because the elections of May 1906 assured the return and even an increase of the majority of the "bloc." These elections focused not on the religious question but rather on the social problem which remained in the forefront until 1914.

---

[6] J. Caron, Le Sillon et la démocratie chrétienne (Paris 1967); P. Droulers, Politique sociale et christianisme: Le P. Desbuquois et l'Action populaire (Paris 1969); C. Molette, L'association catholique de la jeunesse française (Paris 1968).

[7] Cf. in vol. IV of R.P. Lecanuet, L'Église de France sous la troisième République (Paris 1930), the chapters that were edited by P. Laberthonnière himself.

[8] J.-M. Mayeur, Un prêtre démocrate, l'abbé Lemire . . . (Paris 1968), 300; P. Barral, Le département de l'Isère sous la III^e^ République (Paris 1962), 341.

The execution of the separation law was dependent on the Roman directives. Its enactment was almost immediately followed by its condemnation through the encyclical Vehementer nos of 2 February 1906, but this did not preclude the possibility of searching for a solution which would insure the religious life of the Church. Such attempts, however, could not imply the recognition of a law prepared without the Holy See. Rome was suspicious of everything that could be taken as acceptance of a precedent and thus influence the concordat situation of the Church in other countries. On the other hand, the government, when preparing the execution of the law, had taken a rather inept and insulting measure. It ordered the churches to take an inventory of all their properties, which were to become that of the state. In March 1906, after a smooth start, these inventory practices caused grave incidents in Paris, Marseille, and especially in the rural areas. The incidents were recorded by J. M. Mayeur.[9] They took place, above all, in areas with strong religious practices (in the lowlands of the west and in the south of the Massif Central, in the Jura, and in French Flanders). In the north and in the Haute-Loire two people died as a result of the unrest. This incipient revolt in the Christian rural areas compelled the government to back down and the inventory activities were discontinued. These incidents were related to the second condemnation of the law through the encyclical Gravissimo officio of 10 August 1906. Under these conditions, the negotiations over the wording of a law that was impossible from a legal point of view were extremely difficult. This was the reason for convening three consecutive episcopal conferences in May and September 1906 and in February 1907. None of the conferences could come to an agreement about the kind of diocesan associations that had been attempted in some dioceses, for instance in Bordeaux. After the law had been enacted, both parties rejected the alternative of "usufruct," which considered the Catholics in their churches users without legal title. When they refused to obtain the official permission required for public gatherings, this offense was ridiculed as a "Mass delict."[10]

[9] J.-M. Mayeur, La séparation . . . , 199.

The total refusal to cooperate forced the legislators to interpret the law moderately, unless they desired to worsen their already questionable position. The communities were required to let the faithful use the cult buildings free of charge. State council and courts referred to ARTICLE 4, assuring the right of the bishops to stop encroachments of schismatic religious communities that had formed in Toulouse, Lyon, and in the west around some pastors who were rebelling against the diocesan authorities. Thus, when executing the law, the administration even functioned as an "executive organ of the episcopal jurisdiction" (Axel von Campenhausen). The Roman intransigence not only forced it to practice a liberal course, but caused a strengthening of the authority of the hierarchy over the lower clergy, of the clergy over the faithful, and, one could add, of Roman authority over the Church of France.[11]

Nonetheless, the overall balance of the first years was very disquieting to the Church. The confiscation of buildings and the lodgement of bishops and parish priests at their own expense in other buildings entailed material losses and great administrative disorder. The cancellation of stipends and salaries especially caused a rapid decrease of clerical appointments, because the seminarians, mostly of humble background, were unable to cover the cost of their education. The seminaries' student body was reduced by half, and even in areas with traditionally numerous clerical candidates (Rodez, Saint-Brieuc) a decline was felt. The spontaneously developing organizations for clerical appointments, seminary associations and associations of priests were indications of the seriousness of a situation that could not really be improved through such measures. Before the outbreak of World War I, the school conflict flared up again and was intensified by the attitude of the nationalists, who were willing to make the interests of the Church their own business.

---

[10] L.-V. Méjan, La Séparation des Églises et de l'État (Paris 1959), 249–415.

[11] A. v. Campenhausen, Staat und Kirche in Frankreich (Göttingen 1962). See also J.-M. Larkin, "The Vatican, French Catholics and the Associations Cultuelles," The Journal of Modern History 36 (Sept. 1964), 298–317.

In spite of this difficult situation, which was intensified until 1914 by the antimodernist criticism of the renewal efforts, the French Catholics found ways and means to respond to the severe challenges they were facing. The statement that the disestablishment of the Church of the concord, radically changed the Church's behavior within French society is justified.[12] In this respect, it is significant that the initiatives in the nineties to strengthen the social impact of Christianity increased. They were supported by prelates such as Léon Amette (Paris), Pierre Coullié (Lyon), and Pierre Dadolle (Dijon). The societies that considered it their duty to waken the Catholics' interests in social affairs and to educate them accordingly, increased their activities. Especially prominent were the Action populaire, headed by P. Desbuquois, the Semaines sociales, whose activities attracted a large audience, and the social secretariats existing in Paris and the provinces after 1908. The Action Catholique de la Jeunesse française was asked to delegate apostolic responsibility to its lay members (Pius X's letter to J. Lerolle of 22 February 1907).[13] Finally, most scholars, unperturbed by the ecclesiastical censures during the modernist crisis, insisted on bearing witness to the truth of the Catholic Church. This is documented by the Annales de philosophie chrétienne (until 1913) and the Bulletin de la semaine, replacing the journal La quinzaine.[14] Characteristic for these prewar years is the revival of religious interest within the intellectual circles, mainly among the youth and even at the universities, as was documented by Joseph Lotte, a friend of Péguy. Finally, the war slowly brought the various social groups closer together again. Comradeship in the trenches, where believers and nonbelievers, priests and laymen fought side by side, contributed substantially to the alleviation of anticlerical prejudices. In 1919, the population of Alsace-Lorraine was not forced to accept the separation law, in order to spare religious feelings. There, priests and pastors continued to receive their salaries from the state, and religious instruction was offered in public schools. This exception, motivated by political expediency, contributed to normalizing the relations between Church and state. It was also significant that during the enforcement of the separation law French schools in foreign countries, especially in the Near East, continued to enjoy the support of the French state.

---

[12] J.-M. Mayeur, La séparation . . . , 193.

[13] C. Molette, op. cit., 518–20.

[14] Not to be confused with Les Cahiers de la quinzaine, which were joined by authors who had returned to the faith under the influence of Charles Péguy.

The contacts between Paris and the Vatican were officially resumed in 1915, especially after the mediation of the superior of Saint Louis des Françąis. After Clemenceau had resigned from the political scene, Briand restored diplomatic relations. The new nuncio, B. Cerretti, was solemnly received in Paris in May 1912. At the same time, a deputy of the leftist Center, Célestin Jonnart, was appointed ambassador to the Vatican. Jonnart declared that the government intended "to let the moral forces dominating the world compete to restore peace," without infringing upon the republican laws (Le Radical of 29 May 1921). The Holy See granted the French government the right to examine the credentials of episcopal nominees. Finally, in November 1922, exhaustive negotiations began, dealing with the plan to replace the religious associations of parishes that had fallen under the influence of laymen with diocesan associations that were to be subject to episcopal jurisdiction. Thanks to the very active preparations of the texts by Louis Canet, adviser for religious affairs at the Quai d'Orsay, and to the subsequent memoranda of the bishops of Nice (Henri Chapon) and Arras (André Julien), the resistance of the majority of the French episcopate and the restraint of the Holy See could be overcome. At the beginning of his pontificate, Pius XI was persuaded to relinquish guarantees in the form of legislation so that the plan would not fail in the wake of reviving anticlericalism. The diocesan associations were finally constituted through administrative channels. They were headed by the bishop and entitled to administer Church property as well as to accept donations and bequests. On 18 January 1924 the Pope gave his approval by issuing the encyclical Maximam gravissimamque, which was endorsed through a letter of 6 February 1924 by the French bishops.[15]

This resumption of relations and this modus vivendi did not mean that anticlerical tendencies had died down. This was demonstrated by the election campaign in the spring of 1925 and by the ensuing policies of the Cartel des Gauches (É. Herriot). But this was to be the "last crisis of the Third Republic that was receptive to the revival of the spirit of 1904" (André Latreille). The agreement reached during the postwar era reflected the spiritual development within the Church, which concerned itself with social activities that were more and more divorced from political goals, as well as among the Republicans, who subscribed more and more to a laicism of action rather than belligerent anticlericalism. This marked the establishment of a regime which was entrusted with the relations between the two powers in France in the course of the twentieth century.

---

[15] G. Lesage, Aspects des rapports entre l'Église et l'État en France, de 1919 à 1924 à travers l'action de Mgr. Julien, évêque d'Arras (Lille 1970); B. Neveu, "Louis Canet, et le service du conseiller technique pour les affaires religieuses au ministère des Affaires étrangères," Revue d'histoire diplomatique (April–June 1968), 134–80. Regarding all these questions, cf. the thorough study of H.-W. Paul, The Second Ralliement: the Rapprochement between Church and State in France in the Twentieth Century (Washington 1967).

CHAPTER 37

The Outbreak of World War I

At the level of international relations, Pius X's pontificate coincided with the "time of crisis" (Duroselle). In 1903, King Alexander of Serbia was assassinated by a group of anti-Austrian officers who tried to make their country the center of Yugoslavian nationalism. From 1905 until 1914 there were five increasingly severe crises: the Franco-German crisis following the Tangier demonstrations of Wilhelm II in 1905, the Austro-Russian crisis following the annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina in 1908, the Agadir crisis in 1911, the Balkan Wars of 1912–1913, which increased Serbia's prestige, and finally the crisis of July 1914 that caused World War I. Even though there was new hope every time that war was successfully circumvented, the approach of a catastrophe could be felt, the approach of a war that would be much more devastating than earlier ones, due to progress in armament and the general introduction of conscription. In the last years of his life, Pius X spoke more and more about the imminent catastrophe.

In view of the increase in nationalism and imperialism and the increasing threat of an expanding conflict, the reaction of Catholic groups appears disappointing in retrospect. In the course of the two years before the war of 1914–1918, ecclesiastical groups as well as the faithful themselves joined more and more openly in the glorification of national feeling. This chauvinism and the general resignation explain the enthusiasm with which the Catholics from both camps (with few exceptions[1]) unanimously supported the fighting, rejecting, all in all, Benedict XI's repeated attempts to end this "useless slaughter."[2]

In Germany, many Catholics followed the leaning of the Protestants and became more and more receptive to everything relating to "national greatness." To be sure, the Catholic associations stayed away from Pan-Germanism and occasionally even condemned its excesses, but the Center Party had relinquished its opposition to armament policies after 1897, and, in 1904, Chancellor von Bülow praised the party for its "German national policies." The development of the international situation in the following ten years, coinciding with the incorporation of the Catholics into the bourgeois national state, encouraged this development, and Erzberger was one of its representatives.[3]

---

[1] Above all the Catholic Irish because of their animosity toward England and some of the Italian Catholics, at least during the first year (cf. P. Scoppola, "Cattolici neutralisti e interventisti alla vigilia del conflitto," Benedetto XV, i cattolici e la prima guerra mondiale [Rome 1963], 95–151).

[2] See Part III.

In Austria, the Catholic intellectuals shied away from such chauvinism. However, nationalism was very active among the members of the Christian Socialist Party between 1909 and 1914. The leading ecclesiastical circles showed no evidence of pacifist tendencies, rather they placed their moral influence with few exceptions in the service of the dynasty and the preservation of the old Empire, which was being undermined by the demands of the various Slav minorities.

In Italy, the weight of the Roman question often kept the Catholics from manifestations of patriotism. But by the turn of the century, a patriotic development had commenced. It intensified in view of the colonization efforts in Libya, which even the Civiltà cattolica presented as a crusade against Islam, though the Holy See had tried to compel the Catholic press to practice restraint. The phenomenon was most noticeable in the south. But from then on, the Catholics wanted to prove almost everywhere that no one could compete with them in terms of patriotism. Even Filippo Meda succumbed to this exaltation for a while. Moreover, the incidents of conflicts between the organized Catholic movements and the extreme nationalists of Corradini increased. In 1910, when trying to solicit the support of the Catholics, Corradini had only found response among the disciples of Murri. In the elections of 1914, he campaigned as a candidate in the region of Vicenza, supported by the episcopate and Catholic Action.[4]

In France, the majority of the clergy and the large Catholic journals emphasized the supposedly close relation between religious experience and patriotic enthusiasm. Following the Dreyfus affair, it was commonplace to consider "the enemies of the army," "the friends of Germany," and "the destroyers of Catholicism" to be one and the same. Demonstrations of this kind multiplied on the occasion of the beatification of Joan of Arc in 1909. In 1911, Secretary Caillaux suggested a policy of détente toward Germany and giving it a small part of the

---

[3] There is no satisfactory study on this subject, therefore see K. Bachem, Vorgeschichte, Geschichte und Politik der deutschen Zentrumspartei VI and VII (Cologne 1929–30).

[4] Cf. G. De Rosa, Storia politica dell'Azione cattolica in Italia II (Bari 1954), 304–37, 364–81; G. Spadolini, Giolitti e i cattolici 1901–1914 (Florence ^{2}1960), 232–82.

French colonial Empire. But he found that almost all French Catholics and a great number of Christian democrats and Sillonists turned against him.[5] The Société Gratry pour le maintien de la paix entre les nations, when founded in 1907 by Vanderpol, an engineer from Lyon, could only solicit seven hundred members. Two years later, it changed into the Ligue des catholiques français pour la paix. In 1913, when Vanderpol, supported by the bishop of Liège, tried to organize an international Church congress in order to pave the way for better Franco-German relations, only four French bishops were willing to send a representative. This was the reason why Vanderpol decided in 1911 to expand his plan and establish a Ligue internationale des pacifistes catholiques, which was to work on public opinion to try to prevent a forced solution of the problem and to insist on the use of international arbitration. In view of the situation, the league was located in Brussels and the positions of president and secretary general were entrusted to Belgians.[6]

The aloofness of many Catholics toward pacifist movements cannot merely be justified with the old medieval tradition according to which military bravery is closely related to Christian virtues. It also rests in the fact that the instigators of antimilitary demonstrations around 1900 were almost always socialists, anarchists, or Freemasons. At that particular time this meant: enemies of the Church. It is characteristic that Pius X principally granted approval to the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace,[7] an American foundation of Protestant origin (letter of 11 June 1911), while rejecting a similar request by Vanderpol's Ligue Internationale. To be sure, the Pope had repeatedly condemned the use of weapons as a means to settle conflicts between nations and had demanded arbitration. When Cardinal Vannutelli praised the conquest of Libya by the Italians as a crusade, the Pope called him to order.[8] However, one cannot but concede that the Holy See did not try seriously enough until 1914 to curb the general tendency of the European Catholics to be enthralled by the nationalistic movement. The Holy

---

[5] A thorough study of nationalism among the French Catholics during the period of the Dreyfus affair and World War I does not exist. A few references can be found in M. Vaussard, Histoire de la Démocratie chrétienne I (Paris 1956), 67–69, and in HistCathFr, 542–43. Also E. Weber, The Nationalist Revival in France 1905–1914 (Berkley 1959).

[6] Compared to the nineteenth century, antimilitarism declined, but it was still quite popular among the Belgian Catholics for practical rather than ideological reasons. They feared that the young people would lose their faith when drafted into the army and fall victim to immorality. Cf. Lehouck, Het antimilitarisme in België 1830–1914 (Antwerp 1958), 44–77.

[7] AAS 3 (1911), 473–74.

[8] Cf. G. De Rosa, op. cit., 330–31. Also see the offical proclamations that were published in the Osservatore Romano between 20 and 30 October 1911, attempting to moderate the enthusiasm for the war.

See's benevolent attitude toward the Action française of Maurras and Daudet, pioneers of the nationalisme intégral, supports this impression.

The attitude of the Holy See at the moment of the outbreak of World War I is still a topic of discussion. When the Austrian ambassador informed Pius X about the ultimatum that was issued by Vienna and sent to Sarajevo on 23 July, the Pope declared his willingness to arbitrate between the two countries and he emphasized his intention to exercise a moderating influence on both governments. But what did really happen in the course of the following days?

The Pope's doctor, Marchiafava, declared during the beatification process: "I remember him telling me that he himself wrote to the Emperor of Austria, imploring him to do everything in his power to prevent the declaration of war, but it was in vain."[9] A. de Cigala,[10] whose report has been quoted frequently, added: "When the Austrian ambassador informed Pius X of the fait accompli and asked him in the name of the Emperor to bless the Austrian weapons, he answered: "Tell the Emperor that I can neither bless the war nor those who wanted it. The Emperor should consider himself lucky not to have received the curse of Christ's deputy." Some hagiographers went one step further and maintained that the Pope had contemplated the excommunication of Franz Joseph and discussed his intention with Cardinal Ferrata.[11]

However, Cardinal Merry del Val declared: "I do not think that it is absolutely clear that he wrote a letter to the Emperor of Austria."[12] In the Roman and Austrian archives, not a trace of such a letter was found, so that the testimony of Dr. Marchiafava appears to be rather questionable. It seems to be even more doubtful in view of another document, which is equally unverifiable, but sounds entirely different. A few days before Pius X died, one of his secretaries told a friend of the Austrian ambassador confidentially that the Pope had been asked by several parties to intervene in behalf of peace and that his response was the following: "The only monarch in whose behalf I would intervene is the Emperor and King Franz Joseph, because he was always loyal to the Holy See. But I cannot intervene on his behalf precisely because the war of Austria-Hungary is quite just."[13] He is supposed to have added that Russia was totally responsible for the expansion of the conflict.

---

[9] Processus Ordinarius, Roma II, 1702–5.

[10] Vie intime de S.S. le pape Pie X (Paris ^{2}1926), 219–21.

[11] The letter of the Pope addressed to Franz Joseph dated 13 August 1914 and published in the French and Italian press is obviously a forgery which the secretary of state did not deem necessary to deny (cf. A. Hudal, op. cit., 283–84). At that time the rumor was circulated that Merry del Val had joined the Austrian camp and influenced the Pope in order to prevent his official protest.

[12] Processus Ordinarius, Roma II, 898.

Aside from these rumors, for which "reliable documents are missing that could prove their authenticity" (Hudal), there are two documents at our disposal which are more reliable, but pose problems of interpretation. On the one hand, we have the letter of the Bavarian legate Baron Ritter, who wrote on 26 July: "The Pope approves the decisive steps Austria took toward Serbia."[14] On the other hand, there is the detailed report of the Austrian legate Count Pállfy, (of 29 July)[15] regarding a conversation he had had two days earlier with Cardinal Merry del Val: "The memorandum addressed to Serbia was considered extremely harsh by the cardinal, but he approved of it nevertheless, at the same time indirectly expressing hope that the Monarchy would be able to endure the conflict. The Cardinal thought that it was a shame that Serbia had not been "crushed" earlier because at that time it might have been accomplished without taking unforeseeable risks." The diplomat added: "This statement coincides with the Pope's ideas, because in the last few years His Holiness frequently expressed regret about Austria-Hungary's failure to put her dangerous neighbor in its place." When these texts were published, the Cardinal countered with a summary of the conversation: "It is true that I said to Count Pállfy after the terrible crime of Sarajevo that Austria had to remain firm and that it had a right to authentic reparations and the protection of its existence, but I never expressed the hope or the opinion that Austria would not take up arms."[16]

What can we conclude from these texts? Unquestionably, we have to consider that a diplomat tends to declare a carefully phrased or simply implied opinion to be an official statement in order to prove that he has succeeded in persuading his opponent that his country was perfectly justified. One should also take into account that some people might have been of the opinion that the Holy See's restraint would finally remove the old Emperor's last inhibitions. On the other hand, it is clear that the slogan "Austria has to remain firm," which Merry del Val admitted to have used, was conducive to encouraging Vienna to impose its reign on Belgrade, even though Serbia had already responded to the Austrian ultimatum in conciliatory terms (25 July). Even on 27 July, the secretary of state and other diplomats were justified in assuming that a confinement of the conflict would be possible, at least as long as Russia had not taken a clear stand. When she finally did, she caused a chain reaction of hostilities all over Europe.

---

[13] Quoted in Engel-Janosi II, 150–51.

[14] Bayerische Dokumente zum Kriegsausbruch, ed. by P. Dirr, III (Munich 1925), 206.

[15] Österreich-Ungarns Außenpolitik. Diplomatische Aktenstücke VIII (Vienna 1930), 893–94.

[16] L'Osservatore Romano, 20 August 1914, 22 October 1923; cf. ibid., 22–23 May 1936.

In any case, one fact can not be disputed: "A number of documents prove that in the decisive months of the summer of 1914 the Vatican was rather favorably inclined toward Austria-Hungary, in fact, one is tempted to say: surprisingly favorably" (Engel-Janosi). It would be exaggerated to speak about the Vatican's dependence on Austria. This can be documented by the fact that, on 24 June 1914, a concordat with Serbia was signed, even though the Austrian diplomats had tried persistently to prevent this because they considered it to be an encouragement for Yugoslavianism.[17] Pius X, however, had great respect for the old Emperor Franz Joseph. After all, just a few years ago, he had appeared as the model of a Catholic sovereign when he walked in the procession of the Most Blessed Sacrament of the Altar on the occasion of the Eucharistic Congress in Vienna wearing his full-dress uniform. The Pope had placed even more hope on the Austrian successor to the throne, Archduke Franz Ferdinand. His assassination deeply disappointed him. Above all, since France's break with Rome, Austria was the only large Catholic state in Europe. Moreover, Austria provided protection against German Protestantism as well as against Orthodox Slavism. There are indications that Pius X and Merry del Val considered Serbia the malignant cell that would eventually infect even the existence of the Habsburg Monarchy. They believed that a weakening of the Austrian influence in the Balkans and on the Danubian plains would favor Russia, the main enemy of Catholicism in the Near East.

Is it possible that the sympathies the Pope and his secretary of state expressed for Austria (which does not necessarily mean that they intended war) also included Germany? In certain French circles, Pius X was charged with having been "the Pope of the Triple Alliance." It is true that the Pope, as a result of his more conciliatory stance toward Italy, did not have the same reasons to bear a grudge against the allies that Leo XIII had. It is also true that the German influence in the Vatican increased during his pontificate. On the one hand, this development was the normal consequence of the break of diplomatic relations by France and of the discontent of the leadership of the religious orders in this country with the measures taken against the congregations. On the other hand, this development resulted from the fact that Rome tended to favor the "safe" principles and dogmas of German Catholicism as opposed to the dangerous French progressivism in the matter of exegesis and philosophy.[18] It is quite possible that the Vatican found satisfaction in the idea that the godless and immoral French would learn a lesson. In view of imminent war, the Pope did not raise the voice of a prophet condemning war, but rather confined himself to a somewhat meek appeal to all peoples to pray.[19] He certainly did not restrain himself because he watched the approach of a catastrophe with pleasure, but rather because he reasoned that the Holy See's position was diplomatically weak and did not permit initiatives such as Pius XII would attempt twenty-five years later at the dawn of World War II. He may also simply have been too tired and old, lacking the energy necessary to act in a hopeless situation.

---

[17] Cf. C. Alix, Le Saint-Siège et les nationalismes en Europe (Paris 1962), 111–14, and É. Poulat, Intégrisme et catholicisme intégral (Paris-Tournai 1969), 527–28.

In fact, a month earlier, Pius X had celebrated his eightieth birthday, and for the last year his health had been a cause of concern. He died almost unexpectedly on the night of 19 August and left his successor with the new and difficult problems that the commencing war posed for the Church.

---

[18] The following assessment by a neutral party seems noteworthy: The American Cardinal O'Connell was asked by Mrs. B. Storer to exercise his influence and "to preserve the friendly feeling which has grown stronger between Germany and the Vatican." He answered her in January 1910: "I wish to assure you that the Holy Father and the cardinal secretary of state are very practical men and that they understand perfectly the value of the staunch sterling character of the Germans and the methods and maneuvers of the French, which are the same the world over" (CHR 40 [1954–55], 141–42).

[19] Dum Europa fere of 2 August 1914 (AAS 6 [1914], 373).

PART THREE

The Expansion of Catholic Missions from the Time of Leo XIII until World War II

The striking lack of representation of missionary interests at the First Vatican Council reflected the fact that ecclesiastical circles were caught up in European interests. As we demonstrated earlier, the participating missionary bishops were active, but in terms of numbers and influence they were a small group.[1] The fact that the Council adjourned abruptly and the missionary proposals were never presented is not the reason for the fact that no effective initiatives for the propagation of the faith emanated from it. The real impulse came from outside, especially from the growing and prevailing imperialism or colonialism, in whose wake the missions had recently assumed truly worldwide scope.[2] The earlier colonial powers, England and France, were joined by a united Germany. Russia expanded its empire in the east and south and thus exercised an antimissionary influence because, in agreement with Western powers, especially England, it impeded the preaching of the Gospel in such countries as Tibet and Afghanistan. In Africa, the Islamic faith, a political force in the Ottoman Empire, penetrated even the black population.

CHAPTER 38

Missions in the Shadow of Colonialism

Initially, a false understanding of the missionary concept impaired worldwide and open-minded missionary activities. This concept originated during the First Vatican Council among the authorities of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. Missionary work was primarily understood to mean activities among the Christians of the Eastern churches and the Catholic immigrants in North America.[3] In the context of the last few years of Pius IX's pontificate, this attitude is understandable; but it can still be found in the first years of Leo XIII's reign. While the Near Eastern Churches enjoyed papal attention (the

---

[1] Regarding the mood among the missionaries, see, for instance, the letter of 31 December 1869 by P. Le Doré (later the general of the Eudists), who had accompanied a bishop of the Antilles to the council (in R. Aubert, Vaticanum I [Mainz 1965], 295).

[2] Delacroix III, uses the words La grande expansion des missions to characterize this period.

[3] Even in our century, the priests in America were considered the "classic" missionaries. The decisive significance of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith in regard to the development of the American Church is evident in the collection of documents compiled by F. Kenneally (United States Documents in the Propaganda Fide Archives I [1673–1844], II [1845–62] [Washington 1966–68]). The editor of this work, A. Tibesar, states in the introduction: "Perhaps in no other country was the Congregation of Propaganda Fide more successful in fulfilling its purpose than in the United States of America after our independence" (I, xiii).

Pope sent several proclamations and directives), the pagan missions, according to Roman archives, were neglected.[4] On 3 December 1880 the Pope issued the encyclical Sancta Dei Civitas, but it is incorrect to call it a missionary encyclical.[5] In 1884, he praised the activities of the missionaries and called them Evangelii praecones. However, he did so on the occasion of the dedication of the North American College in Rome.[6]

This view of the pagan mission changed after the reform of the Curia by Pius X on 29 June 1908;[7] as a result of it, the activities of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith were principally limited to non-Christian areas. The reform deprived the Congregation of its authority over seven archbishoprics and forty-seven bishoprics in Europe (England, Scotland, Ireland, Holland, and Luxemburg) and thirty archdioceses with 147 suffragan bishoprics in Canada and the United States. As far as the Near Eastern Churches were concerned, the system of 1862 remained in force. They continued to be subject to the prefect of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, with its own special secretary. Finally, in 1917, a Congregation for the Eastern Churches was established, thus relieving the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith of its last responsibility. On the basis of the reform of 1908, missionaries as missionaries were subject to the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. However, as members of religious orders they were responsible to the Congregation for Religious.[8] Moreover, a number of areas for which the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith had been responsible (e.g., matters of faith, of marriage, of rites and liturgy) were now transferred to other administrative branches.

During the pontificates of Leo XIII and Pius X, home missionary activities were increased and strengthened. This was necessary for two reasons: because of the expansion of missionary tasks (especially after the colonization of Africa) and because of the new Italy depriving the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith of some of its responsibilities.[9] Therefore, the existing missionary societies were strongly recommended and supported by popes and bishops alike. However, since several of these organizations (e.g., the Leopoldinen-Stiftung in Vienna and the Ludwigs-Missionsverein in Munich, etc.) served almost exclusively the American and Near Eastern missions, new societies arose, such as the Africa Society of the German Catholics (from 1888–1917),[10] the Werk vom heiligen Petrus für den einheimischen Klerus, founded in 1889 by Stéphanie Bigard and her daughter Jeanne, the Missionsvereinigung katholischer Frauen und Jungfrauen (1893), the Petrus-Claver-Sodalität, suggested by Countess Maria Theresia Ledóchowska in 1894, and many more.[11] [4] Schmidlin, PG II, 500–36, in accordance with the documents, devoted more than half of his study to the northern, the Russian, and the Middle Eastern missions.

---

[5] Acta Leonis I, 171–77. The encyclical contains a warm commendation of the activities of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith in Lyon and the Association of the Holy Childhood in Paris. However, the work of the Christian schools in the Middle East is considered equally valuable.

[6] Acta Leonis II, 88–92: Litterae Apostolicae of 25 October 1884. Praise of the missionaries: p. 88.

[7] N. Hilling, "Die rechtliche Stellung der Propagandakongregation nach der neuen Kurialreform Pius' X," ZM (1911), 147–58.

[8] This gave the leaders of orders the right to voice their opinion about the activities of their members in the missions. Consequently, they became much more interested in missionary work.

In conjunction with the increase of material support, the number of missionary personnel increased. The first third of the nineteenth century was marked by the founding of French missionary societies, while the second third was marked by the establishment of new Italian associations, which were later joined by the missionaries of Parma (Saveriani, 1895)[12] and the Consolata missionaries of Turin (1901).[13] The German missionary groups were (for the most part) formed in the last third of the century. Because of the Kulturkampf, the first group settled in nearby Holland, where Arnold Janssen founded the Society of the Divine Word (Steyl, 1875).[14] From here, he tried to move into Germany. In 1889, he began work, with permission of the government, in Mödling near Vienna and in 1892 in Neisse (Silesia). The actions of the missionaries in Steyl signaled the creation of German provinces by French and Italian societies. Thus, the following groups were allowed to settle: the Pallottines in Limburg (1892), the Oblates of Mary Immaculate in Hünfeld near Fulda (1895), the Holy Ghost Fathers in Knechtsteden (1895), the White Fathers in Trier (1896), and the Sacred Heart Missionaries in Hiltrup near Münster (1896).

Conceived differently was the missionary work started in 1882 by the Austrian Trappist Franz Pfanner and his disciples in Mariannhill (South

---

[9] Schmidlin, PG II, 502. All protests were in vain, and not until the Lateran Treaties of 1929 did they receive compensation.

[10] In connection with Lavigerie's antislavery societies in other countries. The Africa mission profited from the epiphany collection instituted by Leo XIII through his letter of 20 November 1890 (Acta Leonis IV, 112–16).

[11] B. Arens, Die katholischen Missionsvereine (Freiburg 1922), gives more information about the various countries.

[12] I Missionari Saveriani nel primo centenario della nascita del loro fondatore Guido M. Conforti (Parma 1965).

[13] "Il Cinquantennio delle Missioni della Consolata," Missioni Consolata 53 (Turin 1951), 101–94.

[14] F. Bornemann, Arnold Janssen, der Gründer des Steyler Missionswerkes 1837–1909 (Steyl 1970).

Africa). From this community of Trappists, elevated to abbey in 1885, there grew over the years the nonmonastic missionary society of Mariannhill.[15] In 1883/84, the Swiss Benedictine monk from Beuron, Andreas Amrhein, laid the cornerstone for similar monastic missionary communities, first in Reichenbach and later in Saint Ottilien. His intention was to develop the missionary component prior to the monastic.[16]

Home missionary activities were also closely involved with the ecclesiastical efforts to improve the relations between Church and state that were disrupted after 1870, especially in Germany during the Kulturkampf and in France during the Republic. The establishment and development of German missionary societies or religious provinces was related to this problem. They owed their establishment to the legislation terminating the Kulturkampf and the improved relations between Bismarck and Leo XIII.[17] Two outstanding diplomatic accomplishments of Leo XIII deserve mentioning: his role as arbitrator in the controversy between Spain and Germany over the ownership of the Caroline Islands, a role which he had been offered by Bismarck and in which he decided in favor of Germany; and his open and courageous support of Lavigerie in his campaign against slavery.[18] The diplomatic successes and the receptive personality of Leo XIII permitted him to turn to such non-Christian sovereigns as the Emperor of Japan[19] and Dowager Empress Tz'u-hsi of China and thank them, in writing, for their goodwill toward the foreign missions.[20] While Leo XIII put his diplomatic skills into the service of propagating the faith, Pius X's chief concern in regard to the missions was of a pastoral nature. He recognized the potential of crossfertilization between home country and missions.[21]

---

[15] J. Dahm, Mariannhill. Seine innere Entwicklung sowie seine Bedeutung für die katholische Missions- und Kulturgeschichte Südafrikas 1882—1909 (Mariannhill 1950).

[16] F. Renner, Der fünfarmige Leuchter. Beiträge zum Werden und Wirken der Benediktinerkongregation von St. Ottilien, 2 vols. (Sankt Ottilien 1971).

[17] The papal letter to the bishops of Prussia (6 January 1888) emphasized the humanitarian and missionary significance of the colonial policies of their nation (Acta Leonis XIII, 183–91).—In a letter to the archbishop of Cologne (20 April 1890), the Pope expressly asked the German Catholics to participate in the Christianization of Africa (ibid. IV, 44–47). These papal words were the result of Bismarck's efforts to get German missionaries for the German colonies.

[18] Lavigerie was the exponent of Leo XIII's relations to France (cf. mainly Xavier de Montclos, Le Toast d'Alger. Documents 1890–1891 [Paris 1966]). Bismarck played a similar role in Germany. The history of the founding of Saint Ottilien is a striking example of this (cf. F. Renner, op. cit. I).

[19] Acta Leonis II, 121–22: letter of 12 May 1885.

[20] Acta Leonis II, 134–35: letter of 1 February 1885.—Unlike previous papal letters, this one was answered, which can be documented by the fact that the Japanese delegate thanked the Pope for it on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of his priesthood (ibid. IV, 228).

The propagation of the faith abroad was totally dependent on the colonial power which directly or indirectly dominated the country or the area. All colonies conquered by Russia, even those solely populated by non-Christians, were off-limits to Catholic missions, as were the countries of the Ottoman Empire and its successor states. These countries, especially England and France, pursued a rather ambiguous missionary policy. Among the non-Islamic populations they tolerated missionary activities, after the turn of the century openly supporting and furthering them. However, among the Islamic populations they forbade and hindered any kind of missionary work.[22]

Everywhere, the missionaries were incorporated into or subjugated to the imperialist system. Real freedom of propagation of the faith barely existed in any of these countries. These facts, which had not been discovered until recently, do not mean that the missionaries voluntarily supported the political and economic systems. According to contemporary reports, most missionaries were scarcely aware of the political impact of their work. And even those who seemed to later generations to have been particularly active in the political arena simply wanted to demonstrate their patriotism, which was constantly questioned by the colonial administration.[23]

Asia

The amalgamation of political power and apostolic activities produced numerous difficulties. The patronate in Asia offers ample evidence for this. After the unpleasant circumstances around the middle of the century and the controversies of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith with Portugal, Leo XIII finally succeeded in 1886 in settling the unfortunate conflict through a new concordat, at least in principle.[24] (Two years earlier, in the interest of the Indian Church, he had appointed an apostolic legate and closed seven parishes in Goa.) Of course, this was a compromise, because the King managed to obtain the confirmation of the patronate through the archdiocese of Goa, which had been elevated to patriarchate, and through its suffragan bishoprics (Damao, Cochin, Meliapur). Consequently, the double jurisdiction continued, and Lisbon succeeded in assuring its right to nominate candidates for certain episcopal sees.[25] On the other hand, the government relinquished its right to claim the non-Portuguese areas in India and it recognized the authority of the Apostolic See. Taking advantage of this freedom, the Pope immediately established a proper hierarchy with seven church provinces (Goa, Agra, Bombay, Verapoly, Calcutta, Madras, Pondicherry), and in Ceylon he set up the archbishopric of Colombo.[26] This marked the beginning of visible growth, solidification and strengthening of the Indian Church, which was furthered by the founding of the Papal Seminary of Kandy (Sri Lanka) by the Belgian Jesuits and the instructions of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith to the episcopate regarding methods of proselytizing.[27] The Uniate Mar-Thomas Church also grew, obtaining its own apostolic vicariates (Trichur and Kottayam) in 1887 thanks to the efforts of its first delegate, L. M. Zaleski.[28] They were first headed by Latin bishops, after 1896 by native pastors, especially in the Syro-Malabarian apostolic vicariates of Ernakulam, Changanacherry, and Trichur. The bishopric of Quilon developed rapidly, headed by the Swiss Carmelite friar A. M. Benziger (suffragan bishop after 1905, bishop from 1905 until 1931).[29] Extraordinarily successful was the mission of Chota Nagpur in the north, especially among the natives, the Kols. The conversion movement, accelerating after 1880, was consolidated by the Flemish Jesuit K. Lievens through a multiplicity of activities (training of catechists, writings in the language of the area, and social work).[30] In the seventies, the Jesuits reported a considerable increase of members in the diocese of Madura, where they maintained the most important school in all of southern India: Saint Joseph College, located since 1881 in Trichinopoly. They succeeded in converting many Brahmans, thus penetrating for the first time the world of Hinduism. In addition to the Carmelites and Jesuits, the Capuchin friars (in the north), the Salesians, the Oblates, and the Holy Cross Fathers did missionary work in the country. In 1875, they were joined by the Mill Hill Missionaries. The missionaries of Milan, in India since 1863, started a sizable conversion movement at the end of the century among the Telugus in the vicariate of Hyderabad. After Leo XIII's reorganization of the Indian mission, the development progressed rather slowly under the following pontificate.[31]

---

[21] Schmidlin, PG, III, 116, 121f. Cf. B. Arens, Papst Pius X. und die Weltmissionen (Aachen 1919).

[22] For example, in the Malayan states, in the many independent areas of India governed by Hindu or Islamic maharajahs, in British or French Sudan, and in large areas of Indonesia, any kind of missionary activity, even pastoral work among the Christians, was forbidden until after World War II.—This historical background is often overlooked when, in recent publications, the missionaries are accused of having neglected the dialogue with the Muslims, because a dialogue requires a partner; however, the missionaries were systematically isolated.

[23] Another fact needs to be considered: Like all other contemporaries, the missionaries received an education oriented towards imperialism, especially the whites working in the colonial administrations or in trade and business abroad.—Cf. Leo XIII's encyclical issued to the faithful in France (16 February 1892, Acta Leonis II, 39) in which he praised the French missionaries because they had spread the "renom de la France et les bienfaits de la religion catholique" in distant lands.—A Villanyi, "Mittel und Wege kolonialer Kirchenpolitik," ZMR 47 (1963), 33–46.

---

[24] Acta Leonis II, 192–96 (letter of 6 January 1886 to the king of Portugal); the Concordat of 23 June 1886, ibid., 205–7. Cf. B. J. Wenzel, Portugal und der Heilige Stuhl. Das portugiesische Konkordatsrecht (Lisbon 1958), 189ff.

[25] These sees were Bombay, Mangalore, Quilon, and Trichinopoly. Various communities responsible to the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith became subject to the jurisdiction of Goa. This displeased the Congregation.

[26] Acta Leonis II, 229–39: Litterae Apostolicae Humanae Salutis Auctor of 1 September 1886.

[27] The Pope insisted on the training of the native clergy. His reasons included the opinions of Francis Xavier, the clergy's better acquaintance with the country and its people, the small number of European missionaries, and, finally, the possibility that the latter could be expelled from the country (Acta V, 165–69: encyclical of 24 June 1893, Ad extremas Orientis ora).—The instructions: Collectanea II, 286–90 (19 March 1893).

[28] W. Maley, Patriarch Ladislas Zaleski, Apostolic Delegate of the East Indies (Bombay 1964).

[29] While he was in office, the number of baptized Christians increased from 87,000 to

Indochina,[32] under British dominion, included Burma, with 3 vicariates established between 1866 and 1870 by missionaries from Paris and Milan. Here, the Karens were converted, while the true Burmese, mainly Buddhists, were less susceptible to Christianity. Moreover, the Malay peninsula fell under the control of the British. It was restored to bishopric in 1888.[33] As in Burma, Christians were not recruited from the ranks of the indigenous population, but from among the Indian and Chinese immigrants, who joined in considerable numbers. This is also true for Siam, which, after a trade agreement with France in 1867, experienced a period of benevolent acceptance of the missions, especially under the long government of King Chulalongkorn, who visited the Pope in 1897 and, upon his return, recommended that the Christian messengers be welcomed as friends. Yet even here conversions took place mainly among the Chinese, while the Thais could not 226,000. He proved to be an energetic patron of the native clergy and built dozens of churches. Cf. Fr. Philip, O.C.D., A Man of God. A Biography of Archbishop Aloysius Maria Benziger (Trivandrum 1956).

---

[30] F. Schwager I, 425; in regard to Constantin Lievens (1856–93), see Streit VIII, 453f.; concerning his scholarly works, see ibid., 453f.

[31] In 1910, Pius X added the archdiocese of Simla (English Capuchins) and the bishopric of Ajmer (French Capuchins) to the Indian hierarchy; he separated the vicariate of Kottayam (with a native bishop) from Changanacherry (Syro-Malabar).

[32] Regarding these areas, cf. Le Thanh Khoi et. al., L'Asie Sud-Est de la fin du XIX^e^ siècle à nos jours, 2 vols. (Paris 1971).

[33] A suffragan bishopric dependent on the archdiocese of Pondicherry after 1889.

be converted.[34] Even though the French colonial administration frequently put obstacles in the way of the missions, the Church of Laos, after 1899 apostolic vicariate, was able to grow. The Christians of Annam particularly suffered from the consequences of colonial politics. Following the peace treaty between King Tu-Duc and France (1862), there was a decade of relative peace, followed by renewed acts of bloody suppression (which can partly be blamed on some missionaries), one in 1872 and another one in 1886, when the final occupation of the country took place. In the course of these persecutions, 20 missionaries, 30 native priests, and 50,000 Christians lost their lives.[35] In spite of this tragic history in the nineteenth century and the many intrigues by the colonial governments, the number of baptized Christians grew after World War I to about one million and the ecclesiastical hierarchy increased to twelve apostolic vicariates headed by the Parisian Dominicans and to two vicariates headed by the Spanish Dominicans.[36]

Similarly fatal events and, for the future of Christianity, even tragic consequences resulted from the Christianization that followed the colonization of China.[37] The treaties imposed upon the Far East by the Western powers marked the beginning of a new era in missionary history. The various agreements paved the way for the missions throughout the entire country and, aside from acceptance and protection, it provided the Church with financial and social advantages. Yet such missionary policies proved to be harmful as well.[38] The missionaries made insufficient efforts to fashion the communities with the Chinese spirit and sensitivities in mind, and many a conversion was inspired by mate-

---

[34] The first Siamese were ordained in 1880. Cf. F. Schwager, "Aus der Vorgeschichte der hinterindischen Mission," ZM 3 (1913), 146–51.

[35] E. Vo Duc Hanh, La place du catholicisme dans les relations entre la France et le Vietnam de 1851 à 1870, I (Leiden 1969). J. Nguyen van Phong (ArchSR 31 [Jan.–June 1971], 248), takes issue with Vo Duc Hanh's opinion that most Catholics were convinced of the religious and political mission of France in the second half of the nineteenth century (p. 26), and the hate of the white population was one of the main reasons for the persecutions of the Christians (287–92).

[36] Latourette VI, 246–51.

[37] To understand the most recent Chinese Church history, see the competent work of J. Beckmann, "Die China-Mission. Versuch einer kritischen Rechenschaft," Wort und Wahrheit 14 (1959), 3–40; id., "Neuerscheinungen zur chinesischen Missionsgeschichte 1945–1955," Monumenta Serica 15 (Tokyo 1956), 378–462. This extensive bibliography offers a survey of the development of missions from the middle of the thirteenth into the twentieth century. Cf. B. Wirth, Imperialistische Übersee- und Missionspolitik dargestellt am Beispiel Chinas (Münster 1968); see also NZM 25 (1969), 317.

[38] A very critical assessment of France's policy of protectionism in Schmidlin, M, 466f.; cf. A. Schier, "Alphonse Favier et la protection des missions en Chine (1870–1905)," NZM 25 (1969), 1–13, 90–101; id., "La nonciature pour Pékin en 1886," NZM 24 (1968), 1–14, 94–110.

rial motives (the so-called rice Christians). In addition, the disciples of a white religion were suspect to the population (e.g., in regard to orphanages) and deeply hated by certain segments, especially the Mandarins and scholars, whose national pride was hurt.[39] The resentments exploded during the Boxer uprising in 1900, an incident which cost the lives of thousands of Catholics and numerous priests. In spite of these setbacks and the revolution of 1911, which put an end to the Manchu dynasty but hardly affected the religious communities, the Catholic Church had 1.4 million members around 1912 (the number had doubled since the turn of the century), and the native clergy included 724 clergymen.[40]

Almost twice as many foreign (especially French, Italian, and German) missionaries devoted themselves at the same time to missionary work all over China. The old established order of the Lazarists,[41] the Jesuits, who produced significant cultural achievements through their educational, scientific, literary, and economic charitable activities in parts of Pohai and Shanghai,[42] the Spanish Dominicans, and the Missionaries of Paris, who administered the large area, all profited following the peace of Tientsin from the establishment of new religious societies. The first to bring in reinforcements were the Scheut Fathers. They had an exceedingly difficult vicariate in Mongolia. By establishing Christian villages, its members succeeded in settling complete communities around the center of the Ordos mission.[43] One of the pioneers of this enterprise was Alfons Bermyn (1878–1915), later vicar apostolic.[44] It was here that Monsignor Hubert Otto began his missionary activities.[45] He later transferred to the Kansu province which had been assigned to the Oblates of Mary Immaculate. He headed the vicariate apostolic of northern Kansu from 1890–1921. Following the Milanese missionaries (1869 in Honan) and the Spanish Augustinian friars (1879 in northern Honan), the Divine Word Missionaries arrived in the southern part of Shantung in 1882. Under the vicars apostolic J. B. Anzer[46] and A. Henninghaus,[47] they made rapid and solid progress, for which their schools were largely responsible. In 1885 assistance was sent to North Shensi by the Seminary of Peter and Paul in Rome, and in 1906 the Institute of Parma sent help to northern Honan. All attempts by the Parisians to Christianize Tibet failed due to the strong resistance of the Lamas. The Spanish Dominicans worked in Formosa (from 1859), however, they encountered obstacles after the Japanese occupied the island in 1895.[48]

---

[39] J. Schütte, Die katholische Chinamission im Spiegel der rotchinesischen Presse. Versuch einer missionarischen Deutung (Münster 1957). In his conclusion, the author describes the weaknesses and shortcomings of the China mission: "In spite of its external involvement with politics, the Catholic China mission on the whole recognized its true religious goal and tried consistently to realize it. The repeated charge that the foreign missionaries were political spies and agents of imperialist powers is unfounded and was rejected" (381).

[40] Regarding the position of the Church in China (and Japan), see J. Schmidlin, Das gegenwärtige Heidenapostolat im Fernen Osten (Münster i. W. 1929).

[41] O. Ferreux, "Histoire de la Congrégation de la Mission en Chine 1699–1950," Annales de la Congrégation de la Mission 127 (Paris 1963), 3–530.

[42] Especially the University of Aurora, the College of Zikawei, and the studios of Tusewe together with the famous observatory.

[43] L. van Hecken, Les réductions catholiques du pays des Ordos. Une méthode d'apostolat des missionnaires de Scheut (Schöneck-Beckenried 1957); cf. id., Les Missions chez les Mongols aux temps modernes (Brussels 1949). Around 1900, the mission had about 371 members.

[44] Many new documents regarding this pioneer of the Mongolian mission (after 1900, he headed the vicariate apostolic of Southwest Mongolia) can be found in J. van Hecken, Mgr. Alfons Bermyn. Dokumenten over het missieleven van een voortrekker in Mongolië (1878–1915), 2 vols. (Wijnegen 1947); J. van Oost, Missionnaire de Scheut Monseigneur Bermyn, Apôtre des Ortos (Louvain 1932).

In order to further the expansion of the Chinese mission, which claimed Leo XIII's particular attention and love, the Pope divided it into five regions (1879), keeping in mind the future local synods that had been negotiated at the First Vatican Council. He also increased the dioceses by fifteen and, in 1883, issued more detailed instructions to the missionaries in China.[49] It was indeed necessary to awaken the missionary spirit because in many cases the interest was not in gaining new territory, but consolidation within the established area.[50] Therefore, the regional synods, appointed after the eighties, strongly emphasized the conversion of the pagans. The meetings were also important for the closer collaboration of the often colorful missionary personnel and for a more uniform organization of missionary procedures. The synods all attempted to eliminate other shortcomings, such as the missionaries' insufficient training and acclimatization to the land and its people, the neglect of the upper classes and intelligentsia in the press and the schools, and the rather arbitrary and not sufficiently planned way in which the Chinese Church was provided with a clergy and episcopate.[51] The elimination of these inadequacies was demanded by a group of missionaries who were attracted by the positive characteristics of the Chinese and, supporting the so-called Tientsin method, advocated turning away from Europeanism.[52] The establishment of a nunciature was to serve the same purpose, but the plan proposed by the Chinese failed because France opposed it.[53] Neither under Leo XIII nor under Pius X could the project be realized. The often abused protectorate was opposed by Vincent Lebbe (1877–1940), who was extremely active, but also assailed by many. He was a disciple of the spirit of the Gentry group and can be considered the pioneer of a new direction of missionary work in China: thorough indigenization.[54]

---

[45] C. van Melckebeke, Notre bon Monseigneur Otto. 1850–1938 (Scheut, Brussels 1949). Regarding Msgr. Otto, cf. Streit XII, 581f.

[46] Regarding J. B. Anzer (1851–1903), cf. Streit XII, 592ff.

[47] Regarding Augustin Henninghaus (1862–1939), ibid. XIII, 8ff.

[48] A. Züger, "Die katholische Kirche auf Formosa," NZM 14 (1958), 276–96. The Dominicans, who had been on the island since 1859, had not been very successful: in 1919, the number of Catholics was only 4,400.

[49] Collectanea II, 187–196.—Regarding the development of the hierarchy under Leo XIII, cf. Schmidlin, PG II, 527; under Pius X, ibid. III, 134f.

[50] Ibid., 192: "Sed quum gentilium conversio ad Christum Dominum in cuius cognitione vita aeterna omnium hominum sita est, finis praecipuus missionum existat, ad eam toto animo intendere Vicarii App. conentur."

At the end of the century, the Western powers and Japan concluded treaties with Korea as well; they proved to be beneficial to the Church. Following the persecutions (1803–13, 1827, 1838–46, 1866–69) and the last edict (1881), Christianity was able to gain ground on the basis of the agreements of the eighties, in spite of some reverses in Taikyu in 1887. Religious freedom was not impeded after 1895 by the establishment of the Japanese protectorate, although the authorities attempted to propagate the official Shinto cult. Monsignor Félix-Clair Ridel, after 1869 vicar apostolic of Korea, did not arrive in the country until 1877. He was arrested the following year and deported to China. Like his successors Blanc and Mutel, he was a member of the Missionaries of Paris who, disregarding the hostile atmosphere on the peninsula, had sent more and more personnel there.[55] Mutel held the office of vicar apostolic of Korea from 1890 until 1911. After the division into two dioceses, Seoul and Taikyu (1911), he administered the former. The growth of the new Church was furthered by the founding of vocational and trade schools by the Benedictines of Saint Ottilien, located in Seoul after they established their monastery there in 1909.[56]

---

[51] J. Beckmann, Die katholische Missionsmethode in China in neuester Zeit (1842–1912) (Immensee 1931).

[52] Ibid., 22, 44, 93, 101f., 106f., 195 in regard to this new orientation.

[53] L. Wei Tsing-sing, "Le Saint-Siège, la France et la Chine sous le pontificat de Léon XIII. Le problème de l'établissement d'une nonciature à Pékin et l'affaire du Pei-t'ang 1880–1886," NZM 21 (1965), 18–36, 81–101, 184–212, 252–71.

[54] The founder of the Société des Auxiliaires des Missions (S.A.M.) is an ambiguous figure. Even the study of J. Leclercq, Vie du Père Lebbe (Toulouse, Paris 1955, ^{5}1961) was criticized. Cf. J. Levaux, Le Père Lebbe, Apôtre de la Chine moderne (Brussels 1948); also J. Beckmann, Die China-Mission (n. 37), 3; id., NZM 4 (1948), 309f., about Lebbe's ideas. These were incorporated into the missionary encyclical of Benedict XV, Maximum illud, and into other documents.

[55] Concerning Ridel (1830–84), see Streit X, 426–28. Marie-Jean-Gustave Blanc (1844–90) came to Korea in 1876. He was the vicar apostolic of Korea from 1884 to 1890 (Streit X, 436–38); Gustave-Charles-Marie Mutel, 1854–1933 (Streit X, 433).

Due to the influence and pressures from outside (treaties with the European powers) and the ensuing accessibility of the country to modern Western civilization, the Church in Japan seemed to face a promising future.[57] By 1889 it enjoyed full religious freedom. The persecution decrees had been abolished in 1872/73. The improvement of the situation was aided by the friendly relations between both Leo XIII and Pius X and the royal court.[58] Slowly conversions increased: in 1882, there were 28,000 Catholics, by 1890 the number had grown to 54,000. The Japanese bishops met that same year for their first synod in Nagasaki and, in 1891, Rome proceeded with the establishment of a hierarchy, with Tokyo becoming an archbishopric and Nagasaki, Osaka, and Hakodate suffragan bishoprics.[59] In 1896 the Trappists, the male as well as the female branch, began their prolific activities in Tobetsu near Hakodate. However, most of the work still rested on the shoulders of the Paris Missionaries. They were soon joined by other missionary societies: the Spanish Dominicans of the Philippines in the apostolic prefecture of Shikoku (1904), the Divine Word Missionaries (apostolic prefecture of Niigata, 1912) and the Franciscans in Hokkaido (apostolic prefecture of Sapporo, including Hokkaido, Sakhalin, and the Kuril Islands, 1915), and the (German) Jesuits who founded the Sophia University in the capital (1913). In 1887, the Marianists arrived, earning praise for their work in secondary schools. And finally, there were the female societies (among others, those of Saint Paul and Saint Maurice).

All these groups devoted themselves to the care of the Christians, the training of the Japanese clergy and the catechists, the education of the converts, the press, and social work.[60] Around the turn of the century, however, the disillusioned and disappointed missionaries had to admit that their high hopes could not be fulfilled because the number of baptized had decreased and the number of converts were very few.[61]

---

[56] F. Renner, "Der Ruf an die Benediktiner nach Korea und Manchukuo," F. Renner, op. cit. II, 391–428; A. Kaspar, P. Berger, 60 Jahre Benediktinermission in Korea und der Mandschurei (Münsterschwarzach 1973). In 1890, Korea had 18,000 Catholics; in 1912: 79,000.

[57] J. Laures, Die katholische Kirche in Japan (Kaldenkirchen 1956).

[58] Acta Leonis II, 134f.; Schmidlin, PG III, 135.

[59] Acta Leonis IV, 222–31: Litterae Apostolicae Non maius Nobis of 15 June 1891.

[60] J. van Hecken, Un siècle de vie catholique au Japon 1859–1959 (Tokyo 1960).

[61] In many respects, this situation is reminiscent of the period following World War II. The Protestants were in a much more advantageous position, and their part in modernizing Japan was more significant. The reason may be that their missionaries came mainly from America and England, countries after which the Japanese modeled their adaptation to the western civilization.

The reasons for this are numerous. Money and personnel were lacking. However, the underlying causes are more complex. Among them were the religious scepticism of the Japanese, their passionate desire for purely material, economic progress, their resentment of European teachers, and the fact that they considered Christianity an intrusion. Moreover, there was the identification of the Japanese national character with Shintoism. After the decline of Buddhism, Shintoism became the state religion, the embodiment of the national ideal and the supporting pillar of the new empire. It was an obstacle to the development of the Church, especially since it was extensively propagated throughout the educational system, the military, and all schools. Finally, the missionary process itself had its flaws, which were recognized by a few of the missionaries: The Japanese world had not been penetrated sufficiently, the religions of the country had not been studied, and indirect work, such as literary endeavors, had been neglected. A more thorough study of language and culture, especially of the religious concepts of the Japanese, was needed.[62]

The only Asian country with a Catholic majority, the Philippines, went through the most critical phase of its ecclesiastical history around the turn of the century.[63] If one is interested in the cause of the events which almost brought the Church to the brink of its existence there, one will have to investigate, on the one hand, the characteristics of the political-ecclesiastical constellation within the Spanish colonial empire and, on the other hand, the American intervention, with its many detrimental consequences. Without diminishing the astonishing accomplishments of the Iberian mother country and especially the missionaries,[64] one is compelled to notice that the system, especially on the ecclesiastical level, had considerable shortcomings: it did not aim at independence, but rather tried to preserve dependence on Spain by employing paternalistic methods. Supported by the Freemasons, nationalistic tendencies opposing the foreign dominion grew stronger in the course of the nineteenth century. The native clergy took the same direction because, having been confined to inferior positions, it felt disadvantaged.[65] This placed the clergy into growing opposition to the

---

[62] Schmidlin, M, 479f.; J. Beckmann, Weltkirche und Weltreligionen (Freiburg i. B. 1960), 102f., describes the first indications of religious strife in the country.

[63] F. X. Clark, The Philippine Missions (New York 1945); "Fourth Centenary of the Evangelization of the Philippines," Boletín Ecl. de Filipinas 39 (Manila 1965), 1–352; "IV Centenario de la Evangelización de Filipinas," Boletín de la Provincia de San Nicolás de Tolentino de Filipinas 55 (Marcilla, Navarra 1965), 53–303.

[64] In this regard, Streit IX, offers impressive documents; cf. ibid., introduction p. X, J. Dindinger's plea defending the messengers of faith.

[65] In the nineteenth century, their number was relatively large, however, they were

Spanish religious orders whose members clung to their old (economically lucrative) positions and who seemed to guarantee loyalty toward the political power. What was originally devised as a colonial reform, slowly took a course toward separation and, in the struggle with the religious, developed even anticlerical features. Pressured by the rebels, Spain deported the monks and expropriated their estates (1897). However, it was too late. Asked for help by the nationalists, America declared war in 1897. But instead of being given into the hands of the patriots, the country became the property of the United States.[66]

The presence of the new power produced drastic changes for the Church: the separation of Church and state (for which the faithful were not prepared), lay legislation which prohibited religious instruction in schools and thus caused religious deprivation,[67] stress on ideological neutrality of the state university (founded in 1911), which alienated the educated from the Church, the infiltration of Protestantism and numerous sects, and, last but not least, the antagonistic attitude of groups indoctrinated by America who considered Christianity a thorn in their side. Finally, in 1912, in the course of the nationalistic turmoils and under the leadership of Gregorio Aglipay, a secular priest from the Philippines (1860–1940), some of the Catholics separated from Rome and formed the Iglesia Católica Filipina Independiente.[68] After initial spectacular successes (50 of the 825 Philippine priests and about 1 million of the 8 million Catholics converted to Aglipayism), the membership slowly declined, especially after 1907 when the Church began to recover from the setback.[69] Aware of the critical situation, Leo XIII had begun in 1902 to reorganize Church life, establishing an apostolic generally kept from heading parishes and episcopal offices (yet there were twelve indigenous bishops during the Spanish era).

---

[66] The most thorough study of this transition: P. S. de Achútegui, M. A. Bernad, Religious Revolution in the Philippines, 2 vols. (Manila 1960–66).

[67] F. T. Reuter, "American Catholics and the Establishment of the Philippine School System," CHR 49 (Washington 1963), 365–81.

[68] Achútegui and Bernad prove clearly that this separation is rooted in nationalism, that it is a reaction to the political as well as religious domination by the Spaniards. Cf. also I. R. Rodríguez, Gregorio Aglipay y los orígenes de la Iglesia Filipina Independiente 1898–1917, 2 vols. (Manila 1960); N. P. Cushner, "Gregorio Aglipay and the Philippine Independent Church," NZM 18 (1962), 142–47. Cushner also describes the official doctrine of the schismatic Church.

[69] P. S. Achútegui, M. A. Bernad, Documents Relative to the Religious Revolution in the Philippines. The Religious Coup d'État 1898–1901. A Documentary History (Manila 1971). Aglipayism deteriorated for many reasons (in 1960 only 5 percent of the population adhered to it): decline of anti-Hispanic sentiments, revitalization of the Catholic Church, return of all estates to the Catholics, the movement's lack of international reputation, its increasing approach toward Protestantism.

delegature and four new dioceses.[70] On the basis of a treaty with Rome, the missionaries, even the Spanish ones, could return. The old orders, continuing their activities, were aided by more recent missionary societies, following the urgent appeal of the Pope to alleviate the dire need for priests: the Mill Hill Missionaries (1906), the Scheut Fathers (1907), the Missionaries of the Sacred Heart (1908), and the Divine Word Missionaries (1909). At the Thomas University in Manila (licensed in 1916), the Dominicans resumed their work. Pius X himself made efforts to convene a plenary council, which met in 1907 in the capital, headed by the delegate Ambros Agius. The real missionary work was done by the Jesuits (on Mindanao), the Scheut Fathers among the Igorots (northern Luzon), the Negritos, and the immigrant Chinese, while the Divine Word Missionaries, with equal success, took care of the Abras.[71]

Under the rather intolerant colonial power of the Dutch,[72] the Catholic Church was able to develop in Dutch East India after it resettled there in the first half of the century.[73] In the twentieth century, the Jesuits were the only ones, supported by a few secular priests (after 1859), to work in the apostolic vicariate of Batavia, which included the entire huge area of the archipelago.[74] After the formation of the first ecclesiastial districts (1905: the apostolic prefecture of Dutch Borneo, 1911: Sumatra, 1913: the Lesser Sunda islands) and the arrival of new societies (the Missionaries of the Sacred Heart, the Capuchin friars, and the Divine Word Missionaries), the Catholics were able to compete with the Protestants, especially on the Lesser Sunda islands, where exceedingly active communities developed. Progress was also due to the work of the various female congregations. The Ursulines and the female

---

[70] Acta Leonis VIII, 141–50: Litterae Apostolicae Quae, mari sinico of 17 September 1902: Lipa, Tuguegarao, Capiz, Zamboanga; the apostolic prefecture of Palawan was established in 1910. In his letter, the Pope emphasized the necessity for the development of a native clergy and missionary activities in the pagan regions.

[71] J. Schmitz, Die Abra-Mission auf Nordluzon/Philippinen von 1598–1955 (Sankt Augustin 1964); Engl. ed.: The Abra Mission in Northern Luzon, Philippines. 1598–1955 (Cebu City 1971); regarding the beginnings of Church life, see F. Schwager, "Die Mission auf den Philippinen," ZM 4 (1914), 198–236.

[72] K. M. Panikkar, Asien und die Herrschaft des Westens (Zurich 1955), passes harsh judgment upon the colonial powers (p. 103). See also F. Schwager, "Die ostindische Inselflur," ZM 3 (1913), 306–10.

[73] J. A. T. Weltjens, De Vrijheid der Katholieke Prediking in Nederlands-Indië van 1900 tot 1940 (partial publ. of a dissertation of the Gregoriana—Djakarta 1969).

[74] After 1881, the Mill Hill Missionaries worked among the Chinese and Dajaks on British North Borneo. In Dutch India, there were only sixteen official missions at the beginning of the twentieth century. This situation reflects Catholicism's difficult position in Holland.

Franciscans were joined in 1885 by the Sisters of Charity from Tilburg, who founded their first school in Padang (Sumatra); the Sisters of the Society of Jesus, Mary, and Joseph settled in Minahassa (Celebes).[75] Planting the seeds for the later growth of the Indonesian Church, these pioneers included a respectable number of missionaries who excelled in the area of language, e.g., the Jesuit Cornelius J. F. le Coq d'Armandville (1846–96), who in 1884 discovered the Portuguese Latin songs in Sika (Flores),[76] and Fr. Franciscus van Lith, the founder of the Mission of Central Java. After his arrival in 1896, he closely studied the culture of the country, desiring to enrich it through contacts with Christianity. His method of influencing the social milieu through a carefully educated elite bore rich fruit.[77]

The missions in the Pacific also had to cope with the explosive atmosphere of colonial expansion. The fact that all islands in the Pacific were divided among the Western powers had its impact on the course of Christianization.[78] Due to the presence of the greatest colonial power, Great Britain, Protestantism had a considerable head start, which motivated the Catholics, particularly the French, under the pontificates of Leo XIII and Pius X, to increase their activities. Continuing into most recent times, the denominational competition was occasionally intensified by national rivalries, the Protestant missionaries relying on England and the Catholic ones on France.[79] Because of this, they were accused of political activities, but today scholars assess the situation with more restraint. Though taking advantage of the assistance of the protective and colonial powers, the missionaries were mainly interested in assuring the success of their work: the Christianization of the people in question.[80]

---

[75] A. Mulders, De Missie in Tropisch Nederland ('s-Hertogenbosch 1940); regarding the situation around 1913, cf. K. Streit, "Die katholische Mission" (in Dutch India), ZM 3 (1913), 310–29; A. Djajasepoetra, "Het 75 jarig bestaan van de St. Claverbond," Missienieuws Jezuiten (Nijmegen 1965), Jan. 4–6; a series of other articles about the seventy-five years of missionary work on Java can be found here.

[76] Streit VIII, 486; B. Biermann, "Lieder der Florinesen," NZM 10 (1954), 141–45.

[77] Streit VIII, 829; L. van Rijckevorsel, Pastoor F. van Lith. S. J. De Stichter van de Missie in Midden-Java 1863–1926 (Nijmegen 1952).

[78] Les missions dans le Pacifique. Journal de la Société des Océanistes (cahier spécial, XXV [Paris 1970]; R. Jaspers, Die missionarische Erschließung Ozeaniens. Ein quellengeschichtlicher und missionsgeographischer Versuch zur kirchlichen Gebietsaufteilung in Ozeanien bis 1855 (Münster 1972).

[79] J. Schmidlin, "Missionsmethode und Politik der ersten Südsee-Missionare," ZMR 26 (1936), 255–63; A. Perbal, Les missionaires français et le nationalisme (Paris 1939), takes issue with Schmidlin's viewpoint.

[80] According to A. A. Koskinen, Missionary Influence as a Political Factor in the Pacific Islands (Helsinki 1953).

All in all, we can say that each one of the three societies primarily involved in missionary work settled in a different geographic area. The Picpus Fathers settled in the eastern Pacific. Even though their vicariates on the Hawaiian Islands (where Damian Deveuster died in 1889 in the service of the lepers on Molokai) and on the Gambier, Society, Marquesas, Paumotu, and Tubuaï Islands were all stagnating, they reached out toward the Windward Islands (1888) and later the Cook Islands (1894). In the central Pacific, the Marists (1887) expanded their area of work to the New Hebrides. When establishing the vicariate apostolic (New Hebrides, 1904), they had only twelve hundred faithful. However, at their headquarters on the Wallis and Futuna Islands, the life of the Church flourished. It also developed satisfactorily on the Fiji Islands under Julien Vital (after 1887 vicar apostolic) and on the Tonga Islands. They did not return to the Solomon Islands, which they had to abandon after forty years of difficult trials, until 1897 when the apostolic prefecture of the Southern Solomon Islands was established (in 1912 a vicariate apostolic).[81] During the revolt of 1878 on New Caledonia, they shared the fate of the colonial power and, fleeing under the protection of the French, paid their share with a number of lives.[82] Pierre-Marie Bataillon (1810–77), bishop of the Marists, deserves credit for having dared to improve the education of the native clergy. Failures and setbacks did not discourage him. He made his last and most decisive move when founding the seminary in Lane (Wallis Islands), where his successor was privileged to ordain the first four Polynesian priests in 1886. In the western Pacific, we find mostly the Sacred Heart Missionaries. From 1881 on, they took care of the huge Melanesian-Micronesian dual vicariate.[83] On the Bismarck Archipelago, New Britain,[84] New Ireland and the Admiralty Islands, they witnessed a remarkable increase in their communities around the turn of the century, and they were also successful on the Gilbert Islands under Monsignor Joseph Leray (after 1882 vicar apostolic of those islands). However, the apostolate on the Marshall Islands did not prosper. On Guam (Mariana [81] P. O. 'Reilly, H. Laraey, "Bibliographie des presses de la mission mariste des Îles Salomon," Journal de la Société des Océanistes 25 (1969), 257–92.

---

[82] R. Dousset, Colonialisme et contradictions. Études sur les causes socio-historiques de l'Insurrection de 1878 en Nouvelle-Calédonie (Paris 1970); reviewed by G. Höltker, Anthropos 66 (1971), 294f.; A. Saussol, "La mission mariste et la colonisation européenne en Nouvelle-Calédonie," Journal de la Société des Océanistes 25 (1969), 113–24.

[83] It dates from 1844; cf. Streit XXI, 127; J. Bertolini, "L'Océanie dans les Archives générales des Missionnaires du Sacré-Cœr," Journal de la Société des Océanistes 25 (Paris 1969), 359–82.

[84] Pioniere der Südsee. Werden und Wachsen der Herz-Jesu-Mission von Rabaul 1882–1932 (Commemorative ed. [Hiltrup 1932]).

Islands), German Capuchin friars replaced the Augustinian Recollects who had been driven out by the Americans in 1898.[85] From Austrialia, the Sacred Heart Missionaries traveled to New Guinea, settling first on Thursday Island (1884) and later on Christmas Island (1885). From here, Fr. L.-A. Navarre, later vicar apostolic, and Fr. St. E. Verjus (1860–90), who was well known and later elected chief, Christianized the British area.[86] In the Dutch section, we find the Sacred Heart Missionaries after 1903. In German New Guinea, the Society of the Divine Word laid a solid foundation for Catholic Christianity at the end of the last century. The Marists continued their work among the Maoris in the south of New Zealand (Wellington), the Mill Hill Missionaries in the north (Auckland). There were only three somewhat significant missionary attempts among the aborigines of Australia: the efforts of the Jesuits after the eighties in the north, of the Benedictines of New Norcia,[87] who received the new vicariate of Kimberley in 1887 and founded the daughter mission of Drysdale River, in 1910[88] and, finally, the attempts of the Trappists in Broome, which was given to the German Pallotines in 1900.

An important first step in all these missionary enterprises was the establishment of the apostolic delegature for Australia, New Zealand, and Oceania.[89] At the outbreak of World War I, the number of Catholics in the nineteen mission districts of the South Seas was one hundred ninety thousand, a truely unique accomplishment in the history of missions, demonstrating the endless optimism of the pioneers of the faith in an area that presented more difficulties than anyone could imagine.

Africa

During the same period, the African mission experienced a similarly stormy development. Although it had been in the background in the middle of the nineteenth century, it now became a focal point of interest. On the one hand, it profited from Europe's growing interest in the dark continent. On the other hand, it took advantage of the possibilities which opened up when the colonial powers occupied large areas of land.[90] The criticism that the missionaries were thinly disguised lackeys of the colonial authorities is refuted by the facts. With the exception of a few, the missionaries stayed away from wordly dealings. Not infrequently, conflicts arose with the administration because the missionaries felt obliged to represent the side of the Africans.[91] The Gospel was not always preached with the same enthusiasm and success. In White Africa (north of the Sahara) it gained hardly any ground, but, along the equator, Catholicism encountered the strongest response. Towards the south, the response gradually decreased.[92]

---

[85] C. Lopinot, "Zur Missionsgeschichte der Marianen und Karolinen," NZM 15 (1959), 305–08.

[86] Concerning Verjus, cf. Streit XXI, 279ff.; A. Dupeyrat, Papouasie. Histoire de la Mission 1885–1935 (Issoudun, Paris 1935); B. de Vaulx, Histoire des missions catholiques françaises (Paris 1951), 506–31.

[87] R. Salvado, Memorias históricas sobre la Australia y la Misión Benedictina de Nueva Nursia (Madrid 1946).

[88] AAS 2 (1910), 410f.; in regard to earlier missionary attempts by the Jesuits, cf. R. M. Berndt, "Surviving Influence of Mission Contact on the Daly River, Northern Territory of Australia," NZM 8 (1952), 81–95, 188–92.

[89] Litterae Apostolicae, 15 April 1914: Sylloge, 83f.; expanding over all the Pacific islands: ibid., 108 (20 May 1919).

In North Africa Christianity encountered the strongest resistance. From here the Islamic faith was to start its victorious course into the center of the continent. It was an element which the Christian churches had to face in many areas.[93] Out of concern for the Muslim population, the authorities did not permit missionary activities in many areas or they imposed restrictions (e.g., in British Sudan, today's Ghana, and in Cameroon). For a long time, there was no real Islamic mission, until Cardinal Lavigerie became archbishop of Algeria in 1867 and introduced drastic reforms. In his first pastoral letter, he demanded the right to deal with the Arabs and he was, indeed, given greater freedom.[94] In [90] L. H. Gann, P. Duignan, Colonialism in Africa 1870–1960, 2 vols. (London 1970); vol. II: 1914–60.—At times, the missionaries were the only whites settling anywhere. In some places, they followed trade or any firmly established foreign power. Partially, the intentions of the missions were identical with those of colonial policies (F. Blanke, "Mission und Kolonialpolitik," Europa und der Kolonialismus [Zurich 1962], 91–122; id., Missionsprobleme des Mittelalters und der Neuzeit [Zurich 1960]; F. Jäger, "Die Kolonisation Afrikas durch die Europäer—eine Kulturleistung," Universitas 17 [1962] 851–57.

---

[91] E. Dammann takes issue with those who consider any kind of colonial activity an error: "In some individual cases, the ties may have been too close. However, in general, a negative judgment is not justified. The earlier situation should not be measured by today's standards. Where else could and should missions have developed if not here?" (Das Christentum in Afrika [Munich, Hamburg 1968], 144; cf. ibid., 23f.).

[92] J. Beckmann, Die katholische Kirche im neuen Afrika (Einsiedeln 1947); W. Bühlmann, Afrika. Die Kirche unter den Völkern I (Mainz 1963).

[93] J. Beckmann, op. cit., 327–55: "Die Auseinandersetzung mit dem Islam"; G. Simon, Die Welt des Islams und ihre Berührung mit der Christenheit (Gütersloh 1930); C. Tiltak, "Die Neuausbreitung des Islam im 20. Jahrhundert," Saeculum 5 (1954), 359–75.—By 1950, 85 million of the 150 million Africans had converted to the religion of the prophet; 45 million were natives.

[94] Streit XVII, 743 (Lettre pastorale, 1867). Napoleon III granted him this right, MacMahon protested. Regarding the conflict with MacMahon, see M. Emerit, RH 223 (1960), 63–84.

1800, he was allowed to educate and baptize orphans whom he had collected in villages (Saint Cyprian, 1873, and Saint Monica, 1875). He also founded the first missions among the purely Muslim Berbers.[95] His disciples, the White Fathers, were supported by the Jesuits, for whom their general, Fr. Roothaan, a genius with vision, had devised a bold program.[96] Subsequently, the White Fathers moved toward the southeast, toward Shanija (three stations). The White Sisters opened a hospital in Biskra. By 1906, the number of Muslim converts had increased to eight hundred and the catechumens to two hundred within thirteen missions. This seems to be a small number, but in view of its principal significance, it represents an important achievement.

Lavigerie formulated his methodical principles regarding missions in his instructions to the missionaries (1878–79). Essentially, they are still valid, and they also inspired other societies in their behavior toward the Muslims.[97] He initially forbade preaching a specifically Christian message, as well as the baptism of individual candidates. He recommended instead the indirect apostolate (charity, schools, orphanages, visits with the natives), hoping to prepare the ground gradually.[98] The same course was taken by the "Apostle of the Sahara," Charles de Foucauld (1858–1916).[99] The primate of Africa demanded of his sons that they know the language, adapt to the life-style of the people who were to be converted, and practice friendship and active charity. Foucauld tried to put these principles into practice in Beni-Abbés and later in Tamanrasset. The White Fathers moved their post into the Sahara desert, where they settled in Gardaia, El Goléa, and Uargla, thus adding to the vicariate of Sahara (1891) the prefecture of Gardaia (1901), which was served by the hermit Foucauld.

In West Africa, the activities of Catholic missionaries began in the black independent state of Liberia. The efforts made on behalf of this country show what kind of obstacles were in the way of missionary work: unhealthy conditions, the Islamic faith penetrating from the north, the strong presence of Protestantism.[100] In many places, the colonial administration added to the difficulties. After their missionary attempts in the first half of the century failed, American secular priests and the Holy Ghost Fathers[101] returned in 1884. But the tropical climate decimated their numbers and they were replaced in 1903 by the Montfort Fathers. When they gave up, the prefecture was given to the Society of African Missions, headed by the courageous Étienne Kyne.[102] The two societies mentioned above, the Spiritans and the Lyon group, took care of a number of areas in West Africa around the turn of the century. Some of them seemed promising (southern Nigeria, the Ivory and the Gold Coast, Lower Volta, Dahomey, the Bight of Benin).[103] More missionaries arrived, such as the Pallottines in Cameroon in 1890. It was important for them that they began in 1901 to take care of the Yaundes (living near today's capital).[104] They contributed a great deal to the acquisition of large communities through farming and the development of small businesses, as well as an extensive school system where German was spoken almost exclusively. The female Pallottines took care of the women. In the north, in Adamaua, the priests of the Sacred Heart from Sittard took on responsibility, while the Divine Word Missionaries, mostly of German descent, moved into Togo in 1892, where they taught, developed agriculture, trained craftsmen, and worked a printing press (in Lomé).[105]

---

[95] J. Tiquot, Une expérience de petite colonisation indigène en Algérie. Les colons arabes-chrétiens du Cardinal Lavigerie (Algier 1936).

[96] A. Villanyi, "La fondation de la mission algérienne dans la correspondance du Père Général Roothaan," NZM 18 (1962), 196–207, 289–304; 19 (1963), 29–42. In a letter of 20 October 1849, Roothaan wrote: "Allez sans bruit dans les tribus voisines comme hôte et comme ami. C'est une œuvre de patience et d'un long dévouement" (ibid., 32).

[97] Instructions de son Éminence le Cardinal Lavigerie à ses Missionaires (Maison-Carrée 1927).

[98] J. Perraudin, Lavigerie. Ses principes missionaires (Fribourg 1941); J. Mazé, "Les idées principales du Cardinal Lavigerie sur l'Evangélisation de l'Afrique," RHM 2 (1925), 351–96.

[99] Streit XX, 475–91: bibliography; J. F. Six, Itinéraire spirituel de Charles de Foucauld (Paris 1958); id., "Le Père de Foucauld et ses recherches de fondations évangéliques," Rev. d'Asc. et de Mystique 36 (1960), 64–72.

---

[100] E. Dammann (op. cit., 24–58) lists as some of the predominantly Protestant missionary areas in Africa Gambia, Sierra Leone, Liberia, Ghana, Kenya, Tanzania, Malawi, Zambia, Rhodesia, the Republic of South Africa, Lesotho, Swaziland, Botswana, South West Africa; the predominantly Catholic areas are Portuguese Guinea, Guinea, the Ivory Coast, Togo, Dahomey, Equatorial Guinea, Cameroon, São Tomé, Príncipe, Gabun, Congo (Brazzaville), the Central African Republic, Zaïre, Angola, and Portuguese East Africa.

[101] The archbishop of Philadelphia sent his vicar general Barron to Liberia in 1840. He was joined by some Spiritans. Cf. H. J. Koren, The Spiritans. A History of the Congregation of the Holy Ghost (Louvain 1958).

[102] During the first sixty-five years, this society lost almost four hundred members in West Africa (283 priests and 110 sisters). Cf. R. Guilcher, La Société des Missions Africaines. Ses origines, sa nature, sa vie, ses œuvres (Lyon 1956); P. Falcon, "Bilan historique de l'action des Missions Africaines sur le continent noir," Revue Française d'Études Politiques Africaines 56 (Paris 1970), 12–36.

[103] See F. Schwager II, 85–112; R. Wiltgen, Gold Coast Mission History 1471–1880 (Techny, Ill. 1956): The author deals with practically all of West Africa.—Along the Ivory Coast, the Africa Society (active after 1895) used a steamship to maintain contact between the stations located on the coast.

[104] P. Hermann Nekes studied the language of the Yaundes (cf. Streit XVIII, 778–80).

[105] H. W. Debrunner, A Church between Colonial Powers. A Study of the Church in Togo (London 1965): especially about the Protestant missions; K. Müller, Geschichte der katholischen Kirche in Togo (Kaldenkirchen 1958); H. W. Gensichen, "Die deutsche

After 1839, when France began to sign treaties with kings and chiefs in the territory around the equator, gradually expanding the French Congo, the first missionaries started to arrive: in 1844, the Holy Ghost Fathers in Gabun and four years later the Sisters of the Immaculate Conception of Chartres. The Spiritans took care of the vicariate of Loango on the coast and the vicariate of Ubangi, which was responsible for the northeastern, the largest part of the colony (1890).[106] This district was first headed energetically by Bishop P.-P. Augouard (1852–1921). In spite of the lowliness of the population, he never doubted their Christianization. Suffering great privation, he took daring trips throughout the huge territory, founding missions in strategic places. Though he was always concerned with the well-being of the missions, he also rendered outstanding political service to his country, but France did not reward him.[107]

The area around the equator and central Africa belonged to those regions of black Africa that had been a focal point for preaching the Gospel since the fifteenth century. Libermann, Monsignor Bessieux, Mère Javouhey, and Monsignor de Marion-Brésillac planned to explore the Sudan, the enormous territory between the Atlantic ocean, the Sahara, Abyssinia, and the Congo.[108] Even though they were unable to penetrate the interior of the continent, their attempts resulted in solid foundations on the coasts of Guinea and Senegal. Others planned to approach the center of Africa from the north along the Nile river, instead of from the west. In 1847, a year after the vicariate apostolic of Central Africa was established, the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith itself sent out pioneers: Monsignor Annetto Casolani, Maximilian Ryllo, S.J., Emmanuele Pedemonte, S.J., and two trainees of the Congregation, Ignaz Knoblecher and Angelo Vinco. They made it all the way to Khartoum, where they failed in the attempt to found a mission.[109] There was another point from which some attempted to reach the desired goal. After a 999-day trip, Stanley had explored the course of the Congo River and discovered its mouth near Boma (1877).

Mission und der Kolonialismus," KuD VII, 1962, 136–49.

[106] Streit XVIII, 152, 268.

[107] Streit XVIII, 252ff.; G. Goyau, Monseigneur Augouard (Paris 1926); A. Perbal, "Le nationalisme de Mgr. Augouard," RHM 15 (1938), 385–407.

[108] A. Tanghe, "Essais de pénétration missionaires dans l'Afrique centrale," NZM 8 (1952), 230–33.

[109] Vicariate apostolic of Central Africa: Ius Pontificium V (Rome 1893), 361; in regard to the various individuals, cf. Streit XVII, 552f., 564f., 602f., 605f., 625f.; M. B. Storme, "Origine du Vicariat Apost. de l'Afrique Centrale," NZM 8 (1952), 105–18; id., "La renonciation de Mgr. Casolani, Vicaire Apostolique de l'Afrique Centrale," NZM 9 (1953), 290–305; R. Gray, A History of the Southern Sudan 1839–89 (Oxford 1961).

Africa's secret was found. Now, the missionaries were able to penetrate the Congo area from the west.

In this enterprise King Leopold II (1865–1909) played a unique role.[110] In 1876 he invited the Geographic Conference to Brussels. He was primarily interested in maintaining control of the initiative to explore the interior of Africa, pursuing the idea of Belgium's colonial expansion. During the debates about the establishment of international strongholds, most participants held the opinion that missionaries should help the explorers and traders to civilize the country. Leopold made sure that the final decisions were not in the hands of the missions because he had his own plans in this regard. Since the Belgian Catholics were sceptical, he informed the Holy See. Pius IX and his successor welcomed the royal plan.[111] Trying to pursue his policy, the monarch established the Association Internationale Africaine. In 1885, on the basis of the Berlin Conference, the independent state of the Congo was created. At first it was the private property of Leopold, after 1908 it became part of the Belgian kingdom. Aside from abolishing the slave trade and elevating the morals of the natives, the King was clearly interested in their Christianization. For that purpose, he pursued the establishment of the vicariate apostolic of the Belgian Congo (1888),[112] which was assigned to the Scheut Fathers because the King gave preference to his countrymen.[113]

The Congregation of the Immaculate Heart of Mary began its work and, subsidized by the government, gathered primarily slaves and children in closed settlements. This system was used in the Kasaï mission (1904, apostolic prefecture), one of the most beautiful settlements of the Scheut Fathers.[114] A similar method (the so-called Fermes-chapelles, including economic and cultural institutions) was employed by the Jesuits, settled in Kwango after 1893.[115] Thanks to the efforts of the Scheut Missionaries and the King it was possible to attract new missionary personnel: in 1894 the Trappists, in 1897 the Priests of the Sacred Heart of Jesus (Stanley Falls), in 1898 the Premonstratensians (northern Congo), in 1899 the Redemptorists (Matadi at the lower portion of the Congo River).[116] Here they were joined by many more missionaries from other orders and societies than anywhere else in Africa in the twentieth century. In spite of the enormous difficulties (slave trade, "Congo tortures," the population's stubborn belief in paganism, tropical diseases), the number of Christians increased (1910: fifty thousand; 1921: three hundred seventy-six thousand). In several areas, missionary activities began rather late, for instance in Ruanda-Urundi (around 1900), but after the twenties they were marvelously successful.[117] These results give an impression of the efforts made by Catholic Belgium on behalf of its colony.

---

[110] P. A. Roeykens, Les débuts de l'œuvre africaine de Léopold II 1875–79 (Brussels 1955).

[111] P. A. Roeykens, Le dessein africain de Léopold II. Nouvelles recherches sur sa genèse et sa nature 1875–76; id., Léopold et la Conférence géographique de Bruxelles 1876; id., La période initiale de l'œuvre africaine de Léopold II. Nouvelles recherches et documents inédits 1875–83. Tome X, fascs. 1–3 (Brussels 1956–57).

[112] Streit XVIII, 198.

[113] E. de Moreau, Les missionaires belges de 1804 jusqu'a nos jours (Brussels 1944); L. Anckaer, De evangelizatiemethode van de missionarissen van Scheut in Kongo 1888–1907 (Brussels 1970).—With the exception of the White Friars (vicariate of Upper Congo), the old missionaries had to leave their stations.

[114] M. B. Storme, Het Onstaan van de Kasai-Missie (Brussels 1961): regarding the first negotiations between 1881 and 1891 and the transferal of the Kasai mission (Luluabourg); id., Pater Cambier on de stichting van de Kasai-Missie (Brussels 1964). P. E. Cambier (1865–1943) was the founder of the mission. Its history from 1891 until 1894 is described on the basis of documents (id., Konflikt in de Kasai-Missie [Brussels 1965]). The civil authorities caused the most problems for the development of missionary activities; in this book, the author deals with the conflict of March 1894–June 1895.

Another advance into the interior of Africa was made from the east, after Livingstone had explored new possibilities and Leopold II's initiatives had aroused the interest of missionary circles. Three societies offered their services to the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, proposing to Christianize these promising regions. In 1877, Fr. Augustin Planque (1826–1907),[118] the first general of the Lyon Missionaries, offered to pursue this task. A year earlier, his priests had settled around the mouth of the Nile with the special assignment of reporting the results of the explorations, which were immediately known in Egypt, to the Roman authorities.[119] In 1878 Lavigerie wrote his extensive Mémoire secret for the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. In it he suggested ways and means for swift Christianization and the elimination of slavery.[120] The (tendentious) article resulted in the assignment of the missions in central Africa to the White Fathers on

---

[115] L. Dénis, Les Jésuites belges au Kwango 1893–1943 (Brussels 1943).

[116] M. Kratz, La mission des Rédemptoristes belges au Bas-Congo. La période des semailles 1899–1920 (Brussels 1970). Initially, they had no real concept for their missionary work. Therefore, they followed at first the Fermes-chapelles, later the Écoles-chapelles (according to the Protestants). Not until after 1921, along with the development of Kimbanguism, did they attempt definite accomodation.

[117] J. Perraudin, Naissance d'une Église. Histoire du Burundi chrétien (Usumbura, Burundi 1963).

[118] Regarding Planque, see Streit XVIII, 148f.

[119] M. B. Storme, Rapports du Père Planque, de Mgr. Lavigerie et de Mgr. Comboni sur l'Association Internationale Africaine (Brussels 1957).

[120] His attempt to penetrate Central Africa from the Kabyle mission had failed. In regard to his memoirs, cf. Streit XVII, 865f.; concerning his antislavery campaign, see F. Renault, Lavigerie, l'esclavage et l'Europe, 2 vols. (Paris 1971).

24 February 1878, four days after the election of Leo XIII.[121] The third person to promise establishing missions in the area of the great lakes was the vicar apostolic of central Africa in Khartoum, Monsignor Daniel Comboni, who, in contrast to Lavigerie, was in favor of the efforts made in Brussels. These areas belonged to his district.[122]

In 1878, starting from Zanzibar, the first caravan of White Fathers headed toward the interior of Africa. In Tabora, they separated into two groups. One, under the leadership of Fr. Léon Livinhac, traveled toward Lake Tanganyika. The other group, which had lost its leader, turned toward Lake Victoria.[123] Fr. Simeon Lourdel (1853–90) succeeded in negotiating with King Mtesa of Uganda. After a fine beginning, the mission got caught in the net of politics. Upon pressure by the Muslims (around the middle of the nineteenth century, the Arabs had entered the area via Zanzibar) and because of Mtesa's fear of British aggression, the missionaries had to leave the country in 1882, at least until after Mtesa's death (1884). His son, suspicious that the European missionaries were pioneers of the colonial powers, agreed. In October 1885, the Anglican Bishop Hannington was murdered, and in May of the following year, a large number of Christians became victims of the persecutions, among them even servants at the court of Charles Lwanga.[124] In 1894, when Britain took charge of the protectorate, a period of peace returned. However, particularly during the time of turbulence, the number of baptisms increased,[125] in spite of the strict requirements by the White Fathers. Thus the threat of the Muslims in the period before World War I was eliminated and Christianity was on the way to becoming a Church of the people.[126]

---

[121] With his allegations that the conference in Brussels was Protestant, Freemason, and anticlerical in spirit, the archbishop wanted to frighten Rome and incite the Propaganda to act swiftly. He was successful.

[122] The basic work about the evangelization efforts in Central and Equatorial Africa during the nineteenth century: M. B. Storme, Evangelisatiepogingen in de binnenlanden van Africa gedurende de XIXe eeuw (Brussels 1951).

[123] Regarding the pénétration laïque et religieuse from the east, cf. R. Heremans, Les établissements de l'Association Internationale Africaine au lac Tanganika et les Pères Blancs. Mpala et Karéma 1877–85 (Tervuren 1966). Between 1879 and 1885, Lavigerie sent forty-six missionaries to the two missions of Nyanza and Tanganyika in order to outdo the Association and the Protestants in every respect and to establish a Christian kingdom.

[124] Among the victims were also Anglican Christians. The beatification of the twenty-two martyrs of Uganda took place on 6 June 1920, their canonization on 18 October 1964 (G. Goyau, "Le Cinquantenaire des Martyrs d'Ouganda," RHM 13 [1936], 321–40; Streit XVIII–XX, passim; biblio. also in A. Mulders, op. cit., 406f.).

[125] The situation of the Christians was aggravated by the presence of the Arabs as well as by the tensions between the Catholics and the Protestants.

[126] J. V. Taylor, Die Kirche in Uganda. Das Werden einer jungen afrikanischen Kirche (Stuttgart 1966). This is a model for the study of a local church. The author indicates the

The Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith responded to this upswing by dividing the old district Nyanza into three vicariates, North Nyanza (Uganda), South Nyanza, assigned to the disciples of Lavigerie, and the Upper Nile, which was given to the Mill Hill Missionaries who used similar methods successfully.[127] The Consolata Missionaries in near-by Kenya (since 1902) were hampered by the fact that the coast was totally Muslim.[128] Toward the south, in East Africa (today Tanzania), Germany had colonial interests. Its protectorate received its final borders in 1890 through the Helgoland Treaty.[129] The Holy Ghost Fathers, in this area after 1863, moved their positions from Bogamayo to Kilimanjaro. They placed great emphasis on economic enterprises and colonization. The White Fathers had more visible successes around the turn of the century in the interior of Africa, in the four vicariates east of Lake Victoria and Lake Tanganyika where they rigorously applied the catechumenate's discipline (according to the directives of their founder). In spite of bad setbacks (during the uprisings of 1889 and 1905), the German Benedictines of Saint Ottilien (after 1888) developed a new mission in Dar es Salaam (1902: vicariate apostolic), which pursued pastoral, educational, and agricultural activities.[130] The Trappists of Mariannhill were briefly engaged (1887–1907) in German East Africa. A shortsighted measure caused them to be recalled from their promising cultural work in the two missions of Gare and Irente in the Usumbura Mountains contrary to the desires of the German colonial administration.[131] During the first East African Episcopal Conference in Dar es Salaam, in July 1912, it became clear that the area, with its seven flourishing vicariates, was outgrowing its status as a mission and that seeds of a native Church had sprung up, for which a well-structured rivalries between the three religions. At that time, this implied choosing between the Arabian, French, or British power.—In 1884, there were 10,000 Christians and 60,000 catechumens in Uganda; in 1904: 86,000 Christians and 135,000 catechumens.

---

[127] H. P. Gale, Uganda and the Mill-Hill Fathers (London 1959): a critical study of the conflicts between the Muslims, the Protestants, the Catholics, and the pagans.

[128] Establishment of the vicariate apostolic of Kenya: Streit XVIII, 1183.

[129] J. Schmidlin, Die katholischen Missionen in den deutschen Schutzgebieten (Münster i. W. 1913); S. Hertlein, Aufbau der Kirche in Tansania (Münsterschwarzach 1971).

[130] F. Renner, "Die Benediktinermission in Ostafrika—eine Überschau," F. Renner, Der fünfarmige Leuchter II (Sankt Ottilien 1971), 123–52; L. Kilger, "Die Missionsgedanken bei der Benediktinergründung von St. Ottilien und die Übernahme der Afrikamission," ZMR 24 (1934), 213–28; J. Eggert, Missionsschule und sozialer Wandel in Ostafrika (Bielefeld 1970).

[131] H. Stirnimann, "Mariannhiller Trappisten in Deutsch-OstAfrika 1897–1907," NZM 25 (1969), 167–80.

catechumenate and the diligent cultivation of religious and liturgical life were characteristic.[132]

In the middle of the nineteenth century, a simply catastrophic situation had resulted from the practice of the patronate in the territories of Portugal in West and East Africa. As good and as necessary as it may have been at one point, this institution was largely to blame for the decline of the missions, running parallel with the collapse in the motherland. The efforts of the Spiritans to take over the abandoned areas found little response until, in 1865, they received permission to work there. One year later they were able to begin. There were five priests in all of Angola.[133] The leadership of the order gradually arrived at the conviction that only missionaries under Portuguese leadership were able to produce fruitful results. Therefore, the Swiss Father J. G. Eigenmann set out to found a settlement or a school of his order in Portugal. In 1869 he was appointed head of the Congo seminary in Santarem, the birthplace of the Portuguese province of the Holy Ghost Fathers. The first priest from the school of Eigenmann, Father José Maria Antunes, went to the mission in Huila (south of Angola) in 1882 to reorganize it.[134] Fathers H. Carrie, C. A. Duparquet, Monsignor L. A. Keiling, and Antunes were all especially important in the tedious new beginning and the slow ascent of the mission.[135] The revolution in the homeland (1910), followed by the separation of Church and state, destroyed a large part of the work abroad. The situation was even worse in the Portuguese part of East Africa, where, after the expulsion of the Jesuits, only a few secular priests were left, mainly Goans, to assure the religious care of the Christians. The Jesuits turned to the heathen missions again in 1881 in the lower portion of the Zambezi river. Due to the relentless climate, they lost thirty-seven members in twenty years. Nevertheless, they managed the founding of several new centers and smaller communities, until they had to leave in 1911. The Divine Word Missionaries, admitted through political pressure, gave a guest performance, so to speak, because they were expelled in 1918.[136] It is not surprising that there were only about five thousand Catholic Africans in this vast country at the beginning of World War I.

---

[132] Beschlüsse der ersten Konferenz der afrikanischen Bischöfe im Juli 1912 (Kath. Miss. Druckerei, Dar es Salaam 1912).

[133] A. Brásio, Spiritana Monumenta Historica. Series Africana 1, Angola, vol. I, 1596–1867 (Pittsburgh, Louvain 1966); cf. review by J. Beckmann, NZM 24 (1968), 232f.; C. Ferreira da Costa, Cem anos dos Missionários do Espírito Santo em Angola 1866–1966 (Nova Lisboa, Angola 1970).

[134] Brásio, Spiritana Monumenta Historica. Series Africana. 1, Angola, vol. II, 1868–1881 (Pittsburgh, Louvain 1968); cf. review by J. Beckmann, NZM 25 (1969), 227.

[135] Concerning Carrie, see Streit XVIII, 530, concerning Keiling, ibid., 483ff.

[136] F. Schwager II, 149f.; P. Schebesta, Portugals Conquistamission in Südostafrika. Missionsgeschichte Sambesiens und des Monomotapareiches 1560–1920 (Sankt Augustin 1966).

Eight of the Jesuits who had been driven out of Mozambique, mostly Austrians and Poles, settled in 1910 in neighboring northern Rhodesia.[137] The Society of Jesus had long endeavored to found a permanent settlement there. Fathers Joseph Moreau and Jules Torrend from the Zambesi mission (in southern Rhodesia) were permitted to settle in Tongaland.[138] Pioneers of the agricultural development of northern Rhodesia, they taught the population modern methods of agriculture and cattle breeding. They were also accomplished in the areas of linguistics and ethnology, especially Torrend, who gained a reputation with his research of the Bantu languages.[139]

In 1879, the Zambezi expedition set out from Cape Town. Headed by the Belgian Jesuit Father Henri Depelchin (1822–1900), an experienced Indian missionary, the group of six priests (among them the German Fathers Anton Terörde [died in 1880] and Karl Fuchs) and five laymen arrived at Victoria Falls in 1880.[140] They established the first station in the land of the Tongas. In spite of the massive reinforcement of fifty-one members which the Society received the following year, they were unable to hold their ground in the northern part of the Zambesi until the beginning of the twentieth century. In the northern region of today's Zambia, the area between Lake Bangwenlu and Lake Nyasa, the White Fathers laid the foundation for their mission among the Bembas (1895). They were headed by Father Joseph Dupont (1850–1930), who was appointed first vicar apostolic of Nyasa in 1897 when this district was separated from the Tanganyika mission.[141] Even though the "wild" tribe of the Bembas had to be trained to settle down, the mission under Bishop Dupont,[142] mainly by way of education and new agricultural methods, reached a remarkable level (1911: six thousand Catholics, fifty-seven catechumens, eighteen thousand pupils).

---

[137] S. Reil, Kleine Kirchengeschichte Sambias (Münsterschwarzach 1969), 34–37; R. L. Rotberg, Christian Missionaries and the Creation of Northern Rhodesia 1880–1924 (Princeton 1965).

[138] S. Reil, op. cit., 32–34.

[139] Regarding Torrend, cf. Streit XVIII, 176f.; concerning Moreau, see ibid., 626f.

[140] J. Spillmann, Vom Cap zum Sambesi. Die Anfänge der Sambesi-Mission. Aus den Tagebüchern des P. Terörde S. J. und aus den Berichten der anderen Missionare dargestellt (Freiburg 1882); excerpts from the diaries of Depelchin and Charles Croonenbergh in Diaries of the Jesuit Missionaries at Bulawayo 1879–1881 (Salisbury 1959).

[141] S. Reil, op. cit., 22ff.—In 1913, the division into the vicariates of Bangweulu and Nyasa occurred (Streit XX, 618).

[142] Dupont had a lot of conflicts with the British colonial authorities. They accused him of pursuing political goals in favor of France.

From the beginning, a number of White Fathers qualified as linguists and their studies rendered invaluable services to their successors.[143]

Aside from the Muslim north, the Catholic missionaries did not encounter anywhere the kind of difficulties they had to cope with in the south of the dark continent.[144] Since they appeared rather late (middle of the nineteenth century), the Roman Church had trouble catching up with the headstart of the Protestants who had worked in these areas intensively. This situation was aggravated by the customary intolerance of the Boers, partly by the British residing in the country since 1806, by the racial differences, and by the numerous sects and African splinter groups which had begun before the turn of the century.[145] In the northern part of German South West Africa, the Oblates of Mary Immaculate arrived and began work in 1896 (at the end of the seventies, the Spiritans had failed) in the prefecture of Lower Zimbabwe, founded in 1892. They also succeeded the missionaries of Lyon north of the Orange Free State (1882) and worked in Transvaal. But progress was slow, even though the Jesuits and Dominicans sisters who had been called from Augsburg to Grahamstown to organize a college could report modest success around 1876 among the Xhosas (east of the Cape of Good Hope area). Statistics may illuminate the situation: in 1911, the number of Catholics in the South African Union (with 4.7 million non-Europeans) was thirty-seven thousand, the Protestants had 1.4 million faithful.[146]

The work was difficult, yet there were two areas in which the Catholics excelled: Basutoland deserves first mention (Lesotho).[147] The Oblates, active in this mountainous and remote region since 1862, managed to establish an influential position, partly owing to their friendly relations with the chiefs. The Sisters of the Holy Family, who arrived in 1865, trained a dozen native sisters by 1912. After 1908, the Menzingen Sisters assisted with social work.[148] The other flourishing mission was located in Natal, which had been assigned to the Oblates in 1850 as a vicariate. This was the center of Mariannhill founded in 1882 by German Trappists under the leadership of Abbot Franz Pfanner (1825–1909).[149] Their life-style, based on Benedictine rules, facilitated social and economic activities which were mandatory in view of the local circumstances. They acquired a large complex of land, settled Bantus, and organized an impressive educational system (with a school, seminary, small businesses, printing press, and hospital).[150] The women were cared for by the Sisters of the Precious Blood.

---

[143] Louis Guillermé, Eugène Pueth, Louis Molinier, Georges Schoeffer.

[144] B. Hutchinson, "Some Social Consequences of XIXth Century Missionary Activity among the South African Bantu," Africa 27 (London 1957), 160–77.

[145] Cf. E. Dammann, op. cit., 53, 160ff., incl. extensive biblio. regarding the post-Christian movements in Africa.

[146] W. E. Brown, The Catholic Church in South Africa. From its Origins to the Present Day (London 1960). The author expresses regret about the Church having missed its chances. He attributes this to the excessively cautious attitude of the vicars apostolic, who tried to avoid any kind of aggravation and scandal and left creative work to others, especially at the beginning of the twentieth century.—Cf. also J. E. Brady, Trekking for Souls (Cedara, Natal 1952).

[147] M. Bierbaum, "Die Entwicklung der katholischen Mission in Basutoland," ZMR 1 (1938), 133–44.

Finally, the island of Madagascar should be mentioned (elevated to vicariate apostolic in 1885). Experiencing difficulties due to pressures from the pro-Protestant governments of the sixties and seventies, the Jesuits were nevertheless able to expand their activities. After they were temporarily deported during the occupation of the country by France and during the turmoils at the end of the century, they received assistance in 1896 from the ranks of the Lazarists,[151] two years later from the Spiritans,[152] and in 1899 from the missionaries of La Salette. In 1906, the French Kulturkampf affected the East African islands and dealt the Church a severe blow. This did not stop its growth, however, but rather caused a constructive process of internal cleansing.

Reviewing the missionary activities under the pontificates of Leo XIII and Pius X, one must describe this period as epoch-making and highly important for Africa as well as the Pacific. Almost everywhere, new communities were established. Quantitatively as well as qualitatively remarkable feats were accomplished in such a short time span. But the missions were now outgrowing the first phase and trying to achieve independence and a character of their own. Even though the missionaries were indebted to the spirit of their time, they remained loyal to their true mission, the preaching of the Gospel.[153]

---

[148] In 1914 the number of Catholics was around 15,000. Basutoland became an apostolic prefecture in 1894, a vicariate apostolic in 1909 (Streit XVII, 404, 1183).

[149] J. Dahm, Mariannhill. Seine innere Entwicklung sowie seine Bedeutung für die katholische Missions- und Kulturgeschichte Südafrikas. I. Zeitabschnitt: Von der Gründung Mariann-Hills 1882 bis zur Trennung vom Trappistenorden 1909 (Mariannhill, Natal 1950).—Long before Mariannhill was founded, the German Protestant missionaries had started in other parts of Africa to work particularly with the rural population, and they had taken similar paths.—See A. Roos, Mariannhill zwischen zwei Idealen (diss., Innsbruck 1962), 13–99, regarding the tragic life of Pfanner, who had established eleven missions, which caused him to be in conflict with the rules of his order. Consequently, he was recalled in 1893.

[150] G. M. Lautenschlager, Die sozialen Ordnungen bei den Zulus und die Mariannhiller Mission von 1882 bis 1909 (Reimlingen 1963).—Likewise, the research accomplishments in Mariannhill were quite remarkable, e.g., the studies of Zulu language and history by W. Wanger (1872–1943) and A. T. Bryant (1865–1953). See Streit XVIII, 493–95; XX, 17–19. Mariannhill also made the first courageous attempt to publish a truly African religious textbook: the great Wanger catechism of 1912 in the Zulu language. Cf. L. A. Mettler, Christliche Terminologie und Katechismus-Gestaltung in der Mariannhiller Mission 1910–1920 (Schöneck-Beckenried 1967).

[151] P. Coste, "Saint Vincent de Paul et la Mission de Madagascar," RHM 4 (1927), 26–61, 217–50.

[152] G. le Faucheur, "Madagascar et les Spiritains," RHM 5 (1928), 407–37.

[153] H. Jedin offers the following conclusion: "On the whole we may say that most of the missionaries were able to preserve the independence of evangelization, and the "natives" were quite capable of differentiating between colonialism and mission activity" ("Weltmission and Kolonialismus," Saeculum 9 [1958], 393–404, quot. 401).

CHAPTER 39

The Development of New Churches

World War I clearly interrupted the missionary activities. The missionary work that had seemed so very promising before the outbreak suffered severe reverses during the upheaval. After the peace was signed, missionary work experienced a decisive new orientation. Well aware of the multiplicity of relationships and tensions between colonialism and missions, the chief authorities of the Church were intent on de-politicizing missionary work. On the other hand, they focused more and more on the independence of the established communities. The period of the pontificates of Benedict XV and Pius XI entailed a basic rejection of Europeanism and can be called an era of increased adjustment to the peoples who were to be converted. Even though the past still had its effect here and there, the model of the native church was clearly in everyone's mind.[1]

The consequences of the war were first felt in the economic sector and in personal life.[2] The subsidies from the home countries decreased considerably or dried up completely. The countries directly involved in the war were affected, while the neutral countries, at least partially, filled the gaps. In spite of an early hope that the colonies might be spared the devastations of the war, hostilities also broke out in the German protectorates. In those areas where no actual fighting took place, the missionary activities suffered noticeably from the recall of numerous missionary personnel. This was particularly true in the case of French citizens, whose departure left many a region abandoned,[3] and in the case of the Italian missions, though to a less devastating degree. The missions of the Germans were particularly burdened by the events of the war. In many places, the missionaries were expelled, imprisoned, or deported, which affected the settlements badly. This happened to the Pallottines in Cameroon, the Divine World Missionaries in Togo, and the Benedictines in East Africa, who all were forced to leave. The German missionaries in British India suffered a similar fate. However, they were able to stay in German South West Africa and, to some extent, in the Far East.[4] The spiritual damages of the war had more impact than the material and personnel losses. The belligerent Western nations, representing Christianity, also infected the missions with the idea of nationalism. In their disunion, they presented an annoying picture to the non-Europeans, causing the halo that had surrounded the white races to fade.

---

[1] It should not be forgotten that, at that time, the colonial areas covered two-thirds of the globe and that, of the world's population of 2 billion people, 700 million were subjected to foreign rule (cf. G. Balandier, "Die koloniale Situation: ein theoretischer Ansatz," R. v. Albertini, Moderne Kolonialgeschichte [Cologne, Berlin 1970], 105–24; R. Delavignette, Christianisme et colonialisme [Paris 1960], 19).

[2] X. Bürkler, "Der Weltkrieg 1914–18 und die Mission," Kath. Missionsjahrbuch der Schweiz 11 (Fribourg 1944), 22–29; cf. the war-mission reviews in ZM, 1915–19.

In order to heal the wounds inflicted by the war, many missionaries returned to their communities after the peace treaty, particularly from the victorious countries, such as the French. The Catholic Church found it easier to recruit replacements for those areas that the missionaries had been forced to leave. This allowed the Church (in some areas) to catch up more rapidly than the Protestants. On the basis of ARTICLES 438 and 122 of the Versailles Treaty, the German missionaries found their missionary freedom limited. However, in retrospect the destruction of the unity of mission and colonial power was a salutary move, even though it was one-sided.[5] At least this was the beginning of the dissolution of the close ties between national and missionary interests, of the liberation of the missions from the burden of colonialism, and of once again focusing on the supranationality of the Church and its mission.[6] [3] During the war, 5,000 French missionaries were drafted: in the summer of 1915, for instance, more than 200 Paris Missionaries, as compared to 200 White Friars and the same number of Lazarists.

---

[4] At the outbreak of the war, approximately 1,100 German priests, 850 clergymen and brothers and 2,000 sisters worked in all missionary regions. By the end of the war: 192 priests, 76 brothers and 249 sisters were expelled; 126 priests, 220 brothers and 76 sisters were imprisoned or interned.

[5] Cf. W. Holstein, "Die Mission in den völkerrechtlichen Verträgen und Verfassungen der Neuzeit," Basileia, Festschrift für Walter Freytag (Stuttgart 1959), 106–27, esp. 117f.

[6] F. Kollbrunner, "Abkehr vom Europäismus und universale Haltung im Missionswerk 1919–59," NZM 28 (1972), 117–32; id., "Die einheimische Kirche als Konsequenz der Katholizität (1919–1959)," NZM 29 (1973), 10–27.

It is to Benedict XV's credit that he dealt with this question courageously. In a situation of extreme national pathos, he offered clarification, rigorously uncovering the weakness of the missionary activity of the Church (the nationalistic attitude of individual representatives and the colonialist missionary methods).[7] Since he partially overcame Europeanism, also introducing a change in missionary theology, he deserves the name "Missionary Pope" as much as his successor, who, following Benedict's ideas, set out to realize the program outlined in Maximum illud. There is no doubt that the apostolic letter of 30 November 1919 was the Magna Carta of the modern missions.[8] The initiative is said to have been made by Guido Conforti, the founder of the Missionaries of Parma. The Dutch Redemptorist and long-term prefect of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, Cardinal Willem van Rossum, is considered to have had decisive influence on the writing of the document.[9]

During the time of Leo XIII, who loved openness and space, the universal responsibility of the Church was already clearly visible. Through his concern for the salvation of all mankind, he brought the missions back into the fold of the Church, integrating the doctrine of the mission into that of the Church. At the same time, in contrast to his predecessors, he assessed the situation of the non-Christians more positively.[10] Pius X, on the other hand, almost completely neglected the "others"; therefore hardly perceiving their true nature. He seemed to turn exclusively inward and did not include the missions in his reform plan—a fatal limitation of the idea of restoration, which caused Church and mission to be separated again and appear to be divided and unrelated entities.[11] This was changed by Benedict XV, who resolutely opened the Church to the missions and restored them as a basic function of the Church itself. His reintroduction of the plural ecclesiae into the ecclesiastical perception of the Popes (the expression had previously been used in an abstract sense) had far-reaching consequences for his concept of the missions. The recognition that the entire Church is composed of individual churches suggests that one not speak of the propagation of the faith in merely general terms but that one plan in concrete terms the formation of new individual Churches.[12] In the final analysis, this view emanated from the fact that the Church was taking its catholicity seriously.

---

[7] Amidst the climax of nationalism it was not easy to preserve impartiality; both camps expressed their discontent with the Pope. Cf. G. Maron, "Die römisch-katholische Kirche von 1870 bis 1970," Die Kirche in ihrer Geschichte. Ein Handbuch, ed. by K. D. Schmidt and E. Wolf, vol. 4, no. 2 (Göttingen 1972), 214f.

[8] This is not an encyclical; the text can be found in Sylloge, 113–28; Germ.—in Marmy, Auf der Maur, 7–25; Lat.-Germ. in Glazik, Päpstliche Rundschreiben, 18ff. The Magna Carta is discussed in J. Beckmann, La Congrégation de la Propagation de la Foi face à la politique internationale (Schöneck-Beckenried 1963); Delacroix III, 128f.; A. Rétif, Les Papes contemporains et la mission (Paris 1966), 40: le premier grand document missionnaire du siècle.

[9] In regard to Conforti and Maximum illud, cf. J. Paventi, "Tres Encíclicas o una Trilogía misionera," Misiones Extranjeras 3 (Burgos 1952), 88–104; J.-M. Drehmanns, "Le Cardinal van Rossum et l'Encyclique Rerum Ecclesiae," Le Bulletin des Missions 25 (1951), 227–30: "Il (sc. van Rossum) élabora le projet de 'Maximum illud' " (228). Regarding Lebbe's influence, cf. J. Glazik, "Die Missions-Enzyklika 'Maximum illud' Benedikts XV. (1919)," W. Sandfuchs, Das Wort der Päpste (Würzburg 1965), 65–74 (esp. 66).

[10] The best presentation of the integration of Church and mission: P. Wanko, Kirche—Mission—Missionen. Eine Untersuchung der ekklesiologischen und missiologischen Aussagen vom I. Vatikanum bis "Maximum illud" (diss., Münster 1968), 42ff. A continuation of this study in F. Kollbrunner, Die Katholizität der Kirche und die Mission in der kirchenamtlichen, ekklesiologischen und missionswissenschaftlichen Literatur der Zeit von "Maximum illud" bis "Princeps Pastorum" 1919–59 (diss., Gregoriana, Rome 1970).

With his new ecclesiological, missiological concept, Benedict offered a basic answer to the postwar conditions. In Maximum illud he focused on a series of urgent individual problems.[13] First, he clearly rejected the nationalistic attitude of certain missionaries, emphasizing the ecclesiastical nature of the missions. Those, he said, who "think more of the wordly than of the heavenly fatherland" and confuse the interests of the nation with those of the Gospel bring Christianity under suspicion of being the concern of the foreign state under whose mandate and as whose agents the missionaries act. He did not hesitate to stigmatize such an attitude as pestis teterrima. The truely "Catholic" missionary is intent only on representing Christ, not his own nation.[14] The Pope developed a missionary strategy that was rooted in mercy: The missionary will never meet anyone with disrespect, no matter how lowly he may be. Rather, "through all the kindness of Christian mercy" he will try to win him to the Gospel. When he defined missionary activity, Benedict also emphasized its ecclesiastical character. It is not exclusively the Pope (as was the case with his predecessors) who stands in the face of Christ and obeys his missionary order, but the Church as a whole.[15] He therefore impressed on the missionaries (mainly their leaders) not to be satisfied with their achievements, but "to strive for the salvation of all people without exception." In order to accomplish this, the leader will, in the true "Catholic" spirit, involve other missionary institutions, if necessary, regardless of whether they are a member of a foreign order or nation. This was clearly aimed at the narrow-minded esprit de corps of the missionary societies. With his recommendation to discuss and resolve common problems with the neighboring areas, the Pope tried to combat any kind of particularism, replacing it with the spirit of cooperation.

---

[11] P. Wanko, op. cit., 67ff.

[12] Cf. Motu proprio Dei providentis of 1 May 1917, pertaining to the establishment of the Congregation for the Eastern Churches (a step that was also important theologically): AAS 9 (1917), 529. Benedict uses the plural (particulares ecclesiae) in regard to the people in the Middle East, but he also deals with the missionary churches.

[13] Cf. the reviews of the papal document (which do not discuss the theological questions): G. Goyau, Missions et missionnaires (Paris 1931), 169–81; M. Grösser, "Das Missionswesen im Lichte des päpstlichen Sendschreibens 'Maximum illud,' " ZM 10 (1920), 73–86; A. Huonder, "Das Missionsrundschreiben Benedikts XV.," StdZ 98 (1920), 433–41.

[14] Elsewhere he says: "Memineritis non hominum debere vos imperium propagare, sed Christi, nec patriae quae hic est, sed patriae quae sursum cives adiicere" (Sylloge, 120).

[15] The Church as a whole is obligated to obey Jesus Christ; this is expressed in the

The goal of missionary work, as the Pope envisioned it, is, in addition to the conversion of individuals, the founding of churches.[16] This requires a native clergy that could "one day take charge of its people." Because the future of new churches is dependent upon the existence of thoroughly trained priests, this task, resting on the universality of the Church, demands the special attention of the responsible missionary staff. Benedict considered this the only way to acclimate the Church and the only possibility to do justice to the characteristics of the people or to harvest its treasures for the benefit of the Church. Unfortunately, the life of the Christian communities is neglected by the papal considerations—they are merely the terminus ad quem of the missionary efforts and their own significance does not come to the fore. Nevertheless, the Pope attempted not only to turn to the Church at home, but contemplated the problems from the perspective of the missions themselves.[17]

The principles outlined in Maximum illud were completed in the instructions to the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, entitled Quo efficacius (6 January 1920).[18] Referring to the classic passage according to which Christianity should not be alien to any nation, these instructions remind the missionaries to understand their task as a spiritual and religious one. They are asked to practice strict neutrality in political matters and forbidden to propagate their own laws and customs in the foreign country.[19] Benedict tried to instill new energy into apostolic activities. This is demonstrated, on the one hand, by his measures beginning of the letter: "Divini mandati memor, Ecclesia numquam, labentibus saeculis, cessavit adhuc traditae divinitus doctrinae partaeque humano generi per Christum salutis aeternae nuntios et administros in omnes partes mittere" (Sylloge, 114).

---

[16] The individual aspect takes priority in Maximum illud, however, the Pope acknowledges both the individual and the social element.

[17] Schmidlin, PG III, 252, already recognized this peculiarity of the letter.

[18] Sylloge, 131–35.

[19] The prophetic words in the instructions of the Propaganda of 23 November 1845 (Collectanea I, 544f.) about the dangers of politics in the missions should not be ignored; ibid., the progressive ideas concerning the elimination of the native episcopate.

to increase the missionary hierarchy (he established twenty-eight apostolic vicariates and eight prefectures as well as a delegation for Japan, Korea, and Formosa [1919][20]) and his order to conduct apostolic inspections (e.g., in China and South Africa); and, on the other hand, by his initiatives regarding the missionary relief system at home. In order to make the papal project more effective for the native clergy, he assigned its supervision to the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, thus locating it in Rome. The Unio Cleri pro Missionibus, founded in 1915 by the energetic Father Paolo Manna (1872–1952)[21] and Bishop G. M. Conforti of Parma and approved in 1916, was incorporated in 1916 in the Roman headquarters. The Union of Priests and Missionaries quickly expanded into Canada, Germany, and Switzerland. Finally, during this pontificate, several missionary seminaries were established (for the purpose of founding missions manned by secular priests), such as the seminary of Maynooth-Galway (Ireland, 1917), of Almonte (Canada, 1919), of Burgos (Spain, 1919), of Montreal (Canada, 1921), and of Bethlehem Immensee (Switzerland, 1921).[22] Many of these progressive activities under Benedict XV and later under Pius XI came about thanks to the open-mindedness of van Rossum, who is rightfully considered the pioneer of the Catholic "world mission." After all, he did away with Europeanism, pushed for adaptation, and worked toward the training and development of the native clergy under the supervision of native bishops.[23]

The missionary programs that Benedict XV initiated during his relatively brief pontificate were continued by Pius XI and put into action. The prefect of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith of both papal administrations made sure that a continuity was preserved.[24] By emphasizing certain aspects initiated by his predecessor, Pius XI shifted the focal point to the theme of universality, to the independence of the new churches and to their growing roots in the native soil, thus to indigenization.[25] The preaching of the Gospel all over the world is the most essential task of the papal office, Pius XI declared at the beginning of his pontificate[26] (in 1922, the centennials of three missions were celebrated).[27] In cooperation with the Pope, the entire episcopate has an obligation toward the task of mission because it represents the universal Church.[28] The Pope required the same efforts from the priests, telling them at the first international congress of the Unio Cleri in Rome (3 June 1922) that the missionary apostolate is not just to be pursued by a special task force but by the entire Church, so that every church would gradually develop into a cell active in missionary work.[29] According to the Pope, the secret of the universality of the Church rests in charity. Love of God and one's fellow man extends it and allows it to grow roots in areas where the population does not know Christ yet. The Church is not primarily self-serving, but exists to serve all.[30] According to his maxim that missions should have priority among Catholic works,[31] he opened during the Sacred Year the mission exhibition of the Vatican, which lived on in the founding of a missionary ethnological museum in the Lateran (1926). Furthermore, in order to awaken the missionary spirit in the entire Christian community, he declared in 1927 the second to the last Sunday in October to be observed as Mission Sunday. In 1922 he moved the Society for the Propagation of the Faith to Rome, incorporated it into the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith and elevated it to a papal work (with new statutes). In 1929, he also initiated the coordination of the three most important organs (Childhood of Jesus, Propagation of the Faith, and Work of Saint Peter). He probably did this hoping to solicit more funds and to distribute them more fairly, but also in order to dissolve the regional national ties of the large missionary societies.

---

[20] Sylloge, 112f.: Litterae Apost. of 26 November 1919.

[21] P. G. B. Tragella, Un'anima di fuoco P. Paolo Manna (Naples 1954).

[22] The Society for Foreign Missions of Maryknoll, U.S.A., was founded in 1911 (B. Arens, Handbuch der katholischen Missionen [Freiburg ²1927], 65–72). Regarding the Foreign Missionary Society of Bethlehem (Immensee), see R. Rust, Die Bethlehem Missionare (1962).

[23] Van Rossum (born 1854) was prefect of the Propaganda from 1918 until his death in 1932; cf. N. Kowalsky, LThK IX, 59f.; J. O. Smit, W. M. Kardinal van Rossum (Roermond 1955).

[24] Cf. J.-M. Drehmanns, op. cit.

[25] J. Schmidlin, "Pius XI. als Missionspapst," ZMR 27 (1923), 233–43 (incl. biblio. concerning the missionary aspect of this pontificate); M. Ledrus, "La doctrine missionnaire de S. S. Pie XI," NRTh 56 (1929), 481–94.

---

[26] Three hundred years after the establishment of the Propaganda and the canonization of Francis Xavier and one hundred years since the beginning of the work of the propagation of the faith.

[27] The beginning of the Motu proprio of 3 May 1922: "Romanorum Pontificum in hoc maxime versari curas planum est oportere, ut sempiternam animarum salutem, Iesu Christi regno per orbem terrarum dilatando, quaerant . . ." (AAS 14 [1922], 321–26). Cf. the famous Pentecost homily of 4 June 1922 (Sylloge, 196–202): He felt obligated to the paternità universale.

[28] AAS 18 (1926), 68f.

[29] AAS 14 (1922), 198f.; concerning the general statutes of the missionary society of priests of 1926, see AAS 18 (1926), 230–36. The entire first part of Rerum Ecclesiae is devoted to the mobilization of the Christian world for the missions.

[30] "Because the Church was born for nothing but the propagation of Christ's kingdom all over the world so that all of mankind may partake in eternal salvation" (Marmy, Auf der Maur, 27); cf. ibid., 30f. (Rerum Ecclesiae). Pius speaks of quantitative as well as qualitative Catholicity (cf. A. Seumois, "La Charité Apostolique, fondement moral constitutif de l'activité missionnaire," NZM 13 [1957], 161–75, 256–70).

[31] In the consistory of 23 May 1923, he spoke about the "maximum sanctissimumque omnium catholicorum operum, quale est opus missionum" (AAS 15 [1923] 248).

Another matter to which the Pope devoted his attention was outlined in detail in Pius XI's encyclical Rerum Ecclesiae (1926). Its main passages deal with the founding, solidification, and independence of the new churches.[32] Three years earlier, the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith sent directives to the missionary societies that clearly aimed at the assimilation of the church into the missionary district.[33] The work of the foreigners could be considered concluded as soon as the new foundation had established its own leadership, churches, native clergy, and funds, in short, as soon as it no longer needed the help of others. At that stage its existence would no longer be threatened if the missionaries should be deported or fresh recruits from Europe should be reduced. For the creation of a church, Rerum Ecclesiae demanded: an autochthonous clergy that would be compatible with the European clergy; autochthonous orders that would correspond to the expectations and interests of the natives as well as to the regional conditions and circumstances; an autochthonous monastic system because the contemplative monasteries offer irreplaceable contributions to the development of an individual church;[34] autochthonous catechists, and an elite of laymen whose careful training could be of invaluable importance for the future of Church and country.[35] The words of Pius XI's encyclical were carried out in practice. In 1926, at the celebration of the Feast of Christ the King, he himself ordained six Chinese bishops, one year later a Japanese, and in 1933 three more Chinese, a Vietnamese, and an Indian. In spite of all obstacles, this was a decisive breakthrough toward independence. This tendency was also noticeable in the intensive development of the missionary territories: by the end of his pontificate, there were 116 new vicariates and 157 prefectures. The Pope pursued the goal of stabilizing the growing churches by sending out apostolic delegates (e.g., Monsignor Costantini to China in 1922, Delle Piane to the Belgian Congo in 1930) and by convening local synods (1924: the council of Shanghai and all of Japan, 1924/27: the synods of South Africa) which tried to apply the directives from Rome to the respective situation.

---

[32] Sylloge, 240–58: De sacris missionibus provehendis Rerum Ecclesiae (28 February 1926); German: Marmy, Auf der Maur, 26–49.

[33] Decree of the Propaganda of 20 May 1923, Lo sviluppo (Sylloge, 213–17).

[34] The Popes rarely discuss this (rather important) concern of monachism. Regarding the numerous native orders and congregations developing in India, see P. Rayanna, The Indigenous Religious Congregations of India and Ceylon (Tallakulam, Madura 1948); concerning the contemplative orders in Africa, cf. Grands Lacs (Namur, Jan. 1956); I. Auf der Maur, "Werden, Stand und Zukunft des afrikanischen Mönchtums," NZM 23 (1967), 284–95, 24 (1968), 21–35; P. Gordan, "Aufgaben und Probleme des benediktinischen Mönchtums in Afrika," NZM 16 (1960), 186–92.

[35] Pius XI devotes one chapter to the assistance provided by missionary doctors.

In a letter to the ecclesiastical leaders in China (16 June 1926)[36] Pius XI expressed another first principle: the idea of accommodation.[37] In order to fend off the persistent charges that missionaries were pursuing political interests, the Pope once more emphasized in this letter the purely religious character of ecclesiastical activities. He continued stressing that no one could dispute the fact that the Church demonstrated the desire to adapt to the character of a people.[38] The justified aspirations of a nation with a rich culture and tradition, he declared two years later in a message to the same country, should not be ignored.[39] Therefore, upon the request of the bishops of Manchuria in 1935, he permitted the Christians in that area to observe certain Confucian ceremonies, provided they exercise pastoral expedience.[40] This ended an exceedingly deplorable chapter in the history of the Far Eastern missions: the unfortunate conflict over rites. Similarly, the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith allowed the Japanese faithful to attend certain events of a national or family-related nature. The instruction in this matter referred to principles that had been devised in 1659 and were surprisingly broad-minded.[41] Two other initiatives by Rome point in the direction of indigenization. The "exceedingly Catholic initiative" requesting that the religious activities be adapted to Japanese characteristics and tradition is praised because the risky enterprise of a Christian Japanese art was somewhat crucial for the Church on these islands.[42] On the other hand, the missionary leaders encouraged the artistic creativity of the natives on the occasion of the first exhibition of religious art in the Congo, justifying it as an expression of the catholicity of the Church, which was willing to absorb the spiritual values of a nation into its tradition.[43] This document demonstrating the spirit of accommodation of the Roman headquarters was written by Celso Costantini, the long-term prefect of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith (1935–1953) and the patron of autochthonous Christian art.[44] Finally, in view of the missions in Africa, a letter of 1938 should be mentioned, because it favors the adoption of burial ceremonies (Matanga) in the Belgian Congo and thus advocates the liturgical adaptation which was finally turned into a program by the Second Vatican Council.[45]

---

[36] Ab ipsis: Sylloge, 259–64. In regard to Pius XI's relations to the China mission (first Council, 1924; ordination of Chinese bishops, etc.), cf. L. Wei Tsing-sing, Le Saint-Siège et la Chine de Pie XI. à nos jours (Sotteville-lès-Rouen 1971).

[37] F. Kollbrunner, "Die Akkommodation im Geist der Katholizität 1919–59," NZM 28 (1972), 161–84, 264–74; the first monograph was published by J. Thauren, Die Akkommodation im katholischen Heidenapostolat. Eine missionsmethodische Studie (Münster 1927). Cf. J. Masson, Le testament missionarie de Pie XI (Collection Xaveriana März, Louvain 1939).

[38] Sylloge, 263: "Nemo ignorat . . . Ecclesiam ad eas, quae cuiusvis nationis aut regni propriae sunt, leges aut constitutiones, sese accommodare."

[39] Sylloge, 308f. (1 August 1928).

[40] Sylloge, 479–82 (28 May 1935).

[41] Sylloge, 537–40 (26 May 1936); the instructions of 1659: Collectanea I, 42f.: "Do not try and do not expect these people to change their ceremonies,their customs, and their traditions unless they are in blatant conflict with religion and ethics. . . . Faith is not in the habit of overthrowing or fighting a people's customs and traditions if they are not bad; on the contrary, it wishes to preserve them unharmed."

[42] Letter to Apostolic Delegate P. Marella of 1 June 1935 in Sylloge, 483.

To what extent were the ideas propagated by the two Popes and espoused in numerous proclamations applied to everyday missionary life? The ecclesiastical documents show a certain discrepancy between theory and practice. But if we want to be fair, we have to admit that, particularly between the two world wars, the Roman declarations had an effect on history, though maybe to a different degree, depending on the case.[46] First of all, they succeeded in interesting Christians in the world apostolate, for instance the Dutch, who were exceedingly active, and the Catholics in the United States, who developed more and more missionary responsibility, or Spain, which sent many friars to South America. If the Church as a whole had not become more missionary in nature, we would not be able to understand the expansion of the missionary work during this period in which catholicity was realized to a unique extent.[47] For example, during the pontificate of Pius XI, the number of Catholics in India grew from three to 3.5 million, in Indo-China from one to 1.5 million. In spite of many obstacles, their numbers also grew considerably in the Pacific. But especially the African missions, mainly in the areas around the equator, witnessed such an upswing that the missionaries had a hard time accomplishing their work.[48] Even in areas that had no great achievements to report, things were stirring, as in South America, where several missionary dioceses and twenty new missionary districts were established among the Indians.[49] The mission of the Indians and blacks in North America (which the Catholics began rather late),[50] where several societies were involved, and the activities among the Eskimos in the north, where Christianization was mainly attempted by the Oblates,[51] progressed to everyone's satisfaction.

---

[43] Sylloge, 543f.: letter to Apostolic Delegate Delle Piane of 14 December 1936.—J. Beckmann, "Die Stellung der katholischen Mission zur bildenden Kunst der Eingeborenen," Acta Tropica 2 (1945), 211–31.

[44] C. Constantini, L'arte cristiana nelle missioni (Vatican City 1940).

[45] Sylloge, 576–78: letter of 14 July 1938 to Apostolic Delegate Delle Piane.

[46] See the critical comments in J. Glazik, "Mission der Kirche im Zeichen des Konzils," ZMR 48 (1964), 149–75 (esp. 170–72); W. Bühlmann, Sorge für alle Welt (Freiburg 1967), 88: "They (sc. Maximum illud and Rerum Ecclesiae) were unable to influence reality."

[47] Schmidlin, PG III, 197–209.

[48] A. Tellkamp, Die Gefahr der Erstickung für die katholische Weltmission (Münster 1950); L. Grond, "Wachstum der Kirche und Priestermangel in Afrika," NZM 16 (1960), 142–46.

However, in another area the positive influence of the two Popes was more visible: in the energetically pursued education of a native clergy and the assignment of the Church leadership to local bishops. This breakthrough at that time can be considered an epoch-making event in the recent history of the missions, even though a lot may have been lacking in regard to the independence of the new Churches.[52] The principles extolled by Benedict XV and Pius XI (regarding the need, possibility, and usefulness of a native clergy and episcopate) were not new, they were embedded in a three-hundred-year-old Roman tradition. However, particularly regarding the demands pertaining to the office of bishop, these principles seemed shocking to many, sometimes even revolutionary.[53] Opposition did not fail to appear: some used the tactic of procrastination, others, for reasons of racial prejudice, warned of hastiness, even though Father Gabet, in a memorandum of 1848, had already refuted their arguments in detail.[54] Disregarding the opposition, [49] Most rewarding in this regard were the successful efforts to establish a native clergy. In 1925, the Bavarian Capuchin Bishop Guido Beck founded for his huge territory in Araucania (Chile) a seminary from which the first full-blooded Indians graduated in 1933. Cf. Noggler, Vierhundert Jahre Araukanermission (Schöneck-Beckenried 1973).—In Yarumal (Colombia), the native Bishop Miguel Angel Builes initiated the founding of the Papal Missionary Seminary of Saint Francis Xavier (1927). Today, it is responsible for several missionary regions.

---

[50] A. Tellkamp, "Zur Geschichte der Missionierung der Neger in den USA," NZM 4 (1948), 45–63. Since 1871, this mission was in the hands of the Mill Hill Missionaries, the Spiritans, the missionaries of Lyon and Steyl, the American society of the Josephites (in existence since 1892), and, after World War II, the brothers of Scheutveld. The smaller number of Catholics is due to the historical circumstances of the past. The first American seminary for blacks, founded in 1920 by the Steyl missionaries in Bay St. Louis, trained, by 1960, thirty-seven S.V.D. members (cf. M. Meier, Die Negermission SVD im Süden der USA [diss., Gregoriana, Rome, part 4 printed, Steyl 1961]).

[51] Since 1932, there has been a female society of Eskimos; P. Duchaussois, Femmes héroïques, les Sœur Grises Canadiennes aux Glaces Polaires (Paris ^{2}1933); id., Aux Glaces Polaires. Indiens et Esquimaux (Paris 1935). Cf. A. Freitag, "Die katholischen Missionen Amerikas," ZMR 25 (1935), 152–77.

[52] G. B. Tragella, Una nuova Epoca nelle storia delle Missioni (Milan 1933).

[53] J. Schmidlin, "Der Sieg der eingeborenen Missionshierarchie," ZMR 24 (1934), 1–19; cf. the disputes of the two spokesmen Lebbe from China and Gille for India.

[54] J. Beckmann, Der einheimische Klerus in den Missionsländern. Eine Übersicht (Fribourg 1943); id. (ed.), Der einheimische Klerus in Geschichte und Gegenwart. Festschrift L. Kilger (Schöneck-Beckenried 1950); included is an essay about P. Gabet by G. B. Tragella, "Le vicende d'un opuscolo sul clero indigeno e del duo autore," 189–202.

Rome helped the cause to succeed. The statistics are striking proof of this.[55] Two examples may serve the point. First: China, which proceeded quickly after 1920. By 1939 it had more than two thousand autochtonous priests, and in approximately twenty districts natives were responsible for the fate of the Church. A historic milestone was the establishment of the hierarchy (1946): twenty-one Chinese were appointed bishop and seven apostolic prefects.[56] Second: After many disappointments and unsuccessful attempts, Africa had, after World War I, 148 native clergymen. By 1939, their number had grown to 358. The first two black bishops (Madagascar and Uganda) were consecrated in 1939 under Pius XII. While the natives were entering the ranks of the clergy and the episcopate, the large orders, such as the Franciscans, Dominicans, and Jesuits opened their doors to the communities in the Far East. Furthermore, the natives were granted independence through the constitution of provinces and monasteries, or they were allowed to develop their own branches within the monastic system (e.g., the Carmelites in India, the Cistercians in China, Japan, and Vietnam). At any rate, there the Church demonstrated that it was overcoming racial prejudice,[57] which certainly did not free it from the responsibility to develop individual ways of training the clergy, depending on the various peoples, in order to break away from an all too Western education.[58]

Finally, if we consider the efforts made toward a qualitative catholicity, which means the Church's willingness to get involved in the cultural, social, and religious traditions of the mission countries, we have to admit that between 1914 and 1939 this was not the dominant concern. Certainly, a native clergy and episcopate were created with indigenization in mind. But precisely this step had to be made first. Foreigners cannot completely adapt the Church to the characteristics, customs, and traditions of a people. This is essentially the task and the obligation of a matured native elite. The urgent need for acclimatization and decolonization in terms of spirit and religion did not surface to the level of awareness until the era of political colonialism approached its end. Nonetheless, the missionaries laid the foundation for such a change, and in that regard they followed the directives of the Pope, though perhaps not always with the (in retrospect) desirable energy. To vindicate them one could say that the will to adapt to the mentality of the land and the people was in many respects a lot stronger than we can imagine.[59] This is proven by the efforts regarding the languages and the native literature (which cannot be praised enough),[60] the creation of a Christian terminology,[61] the indigenization of the Bible,[62] and research in the area of ethnology and religious studies.[63] At their general chapter meeting in 1926, the White Fathers decided to prepare a study center for the Muslim missionaries, an initiative to which the Institut des Belles Lettres Arabes (and its periodical Ibla) owes its existence. Among the missionaries in India, the Belgian Jesuits dealt with the relations between Hinduism and Christianity, e.g., the two Sanskrit scholars Father Dandoy and Father Johanns (with his famous work To Christ through the Vedanta).[64] The Parisian missionaries had outstanding linguists and religion scholars. Therefore, Vietnam witnessed the most enlightened investigation of its culture and especially the religious tradition of Buddhism in the Orient.[65] In Japan, some missionaries conducted similar studies.[66] There were even steps made toward a native theology, as in India and China,[67] and in many places the liturgy was on its way to finding a form of expression which was more in line with the people's feelings.[68] In regard to Africa we need to remember the invaluable contributions of the native catechists and sisters (by 1939, the number of female congregations was 242 and included 1,529 members) regarding the solidification of the Church. These examples remind us not to pass general judgment on the missionaries and their guilt or insufficient willingness to adapt.

---

[55] A. Freitag, "Die Fortschritte des einheimischen Klerus und der einheimischen Hierarchie in den Missionsländern der letzten dreißig Jahre (1920–50)," Festschrift L. Kilger (n. 54), 203–32; I. Ting Pong Lee, "Episcopal Hierarchy in the Missions," ED 13 (1960), 181–225.

[56] J. Beckmann, "Die hierarchische Neuordnung in China. Ein geschichtlicher Überblick," NZM 3 (1947), 9–24.

[57] J. Beckmann, "Einheimischer Klerus und Rassenfrage," NZM 11 (1955), 1–14. "One of the most gratifying aspects of the recent missionary epoch is the fact that, after overcoming the last obstacles, the foreign missionaries of all nations unanimously supported the papal directives and tried in any way possible to apply them" (11).

[58] In the past, isolated attempts were made to adjust the education of the clergy. Nevertheless, it remains a task of the future which can only be accomplished through cooperation of foreign missionaries and native priests. See T. Ohm, "Die philosophisch-religionswissenschaftlich-theologische Ausbildung des indischen Klerus," Festschrift L. Kilger (n. 54), 233–50; H. Köster, "Zur theologischen Ausbildung des chinesischen Klerus," TThZ 61 (1952), 289–316; A. Morant, Die philosophisch- theologische Bildung in den Priesterseminaren Schwarz-Afrikas (Schöneck-Beckenried 1959); C. W. Forman, "Theological Education in the South Pacific Islands: a Quiet Revolution," Journal de la Société des Océanistes 25 (1969), 151–68.

---

[59] Regarding the Chinese missions, see J. Beckmann, "Die Stellung der katholischen Missionare zur chinesischen Kultur," Missionsjahrbuch der Schweiz 9 (Fribourg 1942), 41–67: "Without being too optimistic, it is justified to say that the Church in China is on its way to becoming a true people's Church, that is to say, the Catholic Church is about to enter into close alliance with the Chinese intellectual and cultural life." (67); cf. J. Rossel, Dynamik und Hoffnung (Basel 1967), 25.

[60] The Bibliotheca Missionum offers a wealth of material illustrating these efforts. See J. Beckmann, "Werden, Wachsen und Bedeutung der Bibliotheca Missionum," De Archivis et Bibliothecis Missionibus atque scientiae Missionum inservientibus: Festschrift Rommerskirchen (Rome 1968), 33–57; one of the most distinguished Catholic Africa linguists: P. G. van Bulck, S. J., Les recherches linguistiques au Congo Belge (Brussels 1948); concerning one of the most eminent experts of Swahili, cf. W. Bühlmann, "P. Charles Sacleux CSSp Missionar und Wissenschaftler (1856–1943)," NZM 4 (1948), 17–32; A. Huppenbauer, "Afrika-Missionare im Dienst der Sprachforschung," Acta Tropica 2 (1945), 262–70.

[61] W. Bühlmann, Die christliche Terminologie als missionsmethodisches Problem (Schöneck-Beckenried 1950); A. Capell, "La traduction des termes théologiques dans les langues de l'Océanie," Journal de la Société des Océanistes 25 1969), 43–70.

[62] J. Beckmann (ed.), Die Heilige Schrift in den katholischen Missionen (Schöneck-Beckenried 1966).

[63] Regarding the prerequisites for the Christianization of Africa, see E. Dammann, op. cit., 101ff.: "Sprache, Völkerkunde, Religionen, sprachliche Praxis"; 130ff.: biblio.

[64] Concerning G. Dandoy (1882–1962), cf. Streit XVII, 224f.; he was the founder and editor of the monthly journal The Light of the East (1922–46); regarding P. Johanns

The new theological discipline called missiology participated energetically in the efforts toward the formation of new churches in the period between the wars, primarily through an eloquent defence of the native clergy and episcopate.[69] The creation of missiology was, on the one hand, an expression of the strengthened desire of the Catholics for missions, on the other hand, it had a stimulating and cleansing effect on missionary activities. The Protestants conducted mission studies much

---

(1882–1955), see Streit XVIII, 252–54 (including a summary of To Christ through the Vedanta); P. Johanns, La pensée religieuse de l'Inde (Paris, Louvain 1952).

[65] One of the greatest scholars of the Far East is L.-M. Cadière (1869–1955), who also pioneered religious ethnology; cf. Streit XI, 435ff.

[66] P. Aimé Villon (1843–1932), to mention only one of the many missionaries from Paris, left us thirteen extensive manuscripts containing studies of Buddhism; in 1938, the Jesuits began publishing the Monumenta Nipponica; see NZM 1 (1945), 145–50.

[67] Regarding India, cf. J. R. Chandran, Library of Indian Christian Theology. A Bibliography (Madras 1969); cf. NZM 27 (1971), 302. P. Henri Bernard-Maître, S. J., wrote a Brevis Introductio in Philosophiam sinicam (Sienshien 1940). Maurus Heinrichs, O.F.M., used a series of studies about Chinese philosophy and cultural history in the Collectanea Commissionis Synodalis (1936ff.) for teaching in the seminaries.

[68] A. Schmid, "Rites camerounais et liturgie catholique," Festschrift L. Kilger (n. 54), 275–95; J. L. van Hecken, "Le mouvement liturgique au Japon en faveur de la célébration eucharistique 1865–1962," NZM 26 (1970), 18–27, 94–113; I. Auf der Maur characterizes the period from 1920 until 1945 in " 'Rückschlag und Besinnung': Beitrag der Benediktiner-Missionare von St. Ottilien in Tansania zur liturgischen Erneuerung 1887–1970," NZM 27 (1971), 126–35, 188–200; A. Plangger says about Rhodesia: "So far, cultural adaptation occurred mainly on the terminological and linguistic level. . . . Broad conceptual adaptations are still modest and rare" ("Shona Gebetbücher. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der Shona-Frömmigkeit," NZM 26 [1970], 28–39, 127–36).

[69] General introductions to Catholic missiology: P. de Mondreganes, Manual de Misionologia (Vitoria 1933, Madrid ^{2}1947); A. Mulders, Inleiding tot de Missiewetenschap ('s-Bosch 1937, Bussum ^{2}1950); J. E. Champagne, Manuel d'action missionnaire (Ottawa 1947); S. Paventi, La Chiesa Missionaria (Rome 1949); A. Seumois, Introduction à la Missiologie (Schöneck-Beckenried 1952).

earlier. In 1867 Alexander Duff (1806–78), a Scottish missionary who used to work in India, succeeded in establishing a missiological teaching chair in Edinburgh, which only lasted until 1905.[70] The international mission conference in Edinburgh in 1910 made a new start by stressing the importance of this discipline for activating the home base. Above all, the Protestants of the United States followed the appeal and, by 1930, sixty out of sixty-eight schools taught missiology in one form or another.[71] Gustav Warneck (1834–1910) is considered the true founder of the discipline on the Protestant side. He introduced it to its rightful place in theological teaching.[72]

Under Warneck's influence, Joseph Schmidlin, an energetic man from Alsace (1876–1944), seized the Catholic initiative in Münster,[73] after Robert Streit, O.M.I. (1875–1930),[74] Anton Huonder, S. J., of Chur (1858–1926), and Friedrich Schwager S.V.D. (1876–1929)[75] had done the groundwork. After 1910 Schmidlin was lecturer for mission studies and, after 1914, the first Catholic full professor. He attended in a critical and systematic manner to the entire discipline with its various branches (theory of mission, missiology, missionary history, law, etc.). After some resistance, he took charge of the editorial office of the first Catholic missiological periodical, the Zeitschrift für Missionswissenschaft, which he published (with the exception of one short period) without interruption until 1937, making it the voice of many a thorough study. The basic works of the new discipline gradually emanated from his work for the journal: Einführung in die Missionswissenschaft (1917, 1925), Katholische Missionslehre im Grundriß (1919, 1923)—called "an event" in the Catholic world—Katholische Missionsgeschichte (1925), and the two-volume Das gegenwärtige Heidenapostolat im Fernen Osten (1928).[76]

---

[70] O. G. Myklebust, The Study of Missions in Theological Education I (Oslo 1955); cf. review in NZM 12 (1956), 146–49.

[71] Id., The Study of Missions in Theological Education II, 1910–1950 (Oslo 1957); cf. review in NZM 15 (1959), 224f.

[72] The first missionary theory is contained in his five-volume work Evangelische Missionslehre (1892–1905).

[73] A biography of him is still lacking; however, a study of his early years in Alsace seems to be planned in honor of his one hundredth birthday. L. Riegert, "Ein Apostel aus dem Sundgau: Joseph Schmidlin 1876–1944," L'Alsace, 2 July 1971, 11; different aspects of his life and work in J. Glazik (ed.), 50 Jahre katholische Missionswissenschaft in Münster 1911–1961 (Münster 1961); J. Beckmann, "Universitätsprofessor Dr. Josef Schmidlin," Schweiz. Kirchenzeitung 112 (1944), 234–36.

[74] J. Pietsch, P. Robert Streit OMI. Ein Pionier der katholischen Missionswissenschaft (Schöneck-Beckenried 1952).

[75] Among other books, he published Europäismus im Missionsbetrieb (Aachen 1921).

[76] He was capable of gaining recognition for his discipline, but he made few friends, shocking most people with his brusque behavior.

Assisted by the Internationales Institut für missionswissenschaftliche Forschungen, founded by Schmidlin in 1911, the Bibliotheca Missionum was published (among other works). This work had been started by Streit in 1916 and continued by Johannes Dindinger, O.M.I. (1881–1958)[77] and Johannes Rommerskirchen, O.M.I.[78] It is an exemplary tool, which now includes about thirty impressive volumes. In regard to recent literature, it should be supplemented by the Bibliografia Missionaria (Rome 1935ff.).[79] Because of his opposition to National Socialism, Schmidlin was forced to retire in 1934 and to resign from the Zeitschrift für Missionswissenschaft in 1937. He died in 1944 in the Struthof concentration camp near Schirmeck.

The tireless efforts of this innovator bore fruit. His students especially carried missiology across the German borders. Their success was probably aided by recommendations from Rome.[80] Indeed, after Münster, missiological teaching chairs were established in Munich (1919), in Rome (1919 at the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith), Nijmegen (1930), Ottawa (1932), Vienna (1933), Comillas (Spain), and Fribourg (1940).[81] At other universities, lectures were given, as at the Institut Catholique of Paris after 1923, in Louvain after 1927, and in Lyon. Real missiological departments were established in 1932 at the Gregoriana and the Propaganda College in Rome. Elsewhere, but not until after 1939, academic institutes were added (Fribourg, Nijmegen, Ottowa).[82] By the outbreak of World War II, thanks to these institutions and the efforts of individual scholars, this new academic discipline already had a sizeable number of missiological journals, series, and compilations, especially regarding sources. In the meantime, practitioners and experts debated acute problems at conventions such as the Semaines de Missiologie (Louvain, since 1922).

During the first phase of the development of Catholic mission studies, Germany produced men who made the young discipline respectable. Otto Maas, O.F.M. (1884–1945) distinguished himself through his missiological historical studies of the Franciscan missions in China, New Mexico, and Indochina.[83] His Franciscan brother Dorotheus Schilling (1886–1950) devoted his research to Japanese missionary history, primarily to the activities of the Jesuits, later to the missionary work of the Franciscans.[84] Benno Biermann, O.P. (1884–1970) critically investigated the contributions of the Dominicans in regard to the propagation of the faith (especially in the New World), and for decades he studied the fascinating person of Las Casas.[85] Anton Freitag S.V.D. (1882–1968), the first one to get his Ph.D. under Schmidlin, devoted his energy thenceforth to missiology.[86] Johannes Peter Steffes (1883–1955) enriched the discipline by incorporating religious studies. Subsequently, Schmidlin expanded his journal after 1928 to a Zeitschrift für Missions- und Religionswissenschaft.[87] Wilhelm Schmidt S.V.D. (1868–1954) offered new ideas through ethnology and philology when founding Anthropos.[88] Through Thomas Ohm, O.S.B. (1892–1962), at first professor of missiology in Salzburg, later in Münster, the scholarly investigation of foreign religions became the focal point.[89] Missiology was relatively weak in France. Georges Goyau (1869–1939) taught missionary history at the Institut Catholique in Paris. He also determined the character of the Revue d'Histoire des Missions during its regrettably brief period of publication (1924–1939). In Italy, a student of Schmidlin, Giovanni Battista Tragella (1885–1968), mediated German missiology by translating several books and thus instilling new impulses into the missionary system at home.[90] Pioneering studies in the area of sinology and Chinese missionary history (especially about Matteo Ricci) were made by the Jesuit Pasquale d'Elia (1890–1963), professor at the Aurora University of Shanghai and subsequently at the missiological department of the Gregoriana.[91] Essays valuable in regard to missiology and ethnology are contained in the Annali Lateranensi (after 1937), which was edited by Michael Schulien S.V.D. (1888–1968) for three decades.[92] In Louvain, missiology could only settle on the fringes of academia. There, Pierre Charles, S.J. (1883–1954), not really a specialist, yet very sensitive to the concrete reality, pointed in new directions and insisted that "implanting the Church" was the main missionary goal.[93] Adelhelm Jann (1876–1945), Swiss Capuchin, focused his missiological-historical work on Bishop Anastasius Hartmann. For the purpose of his investigation he founded the Monumenta Anastasiana.[94] Also oriented toward history was Laurenz Kilger, O.S.B. (1890–1964). Immediately after World War II, in cooperation with Johannes Beckmann, S.M.B. (1901–1971), he founded the Neue Zeitschrift für Missionswissenschaft, a courageous enterprise.[95] Beckmann's interests (he as well as Kilger were students of Schmidlin) included all aspects of his discipline, but his exceedingly rich work is also dominated by history.[96] In Spain, missiology flourished unexpectedly after the Civil War, especially missionary history, so that the Archivo Ibero-Americano (1914–1936, 22 vols.), which was important for the missionary history of the Franciscans, could be continued after 1941.[97] Aside from the Franciscans, the Catholics in the United States paid little attention to this discipline, in spite of the general upswing of missions in this country. It was regrettable that this branch of theology was also lacking in the mission churches themselves. But this is understandable in the case of a discipline that is still struggling for recognition, even though the missions needed it most.[98]

---

[77] Concerning him, cf. NZM 7 (1959), 64–66 (J. Beckmann).

[78] Regarding his 60th birthday, cf. NZM 15 (1959), 64–66 (J. Beckmann).

[79] J. Beckmann, "Die Bibliotheca Missionum. Zur Vollendung der ersten Serie," Priester und Mission (Aachen 1963), 237–50.

[80] Pius X welcomed the missiological efforts in Germany (Schmidlin, PG III, 119); Benedict XV announced a teaching chair for missiology in Rome in Maximum illud (Sylloge, 121f.); Pius XI demanded that missionary work be studied in a scholarly manner (cf. Schmidlin, PG IV, 192, his critical comments regarding Pius XI).

[81] J. Beckmann, "Die Universität Freiburg und das katholische Missionswerk," Festgabe an die Schweizer Katholiken (Freiburg 1954), 155–67.

[82] A. Mulders, "Missiewetenschappelijk Leven," Het Missiewerk 26 (1947), 1–15; J. Beckmann, "Die Pflege der Missionswissenschaften in den einzelnen Ländern," NZM 5 (1949), 19–29.

---

[83] NZM 2 (1946), 305f.; this volume deals with earlier representatives of missiology: Paul Andres, Maurus Gahn, and Josef Jung-Diefenbachs.

[84] Ibid. 6 (1950), 223–26.

[85] Ibid. 20 (1964), 50–54; 26 (1970), 219f.; B. Biermann, Las Casas und seine Sendung. Das Evangelium und die Rechte der Menschen (Mainz 1968).

[86] ZMR 49 (1965), 222–24; NZM 24 (1968), 205f.

[87] NZM 11 (1955), 142f.

[88] J. Beckmann, "Mission und Ethnologie, Zum Tode von P. Wilhelm Schmidt SVD," NZM 10 (1954), 293–96; J. Henninger, "Im Dienste der Mission: 60 Jahre Anthropos 1906–1966," NZM 23 (1967), 206–21.

[89] NZM 18 (1962), 305–311. T. Ohm, Machet zu Jüngern alle Völker. Theorie der Mission (Freiburg 1962).—This list shows how the number of the first German missiologists has diminished—and there are very few replacements.

[90] For instance, he translated Schmidlin's history of the missions into Italian (3 vols., Milan 1927–29). His three-volume history of the seminary of Milan gained quite a reputation (Le Missioni Estere di Milano nel quadro degli avvenimenti contemporanei [Milan 1950/1959/1963], cf. NZM 24 [1968], 203–5).

It is obvious from the names mentioned that the strength of missiology during the period of its consolidation lay in the area of mission history, even though it accomplished a great deal in other areas as well, e.g., in mission studies. By investigating the past as objectively as possible and thus creating a benevolent understanding for the missionary efforts within the other camp, the intensive historical research in regard to missions resulted in a relaxation of the often tense relationship between Catholics and Protestants. This was quite an accomplishment.[99] Aside from theoretical debates which are still carried on today,[100] two problems played an important role. The first was the question of the missionary goal.[101] Against the background of complicated interrelations, the discussion is dominated by two major trends: the theory of the Plantatio Ecclesiae and the salvation of the non-Christians. However, the viewpoints gradually merged and one could say that the missionary goal is the implantation of the Church with the conversion of the people in mind.[102] The other frequently discussed problem deals with accommodation. The urgency of this matter resulted from the changes within the missionary field, the rejection of Europeanism.[103] Several things were realized: adaptation is the requirement for the implantation of Christianity into the people. Adaptation emanates by necessity from the essence of the Church itself. It is the realization of its catholicity and occurs when cultures meet. This complex of problems became more complicated after World War II, when the exceedingly difficult situation of the countries in the Third World began challenging the new discipline to provide new answers.[104]

---

[91] NZM 20 (1964), 146f.: information about the Fonti Ricciane.

[92] Ibid. 5 (1949), 143–47; 24 (1968), 304f.

[93] Ibid. 10 (1954), 136f.

[94] Ibid. 2 (1946), 131; W. Bühlmann, "P. Adelhelm Jann, Pionier der schweizerischen Missionswissenschaft und Missionsbewegung," Geist und Geschichte. Gedenkschrift zum 50jährigen Bestehen des Lyzeums am Kollegium St. Fidelis in Stans (Stans 1959), 149–69.

[95] NZM 20 (1964), 161–67 (obituary of Kilger); J. Beckmann, "Von der alten zur neuen Zeitschrift für Missionswissenschaft," NZM 1 (1945), 1–11; J. Baumgartner, Missionswissenschaft im Dienste der Weltkirche. 25 Jahre NZM (Schöneck-Beckenried 1970).

[96] J. Baumgartner, "In Favorem Missionum. Zum Ehrendoktorat von Prof. Dr. Joh. Beckmann," NZM 26 (1970), 82–93; id., obituary: NZM 28 (1972), 1–9.

[97] NZM 2 (1946), 143–46. Manuel Giménez (1896–1968) was a respected Las Casas scholar.

[98] This postulate is still waiting to be realized.

---

[99] J. Beckmann, "Der Einfluß der Missionswissenschaft auf die Beziehungen der christlichen Konfessionen," Kath. Missionsjahrbuch der Schweiz 25 (Freiburg 1958), 28–35; J. Beckmann, "Missionsgeschichte und Ökumene. Zum Tode von Kenneth Scott Latourette 1884–1968," NZM 25 (1969), 210–14; id., "Die Bedeutung der Missionsgeschichte für die praktische Missionsarbeit," Scientia Missionum ancilla. Festschrift A. Mulders (Nijmegen, Utrecht 1953), 124–37.

[100] See H. Adamek, "Über die Integration der Missionswissenschaft in die Forschungs- und Lehrpraxis der evangelisch-theologischen Fakultäten," Ev. Miss. Zeitschrift 26 (1969), 106–10; F. Kollbrunner, "Der Ort der Mission in der Theologie," J. Baumgartner (ed.), Vermittlung zwischenkirchlicher Gemeinschaft (Schöneck-Beckenried 1971), 247–63.

[101] H. Kruska, "Zum katholischen Missionsdenken der Gegenwart," Ev. Miss. Zeitschrift 10 (1953), 33–45.

[102] A. Seumois, Vers une définition de l'activité missionnaire (Schöneck-Beckenried 1948).

[103] J. Mülller, Missionarische Anpassung als theologisches Prinzip (Münster 1973).

[104] J. Beckmann, "Forderungen der gegenwärtigen Missionslage an die Missionswissenschaft," NZM 8 (1952), 241–50; T. Ohm, "Die katholische Weltmission—gestern und heute," ZMR 39 (1955); id., "Die Missionswissenschaft," ZMR 45 (1961), 189–96 (tasks for the future: 193ff.).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

GENERAL BIBLIOGRAPHY

The General Bibliography in vol. VIII (p. 337) contains a large part of material also pertaining to this volume. The following bibliography is of a supplementary nature listing particularly more recent works. The bibliography on individual countries (II, 3) should be supplemented with the systematic bibliography in II, 4–9. Biographies, memoirs, and diaries are included in the bibliographies to individual chapters.

I. GENERAL HISTORY

T. Schieder, ed., Handbuch der europäischen Geschichte VI (Stuttgart 1968); R. Lill, Politische Ideologien und nationalstaatliche Ordnung. Festschrift für Th. Schieder (Munich 1968); L. Capéran, Histoire contemporaine de la laïcité française, 3 vols. (vol. 4 not yet publ. by the Institut catholique de Toulouse) (Paris 1958–61); P. Sorlin, Waldeck-Rousseau (Paris 1966); id., La société française I: 1840–1914 (Paris 1969). R. C. K. Ensor, "England 1870–1914," Oxford History of England XIV (London 1936); G. M. Young, Victorian England. Portrait of an age (London 1957); F. Fonzi, Crispi e lo "Stato di Milano" (Milan 1965); A. W. Salomone, Italy in the Giolittian Era. Italian Democracy in the Making, 1900–1914 (Philadelphia 1960); R. Konetzke, Geschichte des spanischen und portugiesischen Volkes (Leipzig 1939); L. Sánchez Agesta, La revolución liberal (Madrid 1955); H. Jeschke, Die Generation von 1898 (Heidelberg 1934); T. Schieder, Das deutsche Kaiserreich von 1871 als Nationalstaat (Cologne and Opladen 1961); E. R. Huber, Deutsche Verfassungsgeschichte seit 1789 IV (Stuttgart 1969); P. Alter, Die irische Nationalbewegung zwischen Parlament und Revolution (Stuttgart 1971); O. Halecki, Grenzraum des Abendlandes. Eine Geschichte Ostmitteleuropas (Salzburg 1957); P. Kovalevsky, Bildatlas der Kultur und Geschichte der slawischen Welt (Basel and Vienna 1964); R. Portal, Les Slaves. Peuples et nations (Paris 1965); F. R. Dulles, The United States since 1865 (University of Michigan 1959); Postan, M. M. and Habakuk, H. J., eds., Cambridge Economic History of Europe 4 (Cambridge, England) 1965; Parker, W. N. and Pounds, N. J. G., Coal and Steel in Western Europe (Bloomington, Indiana 1957); Moller, Herbert, ed., Population Movements in Modern European History (New York 1964); Dickinson, R. E., The West European City: A Geographical Interpretation (London 1951); Briggs, Asa, The Making of Modern England, 1783–1867: The Age of Improvement (New York 1959); Bell, H. C., Lord Palmerston, 2 vols (Hamden, Conn. 1936); Curtis, L. P., Coercion and Conciliation in Ireland, 1880–1892 (Princeton 1963); Wright, Gordon, France in Modern Times: 1760 to the Present (Chicago 1960); Brogan, D. W., The French Nation: From Napoleon to Petain, 1814–1940 (London 1961); Holborn, Hajo, A History of Modern Germany 3 (New York 1968); Webb, Robert K., English History, 1815–1914 (Washington, D.C. 1967); Rich, Norman, Germany, 1815–1914 (Washington, D.C. 1968); Macartney, C. A., The Habsburg Empire, 1790–1918 (London 1969); Langer, William L., European Alliances and Alignments, 1871–1890 (New York 1931).

II. CHURCH HISTORY

1. GENERAL CHURCH HISTORY

G. Maron, "Die römisch-katholische Kirche von 1870–1970," K. D. Schmidt and E. Wolf, Die Kirche und ihre Geschichte 4 and 2 (Göttingen 1972); K. Algermissen, Konfessionskunde, revised by H. Fries et al. (Paderborn 1969).

2. PAPACY

Stanislao da Campagnola, I papi nella storia II (Rome 1961); G. Schwaiger, Geschichte der Päpste im 20. Jh. (Munich 1964; new ed. in Deutscher Taschenbuchverlag no. 482 [1968]); C. Falconi, I papi del ventesimo secolo (Milan 1967); H. Hermelink, Die katholische Kirche unter den Pius-Päpsten des 20. Jh. (Zurich 1949); C. Alix, Le Saint-Siège et les nationalismes en Europe, 1870–1960 (Paris 1962); D. Secco Suardo, "Da Leone XIII a Pio X," Collana di storia del movimento cattolico no. 18 (Rome 1967); K. O. v. Aretin, Papsttum und moderne Welt (Munich 1970); E. T. Gargan, ed., Leo XIII and the Modern World (New York 1961); F. Engel-Janosi, Österreich und der Vatikan 1846–1918, 2 vols. (Graz 1958–60) (of general interest); Il cardinale Gasparri e la Questione Romana (con brani delle Memorie inedite), ed. by G. Spadolini (Florence 1973); G. Franz, Kulturkampf. Staat und katholische Kirche in Mitteleuropa von der Säkularisation bis zum Abschluß des preußischen Kulturkampfes (Munich 1954); id., (G. Franz-Willing), Kulturkampf gestern und heute. Eine Säkularbetrachtung (Munich 1971); H. E. Feine, Kirchliche Rechtsgeschichte. Die katholische Kirche (Cologne and Graz 1964); N. del Rè, La Curia Romana (Rome 1970); L. Bedeschi, La Curia Romana durante la crisi modernista (Parma 1968); id., Riforma religiosa e Curia Romana all'inizio del secolo (Milan 1968); La Correspondance de Rome 1907–1912 (later ed. Milan [1972], 3 vols., ed. by É. Poulat); L'ordinamento dei seminari da S. S. Pio X a Pio XII (Rome 1958).

3. THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN INDIVIDUAL COUNTRIES

GERMANY: R. Lill, Die ersten deutschen Bischofskonferenzen (Freiburg, Basel, and Vienna 1964); E. Gatz, Die deutschen Bischofskonferenzen 1872–1881 (in preparation); W. Spael, Das katholische Deutschland im 20. Jh. (Würzburg 1964); Der Katholizismus in Deutschland und der Verlag Herder. 1801–1951 (Freiburg i. Br. 1951); W. Kramer, Zeitkritik und innere Auseinandersetzung im deutschen Katholizismus im Spiegel der führenden katholischen Zeitschriften, 1895–1914 (diss., Mainz 1955); K. Buchheim, "Der deutsche Verbandskatholizismus. Eine Skizze seiner Geschichte," B. Hanssler, Die Kirche in der Gesellschaft (Paderborn 1961), 30–83.

The Social Question: W. Schwer and Franz Müller, "Der deutsche Katholizismus im Zeitalter des Kapitalismus," Kirche und Gesellschaft VI (Augsburg 1932); P. Jostock, Der deutsche Katholizismus und die Überwindung des Kapitalismus. Eine ideengeschichtliche Skizze (Regensburg 1932); id., Die katholisch-soziale Bewegung der letzten hundert Jahre in Deutschland (Cologne 1958); id., Katholische Arbeiterbewegung in der Geschichte der christlichen Arbeiterbewegung Deutschlands (Cologne 1963); J. Höffner, Die deutschen Katholiken und die soziale Frage im 19. Jh. (Paderborn 1954); E. Ritter, Die katholisch-soziale Bewegung Deutschlands im 19. Jh. und der Volksverein (Cologne 1954); K. H. Brüls, Geschichte der katholisch-sozialen Bewegung in Deutschland (Münster 1958); E. Filthaut, Deutsche Katholikentage 1848–1958 und soziale Frage (Essen 1960); J. J. Stegmann, "Geschichte der sozialen Ideen im deutschen Katholizismus," H. Grebing, ed., Deutsches Handbuch der Politik 3 (1969), 325–560.

Church and State: H. Bornkamm, Die Staatsidee im Kulturkampf (Munich 1950); R. Morsey, "Bismarck und der Kulturkampf," AKG 39 (1957), 232–70; id., Die deutsche Zentrumspartei 1917–1923 (Düsseldorf 1966; also important for the decade preceeding 1914); id., ed., Zeitgeschichte in Lebensbildern. Aus dem deutschen Katholizismus des 20. Jh. (Mainz 1973) (biographies of Cardinal G. Kopp, J. Bachem, G. v. Hertling, F. Hitze, P. Spahn, K. Trimborn); E. Schmidt-Volkmar, Der Kulturkampf in Deutschland 1871–1890 (Göttingen 1962); K. Buchheim, Ultramontanismus und Demokratie (Munich 1963); H. Lutz, Demokratie im Zwielicht. Der Weg der deutschen Katholiken aus dem Kaiserreich in die Republik (Munich 1963); C. Weber, Kirchliche Politik zwischen Rom, Berlin und Trier 1876–1888 (Mainz 1970); id., Quellen und Studien zur Kurie und der vatikanischen Politik unter Leo XIII. (forthcoming); R. Lill, Die Katholiken und Bismarcks Reichsgründung: Reichsgründung 1870/71, ed. by T. Schieder and E. Deuerlein (Stuttgart 1970), 345–65; id., Die Wende im Kulturkampf (Tübingen 1973); A. Gnägi, Kirche und Demokratie (diss., Zurich 1970); K. Erlinghagen, Die Säkularisierung der deutschen Schule (Hanover 1972).

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY: M. Csáky, Der Kulturkampf in Ungarn (Graz, Vienna, and Cologne 1967).

The Social Question: J. Wodka, Kirche in Österreich (Vienna 1959); F. Engel-Janosi, Österreich und der Vatican, 2 vols. (Graz 1958–60); F. Funder, Aufbruch zur christlichen Sozialreform (Vienna and Munich 1953); id., Vom Gestern ins Heute (Vienna and Munich 1971); C. Allmayer-Beck, Vogelsang. Vom Feudalismus zur Volksbewegung (Vienna 1952; of general interest); G. Silberbauer, Österreichs Katholiken und die Arbeiterfrage (Graz 1966); I. A. Hellwing, Der konfessionelle Antisemitismus im 19. Jh. in Österreich (Vienna, Freiburg, and Basel 1972).

SWITZERLAND: K. Fry, Kaspar Decurtins, 2 vols. (Zurich 1949–52; of general interest); J. Meier, Der Schweizer Katholische Verein (Lucerne 1954); U. Altermatt, Der Weg der Schweizer Katholiken aus dem Ghetto (forthcoming).

FRANCE: E. Lecanuet, L'Église de France sous la III^{e} République, new ed., II–IV (Paris 1930–31); A. Latreille and R. Rémond, Histoire du catholicisme en France III (Paris 1962); R. Rémond, Les deux congrès ecclésiastiques de Reims et de Bourges, 1896–1900 (Paris 1964); A. Baudrillart, Vie de Mgr d'Hulst, 2 vols. (Paris 1921–25); J.-M. Mayeur, Un prêtre démocrate, l'abbé Lemire (Paris and Tournai 1968).

Church and State: J. Gadille, La pensée et l'action politiques des évêques français au début de la III^{e} république, 2 vols. (Paris 1967); J.-B. Woodall, The Ralliement in France. Origins and History, 1876–1894 (New York 1961); A. Sedgwick, The Ralliement in French Politics, 1890–1898 (Cambridge, Mass. 1965); L. V. Méjan, La séparation de l'Église et de l'État en France. L'œuvre de Louis Méjan (Paris 1959); A. v. Campenhausen, Staat und Kirche in Frankreich (Göttingen 1962); J.-M. Mayeur, La séparation de l'Église et de l'État (Paris 1966); M. Vaussard, Histoire de la démocratie chrétienne (Paris 1956); J. Caron, Le Sillon et la démocratie chrétienne (Paris 1967); P. Castel, Le Picard et le P. Bailly dans les luttes de presse (Rome 1962); P. Sorlin, "La Croix" et les Juifs (Paris 1967); P. Pierrard, Juifs et catholiques français. De Drumont à Jules Isaac (Paris 1970).

The Social Question: E. Barbier, L'histoire du catholicisme libéral et du catholicisme sociale en France, 1870–1914, 5 vols. (Bordeaux 1923–28) (integralist perspective; a great deal of documentation); H. Rollet, L'action sociale des catholiques en France, 1871 à 1914, 2 vols. (Paris 1948–58); G. Le Bras, Histoire de la pratique religieuse en France, 2 vols. (Paris 1942–44); C. Molette, L'Association catholique de la jeunesse française, 1886–1907 (Paris 1968); H. I. Terhünte, Die religiöse Lage der Katholiken Frankreichs in der 3. Republik (1919); H. Platz, Geistige Kämpfe im modernen Frankreich (Kempten 1922).

ITALY: G. Spadolini, L'opposizione cattolica da Porta Pia al '98 (Florence 1961); id., Giolitti e i cattolici, 1901–1914 (Florence 1960); D. Secco Suardo, I cattolici intransigenti (Brescia 1962); P. Scoppola, Coscienza religiosa e democrazia nell'Italia contemporanea (Bologna 1966); id., Spiritualità e azione del laicato cattolico italiano, 2 vols. (Padua 1969); F. Magri, L'azione cattolica in Italia (1775–1939) (Milan 1953); L. Civardi, Compendio di storia dell'Azione cattolica italiana (Rome 1956); L. Ambrosoli, Il primo movimento D. C. in Italia (1897–1904) (Rome 1958); G. De Rosa, Storia politica dell'A. C. in Italia 1905–1919 (Bari 1954), new ed. in 2 vols. (1966); A. Gambasin, "Il movimento sociale nell'Opera dei congressi (1874–1904)," AnGr no. 91 (Rome 1958); M. C. Casella, Religious Liberalism in Modern Italy, 2 vols. (London 1966); G. Candeloro, Il movimento cattolico in Italia (Rome 1953) (Marxist interpretation); R. F. Esposito, La Massoneria e l'Italia (Rome 1969); C. Bello, Geremia Bonomelli (Brescia 1961); A. Albertazzi, Il cardinale Svampa e i cattolici bolognesi (Brescia 1971).

BELGIUM—THE NETHERLANDS—LUXEMBURG: A. de Moreau, L'Église en Belgique (Brussels 1945), 239–63; P. van Zuylen, "La Belgique et le Vatican en 1879," Revue générale Belge (1954), 1707–34, 1901–15, 2065–81; (1955), 67–86; A. Simon, La liberté de l'enseignement (Brussels 1952); id., Le cardinal Mercier (Brussels 1960); R. Reszohazy, Origines et formation du catholicisme social en Belgique. 1842–1909 (Brussels 1958); P. Gérin, Les origines de la démocratie chrétienne à Liège, 2 vols. (Brussels 1958–59); L. J. Rogier, Katholieke Herleving, Geschiedenis van Katholiek Nederland sinds 1853 (The Hague 1957), 276–348; E. Donckel, Die Kirche in Luxemburg von den Anfängen bis zur Gegenwart (Luxemburg 1950).

SPAIN: J. M. Cuenza, Estudios sobre la Iglesia española del xix (Madrid 1973).

BRITISH EMPIRE: Maisy Ward, The Wilfrid Wards and the Transition, 2 vols. (London 1934–38); J. G. Snead-Cox, Life of Herbert Vaughan, 2 vols. (London 1910); E. Oldmeadow, Francis cardinal Bourne, 2 vols. (London 1940–44); L. I. McCaffrey, The Irish Question, 1800–1922 (Lexington 1968); Alexis de Barbezieux, L'Église catholique en Canada (Montreal 1934); E. Gautier, Le catholicisme au Canada (Ottawa 1934); D. de Saint-Denis, L'Église catholique au Canada (Montreal 1956); V. Harvey et al., L'Église et le Québec (Montreal 1961); J. Hulliger, *L'enseignement social des évêques canadiens, 1891–*1950); F. Engel-Janosi, 2 vols. Österreich und der Vatican (Graz 1958–60); E. Winter, Laval University 1961); P. Savard, Jules-Paul Tardivel (Quebec 1967) (of general interest); J. E. Murtagh, Australia. The Catholic Chapter (New York 1947); P. Ford, Cardinal Moran and Australian Labour Party (London 1966); R. Fogarty, Catholic Education in Australia, 1806–1950, 2 vols. (Melbourne 1959).

THE SLAVIC WORLD: A. M. Ammann, Abriß der ostslawischen Kirchengeschichte (Vienna 1950); F. Engel-Janosi, 2 vols. Österreich und der Vatican (Graz 1958–60); E. Winter, Byzanz und Rom im Kampf um die Ukraine 955–1939 (Leipzig 1942); id., Rußland und die slawischen Völker in der Diplomatie des Vatikans 1878–1903 (Berlin 1950); id., Rußland und das Papsttum II: Von der Aufklärung bis zur großen sozialistischen Oktoberrevolution (Berlin 1961); id., Rom und Moskau. Ein halbes Jahrtausend Weltgeschichte in ökumenischer Sicht (Vienna 1972), 145–232.

LATIN-AMERICA: E. Ryan, The Church in the South American Republics (London 1934); J. L. Mecham, Church and State in Latin America (North Carolina Press 1934); W. v. Schoen, Geschichte Mittel- und Südamerikas (Munich 1953), 343–665.

THE UNITED STATES: Nolan, ed., Pastoral Letters of the American Hierarchy, 1792–1970 (Huntington 1971); T. T. McAvoy, A History of the Catholic Church in the United States

(Notre Dame 1969); id., The Great Crisis in American Catholic History 1895–1900 (Chicago 1957); T. Roemer, The Catholic Church in the United States (London 1950); C. J. Barry, The Catholic Church and German Americans (Milwaukee 1953) (critical of the Ireland-Keane group); H. A. Buetow, The Story of Catholic Education in the United States (New York 1970); F. J. Zwierlein, Theodore Roosevelt and Catholics, 1882–1919 (Rochester 1956); R. D. Cross, The Emergence of Liberal Catholicism in America (Cambridge, Mass. 1958); J. T. Ellis, The Life of James card. Gibbons, 2 vols. (Milwaukee 1952); J. H. Moynihan, The Life of John Ireland (New York 1953).

The Social Question: H. Browne, The Catholic Church and the Knights of Labor (Washington 1949); M. Karson, The Catholic Church and Unionism (New York 1951); A. I. Abell, American Catholicism and Social Action, 1865–1950 (Notre Dame 1963).

4. HOPES FOR UNIFICATION

CONTACT WITH THE ANGLICAN CHURCH: J. J. Hughes, Absolutely Null and Utterly Void (London 1968); id., Stewards of the Lord. A Reappraisal of Anglican Orders (London 1970); id., "Zur Frage der anglikanischen Weihen. Ein Modellfall festgefahrener Kontroverstheologie," Quaestiones disputatae 59 (Freiburg i. Br. 1973; original in German).

THE INDEPENDENT AND UNIATE CHURCHES—PAPAL HOPES FOR UNIFICATION: D. Attwater, The Christian Churches of the East, 2 vols. (Milwaukee 1961–62); A. Brunello, Le Chiese Orientali e l'Unione. Prospetto storico statistico (Massimo and Milan 1966); J. Casper, "Die orientalische Christenheit," Christus und die Religionen der Erde. Handbuch der Religionsgeschichte III, ed. by F. König (Freiburg 1951), 643–729; R. F. Esposito, Leone XIII e l'Oriente cristiano. Studio storico-sistematico (Rome 1961); E. v. Ivánka et al., Handbuch der Ostkirchenkunde (Düsseldorf 1971); F. Heiler, Die Ostkirchen. Revision of Urkirche und Ostkirche. In cooperation with H. Hartog, ed. by A. M. Heiler (Munich and Basel 1971); A. S. Hernández, Iglesias de Oriente. Puntos específicos de su teología (Santander 1959); R. Janin, Les Églises orientales et les rites orientaux (Paris 1955); id., "Les Églises orientales," C. Poulet, Histoire du christianisme. Époque contemporaine (Paris 1957), 489–545; M. Lehmann, Österreich und der christliche Osten (Vienna 1970); H. Musset, Histoire du christianisme, spécialement en Orient 3 (Harissa and Jerusalem 1948–49); J. Hajjar, Le christianisme en Orient. Études d'histoire contemporaine 1684–1968 (Beirut 1971); B. Spuler, Gegenwartslage der Ostkirchen in ihrer nationalen und staatlichen Umwelt (Frankfurt a. M. 1968); B. Stasiewski, "Geschichtliche Überlegungen zur kirchlichen Trennung zwischen Orient und Okzident," Das Christentum des Ostens und die christliche Einheit (Würzburg 1965), 13–40, W. de Vries, Der christliche Osten in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Würzburg 1951); G. Zananiri, Catholicisme oriental (Paris 1966); N. Zernow, "Die Ostkirchen und die ökumenische Bewegung im 20. Jh.," R. Rouse and St. C. Neill, Geschichte der Ökumenischen Bewegung 1517–1948 II (Göttingen 1958), 317–58.

5. HISTORY OF THE MISSIONS

R. Streit, Bibliotheca Missionum III, XXIV, XXV (America); VIII, XXVII (India); IX (Philippines); X (Japan, Korea); XI (Indochina); XII–XIV (China); XVII–XX (Africa); XXI (Australia, Oceania (Freiburg i. Br. 1951ff.); J. Glazik, Päpstliche Rundschreiben über die Mission von Leo XIII. bis Johannes XXIII. (Münsterschwarzach 1961; Lat. and Germ.); Kenneth Scott Latourette, A History of the Expansion of Christianity V–VII (New York and London 1943–45); A. Mulders, Missionsgeschichte. Die Ausbrietung des katholischen Glaubens (Regensburg 1960); T. Ohm, Wichtige Daten der Missionsgeschichte (Münster 1961); J. Jennes, A History of the Catholic Church in Japan (Tokyo 1959).

6. Orders and Congregations

P. Schmitz, Histoire de l'ordre de saint Benoît (Maredsous 1948–56); A. Wulf, Compendium of the History of the Cistercian Order (Milwaukee 1944); C. Grolleau and G. Chastel, L'ordre de Cîteaux. La Trappe (Paris 1954); A. Walz, Wahrheitskünder. Die Dominikaner in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Essen 1960, gen. Germ. version of the Compendium . . .); C. Hollis, The Jesuits: A History (New York 1969); J. Monval, Les Assomptionnistes (Paris 1939); E. B. Lüthen, Die Gesellschaft des Göttlichen Heilandes (1911); R. Pfeiffer, Joh.-B. Jordan (Rome 1920); E. Federici, G. B. Jordan (Rome 1948); H. Fischer, Arnold Janssen (Steyl 1919); S. Sinningen, Katholische Frauengenossenschaften Deutschlands (Düsseldorf 1944; biblio.); R. Hostie, Vie et mort des ordres religieux (Paris 1927), 223–80.

7. Piety—Its Expression in the Arts and Literature

A. Rohrbasser, Heilslehre der Kirche. Dokumente von Pius IX. bis Pius XII. (Fribourg 1953); R. Graber, Die marianischen Weltrundschreiben der Päpste in den letzten hundert Jahren (Regensburg 1951); A. Mayer-Pfannholz, "Das Kirchenbild des 19. Jh. und seine Ablösung," Die Besinnung 3 (Nuremberg 1948), 124–44.

LITURGICAL MOVEMENT: W. Trapp, Vorgeschichte und Ursprung der liturgischen Bewegung (Regensburg 1940); O. Rousseau, Histoire du mouvement liturgique (Paris 1945), 201–30; J. Hacker, "Die Messe in den deutschen Diözesan-, Gesang- und Gebetbüchern von der Aufklärung bis zur Gegenwart," MthSt(H) 1 (1950), 68–132; Anton L. Mayer, "Die Stellung der Liturgie von der Zeit der Romantik bis zur Jahrhundertwende," ALW 3 (1955), 1–77; H. A. Heiser, Die Durchführung der Kommuniondekrete in der ganzen Welt (Wiesbaden 1932); P. Hellbernd, Die Erstkommunion der Kinder in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Vechta 1954).

EUCHARISTIC CONGRESSES: E. Lesne, Cinquantenaire des congrès eucharistiques internationaux (Lille 1931). R. Aubert, "Die Eucharistischen Kongresse von Leo XIII. bis Johannes XXIII.," Concilium 1 (1965), 61–66.

REFORM OF THE BREVIARY: T. Narbutas, La reforma del breviario romano por Pío X (Santiago de Chile 1949).

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE BIBLE: B. Dreher, Die biblische Unterweisung im evangelischen und katholischen Religionsunterricht (Freiburg i. Br. 1963), 11–81.

CHURCH MUSIC: K. G. Fellerer, Geschichte der Katholischen Kirchenmusik (Düsseldorf 1949), 143–62; F. Romita, "La preformazione del Motu proprio di S. Pio X sulla musica sacra," Monitor ecclesiasticus 86 (1961), 395–497; P. Combe, Histoire de la restauration de chant grégorien d'après des documents inédits (Solesmes 1969).

CHURCH ART: I. Herwegen, O.S.B., Das Kunstprinzip der Liturgie (Paderborn 1920); id., Kunst und Mysterium (Münster i. W. 1929); K. Clark, The Gothic Revival (London 1950); K. Andrews, The Nazarenes. A Brotherhood of German Painters in Rome (Oxford 1964); R. Ironside and J. Gere, Pre-Raphaelite Painters (London 1948); A. Kamphausen, Gotik ohne Gott. Ein Beitrag zur Deutung der Neugotik und des 19. Jh. (Tübingen 1952); A. Mann, Die Neuromantik (Cologne 1966); J. Kreitmaier, S.J., Beuroner Kunst. Eine Ausdrucksform der christlichen Mystik (Freiburg i. Br. 1923); St. Waetzoldt, "Bemerkungen zur christlich-religiösen Malerei in der zweiten Hälfte des 19. Jh.," Triviale Zonen in der religiösen Kunst des 19. Jh. (Studien zur Philosophie und Literatur des 19. Jh. 15 [Frankfurt a. M. 1971]).

SPIRITUAL LIFE: H. Weinert, Dichtung aus dem Glauben (Heidelberg 1948); C. Moeller, Littérature du XX^{e} siècle et christianisme (Paris 1953ff.). A. Simon, La Littérature du péché et de la grâce, 1880–1950 (Paris 1957); M. Bougier, Essai sur la renaissance de la Poésie catholique de Baudelaire à Claudel (Montpellier 1942); W. Spael, Das Buch im Geisteskampf. 100 Jahre Borromäusverein (Bonn 1950); O. Köhler, Bücher als Wegmarken im deutschen Katholizismus: "Der katholische Buchhandel Deutschlands", ed. by the Vereinigung des katholischen Buchhandels (Frankfurt a. M. 1967); G. Rossini, ed., Aspetti della cultura cattolica nell'età di Leone XIII (Rome 1961).

8. POLITICAL AND SOCIAL DOCTRINE—SOCIAL AND POLITICAL CATHOLICISM

PAPAL SOCIAL AND POLITICAL DOCTRINES: R. Kothen, L'enseignement social de l'Église (Louvain 1949) (texts of doctrines issued by the Popes from Leo XIII to Pius XI); E. Muhler, Die Soziallehren der Päpste (Munich 1958); J. Schasching, Die soziale Botschaft der Kirche von Leo XIII. bis Johannes XXIII. (Vienna 1963); G. Jarlot, Doctrine pontificale et histoire, L'enseignement social de Léon XIII., Pie X et Benoît XV vu dans son ambiance historique (Rome 1964).

LEO XIII: P. Mourret, Les directives politiques, intellectuelles et sociales de Léon XIII. (Paris 1920); W. Schwer, Leo XIII.: Klassiker der katholischen Sozialphilosophie (Freiburg 1923); O. Schilling, Die Staats- und Soziallehre des Papstes Leo XIII. (Cologne 1925); id., Christliche Gesellschaftslehre (Freiburg i. Br. 1926); P. Tischleder, Die Staatslehre Leos XIII. (Mönchen-Gladbach 1925–27); id., Staatsgewalt und katholisches Gewissen (Mönchen-Gladbach 1926); L. P. Wallace, Leo XIII and the Rise of Socialism (New York 1966).

RERUM NOVARUM: G. Gundlach: Veröffentlichung der Görres-Gesellschaft, Sektion Sozial-und Wirtschaftsgeschichte no. 3 (Paderborn 1931) (also Quadragesimo anno); O. v. Nell-Breuning, Die soziale Enzyklika: Erläuterungen zum Weltrundschreiben Pius' XI. über die gesellschaftliche Ordnung (Cologne 1932; 2d ed., 1950; including important comments regarding Rerum novarum); M. Allendorf, Zur Geschichte der Sozialenzykliken des Vatikans (diss., Humboldt Univ., Berlin 1963).

DOCTRINE OF PROPERTY: O. v. Nell-Breuning, "Die Eigentumslehre," J. Strieder et al. (ed. of the Görres-Gesellschaft), Die soziale Frage und der Katholizismus (Paderborn 1931); K. H. Grenner, Wirtschaftsliberalismus und katholisches Denken (Cologne 1967); F. Beutter, Die Eigentumsbegründung in der Moraltheologie des 19. Jh. (Paderborn 1971).

SOCIAL AND POLITICAL CATHOLICISM: A. M. Knoll, Der soziale Gedanke im modernen Katholizismus. Von der Romantik bis Rerum novarum (Vienna and Leipzig 1932); L. Leutner, Das Erwachen der modernen katholischen Sozialidee. Die Entwicklung im 19. Jh. bis Rerum novarum (Vienna 1951); J. N. Moody, ed., Church and Society: Catholic Social and Political Thought and Movements, 1789–1950 (New York 1953); M. P. Fogarty, Christian Democracy in Western Europe, 1820–1953 (London 1957); G. Brakelmann, Die soziale Frage des 19. Jh. II: Die evangelisch-soziale und die katholisch-soziale Bewegung (Witten 1962); C. Bauer, "Bild der Kirche—Abbild der Gesellschaft," Hochland 48 (1956); new ed.: Deutscher Katholizismus (Frankfurt 1964), 9–27; Hans Maier, Revolution und Kirche. Studien zur Frühgeschichte der christlichen Demokratie, 1789–1901 (Freiburg 1965); id., Kirche und Gesellschaft (Munich 1972); M. Bendiscioli, "Chiesa e società nei secc. XIX e XX," Nuove questioni di storia contemporanea I (Milan 1967), 325–447; Verluis, Beknopte Geschiedenis van de Katholicke Arbeidersbeweging (1949); Götz Briefs et al., ed. by the Catholic Social Institute of the Archdiocese of Cologne, Das Bild des Arbeiters in der katholischen Sozialbewegung von den Anfängen bis zur Gegenwart (Cologne 1960); S. H. Scholl, ed., 150 ans de mouvement ouvrier chrétien en Europe de l'Ouest (Paris 1966); L. R. Sanseverino, Il movimento sindacale cristiano dal 1850 al 1939 (Rome 1950); K. H. Schürmann, Zur Vorgeschichte der christlichen Gewerkschaften (Freiburg i. Br. 1958); K. Buchheim, "Christliche Parteien," StL II 467–75 (international survey, biblio.).

9. HISTORY OF THEOLOGY

NEO-SCHOLASTICISM: P. Dezza, Alle origini del Neotomismo (Milan 1940); id., I neotomisti italiani del secolo XIX, 2 vols. (Milan 1942–44); R. Aubert, "Aspects divers du néo-thomisme sous le pontificat de Léon XIII.," Aspetti della cultura cattolica nell'età di Leone XIII. (Rome 1961), 133–227; A. Walz, "Sguardo sul movimento tomista nel secolo XIX fino all'enciclica Aeterni Patris," Aquinas 8 (1965), 351–79; H. Vorgrimler and R. Vander Gucht, Bilanz der Theologie, 3 vols. (Freiburg i. Br. 1969), esp.: F. van Steenberghen, Die neuscholastische Philosophie (vol. 1), R. Aubert, Die Theologie während der 1. Hälfte des 20. Jh. (vol. 2); K. Eschweiler, Die zwei Wege der neueren Theologie. G. Hermes-M. J. Scheeben (Augsburg 1926); M. J. Scheeben, Handbuch der katholischen Dogmatik, 7 vols., ed. by J. Höfer et al. (Freiburg 1941–57; incl. biblio.); F. S. Pancheri, Il pensiero teologico di M. Scheeben e S. Tommaso (Padua 1956).

M. BLONDEL AND HIS SCHOOL: R. Scherer, Introduction to: M. Blondel, Das Denken (Freiburg i. Br. 1953), VIII–XXXII; R. Aubert, Le problème de l'acte de foi, données traditionnelles et résultats des controverses récents (Louvain 1950), 227–511; J.-P. Golinas, La restauration du Thomisme sous Léon XIII et les philosophes nouvelles. Ètude de la pensée de M. Blondel et du Père Laberthonnière (Washington 1959); A. Hayen, Bibliographie blondélienne (Messina 1953); Laberthonnière. L'homme et l'œuvre, ed. by P. Beillevert (Paris 1972); E. Lecanuet, La vie de l'Église sous Léon XIII (Paris 1930), 384–543.

THE BIBLICAL QUESTION (cf. "MODERNISM"): A. Loisy, Mémoires, 3 vols. (Paris 1930–31); A. Houtin, La question biblique chez les catholiques de France au XIX^e siècle (Paris 1902); id., La question biblique au XX^e siècle (ibid. 1906); J. Chaine et al., L'œuvre exégetique et historique du R. P. Lagrange (Paris 1935); L.-H. Vincent, "Le Père Lagrange," RB 47 (1938), 321–54; F. M. Braun, L'œuvre du Père Lagrange (Fribourg 1943); Le Père Lagrange ou service de la Bible, Souvenirs personnels (Paris 1967).

THE "MODERNIST" CRISIS: O. Schröder, Aufbruch und Mißverständnis. Zur Geschichte der Reformkatholischen Bewegung (Graz 1969); A. Gisler, Der Modernismus (Einsiedeln 1912); J. Rivière, Le modernisme dans l'Église (Paris 1929); The Modernist Movement in the Roman Church (Cambridge 1934); id., A Variety of Catholic Modernists (Cambridge 1970); É. Poulat, Histoire, dogme et critique dans la crise moderniste (Paris and Tournai 1962); id., Intégrisme et catholicisme intégral (Paris and Tournai 1969); J. Ratté, Three Modernists, A. Loisy, G. Tyrrell, W. L. Sullivan (New York 1967); F. Rodé, Le miracle dans la crise moderniste (Paris 1965); C. Porro, La controversia cristologica nel periodo modernisto (Milan 1971); M. Ranchetti, Cultura e riforma religiosa nella storia del modernismo (Turin 1963); P. Scoppola, Crisi modernista e rinnovamento cattolico (Bologna 1969); L. Bedeschi, I cattolici disubbidienti (Naples and Rome 1959); id., Il Modernismo e Romolo Murri in Emilia e Romagna (Parma 1967); M. Guasco, R. Murri e il modernismo (Rome 1968); M. de la Bédoyère, The Life of Baron von Hügel (London 1951); L. F. Barmann, Baron F. von Hügel and the Modernist Crisis in England (Cambridge 1972); F. Parente, E. Buonaiuti (Rome 1970); L. Bedeschi, Lineamenti dell'antimodernismo. Il caso Lanzoni (Parma 1970); E. Weinzierl, ed., Der Modernismus. Beiträge zu seiner Erforschung (Graz, Vienna and Cologne, 1973), which includes: R. Lill, "Der Kampf der römischen Kurie gegen den 'praktischen' Modernismus: Die Päpstliche Autorität im katholischen Selbstverständnis des 19. und 20. Jh.," 109–23.

BIBLIOGRAPHY TO INDIVIDUAL CHAPTERS

Part One

The Problem of Adapting to the Modern World

Introduction: The World Plan of Leo XIII: Goals and Methods

SOURCES

ASS 11–35 (Rome 1878–1903); Leonis XIII Pont. Max. Acta, 23 vols. with index (Rome 1881–1905; reprint Graz 1971); Epistolae encyclicae, 6 parts (Freiburg i. Br. 1878–1904; Lat. and Germ.); Leonis XIII Allocutiones, Epistolae et Constitutiones, 8 vols. (Bruges 1887–1911); Scelta di atti episcopali del card. G. Pecci ora Leone XIII (Rome 1879); Leonis XIII Carmina, Inscriptiones, Numismata, ed. by J. Bach (Cologne 1903); Discorsi, ed. P. de Franciscis (Rome 1882); A. Mercati, Raccolta di Concordati I (Rome 1952); Œuvres pastorales de S. E. le Cardinal Pecci, 2 vols. (Bruges and Lille 1888–92); Lettres de Pecci, 1843–1846, ed. by A. Simon (Brussels and Rome 1959).

On the conclave: Mullé de la Cerda, Reseña histórica del último conclave y biografía de León XIII (Madrid 1878); Journal of Cardinal H.-M.-G. Bonnechose: L. Besson, Vie de S. E. le cardinal Bonnechose II (Paris 1887); R. de Cesare, Il Conclave di Leone XIII (Città di Castello 1888).

Memoirs and letters: A. Perraud, Mes relations personnelles avec les derniers papes Pie IX et Léon XIII 1856–1903 (Paris 1917); D. Ferrata, Mémoires, 3 vols. (Rome 1920); K. v. Schlözer, Letzte römische Briefe (1882–94 [Berlin 1924]; P. M. Baumgarten, Römische und andere Erinnerungen (Düsseldorf 1927); C. Benoist, Souvenirs I 1883–93 (Paris 1932); G. Someria, I miei quattro Papi I (Milan 1930); F. Crispolti, Pio IX–Pio XI, Ricordi personali (Milan 1939); Lettere di Giuseppe Toniolo, ed. by G. Anichini, 3 vols. (Rome 1952–53); F. X. Kraus, Tagebücher (cf. chap. 29), 383–758; L. v. Pastor, Tagebücher—Briefe—Erinnerungen (cf. chap. 29) 111–416; H. des Houx, Souvenirs d'un journaliste français à Rome (Paris 1886).

Nunciatures: G. de Marchi, Le nunziature apostoliche dal 1800 al 1956 (Rome 1957; chronologically arranged list of nuncios with appointment and sanction according to countries).

The press: Osservatore Romano (1878ff.; since 1870 semiofficial paper of the Vatican); La Civiltà Cattolica (1878ff.); in Schmidlin, PG, 377, and in the other biographies the positive press comments, even from the liberal and Socialist camp, are quoted; the wording and selection need to be examined; F. Jürgensmeier, Die katholische Kirche im Spiegel der Karikatur der deutschen satirischen Tendenzzeitschriften von 1848–1900 (1969) 216–29, 230–47, passim.

LITERATURE

In addition to the general church histories listed in the General Bibliography, see the older documents of that time (cf. chap. 22), especially F. Mourret, Histoire générale de l'Église, 9 vols. (1909–21), pertinent vols. 8 and 9; P. M. Baumgarten, Die katholische Kirche unserer Zeit, 2 vols. (Munich 1899–1902); E. Jarry, L'Église contemporaine, 2 vols. (Paris 1936).

New assessments of the pontificate: E. T. Gargan, ed., Leo XIII and the Modern World (New York 1961); Stanislao da Campagnola, I papi nella storia II (Rome 1961); G. Schwaiger, Geschichte der Päpste im 20. Jahrhundert, (Munich 1964; new in Deutscher Taschenbuchverlag no. 482 [1968] 28–49); D. Secco Suardo (cited in chap. 5); K. O. v. Aretin, Papsttum und moderne Welt (Munich 1970); G. Maron, Die römisch-katholische Kirche von 1870 bis 1970; K. D. Schmidt and E. Wolf, Die Kirche und ihre Geschichte 4, 2 (Göttingen 1972), 203–8, passim; I. E. Ward, "Leo XIII, 'the Diplomat pope,'" Review of Politics 28 (1966), 47–61; C. Weber (biblio. to chap. 3).

Biblio. on the various countries and the individual topics, cf. the respective chapters.

BIOGRAPHIES

Schmidlin, PG II (Munich 1934), 331–589, is still considered "one of the most thorough . . . presentations" (R. Lill).—The purely popular biographies, of which the German ones are particularly numerous (see Schmidlin, PG, pp. XIX–XXII), are noteworthy as documents of the papal consciousness.—C. Tesi-Passerini and G. Cinquemani, Leone ed il suo tempo, 3 vols. (Turin 1890–92); C. de T'Serclaes, Le Pape Léon XIII, 3 vols. (Paris and Bruges 1894–1906), annalistic; according to the foreword of Vol. III, Pope Leo read the proof sheets, advice-note by Rampolla; H. des Houx, Histoire de Léon XIII (Paris 1900); L. K. Goetz, Leo XIII., seine Weltanschauung und seine Wirksamkeit (Gotha 1899; Protestant); B. O'Reilly, Vie de Léon XIII (Paris 1887); N. Schneider, Leo XIII., sein Leben und Wirken (Kempten 1903; "with Duke Pecci's support"); M. Spahn, Leo XIII. (Munich 1905); J. Fèvres. Vie de Léon XIII, 2 vols. (Paris 1908); Walter Goetz in Meister der Politik III, ed. by E. Marcks and K. A. v. Müller (Stuttgart 1924) 381–403 (best assessment from the Protestant side; cf. below); E. Vercesi, Tre Papi: Leone XIII, Pio X, Benedetto, XV (Milan 1929); A. Buttè, Il papa Leone XIII (Milan 1931); E. Soderini, Il pontificato di Leone XIII, 3 vols. (Milan 1932–33; "using the materials made available to him by the Pope himself"); R. Fülöp-Miller, Leo XIII. (Zurich 1935); F. Hayward, Léon XIII (Paris 1937; foreword by Cardinal A. Baudrillart); G. Monetti, Leone XIII, 3 vols. (Rome 1942); R. Aubert, Léon XIII: I cattolici italiani dall'800 ad oggi (Brescia 1964), 191–220.—Misc.: A.-J. Boyer d'Agen, La jeunesse de Léon XIII (and cf. below) (1897); J. Kraikin, L'infanzia e la giovinezza di un papa (Grottaferrata 1914); W. Lorenz, Die Jugend des J. Pecci: StdZ 165 (1959/60) 415–23; A.-J. Boyer d'Agen, La prélature de Léon XIII (Paris 1907); id., Msgr. J. Pecci 1838–46 (Paris 1910); P. van Zuylen, "La nonciature Pecci," Rev. gén belge 126 (Brussels 1931) 258–76; N. Hilling, "Die kirchliche Gesetzgebung Leos XIII," AkathKR 93 (1913); 94 (1914); Un témoin (=Cardinal F. D. Mathieu), Les derniers jours de Léon XIII et le conclave (Paris 1904).—Pertaining to the various papal actions, cf. the respective chapters.

VATICAN AND CARDINALS: L. Teste, Léon XIII et le Vatican (Paris 1880); id., Préface au Conclave (Paris 1873); J.-J. Thierry, La vie quotidienne au Vatican du temps de Léon XIII (Paris 1963).—Cardinals (according to the dates of their appointment): J.-B. Pitra (1863); see vol. VIII; Gustav F. v. Hohenlohe (1866): vol. VIII; P. Cullen (1866): M. J.

Curran (Dublin 1955); L. Oreglia (1873): Schmidlin, PG II, index; Franchi (1873): Schmidlin, PG II, index; J. H. Guibert (1873): J. Paguelle de Follenay, 2 vols. (Paris 1896); M.-H. Graf v. Ledóchowski (1875): this vol., Chaps. 1 and 3; H. E. Manning (1875): J. Fitzsimons (London 1951); V.-A. Dechamps (1875): M. Becqué, 2 vols. (Louvain 1956); Bartolini (1875): Schmidlin, PG II, index; McCloskey (1875): J. Farley (London 1918); J. B. Franzelin (1876): Hocedez III, 133–40, index; L. Parocchi (1877): Schmidlin, PG II, index; Pastor, Tagebücher, index; L. Nina (1877): Schmidlin, PG II, index; J. H. Newman (1879): vol. VIII, chap. 9; T. M. Zigliara (1879): Hocedez II and III, index; J. Hergenröther (1879): S. Merkle in Lebensläufe aus Franken, ed. by A. Chroust (Munich 1919), 188–97; B. Lang: ThPQ 93 (1940) 302–9; L. Jacobini (1879): Schmidlin, PG II, 458–62; L. Pie (1879): vol. VIII; C.-M. A. Lavigerie (1882): this vol. chap. 6; W. Czacki (1882): this vol., chap. 3, n. 4; G. Aloisi Masella (1883): this vol., chap. 3, n. 8; C. González Díaz Tuñón (1884): A. Walz, Compendium . . . (Rome 1948), 621f.; P. F. Moran (1885): Schmidlin PG II, 500; this vol., chap. 9; P. Melchers (1885): H. M. Ludwigs (Cologne 1909); C. Mazzella (1886): ECatt VIII, 526f.; Hocedez III, 263f., index; J. Gibbons (1886): J. T. Ellis, 2 vols. (Milwaukee 1952); E. A. Taschereau (1886): D. de Saint-Denis, L'Église cath. au Canada (Montreal 1956); this vol., chap. 9; M. Rampolla (1887): T. Cramer-Klett in Hochland 11, 2 (1914), 1–9; B. Ceretti (Rome 1928); E. Vercesi, Tre Segretari di Stato: Consalvi, Rampolla, Gasparri (Venice 1932); Engel-Janosi, index; Serafino Vannutelli (1887): Schmidlin, PG II, index; F. X. Kraus, index; P. L. Goossens (1889): J. Muyldermans (Mechelen 1922); F.-M. B. Richard de la Vergne (1889): this vol., chap. 30; G. Mermillod (1890): C. Comte (Paris 1924); H. J. Gruscha (1891): O. Posch (diss., Vienna 1947); H. Vaughan (1892): J. G. Snead-Cox, 2 vols. (London 1910); P. Thureau-Dangin (Paris 1911); this vol., chap. 9; G. Sarto (1893): cf. Part II of this vol.; G. v. Kopp (1893): F. X. Seppelt in Zs. f. Gesch. Schlesiens 50 (Wroclaw 1916) 295–308; id., Gesch. des Bistums Breslau (Berlin 1929), 121–26; P. Krementz (1893): P. Höveler (Düsseldorf 1899); L. Galimberti (1893): this vol., chap. 3; Engel-Janosi, index; Angelo di Pietro (1893): De Marchi (see under Sources); A. G. Ferrari (1894): G. B. Penco, Un grande cardinale (Milan 1959); A. Gotti (1895): Il Carmelo 5 (1906), 15 (1916), 33 (1934); A.-L.-A. Perraud (1895): G. d'Orgeval-Dubouchet (Paris 1907); A. Houtin, Évêques et diocèses I (Paris 1908), 5–42; F. Satolli (1895): L. Hertling, Gesch. der kath. Kirche in den Vereinigten Staaten (Berlin 1954), 225f., 232ff.; A. Agliardi (1896): Pastor, Tagebücher, 229, 251f.; Engel-Janosi, index; D. Ferrata (1896): U. Stutz, Die päpstl. Diplomatie unter Leo XIII nach den Denkwürdigkeiten [cf. above, Sources] D. Ferratas (Berlin 1926); F.-D. Mathieu (1899): E. Renard (Paris 1925); J. C. Vives y Tutò (1899): A. M. de Barcelona (Barcelona 1951); Respighi (1901): Schmidlin, PG II, index.

SECTION ONE

The Situation in the Various Countries until 1914

1. The Kulturkampf in Prussia and in the German Empire until 1878

SOURCES

N. Siegfried (i.e., V. Cathrein), Aktenstücke betreffend den preußischen Culturkampf (Freiburg 1882); Aktenstücke betreffend die Fuldaer Bischofskonferenzen 1867–1888 (Cologne 1889); L. Bergsträsser, Dokumente des politischen Katholizismus II (Munich 1923); O. v. Bismarck, Die gesammelten Werke VIc: Politische Schriften 1871–1890, ed. W. Frauendienst (Berlin 1935); XI: Reden 1869–1878, ed. W. Schüßler (Berlin 1929); Die Vorgeschichte des Kulturkampfes. Quellenveröffentlichung aus dem Deutschen Zentralarchiv, ed. A. Constabel, introd. by F. Hartung (Berlin 1956).

LITERATURE

J. Bachem, Preußen und die kath. Kirche (Cologne 1887), 80–110; H. Brück, Gesch. der kath. Kirche in Deutschland im 19. Jahrhundert IV, 1, ed. J. B. Kißling (Münster 1907); J. B. Kißling, Geschichte des Kulturkampfes im Deutschen Reich II, III (Freiburg 1913, 1916); F. Vigener, Ketteler (Munich and Berlin 1924), 612–722; K. Bachem, Vorgeschichte, Geschichte und Politik der deutschen Zentrumspartei III (Cologne 1927; reprint, Aalen 1967); Schmidlin, PG II, 179–89; H. Bornkamm, Die Staatsidee im Kulturkampf (Munich 1950); Aubert, Pie IX, 384–92; G. Franz, Kulturkampf. Staat und kath. Kirche in Mitteleuropa von der Säkularisation bis zum Abschluß des preußischen Kulturkampfes (Munich 1954), 185–246; id., (under the name of G. Franz-Willing), Kulturkampf gestern und heute, Eine Säkularbetrachtung (Munich 1971), 27–72; R. Morsey, "Bismarck und der Kulturkampf," AKG 39 (1957), 232–70; id., "Probleme der Kulturkampf-Forschung," HJ 83 (1964), 217–45; K. Buchheim, Ultramontanismus und Demokratie (Munich 1963), 215–308; Bihlmeyer-Tüchle III, 406–10; E. Schmidt-Volkmar, Der Kulturkampf in Deutschland 1871–1890 (Göttingen 1962); W. P. Fuchs, "Ultramontanismus und Staatsräson. Der Kulturkampf," Staat und Kirche im Wandel der Jahrhunderte, ed. by W. P. Fuchs (Stuttgart 1966), 184–200; E. R. Huber, Deutsche Verfassungsgeschichte seit 1789 IV (Stuttgart 1969), 49–54, 60f., 651–767; R. Lill, "Die Katholiken und Bismarcks Reichsgründung," Reichsgründung 1870/71, ed. by T. Schieder and E. Deuerlein (Stuttgart 1970), 345–65; C. Weber, Kirchliche Politik Zwischen Rom, Berlin und Trier 1876–1888 (Mainz 1970); G. Maron, "Die römisch-kath. Kirche von 1870 bis 1970," Die Kirche in ihrer Geschichte. Ein Handbuch, ed. by K. D. Schmidt and E. Wolf, vol. 4, no. 2 (Göttingen 1972), 201ff., 256–59; E. Gatz, Die deutschen Bischofskonferenzen 1872–1881 (in preparation).

INDIVIDUAL DIOCESES AND PROVINCES: M. Höhler, Gesch. des Bistums Limburg (Limburg 1908), 322–65; A. Bertram, Gesch. des Bistums Hildesheim III (Hildesheim and Leipzig 1925), 313–26; E. Gatz, "Bischöfliche Einheitsfront im Kulturkampf? Neue Funde zum Kirchenkonflikt im Bistum Hildesheim," HJ 92 (1972), 391–403; L. Ficker and O. Hellinghaus, Der Kulturkampf in Münster (Münster 1928); G. Dettmer, Die ost- und westpreußischen Verwaltungsbehörden im Kulturkampf (Heidelberg 1958); W. Jestaedt, Der Kulturkampf im Fuldaer Lande (Fulda 1960); H. Lepper, "Die kirchenpolitische Gesetzgebung der Jahre 1872–1875 und ihre Ausführung im Regierungsbezirk Aachen," AHVNrh 171 (1969), 200–258; Weber, Kirchliche Politik (see above, Trier, Rhine province); N. Trippen, Das Domkapitel und die Erzbischofswahlen in Köln 1821–1929 (Cologne and Vienna 1972), 249–76; F. G. Hohmann, "Domkapitel und Bischofswahlen in Paderborn 1857–1892," WZ 122 (1972), 192–282.

INDIVIDUAL PERSONALITIES (the extensive Bismarck bibliography is not listed; there are no critical biographies of most Catholic leaders): Empress Augusta: M. v. Bunsen (1940); W. Goetz in NDB 1, 451f.—Eberhard: A. Ditscheid (Trier 1911).—Falk: E. Förster (Gotha 1927); R. Ruhenstroth-Bauer, Bismarck und Falk im Kulturkampf (Heidelberg 1944); S. Skalweit in NDB 5, 6f. —For the following, see vol. VIII in this series: Ketteler (chap. 6), Ledóchowski (chap. 8, no. 6), Mallinckrodt (chap. 8), Melchers (chap. 8, n. 5), Moufang (chap. 8; in add. G. May in AMrhKG 22 [1970], 227–36), the brothers Reichensperger (chap. 6). For Förster and Krementz, see above, this chapter, nn. 15 and 16.—Mühler: W. Reichle (Berlin 1938).—Windthorst: E. Hüsgen (Cologne 1907); E. Deuerlein in StZ 169 (1961/62), 277–97; W. Spael (Osnabrück 1962); R. Lillin Politische Ideologien und nationalstaatliche Ordnung. Festschr. f. Th. Schieder (Munich 1968), 317–35; R. Morsey in StL VIII, 712ff.

2. Tensions in the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy (1878–1914)

LITERATURE

Vol. VIII, chaps. 8 and 19. In addition: L. v. Pastor, Tagebücher, Briefe, Erinnerungen, ed. W. Wühr (Heidelberg 1950); A. Hudal, Die österreichische Vatikanbotschaft 1806–1918 (Munich 1952); J. Wodka, Kirche in Österreich (Vienna 1959); F. Engel-Janosi, Österreich und der Vatikan II, 2–173; M. Csáky, Der Kulturkampf in Ungarn (Graz, Vienna and Cologne 1967); F. Funder, Vom Gestern ins Heute (Vienna and Munich 1971); G. Adriányi, "Friedrich Graf Revertera, Erinnerungen (1888–1901)," AHPont 10 (Rome 1972), 241ff.; I. A. Hellwing, Der konfessionelle Antisemitismus im 19. Jh. in Österreich (Vienna, Freiburg and Basel 1972).

3. The Conclusion of the Kulturkampf in Prussia and in the German Empire

SOURCES

As in chap. 1 (except the edition of Constabel). In addition: O. Pfülf, "Aus Windthorsts Korrespondenz," Stimmen aus Maria Laach 82, 83 (1912); K. v. Schlözer, Letzte römische Briefe 1882–04, ed. L. v. Schlözer (Berlin and Leipzig 1924); O. v. Bismarck, Die gesammelten Werke XII, XIII: Reden 1878–1897, ed. W. Schüßler (Berlin 1929–30); Vatikanische Akten zur Geschichte des deutschen Kulturkampfes, ed. R. Lill, Part 1:1878–80 (Tübingen 1970), Part 2: 1880–87 (in preparation).

LITERATURE

As in chap. 1, especially the works by Kißling (vol. 3), K. Bachem (vols. III, IV), Franz-Willing, Morsey, Schmidt-Volkmar, E. R. Huber and C. Weber. In addition: E.

Lefebvre de Béhaine, Léon XIII et le Prince de Bismarck . . . , Introduction par G. Goyau (Paris 1898); C. Crispolti and G. Aureli, La politica di Leone XIII da Luigi Galimberti a Mariano Rampolla (Rome 1912); J. Heckel, "Die Beilegung des Kulturkampfes in Preußen," ZSavRGkan 19 (1930), 215–353, reprinted in: J. Heckel, Das blinde, undeutliche Wort Kirche, ed. S. Grundmann (Cologne and Graz 1964), 454–571; E. Soderini, Il Pontificato di Leone XIII III (Milan 1933); H. Mann, Der Beginn der Abkehr Bismarcks vom Kulturkampf 1878–1880 unter bes. Berücksichtigung der Politik des Zentrums und der Römischen Kurie (diss., Frankfurt a. M. 1953); R. Lill, "Die Wende im Kulturkampf," QFIAB 50 (1970), 227–83, 52 (1972), 657–730; in book form (Tübingen 1973); C. Weber, Quellen u. Studien zur Kurie u. vatikan. Politik unter Leo XIII. (in preparation).

4. The Development of Catholicism in Switzerland

LITERATURE

Vol. VII, chaps. 7 and 20; vol. VIII, chap. 8; Schmidlin, PG II, 482–85; U. Stutz, 29–46; G. Franz, Der Kulturkampf (1954), 154ff.; K. Fry, Kaspar Decurtins, 2 vols. (Zurich 1949–52), on the basis of archival material, offers above and beyond the biography of this politician a lot of information about the internal problems of Swiss Catholicism; G. Beuret, Die kath.-soziale Bewegung in der Schweiz. 1848–1919 (diss., Zurich, Winterthur 1959, with biblio.); L. Schihin, Sozialpolitische Ideen im schweizerischen Katholizismus. 1798–1848 (diss., Zurich 1937), offers, in regard to the case of the poor, information about the early paternal mentality and fear of socialism; B. Prongué, Le mouvement chrétien-social dans le Jura bernois, 1891–1961 (Fribourg 1968); R. Ruffieux, Le mouvement chrétien-social en Suisse romande, 1891–1949 (Fribourg 1969); U. Altermatt, Der Weg der Schweizer Katholiken aus dem Ghetto (Cologne, in preparation).

5. Italian Catholics between the Vatican and the Quirinal

LITERATURE

Vol. VIII, chaps. 17, 18, and 20.

1. COLLECTIONS OF SOURCES: H. Bastgen, Die Römische Frage. Dokumente und Stimmen, 3 vols. (Freiburg i. Br. 1917–19); A. C. Jemolo, La questione romana (Milan 1938); Insegnamenti pontifici n. 4, 1748–1956. Il Laicato, ed. the monks of Solesmes, ed. Ital. (Rome 1958); P. Scoppola, Dal neoguelfismo alla democrazia cristiana (Rome 1957).

2. HISTORICAL SURVEYS OF PIONEERS: V. Veggian, Il movimento sociale cristiano nella seconda metà del sec. XIX (Vicenza 1902); R. della Casa, Il movimento cattolico italiano, 2 vols. (Milan 1905); R. Murri, Dalla Democrazia Cristiana al Partito Popolare Italiano (Florence 1920); F. Olgiati, Storia dell'azione cattolica in Italia (Milan 1920); E. Vercesi, Il movimento cattolico italiano (1870–1922) (Florence 1922); M. Vaussard, L'Intelligence catholique dans l'Italie du XX^e siècle (Paris 1921); G. B. Valente, Aspetti e momenti dell' azione sociale dei cattolici in Italia (1892–1926), ed. F. Malgeri (Rome 1968); G. della Torre, I cattolici e la vita pubblica italiana, ed. G. De Rosa, 2 vols. (Rome 1962); M. Zanatta (pseudonym of A. De Gasperi), I tempi e gli uomini che prepararono la "Rerum novarum" (Milan 1928 and 1945); F. Magri, L'azione cattolica in Italia (1775–1939) (Milan 1953).

3. More Recent Historical Works: G. Candeloro, L'azione cattolica in Italia (Rome 1949); id., Il movimento cattolico in Italia (Rome 1953) (Marxist interpretation); L. Riva, Sanseverino. Il movimento sindacale cristiano (Rome 1950); G. De Rosa, L'azione cattolica. Storia politica 1874–1904 (Bari 1953); id., Storia politica dell'A. C. in Italia 1905–1919 (Bari 1954) (cf. review by F. Fonzi in Humanitas VIII [1963], 694–98; IX [1954], 1120–30). New ed. in 2 vols. (1966); F. Fonzi, I cattolici e la società italiana dopo l'Unità (Rome 1953); G. Spadolini, L'opposizione cattolica da Porta Pia al 1898 (Florence 1954); A. Martini, Studi sulla questione romana e la conciliazione (Rome 1963); D. Secco Suardo, Da Leone XIII a Pio X (=Collana di storia del movimento cattolico no. 18 [Rome 1967]); several authors, Spiritualità ed azione del laicato cattolico italiano, 2 vols. (Padua 1969) (cf. review by S. Tramontin in RSTI 26 [1972], 154–74); A. Gambasin, Il movimento sociale nell'opera dei congressi (1874–1904) (=AnGr no. 91 [Rome 1958]); id., "Il movimento sindacale italiano" in S. H. Scholl, ed., 150 anni di movimento operaio cattolico nell'Europa centro-occidentale (Padua 1962); G. Rossini, Ed., Aspetti della cultura cattolica nell'età di Leone XIII (Rome 1961); L. Ambrosoli, Il primo movimento D. C. in Italia (1897–1904) (Rome 1958); C. Brezzi, Cristiano sociali e intransigenti (L'opera di Medolago Albani fino alla "R. N.") (Rome 1971); Complete bibliography: Archivio per la storia del movimento cattolico in Italia (Milan 1967); M. Bendiscioli, "Chiesa e società nei secc. XIX e XX," Nuove questioni di storia contemporanea I (Milan 1967), 325–447; C. Maronciu-Buonaiuti, Non expedit (Rome 1971).

4. Specific Topics: (a) The development in different parts of the country: Lombardy: Aside from the monographs about D. Albertario, F. Meda, Rezzara (Bergamo), Tovini (Brescia), Bonomelli (Cremona), cf. A. Zaninelli, Le leghe "bianche" nel cremonese (1900–21) (Rome 1961); L. Ambrosoli, Profile del movimento cattolico milanese nell'Ottocento (Milan 1960); B. Malinverni, La scuola sociale cattolica di Bergamo (1910–32) (Rome 1960).—Veneto: The biographies of Paganuzzi, Rezzara, the Scottons in: A. Gambasin, Il movimento sociale nell'opera dei congressi; biblio. in ibid., 585–96; E. Reato, Le origini del movimento cattolico a Vicenza (1860–91) (Vicenza 1961).—Piedmont: A. Zussini, L. Caisotti di Chiusano e il movimento cattolico dal 1896 al 1915 (Turin 1970); M. L. Salvadori, Il movimento cattolico a Torino 1911–15 (Turin 1969).—Tuscany: G. P. Cappelli, La prima sinistra cattolica in Toscana (Rome 1962); M. Stanghellini and U. Tintori, Storia del movimento cattolico lucchese (Rome 1958); P. L. Ballini, Il movimento cattolico a Firenze 1900–19 (Rome 1969).—Naples: P. Lopez, E. Cenni e i cattolici napoletani dopo l'unità (Rome 1962); A. Cestaro, La stampa cattolica a Napoli 1860–1904 (Rome 1965).—Calabria: P. Borzomati, Aspetti religiosi e storia del movimento cattolico in Calabria (1860–1919) (Rome 1970).

(b) The movement and organizations: B. M. Brogi, La lega democratica nazionale (Rome 1959); C. Giovannini, Politica e religione nel pensiero della lega dem. naz. 1905–1915 (Rome 1968); G. Licata, La "rassegna nazionale". Conservatori e cattolici liberali attraverso la loro rivista (Rome 1968); O. Confessore, Conservatorismo politico e riformismo religioso. La "rassegna nazionale" 1898–1908 (Bologna 1971); G. Marcucci Fanello, Storia della Federazione Universitaria Cattolica Italiana (Rome 1971). Regarding the Rinnovamento, cf. N. Raponi, Tommaso Gallarti Scotti tra politica e cultura (Milan 1971).

(c) The journals as an expression of the Catholic movement: several authors, Aspetti della cultura cattolica nell'età di Leone XIII (Rome 1961); G. De Rosa, ed., Antologia della "Civilta cattolica" (Rome 1971).

(d) The relationship to Italy's history: F. Chabod, Storia della politica estera italiana dal 1870 al 1896. I. Premesse (Bari 1951); L. Valiani, "L'Italia dal 1876 al 1915," N. Valeri, ed., Storia d'Italia IV (Turin 1965); C. A. Jemolo, Chiesa e stato in Italia negli ultimi cento anni (Turin 1955).

(e) Individual personalities: G. Toniolo, Opera omnia (Vatican City 1947), especially Lettere, 3 vols. (1952–55); E. da Persico, G. Toniolo (Verona 1928) (rather belletristic); F. Vistalli, G. Toniolo (Rome 1954); A. Vian, G. B. Paganuzzi (Rome 1950); G. Roncalli, Radini Tedeschi, vescovo di Bergamo (Bergamo 1916); 2d ed. by G. De Luca (Rome 1963); C. Bellò, Geremia Bonomelli con documenti inediti (Brescia 1961); F. Gregori, La vita e le opere di mgr. G. B. Scalabrini (Turin 1932); E. Vercesi, Don Davide Albertazio (Milan 1922); A. Novelli, F. Meda (Milan 1921); E. Micheli, F. Meda . . . (Parma 1948); M. Vaussard, L'intelligence catholique en Italie, op. cit., 85–132; F. Meda, Scritti scelti, ed. G. P. Dore (Rome 1959); A. Cistellini, G. Tovini, foreword by G. B. Montini (Brescia 1954); C. Brezzi, Cristiano sociali e intransigenti. L'opera di Medolago Albani (Rome 1971); G. Sacchetti, La reazione cattolica. Scritti e discorsi con introduzione di G. De Rosa (Rome 1967).

6. The Failure to Reconcile Catholics and the Republic in France

SOURCES

Cardinal D. Ferrata, Mémoires. Ma nonciature en France (Rome 1921); A. Siegfried, L'abbé Frémont (1852–1912), 2 vols. (Paris 1932); C. Benoist, Souvenirs (Paris 1932–34); X. de Montclos, Le toast d'Alger. Documents, 1890–1891 (Paris 1966).

LITERATURE

E. Lecanuet, L'Église de France sous la III^{e} République II–IV (Paris 1930–31, reprint); A. Latreille and R. Rémond, Histoire du catholicisme en France III (Paris 1962); L. Capéran, Histoire contemporaine de la laïcité française, 3 vols. (vol. 4 not yet issued by the Institut catholique de Toulouse) (Paris 1958–61); id., L'anticléricalisme et l'affaire Dreyfus, 1897–1899 (Paris 1948); H. Rollet, Albert de Mun et le parti catholique (Paris 1947); id., L'action sociale des catholiques en France, 2 vols. (Paris 1948–58); J. Gadille, La pensée et l'action politiques des évêques français au début de la III^{e} république, 2 vols. (Paris 1967); J. Tournier, Le cardinal Lavigerie et son action politique (Paris 1913); J.-B. Woodall, The Ralliement in France. Origins and History, 1876–1894. (New York 1961); A. Sedgwick, The Ralliement in French Politics, 1890–1898 (Cambridge, Mass. 1965); M. Montuclard, Conscience religieuse et démocratie (Paris 1965); J.-M. Mayeur, Un prêtre démocrate, l'abbé Lemire 1853–1928 (Paris 1968); "Les congrès nationaux de la démocratie chrétienne à Lyon, 1896–1898," RHMC, July/Sept. 1962; "Droites et Ralliés à la Chambre des députés au début de 1894," RHMC, April/July 1966; R. Rémond, Les congrès ecclésiastiques de Reims et de Bourges (Paris 1964); P. Sorlin, "La Croix" et les Juifs (Paris 1967); P. Pierrard, Juifs et Catholiques français (Paris 1970).

7. On the Road to Conservatism: Belgium, the Netherlands, and Luxemburg

SOURCES

Pastoral letters of the bishops (index): Lettres pastorales des évêques de Belgique, 1800–1950 IV: 1868–1883, V: 1883–1906, VI: 1906–1926 (Brussels, n.d.); Akten der Kongresse der Katholiken in Lüttich 1887, 1889, 1890, and in Mechelen 1891 and 1909; C.

Woeste, Mémoires I–II (Brussels 1927–33); id., Échos des luttes contemporaines, 2 vols. (Brussels 1906); A. Verhagen, 25 années d'action sociale (Brussels, n.d.); A. Vermeersch, Manuel social. La législation et les œuvres en Belgique (Louvain 1900).

LITERATURE

BELGIUM: Vol. VIII, chap. 18; C. Doset, Ed., Un siècle de l'Église en Belgique, 2 vols. (Cortrai 1934); A. de Moreau, L'Église en Belgique (Brussels 1945), 239–63; P. van Zuylen, "La Belgique et le Vatican en 1879," Revue générale Belge (1954), 1707–34, 1901–15, 2065–81, (1955), 67–86; A. Simon, La liberté de l'enseignement (Brussels 1952); M. Becqué, Le Cardinal Dechamps, 2 vols. (Louvain 1956); J. Muyldermans, Cardinal Goossens (Mechelen 1922); A. Simon, Cardinal D. Mercier (Brussels 1960); L. De Raeymaeker, Le Cardinal Mercier et l'Institut Supérieur de Philosophie de Louvain (Louvain 1952); R. Reszohazy, Origines et formation du catholicisme social en Belgique. 1842–1909 (Brussels 1958); P. Gérin, Les origines de la démocratie chrétienne à Liège, 2 vols. (Brussels 1958–59); L. de Saint-Moulin, "Contribution à l'histoire de la déchristianisation. La pratique religieuse à Seraing depuis 1830," Annuaire d'histoire liégeoise 10 (1967), 33–126; W. Rombauts, Het Paasverzuim in het bisdom Brugge (Louvain and Paris 1971); F. Petri, "Belgien, die Niederlande und Luxemburg (1867–1918)," in T. Schieder, ed., Hdb. der europ. Geschichte VI (Stuttgart 1968), 465–93.

THE NETHERLANDS: L. J. Rogier, Katholieke Herleving, Geschiedenis van Katholiek Nederland sinds 1853 (The Hague 1957), 276–348; G. Brom, Herleving van de wetenschap in Katholiek Nederland (The Hague 1930); I. Wietlox, H. Schaepman, 3 vols. (1960); G. Brom, Fr. Ariëns, 2 vols. (1941); J. Colsen, P. Poels (1955).

LUXEMBURG: E. Donckel, Die Kirche in Luxemburg von den Anfängen bis zur Gegenwart (Luxemburg 1950).

8. The Church of the Iberian World between Revolution and Reaction

LITERATURE

Vol. VIII, chaps. 10 and 18.

SPAIN: Schmidlin, PG II, 441–47; J. Becker, Relaciones diplomáticas entre Espãna y la S. Sede durante el Siglo XIX (Madrid 1908); R. Konetzke, Geschichte des spanischen und portugiesischen Volkes (Leipzig 1939), 368–80, 393–99, id. in: T. Schieder, ed., Hdb. der europ. Geschichte VI (Stuttgart 1968), 503–33 (considering church history); J. N. Schumacher, "Integrism. A Study in XIXth Century Spanish Politico-Religious Thought." CHR 48 (1962/63), 343–64; M. Llorens, "El P. Antonio Vincent. Notas sobre el desarollo de la acción católica en España," Estudios de Historia moderna 4 (Barcelona 1954), 393–440; J. F. Pastór, Weltanschauung und geistiges Leben in Spanien (Wroclaw 1931); L. Sánchez Agesta, La revolución liberal (Madrid 1955); H. Jeschke, Die Generation von 1898 (Heidelberg 1934).

PORTUGAL: Z. Giacometti, Quellen zur Geschichte der Trennung von Staat und Kirche (1926); Schmidlin, PG II, 447f.; G. S. da Silva Dias, Correntes do sentimento religioso (Coimbra 1960); R. Konetzke, op. cit. (1939), 386–90 id., op. cit. (1968) 533–38.

LATIN AMERICA: Acta et decreta concilii plenarii Americae latinae anno 1899 celebrati, 2 vols. (Rome 1900); cf. A. Bellesheim in AkathKR (1901), 38–63 (with introductory description of the situation); Schmidlin, PG II, 448–54; E. Ryan, The Church in the South American Republics (London 1934); J. L. Mecham, Church and State in Latin America (North Carolina Press 1934); E. Samhaber, Die Neue Welt. Wandlungen in Südamerika (Freiburg i. Br. 1949; essayistic, but more from the perspective of church history than in: Südamerika [Hamburg 1939]); L. Zea, Dos etapas del pensamiento en Hispanoamérica. Del romanticismo al positivismo (Mexico City 1949); W. v. Schoen, Geschichte Mittel- und Südamerikas (Munich 1953), 343–665. Biblio. regarding general Latin American history in A. P. Witaker in HM X (Berne 1961), 788f.

9. Catholic Self-Awareness in the British Empire

LITERATURE

THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND: Vol. VII, chap. 21; vol. VIII, chap. 9; also E. Taylor, The Cardinal Democrat (London 1908); G. Goyau, Autour du catholicisme social II, 220–45; III, 194–231; IV, 71–85; K. Waninger, Der soziale Katholizismus in England (Mönchen-Gladbach 1914); I. Bolten, Katholisches aus England (Mönchen-Gladbach 1928; popular, but informative); C. Hollis in I. N. Moody, ed., Church and Society (New York 1953), 809–42; W. G. Gorman, Converts to Rome in the United Kingdom during the last 60 years (London 1910); J. G. Snead-Cox, Cardinal Herbert Vaughan. 1892–1903, 2 vols. (London 1910); E. Oldmeadow, Cardinal Francis Bourne, 1903–1935, 2 vols. (London 1940, 1944); Maisy Ward, The Wilfrid Wards and the Transition, 2 vols. (London 1934–38).

General history: P. Kluke in T. Schieder, ed., Handbuch der europ. Geschichte 6 (1968), 269–72, biblio.

IRELAND: A. Bellesheim, Geschichte der kath. Kirche in Irland III (Mainz 1891); J. Pokorny, Irland (1916); P. K. Egan, The Influence of the Irish on the Catholic Church in America in the 19th Century (Dublin 1968; a twenty-two-page summary, with biblio.); E. Larkin, "Economic Growth, Capital Investment and the Roman-Cath. Church in 19th Century Ireland," AHR 72 (1966), 885–905; L. I. McCaffrey, The Irish Question, 1800–1922 (Lexington 1968); cf.: M. R. O'Connell in CHR 58 (1972) 415f.; P. Alter, Die irische Nationalbewegung zwischen Parlament und Revolution (Stuttgart 1971).

CANADA: Vol. VII, chap. 9; vol. VIII, chap. 9; Alexis de Barbezieux, L'Église catholique en Canada (Montreal 1934); E. Gautier, Le catholicisme au Canada (Ottawa 1934); D. de Saint-Denis, L'Église catholique au Canada (Montreal 1956); V. Harvey et al., L'Église et la Québec (Montreal 1961); P. Savard, Jules-Paul Tardivel (Quebec 1967).

AUSTRALIA: Vol. VIII, chap. 9; J. E. Murtagh, Australia. The Catholic Chapter (New York 1947); G. Walter, Australien. Land und Leute, Mission (Limburg 1928), Bericht eines Missionars; P. Ford, Cardinal Moran and the Australian Labour Party (London 1966).

10. The American Way

LITERATURE

Vol. VII, chap. 9; vol. VIII, chap. 9; H. J. Nolan, ed., Pastoral Letters of the American Hierarchy, 1792–1790 (Huntington 1971), cf. J. T. Ellis in CHR (1972), 388–93; J. T.

Ellis, A Select Bibliography of the History of the Catholic Church in the US (New York 1947); T. Maynard, The Story of American Catholicism (New York 1941, 1949); T. Roemer, The Catholic Church in the United States (London 1950); J. T. Ellis, American Catholicism (New York 1956; review, critical of J. G. Shea and T. Maynard); id.: New Cath. Encyclopedia 14 (1967), 425–48 (esp. considering the question of immigration); best complete presentation: T. T. McAvoy, A History of the Catholic Church in the United States (Notre Dame 1969); P. Guilday, A History of the Councils of Baltimore, 1711–1884 (New York 1932); Schmidlin, PG II, 494–500; III, 114ff.; J. T. Ellis, The Life of Cardinal Gibbons (Milwaukee 1952); J. H. Moynihan, The Life of Archbishop J. Ireland (New York 1953); M. Corrigan-Memorial, compiled and published by J. M. Farley (New York 1902); regarding the controversy over the emigrants' loss of faith: L. Hertling, 162–66; C. J. Barry, The Catholic Church and German Americans (Milwaukee 1953; is negative about the Ireland-Keane group); about the Irish influence: P. K. Egan (biblio. for chap. 9); F. Downing in J. N. Moody, ed., Church and Society (New York 1953), 843–904; H. Browne, The Catholic Church and the Knights of Labor (Washington 1949); S. Bell, Rebel, Priest and Prophet. A Biography of Dr. Edw. McGlynn (New York 1937); T. T. McAvoy, The Great Crisis in American Catholic History. 1895–1900 (Chicago 1957); P. E. Hogan, The Cath. University of America. 1896–1903 (Washington 1949); J. T. Ellis, The Formative Years of the Catholic University of America (Washington 1946); W. E. Garrison, Catholicism and the American Mind (Chicago 1928); J. Mannix, The American Convert Movement (New York 1923); L. C. Feiertag, American Public Opinion in the Diplomatic Relations between the United States and the Papal State (Washington 1933); R. D. Cross, The Emergence of Liberal Catholicism in America (Cambridge, Mass. 1958).

11. Catholicism in the Slavic World until 1914

LITERATURE

THE RUSSIAN EMPIRE: W. Gribowski, Das Staatsrecht des Russischen Reiches (Tübingen 1912); F. Haase, Die katholische Kirche Polens unter russischer Herrschaft (Breslau 1917); A. Boudou, Le Saint-Siège et la Russie. Leurs relations diplomatiques au XIX^e siècle II: 1848–83 (Paris 1925); A. Petrani, Kolegium Duchnowne w Petersburgu (Lublin 1950); "Kościoly katolickie ob. łać. na obszarach Rosji (1772–1914)," SPM II (Rome 1955), 467–97; E. Winter, Rußland und das Papstum II (Berlin 1961), 340–567; B. Stasiewski, "Die kirchliche Organisation der deutschen katholischen Siedler in Rußland," Festschrift für Margarete Woltner zum 70. Geburtstag (Heidelberg 1967), 270–83; G. Simon, Konstantin Petrovič Pobedonoscev und die Kirchenpolitik des Heiligen Sinod 1880–1905 (Göttingen 1969).

THE THREE PARTITIONS OF POLAND: J. S. Pelczar, Pius IX i Polska (Miejsce Piastowe 1914); K. Völker, Kirchengeschichte Polens (Berlin and Leipzig 1930); G. Manteuffel-Szoege, Geschichte des polnischen Volkes während seiner Unfreiheit 1772–1914 (Berlin 1950); J. Umiński, Historia Kościoła II, ed. by W. Urban (Oppeln 1960); F. Manthey, Polnische Kirchengeschichte (Hildesheim 1965); G. Rhode, Kleine Geschichte Polens (Darmstadt 1965); W. Urban, Ostatni etap dziejów kośicoła w Polsce przed nowym tysiącleciem 1815–1965 (Rome 1966, biblio.); Z. Olszamowska-Skowrońska, "Tentatives d'introduire la langue russe dans les églises latines da la Pologne orientale 1865–1903," Antemurale 11 (1967), 47–169; B. Stasiewski, "Tausend Jahre polnischer Kirchengeschichte," Kirche im Osten 10 (1967), 56–60; Księga tysiąclecia katolicyzmu w Polsce, 3 vols. (Lublin 1969); Le millénaire du catholicisme en Pologne (Lublin 1969); B. Kumor, Granice metropolii i diecezji polskich 966–1939 (Lublin 1969–71); E. Jabłońska-Deptuła, "Duchowieństwo zakonne a sprawa narodowa w połowie XIX wieku," Znak 24 (1972), 481–504.

THE HABSBURG MONARCHY: A. Hudal, Die österreichische Vatikanbotschaft 1806–1918 (Munich 1952); R. A. Kann, Das Nationalitätenproblem der Habsburgmonarchie. Geschichte und Ideengehalt der nationalen Bestrebungen vom Vormärz bis zur Auflösung des Reiches im Jahre 1918, 2 vols. (Graz and Cologne 1964); R. W. Seton-Watson, A History of the Czechs and Slovaks (Hamden 1965); F. Prinz, "Die böhmischen Länder von 1848 bis 1914," Hdb. der Gesch. der böhmischen Länder III, ed. by K. Bosl (Stuttgart 1968), 103–23; A. Wandruszka, "Österreich-Ungarn vom ungarischen Ausgleich bis zum Ende der Monarchie (1867–1918)," Hdb. der europ. Gesch. VI, ed. by T. Schieder (Stuttgart 1968), 354–99.—See this vol., chap. 2.

SOUTHEASTERN EUROPE: H. Wendel, Der Kampf der Südslawen um Freiheit und Einheit (Frankfurt 1925); M. Spinka, A History of Christianity in the Balkans (Chicago 1933); J. H. Ledit, The Church in the Balkans (New York 1949); J. Radonić, Rimska kurija i južnoslovenske zemľe od XVI do XIX veka (Belgrade 1950); G. Stadtmüller, Geschichte Südosteuropas (Munich 1950); G. Wolfrum, "Die Völker und Nationalitäten," Osteuropa-Handbuch Jugoslawien, ed. by W. Markert (Cologne and Graz 1954) 14–36; R. Kißling, Die Kroaten. Der Schicksalsweg eines Südslawenvolkes (Graz and Cologne 1956); G. Jäschke, "Das osmanische Reich vom Berliner Kongreß bis zu seinem Ende (1878–1920/22)," Hdb. der europ. Gesch. VI, ed. by T. Schieder (Stuttgart 1968), 539–46; G. Rhode, "Die Staaten Südosteuropas vom Berliner Kongreß bis zum Ausgang des I. Weltkrieges (1878–1918)," ibid., 547–609; E. Schramm-von Thadden, "Griechenland vom Beginn der Dynastie Glücksburg bis zum Frieden mit der Türkei (1863–1923)," ibid., 610–17; A. Tarnovaliski, Msgr. Andreas Canova. Bulgariens erster Kapuzinermissionar und Bischof 1841–1866 (Bressanone 1968); H. D. Schanderl, Die Albanienpolitik Österreich-Ungarns und Italiens 1877–1908 (Wiesbaden 1971).

SECTION TWO

The Development of Catholicism in Modern Society

12. Catholicism in Society as a Whole

SOURCES

Encyclicals of Leo XIII: Quod apostolici (1878); Arcanum illud (1880, marriage); Humanum genus (1884, Freemasons); Libertas (1888); Sapientiae christianae (1890); Rerum novarum (1891); Longinqua Oceani spatia (1895); Militantis ecclesiae (1897, education).

Contemporary theoreticians (especially regarding the question of property): C. Périn, De la richesse dans les sociétés chrétiennes, 2 vols. (Paris 1861); F. Le Play, La réforme sociale en France, 2 vols. (Paris 1864); M. Liberatore, Principii di economia politica (Rome 1889); G. Toniolo (cf. above chap. 5); C. v. Vogelsang, Ges. Aufsätze über socialpolitische und verwandte Themata (Augsburg 1885–87); F. Hitze, Capital und Arbeit und die Reorganisation der Gesellschaft (Paderborn 1880); Die Quintessenz der socialen Frage (Paderborn 1880); H. Pesch, Liberalismus, Sozialismus und christliche Gesellschaftsordnung (Freiburg 1898); id., Lehrbuch der Nationalökonomie, 5 vols. (Freiburg i. Br. 1905–23); V. Cathrein, Der Sozialismus (Freiburg i. Br. 1890, 1923); A. Lehmkuhl, Theologia moralis, 2 vols. (Freiburg i. Br. 1883, 1890); A. M. Weiß, Apologie des Christentums 4, 5 (=Soziale Frage und soziale Ordnung) (Freiburg i. Br. 1892, 1904); T. Meyer, Die christlich-ethischen Sozialprinzipien und die Arbeiterfrage (Freiburg i. Br. 1904); G. J. Waffelaert, De iustitia, 2 vols. (Bruges 1885–86); A. Vermeesch, Quaestiones de iustitia (Bruges 1901); A. Stöckl, Das Christentum und die großen Fragen der Gegenwart auf dem Gebiet des geistigen, sittlichen und sozialen Lebens, 3 vols. (Mainz 1879–80); F. Schaub, Die Eigentumslehre nach Tomas v. Aquin und dem modernen Sozialismus (Freiburg i. Br. 1898).

LITERATURE

TRANSLATIONS OF AND COMMENTARIES ON RERUM NOVARUM: G. Gundlach: Veröff. der Görres-Gesellschaft, Sektion Sozial-und Wirtschaftsgeschichte, no. 3 (Paderborn 1931) [with Quadragesimo anno]; R. Kothen, L'enseignement social de l'Église (Louvain 1949; texts of doctrinal statements by the Popes from Leo XIII to Pius XII); P. Jostock. Die sozialen Rundschreiben: Leo XIII: "Über die Arbeiterfrage"—Pius XI: "Über die gesellschaftliche Ordnung" [texts and commentary] (Freiburg i. Br. 1960); J. Schasching, Die soziale Botschaft der Kirche von Leo XIII. bis Johannes XXIII. (Vienna 1963; aside from the texts of Rerum novarum, Quadragesimo anno, and subsequent social encyclicals, an introduction, 11–68); P. Mourret, Les directives politiques, intellectuelles et sociales de Léon XIII (Paris 1920); W. Schwer, Leo XIII.: Klassiker der katholischen Sozialphilosophie (Freiburg 1923); O. v. Nell-Breuning, Die soziale Enzyklika: Erläuterungen zum Weltrundschreiben Pius' XI. über die gesellschaftliche Ordnung (Cologne 1932, 1950; including important remarks about Rerum novarum); J. Haessle, Das Arbeitsethos der Kirche nach Thomas von Aquin und Leo XIII. (Freiburg i. Br. 1923); E. Muhler, Die Soziallehren der Päpste (Munich 1958); G. Boni, Il pensiero sociale di Leone XIII e Pio XI . . . (Bergamo 1932); M. Allendorf, Zur Geschichte der Sozialenzykliken des Vatikans (diss., Humboldt Univ., Berlin 1963); G. Jarlot, Doctrine pontificale et histoire. L'enseignement social de Léon XIII, Pie X et Benoît XV vu dans son ambiance historique (Rome 1964); R. L. Camp, The Papal Ideology of Social Reform, 1878–1967 (Leiden 1969).—Regarding the history of the development of Rerum novarum: G. Antonazzi, L'enciclica R. N. (Rome 1957).

The Problem of "Catholicism": C. Bauer, "Bild der Kirche—Abbild der Gesellschaft," Hochland 48 (1956), new: "Deutscher Katholizismus" (Frankfurt 1964), 9–27; id., "Wandlungen der sozialpolitischen Ideenwelt im deutschen Katholizismus des 19. Jh.," J. Strieder et al., eds., Die soziale Frage und der Katholizismus (Paderborn 1931), 11–46.

General Presentations: G. Goyau, Autour du catholicisme social, 5 "series" (Paris 1901–12); O. Schilling, Die Staats-und Soziallehre des Papstes Leo XIII. (Cologne 1925); id., Christliche Gesellschaftslehre (Freiburg i. Br. 1926); E. K. Winter, Die Sozialmetaphysik der Scholastik (Vienna 1929); O. v. Nell-Breuning, "Die Eigentumslehre," J. Strieder, et al. (cf. above); A. M. Knoll, Der soziale Gedanke im modernen Katholizismus. Von der Romantik bis Rerum novarum (Vienna and Leipzig 1932); W. Schwer, "Krisen der kath.-sozialen Bewegung und ihre Lehren," Soziale Revue. Kath. internationale Quartalschrift 31, 1 (Munich 1930), 1–9 (regarding W. Schwer, see N. Monzel in Hochland 42 [1949/50] 309f.); J. N. Moody, ed., Church and Society: Catholic Social and Political Thought and Movements. 1789–1950 (New York 1953); W. Bredendiek, Christliche Sozialreformer des 19. Jh. (Leipzig 1953); L. Leutner, Das Erwachen der modernen kath. Sozialidee. Die Entwicklung im 19. Jh. bis Rerum novarum (Vienna 1951); S. Hedler, Die katholischen Sozialisten. Darstellung und Kritik ihres Wirkens (diss., Hamburg 1952); L. P. Wallace. Leo XIII and the Rise of Socialism (New York 1966) (the Catholic Church as a dam against socialism); F. Beutter, Die Eigentumsbegründung in der Moraltheologie des 19. Jh. (Paderborn 1971); H. Maier, Kirche und Gesellschaft (Munich 1972; recent history, but also including problems of the nineteenth century).

Individual Countries: Cf. the biblios. of chaps. 1–10 and chap. 13; also in regard to France: C. Calippe, L'attitude sociale des catholiques français au XIX^e^ siècle (Paris 1911); E. Barbier, L'histoire du catholicisme libéral et du catholicisme sociale en France, 1870–1914, 5 vols. (Bordeaux 1923–28; integralistic perspective, rich documentation); W. Gurian, Politische und soziale Ideen des französischen Katholizismus. 1789–1914 (1929), here: 239–312; G. Hoog, Histoire du catholicisme social en France, 1871–1931 (Paris 1946); J. B. Duroselle, Les débuts du catholicisme social en France (Paris 1951; goes up to 1870, but important description of previous history); Dansette [cited in Chap. 16] II, 180–215, 397–436 (after 1898).

Germany and Austria: S. Merkle, "Die katholische Kirche," S. Körte, ed., Deutschland unter Kaiser Wilhelm II. (1914); M. Meinertz-H. Sacher, Deutschland und der Katholizismus, 2 vols. (Freiburg 1918); W. Schwer-Franz Müller, "Der deutsche Katholizismus im Zeitalter des Kapitalismus," Kirche und Gesellschaft, VI (Augsburg 1932); P. Jostock, Der deutsche Katholizismus und die Überwindung des Kapitalismus. Eine ideengeschichtliche Skizze (Regensburg 1932); id., Die katholisch-soziale Bewegung der letzten hundert Jahre in Deutschland (Cologne 1958); J. Höffner, Die deutschen Katholiken u. die soziale Frage im 19. Jh. (Paderborn 1954); K. H. Grenner, Wirtschaftsliberalismus und katholisches Denken (Cologne 1967); K. Buchheim, Ultramontanismus und Demokratie. Der Weg der deutschen Katholiken im 19. Jh. (Munich 1963); F. J. Stegmann, "Geschichte der sozialen Ideen im dt. Katholizismus," H. Grebing, ed., Dt. Hb. der Politik 3 (1969), 325–560; J. B. Kißling, Geschichte der deutschen Katholikentage II (Mainz 1923);

P. Siebertz, Karl Fürst zu Löwenstein. 1834–1921 (Munich 1924); F. Funder (cited in chap. 2).

THE POLITICAL SITUATION: Cf. chaps. 1–11 and chap. 14.

THE QUESTION OF SCHOOLS: Aside from biblio. in the chaps. on individual countries: J. A. Burns-B. J. Kohlbrenner, A History of Catholic Education in the US (New York 1937); H. K. Beale, History of Freedom of Teaching in American Schools (New York 1941); F. Larroyo-A. L. Lacombe (Latin America): New Cath. Encyclopedia 5 (1967), 157–62; P. Verhaegen, La lutte scolaire en Belgique (Ghent 1905); M. Spahn, Der Kampf um die Schule in Frankreich u. Deutschland (Munich 1907); K. Erlinghagen, Die Säkularisierung der deutschen Schule (Hanover 1972), 43, 48, 58f., 73ff.

CATHOLIC ORGANIZATIONS: Cf. biblio. in the chaps. on individual countries; Wetzer-Welte, ed., "Vereinswesen," Kirchenlexikon 12 (1901), 707–60; A. Retzbach, Das moderne kath. Vereinswesen (1925) (countercritique of societies); K. Buchheim, "Der deutsche Verbandskatholizismus. Eine Skizze seiner Geschichte," B. Hanssler, Die Kirche in der Gesellschaft (Paderborn 1961), 30–83; A. Pieper, Sinn und Aufgaben des Volksvereins (Mönchen-Gladbach 1926), 25–41, about the history of its founding, containing organization and statutes; E. Ritter, Die kath.-soziale Bewegung Deutschlands im 19. Jh. und der Volksverein (Cologne 1954; literary estate of August Pieper and Chancellor Wilhelm Marx included; up to p. 130 good summary [with biblio.] about the development of social theory, also in the Center Party).

THE CATHOLIC PRESS: H. Keiter, Hdb. der kath. Presse (1895, 1909); New Catholic Encyclopedia, Catholic Press, World Survey 3 (New York 1967), 283–327, according to countries, partially with historical retrospective; J. Morienval, Sur l'histoire de la presse catholique en France (Paris and Colmar 1936). Regarding La Croix: E. R. Lacoste, P. Bailly (Paris 1913); id., F. Picard (Paris 1932); De Moine, "La Croix"—cinquantenaire (Paris 1933); R. Kokel, P. Bailly (Paris 1942); R. d'Harcourt in StL V, 207f.; P. Castel, Le P. Picard et le P. Bailly dans les luttes de presse (Rome 1962); R. J. Marion, La "Croix" et le Ralliement (diss., Worcester, Mass. 1957).

The press in Italy: E. Lucatello, "Giornalismo Cattolico," ECatt VI (1951), 458–62; cf. chaps. 5, 33, 34. Regarding Osservatore Romano: G. B. Casoni, Cinquant'anni di giornalismo (Bologna 1907); C. Crispolti, Rimpianti (Milan 1922).

In Germany: K. Löffler, Gesch. der kath. Presse Deutschlands (Mönchen-Gladbach 1924); K. Bachem, Josef Bachem. Versuch einer Gesch. der kath. Presse, 2 vols. (1912–13): II: until 1860 (as a history of the preceding period important for the subsequent development); W. Kisky, Der Augustinusverein zur Pflege der kath. Presse von 1878–1928 (Düsseldorf 1928).—On the Vienna Reichspost: F. Funder, Vom Gestern ins Heute (Vienna 1952).

13. The Social Movements

LITERATURE

ON THE THEORIES: Cf. chap. 12.—International presentations and collections: J. N. Moody (cited in chap. 12); M. P. Fogarty, Christian Democracy in Western Europe. 1820–1953 (London 1957); G. Briefs et al., eds. of the Catholic Social Institute of the Archdiocese of Cologne, Das Bild des Arbeiters in der kath. Sozialbewegung von den

Anfängen bis zur Gegenwart (Cologne 1960); G. Brakelmann, Die soziale Frage des 19. Jh. II: Die evangelisch-soziale und die katholisch-soziale Bewegung (Witten 1962); H. S. Scholl, ed., 150 ans de mouvement ouvrier chrétien en Europe de l'Ouest (Louvain 1966).

ON INDIVIDUAL COUNTRIES: France: M. Vaussard, Histoire de la Démocratie chrétienne (Paris 1956); H. Rollet, L'Action sociale des catholiques en France. 1871 à 1914, 2 vols. (Paris 1947, 1958).—Belgium: R. Reszohazy (cited in chap. 7).—Italy: F. Magri, A. Gambasin (cited in chap. 5).—Switzerland: G. Beuret (cited in chap. 4).—Germany: K. H. Brüls, Geschichte der kath.-sozialen Bewegung in Deutschland (Münster 1958); E. Filthaut, Deutsche Katholikentage 1848–1958 und soziale Frage (Essen 1960); J. Joos, Kath. Arbeiterbewegung in der Gesch. der christl. Arbeiterbewegung Deutschlands (Cologne 1963); E. Naujoks, "Die kath. Arbeiterbewegung und der Sozialismus in den ersten Jahren des Bismarckschen Reiches," Neue Deutsche Forschungen, ed. by H. R. G. Günther and E. Rothacker, Vol. 228 (Berlin 1939), Abt. Neuere Geschichte, Vol. 6, ed. by R. Stadelmann [in favor of Bismarck, but material on Chaplain Gronenberg, etc.]; M. Berger, Arbeiterbewegung und Demokratisierung. Die . . . Gleichberechtigung des Arbeiters im Verständnis der kath. Arbeiterbewegung . . . zwischen 1890 und 1914 (diss., Freiburg i. Br. 1971).—Austria: F. Funder (cited in chap. 2); G. Silberbauer, Österreichs Katholiken und die Arbeiterfrage (Graz 1966); F. Bischof, Kard. Gruscha und die soziale Frage (diss., Vienna 1959).—United States: Henry D. Browne, The Catholic Church and The Knights of Labor (Washington 1949); A. I. Abell, American Catholicism and Social Action, 1865–1950 (Notre Dame 1963).

CHRISTIAN TRADE UNIONS: Information about the international situation in: Fogarty; K. H. Schürmann, Zur Vorgeschichte der christl. Gewerkschaften (Freiburg 1958); L. R. Sanseverino, Il movimento sindacale cristiano dal 1850 al 1939 (Rome 1950); M. Karson, The Catholic Church and Unionism (New York 1951); J. Zirnheld, Cinquante Années de Syndicalisme Chrétien (Paris 1937) (13–76 the development toward the Confédération Française des Travailleurs chrétiens [CFTC]); L. Deuerlein, "Gewerkschaftsstreit," StL III, 943–46.—R. Morsey, ed., Zeitgeschichte in Lebensbildern. Aus dem deutschen Katholizismus des 20. Jahrhunderts (Mainz 1973), portraits of Cardinal G. Kopp, J. Bachem, G. v. Hertling, F. Hitze, P. Spahn, K. Trimborn et al.—In general, cf. chaps. on individual countries.

14. The Relationship to the State and the Parties

Encyclicals of Leo XIII: Diuturnum illud (1881); Immortale Dei (1885); Libertas (1885); Au milieu des sollicitudes (1892); Graves de communi (1901).

LITERATURE

C. Crispolti and G. Aureli, La politica di Leone XIII da L. Galimberti a M. Rampolla (Rome 1912); F. Mourret, Les directives politiques, intellectuelles et sociales de Léon XIII (Paris 1920).—Aside from biblio. for chap. 12 (especially the works of O. Schilling and F. Mourret): P. Tischleder, Die Staatslehre Leos XIII. (Mönchen-Gladbach 1925–27); id., Staatsgewalt und katholisches Gewissen (Mönchen-Gladbach 1926).—History of the assessment of democracy by Catholicism: A. Pieper in StL I, and H. Peters in StL II, 589–92; Hans Maier, Revolution und Kirche. Studien zur Frühgeschichte der christlichen Demokratie, 1789–1901 (Freiburg 1965); K. Buchheim, "Christliche Parteien," StL II, 467–75; A. Gnägi, Kirche und Demokratie (diss., Zurich 1970), 149–60.—Cf. biblio. for the chaps. on individual countries.

15. The Position of Catholicism in the Culture at the Turn of the Century

SOURCES

Encyclicals of Leo XIII: Praise of technological progress, passim, such as in Sapientiae christianae (1890), Rerum novarum (1891); Criticism of civilization: Inscrutabili (1878); Exeunte iam anno (1888); Annum ingressi (1902).

Scholarship: universities: Annuaire de l'université catholique de Louvain; Univ.-cath. de Louvain—Bibliogr. 1834–1954 (Louvain 1900–1954).—Die Universität Fribourg (Basel 1939).—Regarding Washington: chap. 10.—C. Roy, L'université de Laval et les fêtes du cinquantenaire (Quebec 1903). Instituts catholiques (France): G. Delépine in Catholicisme V (1963), 1756–63.

Congresses: L. Pisani, "Les congrès scientifiques internationaux des catholiques," Revue du clergé français (1898); Compte rendu du 3^e Congrès scientifique international des catholiques (Brussels 1895); Compte rendu du 4^e Congrès scientifique (Fribourg 1897–98).

Societies: Jahresberichte der Görres-Gesellschaft (1880f.); On the Leo Society: Die Kultur (Vienna 1899–1919).

New journals: historical journals: this series, vol. I, 35–56; theological and philosophical journals: aside from ZKTh (Innsbruck 1877ff.), cf. chap. 20.

On the problems: G. v. Hertling, Das Prinzip des Katholizismus und die Wissenschaft (Freiburg i. Br. 1899); G.-P. Fonsegrive-Lespinasse, Le catholicisme et la vie de l'esprit (Paris 1898); id., L'évolution des idées dans la France contemporaine de Taine à Péguy (Paris 1917); F. Brunetière, Essais sur la Littérature contemporaine (Paris 1892); id., Questions actuelles (Paris 1907); id., Discours de combat, 3 vols. (Paris 1895ff.); R. Murri, Battaglie d'oggi, 5 vols. (Rome 1903–8); C. Sonnenschein, Aus dem letzten Jahrzehnt des italienischen Katholizismus (Elberfeld 1906) =Broschüren des Windhorst-Bundes no. 1; C. Schulte, Die Kirche und die Gebildeten (Freiburg i. Br. 1919).

Literature and the Arts: cf. chaps. on individual countries and chaps. 18, 19.

LITERATURE

Cf. chaps. 18–22, 29–32, 35. W. Schwer, "Die kirchliche Entfremdung des neuzeitlichen Bürgertums," BZThS (1930), 307–20; F. Schneider, Bildungskräfte im Katholizismus der Welt (Freiburg i. Br. 1936); R. Agraiu, Les Universités catholiques (Paris 1935); In this regard, see the studies about the individual universities in the chapters on individual countries.—H. Rost, Die wirtschaftliche und kulturelle Lage der deutschen Katholiken (Cologne 1911); W. Kramer, Zeitkritik und innere Auseinandersetzung im dt. Katholizismus im Spiegel der führenden kath. Zeitschriften. 1895–1914 (diss., Mainz 1955); W. Spael, Das Buch im Geisteskampf. 100 Jahre Borromäusverein (1950); O. Köhler, "Bücher als Wegmarken im dt. Katholizismus," Der. kath. Buchhandel Deutschlands, ed. by the Association of the Catholic Bookstores (Frankfurt a. M. 1967) (review from the beginning of the nineteenth century until the present); Der Katholizismus in Deutschland und der Verlag Herder. 1801–1951 (Freiburg 1951).—H. Platz, Geistige Kämpfe im modernen Frankreich (Kempten 1922); M. Bougier, Essai sur la Renaissance de la Poésie catholique de Baudelaire à Claudel (Montpellier 1942); A. Simon, La littérature du péché et de la grâce. 1880 jusqu'à 1950 (Paris 1957); C. Moeller, Littérature du XX^e siècle et christianisme (Paris 1953ff.); H. Weinert, Dichtung aus dem Glauben (Heidelberg 1948).

SECTION THREE

Forms of Piety

16. Externalization and Internalization of Nineteenth-Century Spirituality—Beginnings of the Eucharistic Congress Movement—Veneration of Saint Thérèse of Lisieux

LITERATURE

Vol. VIII, chap. 15. Also: A. Mayer-Pfannholz, "Das Kirchenbild des 19. Jh. und seine Ablösung," Die Besinnung 3 (Nuremberg 1948), 124–44; S. Beissel, "Zur Geschichte der Gebetbücher," StdZ 77 (1909); H. Brück and J. B. Kißling, Geschichte der katholischen Kirche in Deutschland IV/2 (Mainz 1908); H. J. Terhünte, Die religiöse Lage der Katholiken Frankreichs in der 3. Republik (1919); G. Le Bras, Histoire de la pratique religieuse en France, 2 vols. (Paris 1942–44); A. Dansette, Histoire religieuse de la France contemporaine II, 1–286 (also non-Catholic publications).

EUCHARISTIC PIETY: E. Dumoutet, Le désir de voir l'hostie (Paris 1926); R. Aubert, "Die Eucharistischen Kongresse von Leo XIII. bis Johannes XXIII.," Concilium 1 (1965), 61–66.

DEVOTION TO THE SACRED HEART: J. Stierli et al., Cor Salvatoris (Freiburg i. Br. 1956), esp. 163ff.

DEVOTION TO MARY: E. Campana, Maria nel culto cattolico, 2 vols. (Turin 1945); E. Villaret, Les Congrégations Mariales (Paris 1947); A. Walz, Saggi di storia rosariana (Florence 1962); J. Stierli, Die Marianischen Kongregationen, 2 vols. (Leipzig 1947); R. Graber, Die marianischen Weltrundschreiben der Päpste in den letzten hundert Jahren (Regensburg 1951).

THE LITURGICAL MOVEMENT: In addition to A. Trapp, 282–367; Anton L. Mayer, "Die Stellung der Liturgie von der Zeit der Romantik bis zur Jahrhundertwende," ALW 3 (1955), 1–77; J. A. Jungmann, Missarum sollemnia I (Freiburg i. Br. 1952), 208–11; T. Klauser, Kleine abendländische Liturgiegeschichte (Bonn 1965), 121–23; J. Hacker, "Die Messe in den deutschen Diözesan-, Gesang- und Gebetbüchern von der Aufklärung bis zur Gegenwart," MthSt(H) 1 (1950), 68–132.

CHARITY: In addition to A. Foucault (see vol. VIII, chap. 2, n. 28): W. Liese, Geschichte der Caritas II (Freiburg i. Br. 1922); L. Werthmann, Die Ziele des Caritasverbandes für das kath. Deutschland (Freiburg 1899); K. Borgmann, L. Werthmann. Aus seinen Reden und Schriften (Freiburg 1958); W. Röhrich: JCW 2 (Freiburg i. Br. 1928), 25–36; A. Eckert, "Aus meinen Erinnerungen an L. Werthmann," Caritas 59 (1958), 285–310.

On Charles de Foucauld and Thérèse Martin (Thérèse of Lisieux), cf. below.

17. The Organization in the Old and New Orders—Inner Reform and the Power of Attraction

LITERATURE

General: J. Zürcher, ed., Päpstliche Dokumente zur Ordensreform (1954); R. Hostie, Vie et mort des ordres religieux (Paris 1972) 223–51 (sociological).—Benedictines: P. Schmitz, Histoire des l'ordre de saint Benoît (Maredsous 1948/56).—Dominicans: A. Walz, Kardinal Frühwirth (Vienna 1950); id., Wahrheitskünder. Die Dominikaner in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Essen 1960).—Franciscans: best summary yet: H. Holzapfel, Geschichte der Franziskaner (Munich 1909).—Jesuits: R. García-Villoslada, Manual de Historia de la Compañía de Jesús (Madrid 1954); H. Becher, Die Jesuiten (Munich 1951); J. Stierli, Die Jesuiten (Fribourg 1955; short history of the spirituality of the order, with biblio.); C. Hollis, The Jesuits. A History (New York 1969), cf.: E. McDenmott in Cath. Hist. Rev. 58 (1972) 76f.—Redemptorists: M. De Meulemeester, Histoire Sommaire de la Congrég. du T. S. Rédempteur (Louvain 1958).—Salesians: Don Bosco nel mondo (Turin 1959; statistics, atlas).—Assumptionists: J. Monval, Les Assomptionnistes (Paris 1939).—Missionaries of Steyl: H. Fischer, Arnold Janssen (Steyl 1919) (cf. biblio. for chap. 38).—Salvatorians: E. B. Lüthen, Die Gesellschaft des Göttlichen Heilandes (1911); R. Pfeiffer, Joh.-B. Jordan (Rome 1920); E. Federici (Rome 1948).

18. The Dispute over Church Music

LITERATURE

K. Weinmann, Geschichte der Kirchenmusik, mit besonderer Berücksichtigung der kirchenmusikalischen Restauration im 19. Jh. (Munich 1906, 1913; Weinmann was president of the General Cecilia Association from 1873 to 1929); O. Ursprung, Die katholische Kirchenmusik (Potsdam 1931) 250–85: E. Bücken, ed., Hdb. der Musikwissenschaft; K. G. Fellerer, Der gregorianische Choral (Regensburg 1936); id., Geschichte der kath. Kirchenmusik (Düsseldorf 1949) 143–62; F. Haberl, "Cäcilianische Kirchenmusik," Zs. f. Kirchenmusik 74 (Cologne 1954), 121–32; F. Krieg, Katholische Kirchenmusik (Teufen and St. Gallen 1954) (the historical parts by E. Tittel; 53, 134–42, with biblio.); P. Combe, Histoire de la restauration de chant grégorien d'après des documents inédits (Solesmes 1969); H. Hucke, "Die Anfänge des Cäcilienvereins," Musik und Altar 22 (Freiburg i. Br. 1970) 159–78; K. G. Fellerer, "Grundlagen und Anfänge der kirchenmusikalischen Organisationen F. X. Witts," KmJb 55 (1971), 33–60; J. M. Bauduccio, "Relazioni del P. A. De Santi SJ con la congr. dei Riti circa la musica sacra dal 1887 al 1902," AHSJ 42 (1973), 128–60.

19. Church Art in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries

(This biblio. offers only a selection. Treatises, catalogues, reports of meetings, congressional files, and articles are only listed in exceptional cases.)

LITERATURE

RELIGION AND ART: C. Meyer, Über das Verhältnis von der Kunst zum Kultus. Ein Wort an alle gebildeten Verehrer der Religion und der Kunst (Zurich 1837); F. Spitta, Gotteshaus und Kunst (Strasbourg 1895); A. Ehrhard, Katholisches Christentum und moderne Kultur (Mainz and Munich 1906); G. F. Hartlaub, Kunst und Religion. Ein Versuch über die Möglichkeit neuer religiöser Kunst (Munich 1919); I. Herwegen, O.S.B., Das Kunstprinzip der Liturgie (Paderborn 1920); id., Kunst und Mysterium (Münster i. W. 1929); R. Guardini, Vom Geist der Liturgie (Freiburg i. Br. 1921); id., Von heiligen Zeichen (Rothenfels a. M. 1922); J. van Acken, Christozentrische Kirchenkunst. Ein Entwurf zum liturgischen Gesamtkunstwerk (Gladbach 1923); G. Mensching, Die liturgische Bewegung in der evangelischen Kirche. Ihre Formen und Ihre Probleme (Tübingen 1925); C. Gröber, Kirche und Künstler (Freiburg i. Br. 1932); W. Stählin, Berneuchen (Kassel 1939); P. Larsch and R. Kramreiter, Neue Kirchenkunst im Geist der Liturgie (Vienna and Klosterneuburg 1939); K. B. Ritter, Die Liturgie als Lebensform der Kirche (Kassel 1946); T. Klauser, Richtlinien für die Gestaltung des Gotteshauses aus dem Geist der römischen Liturgie (Münster i. W. 1955); F. Kolbe, Die liturgische Bewegung (Aschaffenburg 1964); U. Rapp, O.S.B., Konzil, Kunst und Künstler. Zum VII. Kapitel der Liturgiekonstitution (Frankfurt a. M. 1965); T. Filthaut, Kirchenbau und Liturgiereform (Mainz 1965); D. F. Debuyst, O.S.B., Architecture moderne et célébration chrétienne (Brussels 1966); W. Birnbaum, Die deutsche evangelische liturgische Bewegung (Tübingen 1970).

CHURCH ART IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY: A. Reichensperger, Vermischte Schriften über christliche Kunst (Leipzig 1856); K. Clark, The Gothic Revival (London 1950); A. Addison, Romanticism and the Gothic Revival (Philadelphia 1938); A. Kamphausen, Gotik ohne Gott. Ein Beitrag zur Deutung der Neugotik und des 19. Jh. (Tübingen 1952); C. Gurlitt, Die deutsche Kunst des 19. Jh. (Berlin 1899); R. Zeitler, Die Kunst des 19. Jh. (Propyläen-Kunstgeschichte 11 [Berlin 1964]); D. Lenz, O.S.B., Zur Ästhetik der Beuroner Schule (Vienna 1912); J. Kreitmaier, S. J., Beuroner Kunst. Eine Ausdrucksform der christlichen Mystik (Freiburg i. Br. 1923); A. Cingria, La Décadence de l'Art Sacré (Lausanne 1917); Triviale Zonen in der religiösen Kunst des 19. Jh. (Studien zur Philosophie und Lit. des 19. Jh. 15, Frankfurt a. M. 1971); G. Germann, Gothic-Revival in Europe and Britain (London 1972); A. Meyer, Neugotik und Neuromanik in der Schweiz. Die Kirchenarchitektur des 19. Jh. (Zurich 1973); H. Sedlmayr, Verlust der Mitte (Salzburg 1948); N. Pevsner, Wegbereiter moderner Formgebung (Hamburg 1957).

CHURCH ART IN THE TWENTIETH CENTURY: T. Wieschebrink, Die kirchliche Kunstbewegung in der Zeit des Expressionismus 1917–1927 (diss., Münster i. W. 1932); P. R. Boving, O.F.M., Kirche und moderne Kunst (Bonn 1922); P. P. Regamey, Kirche und Kunst im 20. Jh. (Graz, Cologne and Wien 1954); P. Metz, Abstrakte Kunst und Kirche. Studie über die Kunst in der Heilsgeschichte (Nuremberg 1954); H. Schnell, Zur Situation der christlichen Kunst (Munich 1962); J. Plazaola, S. J., El arte sacro actual (Madrid 1965).

CHURCH ARCHITECTURE IN THE NINETEENTH AND TWENTIETH CENTURIES: E. Kaufmann, Architecture in the Age of Reason. Baroque and Post-Baroque in England, Italy and France (Cambridge, Mass. 1955); P. Hautecœur, Histoire de l'architecture classique en France VII (Paris 1963); A. Reichensperger, Die christlich-germanische Baukunst und ihr Verhältnis zur Gegenwart (Trier 1852); H. Lützeler, Der Kölner Dom in der deutschen Geistesgeschichte (Bonn 1948); A. W. N. Pugin, True Principles of Pointed or Christian Architecture (London 1841); id., An Apology for the Revival of Christian Architecture in England (London 1843); W. Weyres and A. Mann, Hdb. der rheinischen Baukunst des 19. Jh., 1800–1880 (Cologne 1968); G. Palm, Von welchen Prinzipien soll die Wahl des Baustyls insbesondere des Kirchenbaustyls geleitet werden? (Hamburg 1845); A. Mann, Die Neuromanik (Cologne 1966); F. Schumacher, Strömungen zur deutschen Baukunst seit 1800 (Leipzig 1935); J. Gerhardy, Praktische Ratschläge über kirchliche Gebäude, Kirchengeräte und Paramente (Paderborn 1895); R. B. Witte, Das katholische Gotteshaus (Mainz 1951); W. Weyres and O. Bartning, Kirchen. Handbuch für den Kirchenbau (Munich 1959); H. Muthesius, Die neuere kirchliche Baukunst in England (Berlin 1901); H. Lützeler, Der deutsche Kirchenbau der Gegenwart (Düsseldorf 1934); R. Schwarz, Vom Bau der Kirchen (Würzburg 1938, Heidelberg 1947); F. Pfammater, Betonkirchen (Zurich 1948); H. Baur and F. Metzger, Kirchenbauten (Zurich and Würzburg 1956); R. Schwarz, Kirchenbau. Welt vor der Schwelle (Heidelberg 1960); J. Pichard, Les églises nouvelles à travers le monde (Paris 1960); H. Muck, S. J., Sakralbau heute (Aschaffenburg 1961); H.-E. Bahr, Kirchen in nachsakraler Zeit (Hamburg 1968); C. M. Werner, Das Ende des "Kirchen"-Baus. Rückblick auf moderne Kirchenbaudiskussionen (Zurich 1971); H. Schnell, Der Kirchenbau des 20. Jh. in Deutschland (Munich and Zurich 1973).

PROTESTANT CHURCH ARCHITECTURE: G. Langmaack, Evangelischer Kirchenbau im 19. und 20. Jh. (Kassel 1971); P. Brathe, Theorie des evangelischen Kirchengebäudes. Ein ergänzendes Kapitel zur evangelischen Liturgik (Stuttgart 1906); M. Meurer, Der Kirchenbau vom Standpunkt und nach dem Brauche der lutherischen Kirche. Geistlichen, Kirchenpatronen und Kirchenvorständen zur Orientierung dargeboten (Leipzig 1877); O. Mothes, Handbuch des evangelisch-christlichen Kirchenbaues (Leipzig 1898); W. Distel, Protestantischer Kirchenbau seit 1900 in Deutschland (Zurich 1933); O. Bartning, Vom neuen Kirchenbau (Berlin 1919); O. Bartning, Vom christlichen Kirchenbau (Cologne 1928).

PAINTING AND INTERIOR DESIGN: F. Novotny, Painting and Sculpture in Europe 1780–1880 (Harmondsworth 1960); J. W. v. Goethe (J. H. Meyer), Neudeutsche religiös-patriotische Kunst (Über Kunst und Altertum I, 1817); K. Andrews, The Nazarenes. A Brotherhood of German Painters in Rome (Oxford 1964); H. Schrade, "Die romantische Idee von der Landschaft als höchstem Gegenstande der christlichen Kunst," Neue Heidelberger Jahrbücher (1931); R. Ironside and J. Gere, Pre-Raphaelite Painters (London 1948); G. Brundu, "Preraffaelismo e Purismo," Enciclopedia universale dell'Arte X, 943–48; S. Waetzoldt, "Bemerkungen zur christlich-religiösen Malerei in der zweiten Hälfte des 19. Jh.," Triviale Zonen in der religiösen Kunst des 19. Jh. (Studien zur Philosophie und Literatur des 19. Jh. 15, [Frankfurt a. M. 1971]); J. Kreitmaier, S.J., Von Kunst und Künstlern. Gedanken zu alten und neuen künstlerischen Fragen (Freiburg 1926); G. Hexges, O.F.M., Ausstattungskunst im Gotteshaus (Berlin 1934); R. Koch, Das Kirchengerät im evangelischen Gottesdienst (Hamburg 1935); A. Henze, Kirchliche Kunst der Gegenwart (Recklinghausen 1954).

SECTION FOUR

Teaching and Theology

20. The Encyclical Aeterni Patris

COMMENTARIES

F. Ehrle (1880), newly ed. by F. Pelster (Rome 1954); G. Cornoldi, La riforma della filosofia promossa dall'enciclica "Aeterni Patris" di S. S. Leone XIII (Bologna 1880); other contemporary commentaries: Schmidlin, PG II, 394 (footnote).

LITERATURE

A. Walz, "Sguardo sul movimento tomista nel secolo XIX fino all'enciclica Aeterni Patris," Aquinas 8 (1965), 351–79; R. Aubert, "Aspects divers du néo-thomisme sous le pontificat de Léon XIII," Aspetti della cultura cattolica nell'età di Leone XIII (Rome 1961), 133–227.—Regarding the history of Neo-Scholasticism after 1879: chap. 21.

21. Neo-Thomism, Neo-Scholasticism, and the "New Philosophers"

LITERATURE

Cf. chap. 20.—M. Grabmann, Die Geschichte der katholischen Theologie (Freiburg i. Br. 1933, photoprint, Darmstadt 1961), 218–81; Hocedez III, 45–52, 110–20, 235–322, 351–83; G. Söhngen, "Neuscholastik," LThK VII, 923–26; O. H. Pesch, "Thomismus," LThK X, 160f.; R. Aubert, Aspects (cited in chap. 20); id., "Die Theologie während der 1. Hälfte des 20. Jh.," H. Vorgrimler and R. Vander Gucht, Bilanz der Theologie II (Freiburg i. Br. 1969), 7–14; F. van Steenberghen, "Die neuscholastische Philosophie," ibid. I, 352–63; in regard to ethical theology: J. G. Ziegler in ibid. III, 316–28; in regard to apologetics: J. Schitz in ibid. II, 201–20 (also about M. Blondel).—On individual philosophers and theologians, cf. chapter footnotes, also chap. 15.

22. The Theory of Church History

LITERATURE

On ecclesiastical historiography: this series, vol. I, pp. 35–56; Hocedez III, 64–91, 142–72; L. Scheffzyk, F. L. von. Stolbergs "Geschichte der Religion Jesu Christi". Die Abwendung der kath. Kirchengeschichtsschreibung von der Aufklärung und ihre Neuorientierung im Zeitalter der Romantik (Munich 1952).

On the history of various problems: this series, vol. I, pp. 1–11; A. Franzen, "Theologie der Geschichte und theologischen Kirchengeschichte," Oberrhein. Pastoralblatt 67 (1966), 395–400; J. Ratzinger, "Das Problem der Dogmengeschichte," Arbeitsgemeinschaft f. Forsch. Nordrhein-Westfalen, Geisteswiss., no. 139 (Cologne 1966); H. Dickerhof, "Kirchenbegriff, Wissenschaftsentwicklung, Bildungssoziologie und die Formen der kirchlichen Historiographie," HJ 89 (1969), 176–202; R. Kottje, ed., Kirchengeschichte heute—Geschichtswissenschaft oder Theologie? (Trier 1970); P. Stockmeier, "Kirchengeschichte und Geschichtlichkeit der Kirche," ZKG 81 (1970), 145–62; Concilium, Internat. Zs. f. Theol. 6 (1970), no. 8/9, with articles by G. Alberigo, R. Aubert, Y. Congar et al.; O. Köhler, "Die Kirche als Geschichte," Mysterium salutis IV/2 (in preparation).

23. The Question of the Bible

LITERATURE

A general history of Catholic Bible studies in the nineteenth century does not exist.—On Catholic exegesis after the sixteenth century: V. Baroni, La Contre-Réforme devant la Bible (Lausanne 1943); id., La Bible dans la vie catholique depuis la Réforme (Lausanne 1955).—A short summary of the "Question Biblique" during Leo XIII's pontificate in: Hocedez III, 124–41; A. Wikenhauser and Josef Schmid, Einleitung in das NT (Freiburg i. Br. 1973), 8ff.; briefly describes the situation until Divino afflante Spiritu (1943), introducing "a new epoch for Catholic Bible Studies."—The best analysis of the problems is provided by the studies about Albert (Marie-Joseph) Lagrange: J. Chaine et al., L'œuvre exégétique et historique du R. P. Lagrange (Paris 1935); L.-H. Vincent, "Le Père Lagrange," RB 47 (1938), 321–54; F. M. Braun, L'œuvre du Père Lagrange (Fribourg 1943); Le Père Lagrange au service de la Bible, Souvenirs personnels (Paris 1967). Negative, but with information: A. Houtin, La question biblique chez les catholiques de France au XIX^{e} siècle (Paris 1902).—J. Coppens, Le chanoine A. van Hoonacker (Paris 1935).—The Jesuit Franz von Hummelauer, suspended from exegetical research, has not yet been appraised, except by L. Koch (Jesuitenlexikon, 833).—The traditional position: cf. A. Delattre, S.J., Autour de la question biblique (Paris 1904); L. Fonck, Der Kampf um die Wahrheit der Heiligen Schrift seit 25 Jahren (Innsbruck 1905).

24. The Condemnation of Americanism

Cf. chap. 10, especially T. T. McAvoy, Crisis (1957); id., New Catholic Enc. 1 (1967), 443f.; Hocedez III, (1947), 190–94; L. Hertling, 230–44; E. Lecanuet, L'Église de France sous Léon XIII (Paris 1931), 544–602.

25. Papal Hopes for Unification—The Independent Eastern Churches and the Uniates

LITERATURE

Cf. Gen. Biblio.; also "Päpstliche Unionshoffnungen": L. K. Goetz, Leo XIII. Seine Weltanschauung und seine Wirksamkeit, quellenmäßig dargestellt (Gotha 1899); B. Arens, Papst Pius X. und die Weltmission (Aachen 1919); F. Portal, "Le rôle de l'amitié dans l'Union des Églises," La Revue catholique des idées et des faits 11 December 1925, 5–8; A. Gratieux, L'Amitié au service de l'Union, Lord Halifax et l'abbé Portal (Paris 1951); A.

Hudal, Die österreichische Vatikanbotschaft 1806–1918 (Munich 1952); R. Aubert, "Un document de la fin du XIXe siècle relatif aux facteurs non théologiques de Désunion entre chrétiens," 1054–1954. L'Église et les églises, neuf siècles de douloureuse séparation entre l'Orient et l'Occident II, ed. by L. Beauduin (Chevetogne 1955), 429–35; G. Florowski, "Die orthodoxen Kirchen und die ökumenische Bewegung bis zum Jahre 1910," R. Rouse and S. C. Neill, Gesch. der Ökumenischen Bewegung 1517–1948 I (Göttingen 1957), 231–96; O. S. Tomkins, "Die Römisch-Katholische Kirche und die ökumenische Bewegung 1910–1948," ibid. II (Göttingen 1958), 359–484; J. Alameda, Las Iglesias de Oriente y su Unión con Roma (Vitoria 1960); O. Rousseau, "Les attitudes de pensée concernant l'unité chrétienne au XIXe siècle," L'Ecclésiologie au XIXe siècle (Paris 1960), 351–73; W. de Vries, Orthodoxie und Katholizismus. Gegensatz oder Ergänzung? (Freiburg, Basel and Vienna 1965); C. Soetens, "Les catholiques belges et le rapprochement avec les Églises d'Orient dans la seconde moitié du XIXe siècle," RHE 66 (1971), 83–115; J. Hajjar, Zwischen Rom und Byzanz. Die unierten Christen des Nahen Ostens (Mainz 1972).

THE INDEPENDENT EASTERN CHURCHES. RUSSIA: J. Wilbois, L'Avenir de l'Église russe. Essai sur la crise sociale et religieuse en Russie (Paris 1907); W. Gribowski, Das Staatsrecht des Russischen Reiches (Tübingen 1912); A. Herman, De fontibus iuris ecclesiastici Russorum. Commentarius historico-canonicus (Rome 1936); J. S. Curtiss, Church and State in Russia. The last years of the Empire 1900–1917 (New York 1940); A. M. Ammann, Abriß der ostslawischen Kirchengeschichte (Vienna 1950); J. Chrysostomus, Die religiösen Kräfte in der russischen Gesch. (Munich 1961); I. Smolitsch, Gesch. der russischen Kirche 1700–1917 I (Leiden 1964); K. Onasch, "Grundzüge der russischen Kirchengeschichte," Die Kirche in ihrer Gesch. Ein Handbuch III, ed. by K. D. Schmidt and E. Wolf (Göttingen 1967), 1–133; G. Simon, "Kirche, Staat und Gesellschaft," Rußlands Aufbruch ins 20. Jh. Politik—Gesellschaft—Kultur 1894–1917, ed. by G. Katkov, E. Oberländer, N. Poppe, G. v. Rauch (Olten and Freiburg i. Br. 1970), 199–233.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY AND SOUTHEASTERN EUROPE: A. Hudal, Die serbisch-orthodoxe Nationalkirche (Graz and Leipzig 1922); J. Mousset, La Serbie et son église 1830–1904 (Paris 1938); G. G. Arnakis, The Near East in Modern Times I (Austin and New York 1969); J. Kondrinewitsch and E. v. Ivánka, "Die Orthodoxie in der Donaumonarchie und im Balkan von 1690 bis heute," Hdb. der Ostkirchenkunde, op. cit., 187–97.

THE FOUR OLD ORTHODOX PATRIARCHATE CHURCHES: C. Korolevsky, Histoire des Patriarcats Melkites, 3 vols. (Rome 1910–11); "Ekklesia X: Die Orthodoxe Kirche auf dem Balkan und in Vorderasien," ed. 45, Gesch., Lehre und Verfassung der Orthodoxen Kirche (Leipzig 1939); ed. 46: "Die orthodoxen Patriarchate von Konstantinopel, Alexandrien, Antiochien, Jerusalem und das Erzbistum von Cypern" (Leipzig, 1941); G. Vismara, Bisanzio e l'islam. Per la storia dei trattati tra la Cristianità Orientale e le potenze Musulmane (Milan 1950); J. Totzke, "Die alten Patriarchate Alexandrien, Antiochien und Jerusalem," Una Sancta 14 (1959), 300–307; 15 (1960), 203–12; C. Dahm, Die Kirche im Osten. Macht und Pracht der Patriarchen I (Offenburg 1964); F. W. Fernau, Patriarchen am Goldenen Horn. Gegenwart und Tradition des orthodoxen Orients (Opladen 1967); M. Lacko and P. Chrysostomus, "Gesch. und jetziger Stand der orthodoxen Kirchen," K. Algermissen, op. cit., 171–202; R. Potz, Patriarch und Synode in Konstantinopel. Das Verfassungsrecht des ökumenischen Patriarchates (Vienna 1971).

THE NATIONAL CHURCHES IN THE MIDDLE EAST: C. Fink, "Die getrennten Kirchen des Morgenlandes," Morgenländisches Christentum. Wege zu einer ökumenischen Theologie, ed. by P. Krüger and J. Tyciak (Paderborn 1940), 23–48; P. Kawerau, Amerika und die orientalischen Kirchen. Ursprung und Anfang der amerikanischen Mission unter den Nationalkirchen Westasiens (Berlin 1958); Hdb. der Orientalistik, Pt. 1, Vol. 8, Sec. 2, ed. by B. Spuler (Leiden and Cologne 1961); A. S. Atiya, A History of Eastern Christianity (London 1968); W. de Vries, "Die getrennten Kirchen des Ostens," K. Algermissen op. cit., 79–170; id., "Die 'nationalen Kirchen' des Nahen Ostens und das 'Uniatenproblem,'" Hdb. der Ostkirchenkunde, op. cit., 198–217.

THE UNIATE CHURCHES: A. Fortescue, The Uniate Eastern Churches. The Byzantine rite in Italy, Sicily, Syria and Egypt (New York 1923); B. J. Kidd, The Churches of Eastern Christendom from A.D. 451 to the Present Time (London 1927); P. Werhun, "Gesch. der Union in Byzanz und Südosteuropa," Der christliche Osten, op. cit., 294–310; id., "Gesch. der Union im ostslawischen Raum," ibid., 311–35; P. Krüger, "Die Unionen im Orient und Ägypten," ibid., 336–49; H. Engberding, "Die mit Rom vereinten Kirchen," Morgenländisches Christentum, op. cit., 49–61; C. de Clercq, Histoire des Conciles d'après les documents originaux XI, 2 (Paris 1952); I. Totzke, "Die 'Unierten.' Zum Problem der mit Rom in kirchlicher Gemeinschaft stehenden Orientalen," Una Sancta 14 (1959), 9–22; J. Alameda, Las Iglesias de Oriente y su Unión con Roma (Vitoria 1960); F. X. Siess, Die Patriarchalverfassung der Unierten Kirche (Erlangen 1960); F. Heyer, "Die katholische Kirche vom Westfälischen Frieden bis zum Ersten Vatikanischen Konzil," Die Kirche in ihrer Gesch. IV, ed. N, op. cit. (1963), 1–195; J. Madey, Kirche zwischen Ost und West. Beiträge zur Geschichte der Ukrainischen und Weißruthenischen Kirche (Munich 1969); M. Lacko, "Unionsbewegungen im slawischen Raum und in Rumänien," Hdb. der Ostkirchenkunde, op. cit., 218–35; J. Hajjar, Zwischen Rom und Byzanz. Die unierten Christen des Nahen Ostens (Mainz 1972).

Part Two
Defensive Concentration of Forces

Introduction: Pius X, a Conservative Reform Pope

SOURCES

ASS, 36–41 (1903–8); AAS 1–6 (1909–14); Lettere, ed. by N. Vian (Rome 1954); L. v. Pastor, Tagebücher, ed. by W. Wühr (Heidelberg 1950), 414–611; R. Merry del Val, Pio X, impressioni e ricordi (Padua 1949); C. Bellaigue, Pie X et Rome (Paris 1916); F. Crispolti, Ricordi personali (Milan 1932), 85–139; Beatificationis et Canonizationis Servi Dei Pii Papae X Positio super introductione causae (Rome 1942); Positio super virtutibus (Vatican City 1949); Disquisitio circa quasdam objectiones modum agendi Servi Dei respicientes in modernismi debellatione (Vatican City 1950, important documents); in addition, the records of the processes (Rome, prof. 1923–31, and apost. 1943–46; Venice, prof. 1924–30 and apost. 1944–46; Mantua, prof. 1924–27 and apost. 1945–46; Treviso, prof. 1923–26 and apost. 1944–46).

LITERATURE

GENERAL PRESENTATIONS: Schmidlin, PG III, 1–177; DThC XII, 1716–40; A Symposium on the Life and Work of Pius X (Washington 1946); H. Hermelink, Die Kath. Kirche unter den Piuspäpsten des 20. Jh. (Zurich 1949), 3–23, passim; Stanislao da Campagnola in I papi nella storia II (Rome 1961), 1078–1101; C. Falconi, I papi del ventesimo secolo (Milan 1967), 17–103, 387–89; G. Schwaiger, Gesch. der Päpste im 20. Jh. (Munich 1968), 49–71, 206–7; Y. de la Brière, Les luttes présentes de l'Église, 2 vols. (Paris 1913–14); M. Pernot, La politique de Pie X (Paris 1910); id., Le Saint-Siège, l'Église catholique et la politique mondiale (Paris 1924; liberal viewpoint); Aventino (=C. Bélin), Le gouvernement de Pie X. Concentration et défense catholique (Paris 1912; conservative viewpoint); Ce qu'on a fait de l'Église (Paris 1912; polemical, but informative); É. Poulat, Histoire, dogme et critique dans la crise moderniste (Paris and Tournai 1962), 662–64; J. M. Javierre, "La diplomacia pontificia en los estados europeos, 1903–14. Fuentes y bibliografía," Salmanticensis 11 (1964), 343–73.

BIOGRAPHIES: Since a satisfactory biography does not yet exist (list in Salmanticensis 11 [1964], 353–54), we recommend primarily: R. Bazin, Pie X (Paris 1928); E. Vercesi, Il pontificato di Pio X (Milan 1935); F. De Carli, Pio X e il suo tempo (Florence 1941); C. Ledré, Pie X (Paris 1952; the most detailed biography; see also id., RHEF 40 [1954], 249–67); G. Dal Gal, Il papa santo Pio X (Padua 1954; very one-sided, but offers many details); P. Fernessole, Pie X. Sa vie et son œuvre, 2 vols. (Paris 1952); N. Vian, S. Pius Pp. X (Padua 1958); P. V. Facchinetti, L'anima di Pio X (Milan 1935); F. Antonelli, "La santità di Pio X," Rivista di vita spirituale 6 (1952), 121–32.

GIUSEPPE SARTO BEFORE HIS PONTIFICATE: A. Marchesan, Pio X (Einsiedeln 1905); D. Ireno, "La formazione di S. Pio X nel Seminario di Padova," Studia patavina 1

(1954), 286–317; E. Bacchion, G. Sarto arciprete di Salzano (Padua 1925); N. Vian, San Pio X a Venezia (Rome 1958); id., Sulla soglia di Venezia (Florence 1964).

THE CONCLAVE: G. Berthelet, Storia e rivelazione sul conclave del 1903 (Turin 1904). The essential issues can quickly be obtained from the article by F. D. Mathieu, "Les derniers jours de Léon XIII et le conclave," Revue des deux mondes 362 (1904), 241–85 (a few additional details from his diary in E. Renard, Le cardinal Mathieu [Paris 1925], 390–415); Prince B. v. Bülow published in his memoirs (I [Berlin 1930], 619–23) an extensive letter by Cardinal Kopp of 4 August 1903; other details given by M. Landrieux, "Le conclave de 1903. Journal d'un conclaviste," Études 299 (1958), 157–83; the French diplomatic correspondence was appraised by H. Néant in Revue d'histoire diplomatique 77 (1963), 97–111, the Austrian diplomatic correspondence by Engel-Janosi II, 1–47. On the veto, see also Z. Obertyński, "Kard. Puzyna und sein Veto," Festschr. F. Loidl III (Vienna 1971), 177–95.

THE CURIA UNDER PIUS X: L. Bedeschi, La Curia Romana durante la crisi modernista (Parma 1968); cf. M. Guasco in Humanitas (1968), 814–17, and G. Martina in RSTI 23 (1969), 230–34.

SECTION ONE

The Reform Work of Pius X

26. Reorganization of the Roman Curia and Codification of Canon Law

LITERATURE

ON THE ENTIRE COMPLEX OF REFORMS: N. Hilling, Die Reformen des Papstes Pius X. auf dem Gebiete der kirchenrechtlichen Gesetzgebung, 3 vols. (Bonn 1909–15; chronological) and id. in AkathKR 95 (1915), 78–112, 283–99, 457–86, 639–58; 96 (1916), 60–73, 244–70, 408–30, 550–68; 97 (1917), 67–81, 245–59, 397–408, 563–75 (systematic); H. E. Feine, Kirchliche Rechtsgeschichte. Die kath. Kirche (Cologne and Graz 1964), 699–719 (biblio.).

ON THE REFORM OF THE CURIA: DDC IV, 997–1004; V. Martin, Les cardinaux et la Curie und Les congrégations romaines (Paris 1930); N. del Rè, La Curia Romana (Rome 1970), see above all: Romana Curia a beato Pio X Sapienti consilio reformata (Vatican City 1951; cited as Rom. Curia), especially the second chap. by G. Feretto about the stages of preparation (as yet unpublished documents). Regarding the old biblio., see Schmidlin, PG III, 34, n. 14. See also L. Bedeschi, La Curia Romana durante la crisi modernista (Parma 1968).

ON THE REFORM OF CANON LAW: P. Gasparri, "Storia della codificazione del diritto canonico," Acta Congressus iuridici internationalis IV (Rome 1937), 1–10; N. Hilling, op. cit.; I. Noval, Codificationis juris canonici recensio historico-apologetica (Rome 1918); A. Knecht, Das neue Kirchliche Gesetzbuch. Seine Geschichte und Eigenart (Strasbourg 1918); U. Stutz, Der Geist des Codex iuris canonici (Stuttgart 1918); M. Falco, Introduzione allo studio del "Codex iuris canonici" (Turin 1925); F. Cimetier, Les sources du droit ecclésiastique (Paris 1930), 150–97; DDC III, 909–40; Agatángel de Langasco in Revista española de derecho canónico 10 (1955), 457–75 (about the role of Cardinal Vives).

27. Eucharistic Decrees and Liturgical Renewal

SOURCES

A. Bugnini, Documenta pontificia ad instaurationem liturgicam spectantia 1903–1935 (Rome 1953).

LITERATURE

EUCHARISTIC DECREES: C. Zerba, Nel cinquantenario del Decreto "Quam singulari" (Vatican City 1961); J.-M. Derély, NRTh 73 (1951), 897–911, 1033–48; id., ibid. 77 (1955), 506–12; DThC III, 539–52; DSAM II, 1282–89; J. A. Hardon, ThSt 16 (1955), 493–532; H. A. Heiser, Die Durchführung der Kommuniondekrete in der ganzen Welt (Wiesbaden 1932; ZAM 8 [1933], 162–66; P. Hellbernd, Die Erstkommunion der Kinder in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Vechta 1954).

LITURGICAL REFORMS OF PIUS X: N. Hilling, AkathKR 96 (1916), 550–68 (old biblio., see 557, n. 6); 97 (1917), 245–59; O. Rousseau, Histoire du mouvement liturgique (Paris 1945), 201–30; T. Narbutas, La reforma del breviario romano por Pío X (Santiago de Chile 1949); J. M. Lecea Yabar, Pastoral litúrgica en los documentos pontificios de Pío X a Pío XII (Barcelona 1959); H. Vinck, "Les réformes liturgiques de 1911–1914" (unpubl. diss. of the Institut supérieur de Liturgie, Paris 1971); Schmidlin, PG III, 46–53.

CHORAL REFORM: K. G. Fellerer, Der gregorianische Choral im Wandel der Jahrhunderte (Rome 1936); E. Moneta-Caglio, "L'attività musicale di S. Pio X," Bolletino ceciliano Nov. 1964; id., Musica sacra, 84–86 (Milan 1961–63); F. Romita, "La preformazione del Motu proprio di S. Pio X sulla musica sacra," Monitor ecclesiasticus 86 (1961), 395–497; P. Combe, Histoire de la restauration du chant grégorien (Solesmes 1969); F. M. Bauducco in CivCatt, 1961, III, 583–94; 1963, I, 240–53; 1968, III, 243–52 (about the role of A. de Santis); id., Bolletino ceciliano (1964), 75–92; G. Zaggia, L. Bottazzo e la restaurazione della musica sacra (Padua 1967); E. Valentini, Un campione del movimento ceciliano, G. Grosso (Turin 1962); H. Vinck in ELit 86, (1972), 290–98; E. Moeller, "C. Bellaigue et Pie X," QLP 21 (1936), 40–65; "Il Pont. Istituto di musica sacra 50° di fondazione," Bolletino degli Amici del Pont. Ist. di Mus. sacra 13 (1961).

BEGINNING OF THE LITURGICAL MOVEMENT: A. Haquin, Dom Lambert Beauduin et le renouveau liturgique (Gembloux 1970); B. Fischer, "Das 'Mechelner Ereignis' vom 23. 9. 1909," LJ 9 (1959), 203–19; A. Bernareggi in SC 78 (1950), 81–102.

28. Concern for Pastoral Improvements: Seminaries, Catechetical Instruction, Catholic Action

LITERATURE

PIUS X AND THE CLERGY: Schmidlin, PG III, 40–43; N. Hilling in AkathKR 95 (1905), 283–99; A. M. Lanz, "Pio X e la Spiritualità del clero diocesano," CivCatt, 1952, I, 141–50; G. Lenhart, Der Priester und sein Tagwerk im Licht des Papstprogramms (Freiburg i. Br. 1913).

THE REFORM OF SEMINARIES: M. Bargilliat, Romanorum Pontificum Pii IX, Leonis XIII et Pii X monita et decreta de institutione clericorum in seminariis (Paris 1908; see also Enchiridion clericorum [Rome 1938]); L'ordinamento dei seminari da S. S. Pio X a Pio XII (Rome 1958); M. Guasco, Fermenti nei seminari del primo '900 (Bologna 1971); id.: Storia contemporanea 2 (1971), 863–74; N. Hilling in AkathKR 95 (1915), 95–112.

CATECHETICAL INSTRUCTION: G. Dal Gal, Beato Pio X papa (Padua 1951), 401–9; P. Stella, "Alle fonti del Catechismo di S. Pio X," Salesianum 23 (1961), 43–66; A. Balocco, "Un memorabile trentennio nella storia della catechesi, 1905–1935," Rivista lassalliana 36 (1962), 3–27; B. Dreher, Die biblische Unterweisung im evangelischen und katholischen Religionsunterricht (Freiburg i. Br. 1963), 11–81.

CATHOLIC ACTION: L. Civardi, Compendio di storia dell'Azione cattolica italiana (Rome 1956); Mgr. de Bazelaire, Les laïcs aussi sont l'Église (Paris 1958).

SECTION TWO

The Modernist Crisis

LITERATURE

The studies written immediately after the crisis are tendentious, but they are valuable by virtue of their testimony. See especially: A. L. Lilley, Modernism, a Record, and a Review (London 1908); K. Holl, Der Modernismus (Tübingen 1908); P. Sabatier, Les modernistes (Paris 1909); A. Gambaro, Il modernismo (Florence 1912); J. Schnitzer, "Der katholische Modernismus," Zeitschrift für Politik 5 (1912), 1–218 (also the volume of documents in the collection Klassiker der Religion 3 [Berlin 1912]); A. Houtin, Histoire du modernisme catholique (Paris 1913); M.-D. Petre, Modernism. Its failure and its fruit (London 1918); E. Buonaiuti, Le modernisme catholique (Paris 1927).

So far, there are three comprehensive histories: J. Rivière, Le modernisme dans l'Église (Paris 1929, with old lit., cf. RevSR 4 [1930], 676–92, and É. Poulat, Histoire, dogme et critique dans la crise moderniste [Paris and Tournai 1962], 41, 289–92, 295), and A. Vidler, The Modernist Movement in the Roman Church (Cambridge 1934). Also: É. Poulat, "'Modernisme' et 'Integrisme'. Du concept polémique à l'irénisme critique," ArchSR 27 (1969), 3–28; id. in RSR 58 (1970), 335–550; 59 (1971), 161–78; A. Vidler, A Variety of Catholic Modernists (Cambridge 1970); M. Ranchetti, Cultura e riforma religiosa nella storia del modernismo (Turin 1963); O. Schröder, Aufbruch und Mißverständnis. Zur Geschichte der reformkatholischen Bewegung (Graz 1969); L. da Veiga Coutinho, Tradition et histoire dans la controverse moderniste (Rome 1954); P. de Haes, La résurrection de Jésus dans l'apologétique des 50 dernières années (Rome 1953); C. Porro, La controversia cristologica nel periodo modernista (Milan 1971); P. Scoppola, "Recenti studi sulla crisi modernista," Rivista di storia e letteratura religiosa I (1965), 274–310.

29. Reform Catholicism in Germany

LITERATURE

A thorough study of this theme is lacking. See the summaries in LThK VIII, 705–7, LThK VIII, 1085, and in RGG V, 896–903; also an extensive study in J. Rivière, op. cit., 75–81, 288–93, 416–27, in A. Gisler, Der Modernismus (Einsiedeln 1912), 133–54, 642–50, and esp. in O. Schröder, op. cit., 369–431.

Regarding the most important leaders, see in this chapter: for Schnell n. 9; for Ehrhard n. 11; for Kraus n. 5; for P. Funk n. 19; for Schnitzer n. 18.

See also A. Hagen, Der Reformkatholizismus in der Diözese Rottenburg (Stuttgart 1962); A. ten Hompel, Indexbewegung und Kulturgesellschaft (Bonn 1908); W. Spael, Das katholische Deutschland im 20. Jh. (Würzburg 1964).

30. The Beginning of the Crisis in France

SOURCES

A. Loisy, Mémoires, 3 vols. (Paris 1930–31; cf. M.-J. Lagrange, M. Loisy et le modernisme [Paris 1932] and É. Poulat, Une œuvre clandestine d'H. Bremond [Rome 1972]); A.

Houtin and F. Sartiaux, A. Loisy. Sa vie, son œuvre, ed. with footnotes by É. Poulat (Paris 1960; cf. A. Vidler, A Variety of Catholic Modernists, 29–33); A. Houtin, Une vie de prêtre. Mon expérience (Paris 1926); P. Alfaric, De la foi à la raison. Scènes vécues (Paris 1965); J. Turmel, Comment j'ai donné congé aux dogmes (Paris 1935); id., Comment l'Église romaine m'a donné congé (Paris 1937); J. Guitton, Dialogues avec M. Pouget (Paris 1954); J. Chevalier, P. Pouget. Logia (Paris 1955); Au cœur de la crise moderniste. Le dossier inédit d'une controverse, ed. by R. Marlé (Paris 1960; cf. É. Poulat, Histoire, dogme et critique, 40–41, 513–15, 587, and Revue belge de philologie et d'histoire 41 [1963], 1164–66); M. Bécamel, "Lettres de Loisy à Mgr. Mignot," BLE 67 (1966), 3–44, 81–114, 170–94, 257–86; 69 (1968), 241–68; M. Blondel and A. Valensin, Correspondance 1899–1912, 2 vols. (Paris 1957); M. Blondel and J. Wehrlé, Correspondance, ed. by H. de Lubac, 2 vols. (Paris 1966); M. Blondel and L. Laberthonnière, Correspondance philosophique, ed. by C. Tresmontant (Paris 1961); H. Bremond and M. Blondel, Correspondance, ed. by A. Blanchet, I–II (Paris 1970–71); H. Bernard-Maître, "'Histoire et dogme' de M. Blondel d'après les papiers inédits d'A. Loisy," RSR 57 (1969), 49–74; id., "Lettres d'H. Bremond à Loisy," BLE 69 (1968), 3–24, 161–84, 269–89; B. Neven, "Lettres de Mgr. Duchesne à A. Loisy et à Fr. v. Hügel," Mélanges de l'École française de Rome 84 (1972), 283–307, 559–99; R. Aubert, "Aux origines de la réaction antimoderniste. Deux documents inédits," EThL 37 (1961), 557–78.

The literary estates of Loisy and Houtin are kept in the Bibliothèque nationale in Paris; those of Blondel in the Institut supérieur de philosophie in Louvain; those of Laberthonnière are kept by the Oratorians of Paris; those of Mgr. Mignot in the archbishopric of Albi and in the bishopric of Rodez.

LITERATURE

Aside from the general works by Rivière, Vidler, Houtin, etc. (p. 616), see primarily: É. Poulat, Histoire, dogme et critique dans la crise moderniste (Tournai and Paris 1962; cf. RH 230 [1963], 262–67), with useful appendix: "Pseudonymes et anonymes modernistes" (621–76). Also: A. Houtin, La question biblique au XX^e^ siècle (Paris 1906); R. Aubert, Le problème de l'acte de foi (Louvain 1950), 265–92; F. Rodé, Le miracle dans la crise moderniste (Paris 1965).

On A. Loisy, aside from his biography by Houtin-Sartiaux (above, with a complete list of his works, 303–24), see also: F. Heiler, Der Vater des katholischen Modernismus, A. Loisy (Munich 1947); M. Dell'Isola, A. Loisy (Modena 1957); R. Boyer de Sainte-Suzanne, A. Loisy entre la foi et l'incroyance (Paris 1968); R. Aubert, Die Wahrheit der Ketzer, ed. by H. J. Schultz (Stuttgart 1968), 172–83, 349–57; D. Baader, "Der Weg Loisys . . . ," FreibThSt, 1974.

On M.-J. Lagrange and M. Blondel, see biblio. to chap. 23 and chap. 21, ns. 19 and 20.

On P. Batiffol, see J. Rivière, Mgr Batiffol (Paris 1929) and A. Houtin, Ma vie laïque (Paris 1928), 150–55. On J. Turmel, see F. Sartiaux, J. Turmel prêtre, historien des dogmes (Paris 1931) and A. Vidler, A Variety . . . , 56–62.—On Mignot, Houtin, Bremond, Laberthonnière, and Le Roy, see below, ns. 12, 13, 15, 17, and 19.

31. The Crisis in England

SOURCES

For Tyrrell: T. M. Loome, "A Bibliography of the Published Writings of G. Tyrrell," Heythrop Journal 10 (1969), 280–314; supplement, ibid. 11 (1970), 161–69; G. Tyrrell's

Letters 1898–1909, ed. by M. Petre (London 1920); Lettres de G. Tyrrell à H. Bremond, ed. with footnotes by A. Louis-David (Paris 1971); other letters in M. Petre, Autobiography and Life of G. Tyrrell (below), in A. Loisy, Mémoires (Paris 1930–31), and ed. by J. H. Graham in The Month 226 (1968), 178–85; 231 (1971) 111–19, and by T. M. Loome in ibid. 229 (1970) 95–101, 138–49; many, as yet unpublished letters in the British Museum, Manuscripts Section. Also F. v. Hügel, "Father Tyrrell. Some memorials of the last 12 years of his life," Hibbert Journal 8 (1909/10), 233–52.

For von Hügel: Selected Letters 1896–1924, ed. by B. Holland (London 1927; the selection intended to cleanse him from the suspicion of modernism); Letters to a Niece, ed. by G. Greene (London 1928); Spiritual Counsels and Letters, ed. by D. Steere (London 1964); other important letters in A. Loisy, Mémoires; regarding the unpublished letters and diaries, see T. M. Loome, op. cit. (below), 295. Also: M. Petre, My Way of Faith (London 1937).

LITERATURE

J. Rivière, op. cit., esp. 82–85, 102–6, 192–222, 265–74, 300–307, 389–401; A. Vidler, The Modernist Movement, esp. 143–81, 204–12; id., A Variety, 109–90; M. Ranchetti, op. cit., 58–74; M. Ward, The Wilfrid Wards and the Transition II (London 1937), 134–420; M. Petre, Von Hügel and Tyrrell (London 1937); id.: Congrès d'histoire du christianisme, ed. by P. Couchoud, III (Paris 1928), 226–47.

On Tyrrell: M. D. Petre, Autobiography and Life of G. Tyrrell, 2 vols. (London 1912); R. Gout: L'affaire Tyrrell (Paris 1910); J. Stam, G. Tyrrell (Utrecht 1938); D. Grasso, "La conversione e l'apostasia di G. Tyrrell," Gregorianum 38 (1957), 446–80, 593–629; R. Boudens, "G. Tyrrell and Card. Mercier," Église et théologie 1 (Montreal 1970), 313–51; P. Scoppola: Humanitas 22 (Brescia 1967), 705–38; G. Daly, "Some Reflections on the Character of G. Tyrrell," Heythrop Journal 10 (1969), 256–74; J. A. Laubacher, Dogma and the Development of Dogma in the Writings of G. Tyrrell (Louvain and Baltimore 1939); J. F. O'Grady, The Doctrine of Nature and Grace in the Writings of G. Tyrrell (Rome 1968).

On von Hügel: M. de la Bédoyère, The Life of Baron v. H. (London 1951); M. Nédoncelle, La pensée religieuse de F. v. H. (Paris 1935); L. Barmann, Baron v. H. and the Modernist Crisis in England (Cambridge 1972); J. Steinmann, F. v. H. (Paris 1962; cf. Revue belge de philologie et d'histoire 41 [1963], 1162–63); J. Heaney, The Modernist Crisis, v. H. (London 1969; cf. Heythrop Journal 10 [1969], 315–19); T. Loome in DR 91 (1973), nos. 302–4.

On Modernism in the United States: T. McAvoy: RPol 21 (1959), 71–74; J. Ratté, Three Modernists, A. Loisy, G. Tyrrell, W. L. Sullivan (New York 1967); J. Leinhard, "The 'New York Review' and Modernism in America," RACHS 82 (1971), 67–82.

32. The Crisis in Italy

SOURCES

E. Buonaiuti, Pellegrino di Roma (Rome 1945); S. Minocchi, "Memorie di un modernista" (manuscript in the Biblioteca Nazionale of Florence; edition prepared by A. Agnoletto; excerpts in RicRel 19 [1948], 148–67, and Itinerari nos. 47–48 [1961], 29–52); G. Semeria, I miei tempi (Milan 1929); F. Lanzoni, Le Memorie, ed. by G. Cattani (Faenza 1958); Centro Studi per la storia del modernismo. Fonti e documenti I (Urbino 1972; letters prepared by Buonaiuti); A. Fogazzaro, Lettere scelte, ed. by T. Gallarati Scotti (Milan 1940); O. Morra, Fogazzaro nel suo piccolo mondo, dai carteggi familiari (Bologna 1960); A. Fogazzaro and G. Bonomelli, Corrispondenza, ed. by C. Marcora (Milan 1968); R. Comandini, "Echi della crisi modernista in un carteggio inedito di G. Meloni con A. Fogazzaro," Studia Patavina 16 (1969), 60–96; P. Scoppola, "Gli anni del modernismo nelle carte inedite di F. Salimei," Humanitas 22 (1967), 705–38. In regard to the reaction against Modernism, see CivCatt after 1901.

LITERATURE

Aside from the general works by Rivière, Vidler, Ranchetti, etc., see: P. Scoppola, Crisi modernista e rinnovamento cattolico (Bologna 1969; basic, cf. RStRis 49 [1962], 491–98; and Revue belge de philologie et d'histoire 41 [1963], 1159–62); L. Bedeschi, I cattolici disubbidienti (Naples and Rome 1959); id., Il Modernismo e Romolo Murri in Emilia e Romagna (Parma 1967; unpublished letters, 277–354); id., Linneamenti dell'antimodernismo, il caso Lanzoni (Parma 1970); M. Guasco, R. Murri e il modernismo (Rome 1968; biblio.); C. Giovannini, Politica e religione nel pensiero della Lega Democratica Nazionale (Rome 1959); F. Manzotti, "'Plebei' cattolici fra integralismo e modernismo sociale (1904/08)," Convivium 26 (1958), 423–45. See also M. C. Casella, Religious Liberalism in Modern Italy, 2 vols. (London 1966), and the other works by L. Bedeschi (below, biblio. to chap. 33).

On the group of the Rinnovamento: P. Scoppola, op. cit. chap. 4; M. Ranchetti, op. cit., 117–29, 191–226; F. Fonzi, "St. Jacini jr e il 'Rinnovamento,'" RStRis 56 (1969), 183–254; O. Confessore, "Sulle origini del 'Rinnovamento,'" Rivisto di storia e letteratura religiosa 4 (1968), 328–37; N. Raponi, T. Gallarati Scotti tra politica e cultura (Milan 1971).

On Genocchi, Fracassini, Minocchi, Buonaiuti, Semeria, and Fogazzaro, see this chap., nn. 1–4, 6, and 14.

33. Intervention of Ecclesiastical Authority and the Integralist Reaction

SOURCES

The main documents regarding Rome's measures against Modernism were compiled by A. Vermeersch, De modernismo (Bruges 1910).

On the integralist reaction: see mainly (F. Antonelli and G. Löw) Disquisitio circa quasdam obiectiones modum agendi servi Dei Pii X respicientes in modernismi debellatione (Vatican City 1950) and É. Poulat, Intégrisme et catholicisme intégral (Tournai-Paris 1969; with an introduction and informative footnotes; renders obsolete: N. Fontaine [=L. Canet], Saint-Siège, Action française et catholiques intégraux, Paris 1928). Also: La Correspondance de Rome 1907–1912 (reprint Milan [1972], 3 vols.), the weekly journal by Msgr. Benigni, containing numerous essays; the memoirs and correspondences mentioned in chaps. 30–32; Le P. Lagrange au service de la Bible. Souvenirs personnels (Paris 1967); [P. Naudet], Ce qu'on a fait de l'Église (Paris 1912; about the author, see É. Poulat, Histoire dogme et critique dans la crise moderniste 662–64); L. Bedeschi, Lettere ai cardinali di don Brizio (Bologna 1970); id. in Nuova rivista storica 54 (1970), 125–76; 55 (1971), 90–132; 56 (1972), 389–412; id. in Rivista di storia e letteratura religiosa 6 (1970), 350–67; 7 (1971), 278–98; C. Marcora in Studi storici in memoria di Mons. A. Mercati (Milan 1956), 201–43.

LITERATURE

J. Rivière, Le modernisme dans l'Église (Paris 1929), 329–549; P. Scoppola, Crisi modernista . . . (Bologna 1969), 327–64; D. Grasso, "I modernisti e la 'Pascendi,'" Divinitas 2 (1958), 150–76.

On the integralist reaction, aside from the aforementioned basic works of É. Poulat, see: DThC, tables 2294–2303; R. Lill, "Der Kampf der römischen Kurie gegen den 'praktischen' Modernismus," Die päpstliche Autorität im kath. Selbstverständnis des 19. und 20. Jh., ed. by E. Weinzierl (Salzburg 1970), 109–23; P. Droulers, Politique sociale et christianisme. Le P. Desbuquois et l'Action populaire. Syndicalisme et intégristes 1903–18 (Paris 1969); L. Bedeschi, Lineamenti dell'antimodernismo. Il caso Lanzoni (Parma 1970); A. Blanchet, Histoire d'une mise à l'Index, la 'Sainte Chantal' de l'abbé Bremond (Paris 1967); M. Becamel in BLE 71 (1970), 262–73.

On Le Sillon: J. Caron, Le Sillon et la démocratie chrétienne 1894–1910 (Paris 1967).

On L'Action française: E. Weber, The Action française (Stanford 1962) and the research report by V. Nguyen in Revue d'histoire moderne et contemporaine 18 (1971), 503–38.

SECTION THREE

The Holy See and the European Governments

34. The Roman Question and Italian Catholicism

BIBLIOGRAPHY

1. COLLECTIONS OF SOURCES (cf. the biblio. in chap. 5): Acta Pii X, 3 vols. (Rome 1905–7); R. Aubert, "Documents relatifs au mouvement catholique sous le pontificat de Pie X," RSTI 12 (1958), 202–43, 334–70; A. Toniolo, Saggi politici, ed. S. Majerotto (Rome 1957); F. Meda, Scritti scelti, ed. G. P. Dore (Rome 1959); G. Della Torre, I cattolici e la vita pubblica italiana, ed. G. De Rosa, 2 vols. (Rome 1962); R. Murri, Battaglie d'oggi, 4 vols. (Rome 1904); L. Sturzo, Opera omnia (appearing in Bologna 1950ff.); id., Dall'idea al fatto, ed. G. De Rossi (Rome 1920); id., Chiesa e Stato (Bologna 1958); La Civiltà cattolica 1850–1945, anthology, ed. G. De Rosa (Rome 1967); L'Azione, antologia di scritti 1902–22, ed. C. Bellò (Rome 1967; journal-newspaper of Cremona); A. Gemelli and F. Olgiati, Vita e pensiero 1914–64, (Milan 1966); Civitas, 1919–25, ed. B. Malinverni (Rome 1963).

2. THE HISTORICAL CONTEXT: Several authors, 30 anni di storia politica italiana (Turin 1968); L. Salvatorelli, Storia del Novecento (Milan 1957); G. Giolitti, Memorie della mia vita (Milan 1945).

3. SPECIAL TOPICS (cf. biblio. in chap. 5): L. Salvatorelli, Giolitti (Milan 1928); G. Spadolini, Giolitti ed i cattolici, 1901–14 (Florence 1960); M. Guasco, R. Murri ed il modernismo (Rome 1968); G. Corradi, Liberali e cattolici nelle Marche, 1900–13 (Urbino 1970); A. Canaletti Gaudenzi, L. Sturzo. Il pensiero e le opere (Rome 1945); G. Petrocchi, Don Luigi Sturzo (Rome 1945); F. Rizzo, L. Sturzo e la questione meridionale (Rome 1937); F. Magri, Un pioniere dell'azione sociale cristiana, Angelo Mauri 1873–1936 (Milan 1956); P. Bondioli, P. Agostino Gemelli. Un profilo (Milan 1926); M. C. Rossi, Fr. L. Ferrari, Dalle Leghe bianche al P. P. I. (Rome 1965); Several authors, Benedetto XV, i cattolici e la prima guerra mondiale (Rome 1963); La parola e l'opera di Benedetto XV durante il conflitto mondiale (Florence 1916); F. Meda, I cattolici nella guerra mondiale (Milan 1928); G. Quadrotta, Il Papa, l'Italia e la guerra, con prefazione di F. Scaduto (Milan 1915); E. Vercesi, Il Vaticano, l'Italia e la guerra (Milan 1925).

35. German Catholicism between Kulturkampf and World War I

LITERATURE

H. Brück, Gesch. der kath. Kirche in Deutschland im 19. Jh. IV, 2, ed. J. B. Kißling (Münster 1908); K. Bachem, Vorgeschichte, Geschichte und Politik der deutschen Zentrumspartei V–VII (Cologne 1919–30; reprint, Aalen 1967–68); Schmidlin, PG III, 94–104, 156–59, 164ff.; Bihlmeyer-Tüchle III, 411ff.; G. Maron, Die römisch-kath. Kirche von 1870 bis 1970 (see in chap. 1), 260ff.

E. Ritter, Die kath.-soziale Bewegung Deutschlands und der Volksverein (Cologne 1954), 129–351; H. Philippi, "Kronkardinalat oder Nationalkardinalat. Preußische und bayerische Bemühungen an der Kurie 1900–1914," HJ 80 (1961), 185–217; id., "Beiträge zur Gesch. der diplomatischen Beziehungen zwischen dem Deutschen Reich und dem Hl. Stuhl 1872–1909," ibid. 82 (1963), 239–62; Buchheim, Ultramontanismus und Demokratie, 309–536; H. Lutz, Demokratie im Zwielicht. Der Weg der deutschen Katholiken aus dem Kaiserreich in die Republik (Munich 1963); R. Morsey, Die deutsche Zentrumspartei 1917–1923 (Düsseldorf 1966; also important for the decade before 1914); id., "Die deutschen Katholiken und der Nationalstaat zwischen Kulturkampf und erstem Weltkrieg," HJ 90 (1970), 31–64; id., "Georg Kard. Kopp, Fürstbischof von Breslau (1887–1914), Kirchenfürst oder 'Staatsbischof'?," Wichmann-Jahrbuch für Kirchengeschichte im Bistum Berlin XXI–XXIII (1967–69), 42–65.—Cf. the sections on Germany in chaps. 12–15.

36. Separation of Church and State in France

SOURCES

Livre blanc du S. Siège. La séparation de l'Église et de l'État en France. Exposé et documents (Paris 1906); Une campagne du Siècle. La séparation des Églises et de l'État, H. Brisson . . . (Paris 1905); Les fiches pontificales de Monsignor Montagnini . . . (Paris 1908); J. de Narfon, La séparation de l'Église et de l'État. Origines, étapes, bilan (Paris 1922); E. Combes, Mon ministère. Mémoires (1902–1905) (Paris 1957); Z. Giacometti, Quellen zur Geschichte der Trennung von Staat und Kirche (Tübingen 1926); L. V. Méjan, La séparation des Églises et de l'État (foreword by G. Le Bras; biblio.) (Paris 1959).

LITERATURE

Aside from the mentioned works by Lecanuet, Latreille, and Mayeur, see F. Mourret-Carreyre, Précis d'histoire de l'Église III (Paris 1929); J. Brugerette, Le prêtre français dans la société contemporaine II–III (Paris 1935–38); L. Capéran, L'invasion laïque. De l'avènement de Combes au vote de la Séparation (Paris 1935); P. Sorlin, Waldeck-Rousseau (Paris 1966); J.-M. Mayeur, La séparation de l'Église et de l'État (Paris 1966); J. Caron, Le Sillon et la démocratie chrétienne (Paris 1967); C. Molette, L'association catholique de la jeunesse française, 1886–1907 (Paris 1968); A. v. Campenhausen, Staat und Kirche in Frankreich (Göttingen 1962); E. Appolis, "En marge de la Séparation. Les associations cultuelles schismatiques," RHEF, 1963; G. Le Bras, Le Conseil d'État, régulateur de la vie paroissiale. Trente ans de Séparation (Paris 1950); Fontaine (L. Canet), Saint-Siège, Action française et catholiques intégraux (Paris 1928); B. Neveu, "Louis Canet et le service du Conseiller technique pour les Affaires religieuses au Ministère des Affaires étrangères," Rev. d'Hist. diplom. (April/June 1968); M. J. M. Larkin, "Loubet's Visit to Rome and the Question of Papal Prestige," The Historical Journal IV (1961), 97–113; id., "The Vatican, French Catholics and the Associations Cultuelles," The Journal of Modern History XXXVI (1964), 298–317; id., "The Church and the French Concordat, 1891 to 1902," EHR LXXXI (1966), 717–39; id., Church and State after the Dreyfus Affair: the Separation issue in France (London, in preparation); J. McManners, Church and State in France 1870–1914 (London, SPCK, 1972); G. Laperrière, La Séparation des Églises et de l'État à Lyon, étude d'opinion publique (Lyon, Centre d'histoire du catholicisme, 1973).

37. The Outbreak of World War I

LITERATURE

Engel-Janosi II, 148–52; J. Nobécourt, "Le Vicaire" et l'histoire (Paris 1964), 120–23, 130–31; A. Hudal, Die österreichische Vatikanbotschaft 1805–1918 (Munich 1952), 281–84; P. Fernesole, Pie X (Paris 1954), II, 440–50; E. Adamov, Die Diplomatie des Vatikans zur Zeit des Imperialismus (Berlin 1932), 72–73; P. Renouvin and J. B. Duroselle, Introduction à l'histoire des relations internationales (Paris 1964), 235–36, 254–56.

Part Three

The Expansion of Catholic Missions from the Time of Leo XIII until World War II

38. Missions in the Shadow of Colonialism

39. The Development of New Churches

SOURCES AND LITERATURE

R. Streit, Bibliotheca Missionum III, XIV, XXV (America); VIII, XXVII (India); IX (Philippines); X (Japan, Korea); XI (Indochina); XII–XIV (China); XVII–XX (Africa); XXI (Australia, Oceania); J. Rommerskirchen, Bibliografia Missionaria (Rome 1936ff.); Acta Leonis XIII, 8 vols. (Bruges and Paris 1887–1910); Acta Sanctae Sedis (ASS, Rome 1865–1908); Acta Apostolicae Sedis (AAS Rome 1909ff.); Collectanea S. Congregationis de Propaganda Fide, 2 vols. (Rome 1907); Sylloge praecipuorum documentorum recentium Summorum Pontificum et S. Congregationis de Propaganda Fide (Rome 1939); J. Glazik, Päpstliche Rundschreiben über die Mission von Leo XIII. bis Johannes XXIII. (Münsterschwarzach 1961; Lat. and Germ.); E. Marmy and I. Auf der Maur, Geht hin in alle Welt. Missionsenzykliken der Päpste Benedikt XV., Pius XI., Pius XII. und Johannes XXIII. (Fribourg 1961).—J. Schmidlin, Papstgeschichte der neuen Zeit II (Pius IX, Leo XIII); III (Pius X, Benedict XV); IV (Pius XI) (Munich 1934–39); id., Katholische Missionsgeschichte (Steyl 1925); S. Delacroix, Histoire universelle des missions catholiques III (Les missions contemporaines 1800–1957) (Paris 1958); F. Schwager, Die katholische Heidenmission der Gegenwart II (Africa) (Steyl 1908); IV (Vorderindien und Britisch-Hinterindien) (Steyl 1909); K. B. Westmann and H. von Sicard, Geschichte der christlichen Mission (Munich 1962); Kenneth Scott Latourette, A History of the Expansion of Christianity V–VII (New York and London 1943–45); id., Geschichte der Ausbreitung des Christentums, condensed ed. (Göttingen 1956); A. Mulders, Missionsgeschichte. Die Ausbreitung des katholischen Glaubens (Regensburg 1960); T. Ohm, Wichtige Daten der Missionsgeschichte (Münster 1961); B. Arens, Handbuch der katholischen Missionen (Freiburg 1925); H. Bernard-Maître, "China," DHGE XII, 693–741; J. Jennes, A History of the Catholic Church in Japan (Tokyo 1959).

INDEX

Aargau, canton 78
Abbelen, Peter 153
Abbeloos 115, 255
Abdul Hamid II, sultan 337, 359
Abel, Heinrich 203
Abhinc duos annos, motu proprio (1913) 412
Accommodation 565f, 575
Acerbo nimis, encyclical (1905) 416
Acquaderni, Giovanni, count 88
Acri 490
Acta Apostolicae Sedis 395
Acta Sanctae Sedis 395
Actio christiana popularis 242
Action of Blondel 317
Action Catholique de la Jeunesse française(ACJF) 515
Action française 212, 246, 387, 470, 473, 476, 512
Action libérale 512
Action populaire 473, 512, 515
Acton, John Emmerich Edward, lord 89
Adames, N., bishop of Luxemburg 118
Ad diem illum, encyclical (1904) 455
Adrian, patriarch of Moscow 352
Aehrenthal, Austrian foreign secretary 51, 55
Aeterni Patris, encyclical (1879) 278, 307ff
Afghanistan 527
Africa 527, 566ff, 570
—Christianization 544ff
Africa Society of the German Catholics 529
Aghtamar, Armenian catholicate 367
Agius, Ambros 541
Agliardi, Antonio, cardinal 23, 48, 52f, 92, 95, 383, 489
Aglipay, Gregorio 540
Aglipayism 540
Agnosticism 458ff
Aïn-Traz, synod (1909) 373
Albani, Medolago 87f, 92, 94f, 484
Albania 185, 188
—Orthodox Church 353, 355, 358
Albertario, Davide 88, 92, 227
Albertines (Poland) 177
Albertus Magnus 308
Alcayaga Godoy, Lucila 134
Alexander, king of Serbia 517
Alexander II, tsar of Russia 167, 172, 347f
Alexander III, pope 18
Alexander III, tsar of Russia 172, 339, 348
Alexander VI, pope 321
Alexandria, Orthodox patriarchate 360
Alexandrian rite, Uniate 374
Alfaro, Eloy 133
Alfieri, A. 490
Allgemeiner Cäcilienverband für die Länder der deutschen Sprache 285
Allioli, Joseph Franz von 325
Allo, O. P. 440
Aloisi Masella, Gaetano, cardinal 58
Alphonso XII, king of Spain 120, 122
Alphonso XIII, king of Spain 122, 124, 125
Alsace-Lorraine 45
—Kulturkampf 75
Amantissimae voluntatis, apostolic letter (1895) 141
America, magazine 278
Americanism 155f, 165, 331ff, 421, 424, 431
—modernism 334
Amette, Léon, cardinal 479, 515
Amrhein, Andreas, O.S.B. 273, 530
Analecta Franciscana, 313
Anderledy, Anton Maria, general S.J. 277
Angers, Catholic university 252
Anglican Church
—unification with the Roman Catholic Church 140ff
Anglican ordination 17
Angola 553
Anizan, general of the Brothers of St. Vincent de Paul 473
Annales de philosophie chrétienne 431, 439, 515
Annali Lateranensi 574
Annum ingressi sumus, apostolic letter (1902) 24, 196
Annum Sacrum, encyclical (1899) 262
Annunzio, Gabriele d' 249
Anselm of Canterbury 416
Anthimos VII, patriarch of Constantinople 359
Anthony Peter IX Hassan, Armenian patriarch, cardinal 376
Anti-Freemason Congress of Trent (1896) 217f
Antimodernism 462ff

Antimodernist oath 170, 174, 429, 463, 504
Antioch
Antioch rite, Uniate 374f
Antiphonal (Antiphonary) 409
Anti-Semitism 48, 218f
—in Austria 204
—in France 106f
Antisocialist law 240
Anti-Socialist League (Belgium) 111
Antonelli, Giacomo, secretary of state 9, 30, 34, 38
Antunes, José Maria 553
Anzengruber, Ludwig 249
Anzer, Johann Baptist, vicar apostolic of South Shantung 536
Apologetics 432ff, 440, 458
Apostolicae curae, bull (1896) 142
Apostolicae Sedis, constitution (1869) 399
Apostolic Camera 398
Apostolic Signature 398
Appel comme d'abus 510
Apponyi, Albert, count 183f
Arcano Divinae Providentiae consilio, brief (1868) 335f
Arcanum, encyclical 209
Architecture, ecclesiastical
—in the 19th and 20th centuries 288ff, 302ff
Arduum sane munus, (1904) 400
A remotissima, decree 401
Argentina 129f
—Catholic university in Buenos Aires 130
Ariens, A. 117
Armenian College 341, 376
Armenians, Armenian Church 366f
—Uniate 376ff
Arnim, Harry, count 41
Arnold, M 445
Art and religion 294, 302
Asociación Católica de propagandistas (Spain) 125
Asquith, H. H. 143, 146
Association Catholique de la jeunesse française (ACJF) 103f, 105, 212
Association de la Jeunesse belge 113
Association des Patrons du Nord (France) 200
Association d'études religieuses 439
Association Internationale Africaine 549
Associazione Cattolica per la libertà della Chiesa 87
Associazioni Cristiane Lavoratori Italiani 232
Assumptionists 280, 341
—in Bulgaria 187, 372
—in France 105f, 508
—in Greece 372
—in Turkey 359
Athanasios, bishop of the Thomas Christians 364
Auersperg, count, Austrian minister 46
Augouard, Ph.-Pr. 548
Augusta, empress of Germany 29, 33, 42, 43
Augustine 312
Augustinans
—in China 536
—on Guam 544
—in the USA 158
Augustinianism 312
Augustinis, A. M. de, S.J. 142
Augustinusverein 216
Au milieu des sollicitudes, encyclical (1892) 16, 102, 237, 238
Aumôniers du travail (Belgium) 229
Australia
—Christianization 544
—development of Catholicism 149f
—elimination of the denominational school system 149
—orders, congregations, and the secular clergy 149f
—the social question 150
Australian Labour Party 150
Austria-Hungary 15, 23, 29, 43, 166, 171, 186f, 192f, 241, 245, 381, 387, 467, 518
—anti-Semitism 219
—Away-from-Rome movement 428
—bishops' nominations 50f
—Catholicism 1914 181ff
—Catholicism and nationalism 517
—Catholicism around the turn of the century 249f
—Catholic organizations 48
—Catholic press 215
—Catholic social movement 222
—Catholic societies 213
—Catholic studies around the turn of the century 253
—Church policy under Franz Joseph 45ff
—civil marriage 45
—concordat 46
—cultural protectorate in the Balkans 342f, 346
—denominational laws (1874) 45f
—elementary school law 45f
—Hungary's church politics and legislation 52
—Italy and the papacy 48f
—language question 182f
—marriage law (1876) 45
—modernism controversy 54
—nationalities, problems of the 49ff
—Neo-Thomism 313ff
—orders 278f
—Orthodox Church 346, 353f
—and outbreak of World War I 520ff
—and papal unification efforts 342f
—political parties of the ethnic groups 183
—religious composition of the mixed population 181
—school question 45
—social democracy 46
—tensions in the monarchy (1878–1914) 45ff
—and Vatican 49f, 520ff
Avolia, G. 453
Ayola, Ángel 125
Azione popolare 387f

Bachem, Julius 215, 429, 502, 504
Baden, Kulturkampf 44
Badeni, Kazimierz, count 46f, 175
Badeni crisis 53
Baeumker, Clemens 314f
Bakunin, Mikhail 91
Balmaceda, José 130
Bamberger, Ludwig 35
Bánffy, Dezsö, baron 52f
Barat Sophie 280
Barbier, É. 469f, 475
Barnabò, Alessandro, cardinal 335
Barrios, Justo Rufino 133
Barroso, Antonio, bishop of Oporto 127f
Barrows, J. H. 164
Bartning, A. 294
Bartolini, cardinal 7
Bartolo, Salvatore di 326f
Basel, canton 76, 78
—separation of state and Church 82
Basel-Solothurn, bishopric 12, 78, 79
Basileios I (Mar Ivanios), catholicos of India 365
Basileios III George II, catholicos of the Thomas Christians 365
Basilians 370
Basutoland, Christianization 555
Bataillon, Pierre-Marie, F.S.M., bishop 543
Batiffol, Pierre 253, 323, 410, 432, 435, 437f, 470
Battaini, D. 452
Battenberg, Alexander, prince 186
Baudelaire, Charles 245
Baudri, Friedrich 27
Baudrillart, Henri-Marie-Alfred 253, 331, 385
Bauer, Bruno 325
Bäumer, Suitbert 410
Baumgartner, Alexander, S. J. 252
Baumstark, A. 466
Bavaria 33, 498, 499
—"covert Kulturkampf" 44f
—orders 271
—school question 211
Bayley, J. R., archbishop of Baltimore 154
Beauduin, Lambert, O.S.B. 114, 412
Beck, Josef 80, 83
Beckmann, Johannes, S.M.B. 574
Beckx, P.-J., general S.J. 277
Beda College 143
Bede, Venerable 143
Bedeschi, L. 394
Beernaert, Auguste Marie François 109
Bégin, L.-N., archbishop of Quebec 149
Behnam Benni, Cyril, Syrian patriarch 339, 374
Belcredi, Egbert, count 47, 202
Belgian Congo 566
Belgium 7, 201, 241, 519
—anticlericalism 107
—Catholic labor movement 229, 231
—Catholic press 216
—Catholic social movement 109f, 220
—Catholic societies 113
—Congo mission 549f
—conservatism 107ff
—de-Christianization 115, 229
—divorce 109
—Eucharistic congresses 261f
—industrialization 110
—liberal and social Catholicism 109f
—liberalism 108
—orders and congregations 113f
—religious instruction 108
—school question 12, 108f, 210
—state and Church 107ff
Belloc, Hilaire 146
Bellot des Minières, Henri, cardinal 101
Belmonte, see Pignatelli di Belmonte
Benedetti, Pietro 415
Benedict XIV, pope 24, 342
Benedict XV (Giacomo della Chiesa), pope 69, 92, 331, 346, 392, 397, 412, 478f, 491, 517, 567
—and missions 557ff
Benedictines 271–283, 341
—in Australia 544
—in Belgium 114
—in East Africa 558
—in England 136
—founding of monasteries and congregations 271ff
—in Germany 495
Benedictines of St. Ottilien 530
—in East Africa 552
—in Korea 538
Benevento 7f
Benigni, Umberto 54, 83, 392, 469ff, 475, 478, 501f
Bennigsen, Rudolf von 33
Benson, E. W., archbishop of Canterbury 141f
Benziger, A. M., O. Carm., bishop 532
Benzler, W., O.S.B. abbot of Maria Laach 275
Berchtold, Austrian foreign secretary 51
Berdyaev, Nicolas 351
Bergson, Henri 101
Berlin trend 223, 477, 501
Bermyn, Alfons, vicar apostolic 535
Berne, canton 76, 78
Berne, V. 104
Bert, Paul 97, 100
Berthier, Joachim, O.P. 313
Bessarione, pubblicazione periodica di Studi Orientali 341
Bessière, P. 405
Bessieux 548
Bethmann Hollweg, Theobald von 496
Bettinger, Franz von, cardinal 499
Beuron, archabbey, O.S.B. 114, 266, 272
Beuron
—art academy 298, 300
—congregation, O.S.B. 273ff

Bianchi, Angelo, cardinal 390
Bible societies, Protestant 324
Bible translations 325f
Biblical Commission, Pontifical 330, 433, 456, 463
Biblical criticism 325f, 431, 458
—historical-literary 326ff
Biblical exegesis 254, 277, 432ff, 456, 465
"Biblical history" 325
Biblical Institute, Pontifical 277, 465
Biblical movement, Catholic 324
Biblical studies 325
Bielczewski, Jósef, archbishop of Lemberg 176
Bienvenu-Martin, J.-B. 510
Biermann, Benno, O.P. 573
Bigard, Jeanne 529
Bigard, Stéphanie 529
Bilio, L., cardinal 5f, 280
Billot, Louis, S.J. cardinal 252, 311, 312, 323, 327, 458, 470
Birot 460
Bishop, Edmund 448, 466
Bishops' appointments 416
Bismarck, Otto von 4, 12, 14f, 20, 22, 29ff, 32ff, 38, 40f, 43f, 56ff, 62ff, 67ff, 229, 240, 273, 282, 496, 530
Bitter, Rudolf 501
Blanc, vicar apostolic of Korea 537
Blanco, Guzmán, president of Venezuela 132
Blome, Gustav, count 204
Blondel, Maurice 248, 312, 317f, 431, 438, 450, 453, 457f, 512
Blum, Nikolaus, S.V.D. 282
Blum, Peter Joseph, bishop of Limburg 40, 66
Boccali, G. 68, 208
Bohemia 181f
Böhm, Dominikus 294, 305
Boisserée, Sulpiz 291f
Bojanowski, Edward 180
Bolívar, Simón 134
Bolivia 131
Bollandists 471
Bonatelli, Francesco 490
Bonaventure 312
Bone, H. 265
Bonghi, R. 86
Bonne Presse 105f
Bonner Bibel 477
Bonomelli, Geremia, bishop of Cremona 85f, 90, 276, 417, 424, 454, 471, 486, 490
Bonomi 486
Borneo 541
Borromeo encyclical 505f
Bosco, Giovanni 258
Boselli 491
Bosnia 45, 181ff, 517
—Serbian Orthodox exarchate 354
Bottini, L. 88
Boulanger, Georges 101
Bouquillon, Thomas 159
Bourdon, Hilaire, see Tyrrell, George
Bourget, J., bishop of Montreal 147
Bourget, Paul 101, 247
Bourne, Francis, cardinal 143, 447
Bouvier, P., S.J. 465
Boxer Rebellion 535
Boyer de Sainte-Suzanne, R. de 436
Brandi, S.J. 482
Brandts, Franz 204, 213, 222
Brauns, H. 231
Braunsberg controversy 32
Brazil 129ff
—orders and congregations 131
—state and Church 130f
Brazilian congregation O.S.B. 275
Breadbasket law (1875) 41
Bremond, Henri 437f, 445, 471
Brentano, Clemens 250
Breslau, bishopric 63
Bressan 390, 470
Brest, Union of 369
Breviary reform of Pius X 389, 410ff
Briand, Aristide 516
Brinkmann, Johannes Bernhard, bishop of Münster 40f, 66
British Empire, see Great Britain
Britten, James 138
Broglie, A.-T.-P. de 253
Brohée, A. 113
Brotherhood and Sisterhood of the Reconciliation 344
Brotherhood of the Blessed Virgin Mary (Poland) 177
Brück, H. 258
Bruckner, Anton 286
Brun, Lucien 102
Brunetière, Ferdinand 247, 250
Brüning, Heinrich 502
Buddhism 570
Budka, Niceta, bishop 344
Bukovina, Orthodox Church 346, 353
Bulgakov, Serge 351
Bulgaria 186f, 188
—orders and congregations 187
—Orthodox Church 346, 354ff
Bulgarians, Uniate 341, 372
Bulletin de la semaine 515
Bülow, Bernhard von, prince 385f, 494, 496, 518
Buonaiuti, Ernesto 450ff, 455, 462, 490
Burma, Christianization 533
Burnes-Jones, Edward 299
Busch, Clemens August 64
Busen, Hermann 305
Byzantine rite, Uniates of the 369ff

Cabrières, Anatole de, bishop of Montpellier 513
Cabrini, Francesca Saveria 151
Cabrol, O.S.B. 466
Cahensly, Peter Paul 151f, 160
Caillaux, Joseph 518

Cairo, synod of the Uniate Copts (1898) 374
Cajetan 310f
Calippe, Charles 104
Caloen, Gérard van, O.S.B. 131, 266, 272, 275
Cambon, Paul 99
Canada
—Anglo-Canadian Catholicism 148f
—anti-Jesuitism 149
—Catholic press 216
—Franco-Canadian Catholicism 147f
— — school controversy 148
—orders 148
Canalejas, J. 125
Canet, Louis 516
Canonica, senator 90
Canonizations 267
Canon law
—Pius X's codification 389, 394, 399ff
Canova, Andreas, O.F.M.Cap., vicar apostolic of Plovdiv-Sofia 187
Cánovas de Castillo, Antonio 4, 120ff, 124
Cantú, Cesare 89
Capecelatro, Alfonso, cardinal 90, 479, 490
Capéran, Louis 97, 106
Capital and labor 198, 203ff, 206
Capitalism 196ff, 203
Capponi, Gino 89
Caprivi, Leo von, count 494, 497
Capuchins 270, 341
—in Bulgaria 187
—in Dutch East India 541
—in Georgia 373
—on Guam 543
—in India 533
Cardauns, H. C. 429
Cardijn, J. 113
Carducci, Giosuè 248f
Caritas, relief activities 260
Carlists 119, 122f, 125
Carlos I, king of Portugal 126f
Carmelites 341
—in India 532, 568
Carmona, Antonio Oscar de Fragoso 127
Carnegie Endowment for International Peace 519
Caroline Islands 15, 20, 69, 71, 530
Caron, J. 475
Carpathian Ukrainians 183f
Carrera, president of Guatemala 133
Carrie, H. 553
Casanova y Estrada, archbishop in Guatemala 133
Casas, bishop of Plasencia 121
Casati, A. 490
Casetta, Francesco di Paola, cardinal 479
Casolani, Annetto 548
Casoni, G. B. 88
Castro, Cipriano 132
Catechetical societies 417
Catechism 324
—Pius X's 416f
Catechism, instruction 389, 416f
Catholic Action 389, 418, 472
Catholic Association 139
Catholic Boy Scouts 139
Catholic Confederation 139
Catholic conventions
—Austrian 49
—German 191f, 202
— — Frankfurt (1863) 232
— — Bamberg (1868) 285
— — Düsseldorf (1869) 229
— — Mainz (1871) 27
— — Aachen (1879) 211, 253
— — Cologne (1895) 231
— — Bonn (1900) 231
— — Essen (1906) 503
— — Mainz (1911) 230f
— — Metz (1913) 216
Catholic Evidence Guild 137
Catholicism
—Catholic press 215ff
—Catholic societies 212ff
—development in modern society 190ff
—image of the enemy 216ff
—marriage and family 208f
—position in the culture around the turn of the century 245ff
—scholarly works 252ff
— — see also Congresses
—school questions 209ff
—social theories 199ff
—see also Doctrine of property, Toleration, Ghetto Catholicism, and the various countries
Catholicisme social 191
Catholic League (France) 103
Catholic movement(s) 190, 219ff
—see also the various countries
Catholic People's Union (the Netherlands) 117
Catholic Social Association (Poland) 177
Catholic Social Guild 139
Catholic Truth Society 137
Catholic University of America 155, 159
Catholic Women's League 139
Catholic Young Men's Society of Great Britain 139
Cathrein, Viktor, S.J. 198
Cavagnis, Felice, cardinal 243
Cavallanti, A. 467
Cecilianism 294f
Center Party, German 12, 26ff, 33, 35f, 37f, 42f, 56f, 59ff, 193f, 213, 215f, 240, 381, 423, 496ff, 501, 518
—and Curia 59ff
—and Kulturkampf 62ff, 74
—and septennate controversy 71f
Central Africa 548
Cercles catholiques d'ouvriers 227
Cerna, president of Guatemala 133
Cerretti, B., cardinal 150, 491, 516
Cerutti 220

Chabot, Jean-Baptiste 465
Chaldeans, Uniate 341, 375ff
Chaminade, Buillaume Joseph 264
Chapon, Henri, bishop of Nice 516
Charity 259
Charles, Pierre, S.J. 574
Châteaubriand, François René Vicomte de 191, 246
Chatel, F. 403
Chesnelong, Charles 102
Chesterton, G. K. 146
Chiaudano, P. 479
Chiesa, Giacomo della, see Benedict XV
Chigi, Flavio, cardinal, nuncio 5
Childhood of Jesus 563
Chile 129f
China 23, 564, 568ff
—Christianization 534ff
Chlysty 348
Chmielowski, Adam 177
Chomjakov, Alexei 351
Chorale, see Gregorian chant
Christ Catholic Church of Switzerland 77
Christian Brothers (Brothers of the Christian Schools) 279, 341
Christian democracy 215, 224ff, 231f, 499ff
Christian Democratic League (Italy) 489
Christian philosophy 307ff
Christian Scientists 279, 341
Christian social doctrine 244
Christian Socialism 206, 242
Christian Socialist Party (Austria) 48, 200ff, 222
Christian trade unions (Germany) 213
—see also Trade-union controversy
Christi nomen, papal letter (1894) 339
Christlich-Pädagogische Blätter 417
Chronique du Sud-Est 104, 512
Chrysostomos Papadopulos, Orthodox archbishop of Athens 358
Chulalongkorn, king of Siam 533
Church architecture, see Architecture, ecclesiastical Church history 318ff
—journals 465
—theoretical concept at the time of Leo XIII 319ff
Church hymns 283
Church interior design 296ff
Church laws, Prussian 36f
Church music 283ff, 407ff
—controversy over church music 283ff
—reform under Pius X 389
Church of Chernovtsy 346, 354
Church of Karlowitz 346, 353f
Church of Sibiu 346, 353
Church union
—efforts toward unification with Orthodoxy 335ff
—journals in the service of unification with Orthodoxy 341f
Ciencia Cristiana 119
Ciencia tomista 122
Cigala, A. de 520
Circoli universitari cattolici (Italy) 87
Círculos Católicos Obreros (Spain) 124
Cittadino di Brescia 92
Ciudad de Dios 122
Civil marriage 39, 208
Civiltà cattolica 450f, 478, 479, 482, 518
Claret y Clará, Antonius Maria 264
Claudel, Paul 247
Clemenceau, Georges 516
Clemens, Franz Friedrich Jakob 313
Clement of Alexandria 310
Clergy, native, in missionary areas 261, 567f
Cleveland, Grover, president of the USA 13
Coalition, right of workers to form a 207, 223f
Coconnier, T. 313
Codex Iuris Canonici, see Canon law
Coenobium 454
Colapietra, R. 387
Collegio Pio latino-americano 127f
Collegium pro gente croatica 185
Cologne, archbishopric 66f
Cologne Cathedral 291f
Cologne event (1837) 250
Cologne trend 477, 501f
Colombia, separation of state and Church 132
Colomiatti, E. 400
Colonialism and mission 527
Combes, Émile 507ff
Comboni, Daniel 551
Comitati cattolici parrochiali 87
Comité Justice-Égalité 105
Comma johanneum 433
Commer, Ernst 313, 429, 457, 467
Communion 267
—for children 389, 404
—first 404
—frequent 389, 403ff
Community church 302ff
Communium rerum, encyclical (1909) 416
Comte, Auguste 134
Conaty, Thomas 158f
Conditae a Christo, constitution (1900) 283, 399
Confederación Nacional de los Círculos Católicos Obreros (Mexico) 134
Confédération des Syndicats chrétiens (Belgium) 112
Confédération Française des Travailleurs Chrétiens (CFTC), France 228
Conforti, Guido M., bishop of Parma 559, 562
Congo 566
—Christianization 548
Congregations
—of Bishops and Regulars 396f
—of the Consistory 397
—for the Eastern Churches 528
—for the Propagation of the Faith 396f

—of Religious 283
—of Rites 397
—of the Sacraments 397
Congregations (religious communities) 279, 282
—and canonizations 258
Congregation of St. Ottilien, O.S.B. 273
Congregation of the Immaculate Heart of Mary
—in Belgian Congo 549
Congregazioni di carità 86
Congresses, Catholic 191
—international Catholic scholars 254ff
Congress of Berlin (1878) 4, 187
Congruist law (1898) 47
Connelly, Cornelia 137
Consejo Nacional de las Corporaciones Obrero-Católicas (Spain) 124f
Conservative People's Party of Switzerland 82
Consolata missionaries 529
—in Kenya 552
Constantinople
—Armenian patriarchate 366f
—Orthodox patriarchate 358ff
— — and the Roman unification efforts 359
— — and the three smaller Orthodox patriarchal churches 360ff
Controversy over rites 565
Conventuals (O.F.M.C.) 270
—in Bulgaria 187
—in Rumania 186
Coppée, François 246
Cornelius, Peter von 297f
Cornely, Rudolf, S.J. 330
Cornoldi, G., S.J. 310
Corporations 203
Corpus Christi fraternities 259
Corpus Iuris Canonici 400
Corradini 518
Correspondance de Rome 54
Corrigan, Michael R., archbishop 156, 159ff, 164f, 333
Costa, Joaquín 248
Costantini, Celso 564, 566
Coullié, Pierre, cardinal 106, 515
Counter Reformation 28f
Crampon, C. 325
Crétinon, L. 104
Crispi, Francesco 15, 50, 73, 86
Critical Catholicism, see Reform Catholicism
Critical method 277, 420, 431ff
Croatian college 185
Croatians, Croatia 13, 182, 184
—orders and congregations 185
Crom, architect 293
Cronenberg, E. 230
Cros, L., S.J. 403
Csáky, Albin, count 52
Cuba, War of Independence 123
Cullen, Paul, cardinal 144, 149
Cultura sociale 93, 452
Culture examination 36f, 62, 63
Cum singulae, decree (1911) 401
Curia
—and Leo XIII's unification efforts 342
—reorganization by Pius X 389, 394ff
Curci, C. M. 86
Cybichowski, suffragan bishop of Gnesen 178
Cyprus 361
Cyril, Orthodox patriarch of Jerusalem 362
Cyril, Saint 336
Cyril II, Orthodox archbishop of Cyprus 361
Cyril IV, Coptic patriarch 365
Cyril V, Coptic patriarch 365
Cyril VIII Geha, Melchite patriarch 344, 372
Cyril Makarios, patriarch of the Uniate Copts 373
Cyril Mar Curilos, head of Jacobite Thomas Christians 364
Cyrion, patriarch of Georgia 353
Czechs 181

Dadolle, Pierre 515
Daens, A. 111ff
Dalmatia 183f, 345
—Orthodox Church 345
Damianos, Orthodox patriarch of Jerusalem 362
Dandoy, G. 569
Danilo I, Orthodox metropolitan of Cetinje 357
Danilo II, Orthodox metropolitan of Cetinje and prince of Montenegro 357
Dannecker, Johann Heinrich von 301
Dar es Salaam, bishops' conference (1912) 552f
Das neue Jahrhundert, journal of the German modernists 429
Daudet, Léon 520
Davis, Cushman C. 152
De Actione populari christiana seu democratico-christiana, instruction (1902) 234
Dechamps, Victor-Auguste, cardinal 108, 114, 261
Decurtins, Kaspar 80f, 82f, 200, 207, 457, 472
De fide catholica, constitution 5
Deharbe, Joseph, S.J. 417
Dehio, Georg 292
Dei providentis, motu proprio (1917) 346, 560
De Lai, Gaetano, cardinal 390, 397, 398, 401, 457
Delattre, A., S.J. 330, 333, 456
Delbos, V. 460
Delcassé, Théophile 509
Delehaye, Hippolyte, S.J. 322
Della Torre 390
Delle Piane 564
Demain 438
Demetrios II, Coptic patriarch 365
Democracy 233ff, 240ff, 420, 471ff
Denbigh, Earl of 139

Denifle, Heinrich, O.P. 314
Denis, Maurice 298f, 300
Denisovič, Stefan Anton, apostolic administrator of Mogilev 171
Depelchin, Henri, S.J. 554
Deploige 464
De quotidiana SS. Eucharistiae sumptione, decree (1905) 404f
Der Gral 428, 501
De Santi, A., S.J. 407ff
Desbuquois, P. 515
Desclée family 272
Descoqs, P., S.J. 316
Deshayes, F. 400
Deutscher Caritas-Verband 260
Deveuster, Damian 543
Díaz, Carmelita 133
Díaz, Porfirio, president of Mexico 133
Dietz, Peter E. 164
Dillon, E. J. 442
Dinder, Julius, archbishop of Gnesen-Posen 13, 74, 178
Dindinger, Johannes, O.M.I. 572
Diocesan prayer books 266
Dionysius V, metropolitan of the Thomas Christians 364
Dionysius VI, metropolitan of the Thomas Christians 364
Di Pietro, Angelo, cardinal 3, 71f, 128
Discalced friars 270
Disraeli, Benjamin 4, 139
Diuturnum illud, encyclical (1881) 20, 235, 237
Divino afflante Spiritu, encyclical (1943) 330
Divino afflatu, bull (1911) 411
Divinum illud munus, encyclical (1897) 340
Divus Thomas 311
Döbbing, Bernhard, O.F.M., bishop of Nepi and Sutri 415, 506
Doctrine, church 325, 438, 440, 457, 500, 502
—and theology 307ff
Doctrine of property 196ff, 203
—natural law and special property 196f
Dogmatic history 323, 434ff, 465
Dölger, Franz Joseph 465
Döllinger, Ignaz von 77, 322
Dominicans 275ff, 341, 568, 573
—in Annam 534
—and Bible exegesis 327ff
—and Catholic university, Fribourg 83f
—in China 535
—on Formosa 536
—in Japan 538
—in the Philippines 541
Dominican sisters, South Africa 555
Doutreloux, bishop of Liège 117f, 114, 229, 261, 337, 340
Dreyfus affair 106, 507f, 518
Drobe, Kaspar, bishop of Paderborn 65, 67
Drummond, Lister 137
Drumont, Édouard Jouard 106
Druses 372, 385, 361, 375
Duchesne, Louis 140f, 253, 256, 319, 322f, 390, 410, 431f, 448, 463, 471, 511f
Dukhobors 348
Duff, Alexander 571
Duhamel, J.-T. archbishop of Ottawa 148
Duilhé de Saint-Projet 254, 315
Dunajewski, Albin, cardinal 176
Dunin, Martin, archbishop of Gnesen-Posen 177
Duns Scotus 311
Dupanloup, Félix, bishop of Orléans 147
Duparquet, C. A. 553
Dupin, A. 462
Dupont, Joseph, S.M.A., bishop of Nyasa 554
Duport, Émile 103, 220
Dupront, A. 440
Durand, Louis 103, 220
Dusmet, Giuseppe Benedetto, O.S.B., cardinal 274, 337
Dutch East India 541
Dyroff, Adolf 429

Ea semper, bull 343
Eastern Churches, independent 335ff, 346ff, 367f
—Latinization 337f, 343
—Uniate 335ff, 346
East Marches Society 178
Eberhard, Matthias, bishop of Trier 40f
Échos d'Orient 372
École biblique, Jerusalem 329
École de Lyon 512
Ecuador 131ff
—state and Church 131ff
Editae saepe, encyclical (1910) 505f
Editio Leonina 277, 309f
Egger, Augustin 82
Ehrhard, Albert 54f, 254f, 322, 424, 426f, 428, 452, 461, 503
Ehrle, Franz, S.J., cardinal 307, 309, 312, 314f, 319, 410
Eichendorff, Joseph von 250
Eichhorn, R. 203
Eichmann, E. 429
Eigenmann, J. G. 553
Einsiedeln, abbey O.S.B. 77, 272
Eisenach Regulations 294
—civil marriage 133
Elementary school law 47
Elia, Pasquale d', S.J. 573
Elias XII Abolionan, patriarch of the Uniate Nestorians 375
Elias Mellus, Chaldean bishop of Accra 376
Elizabeth I, queen of Great Britain 140
Elliot, Walter 164, 332
Ellis, J. T. 156, 159
Emaus, abbey O.S.B. 273
Engelberg, monastery O.S.B. 77
Engels, E., see Tyrrell, George

Engels, Friedrich 229
English Church Union 140
English Ladies, in Rumania 186
Episcopate 41, 416f
—indigenous in missionary areas 561, 567f
Equal Rights Association (Canada) 149
Equal rights for women 209
Equatorial Africa, Christianization 548
Erdington, abbey O.S.B. 273
Erp, Baron d' 340
Erzberger, Matthias 496f, 499, 518
Eschatological school 434
Eskimos, Christianization 567
Estrada Cabrera, president of Guatemala 133
Estudios franciscanos 122
Ethiopians, Ethiopian Church 365f
—Uniate 374
Etschmiadzin, Armenian catholicate 366
Études 248
Études bibliques 329
Eucharist 267
—congregations and fraternities of 262
—frequent Communion 403ff
Eucharistic Children's Crusade 406f
Eucharistic congresses 192, 405f
—beginnings of the Eucharistic Congress movement 260f
—Avignon (1876) 260
—Favernay (Besançon)(1878) 261
—Lille (1881) 261
—Liège (1883) 261f
—Fribourg (1885) 261
—Paris (1888) 261
—Jerusalem (1893) 261, 337, 406
—Brussels (1898) 261
—Rome (1905) 404, 406
—Metz (1907) 406f
—Bogotá (1908) 132
—London (1908) 143, 406
—Cologne (1909) 406
—Montreal (1910) 149, 406f
—Madrid (1911) 125, 406f
—Vienna (1912) 406f
—La Valetta (Malta)(1913) 406
—Lourdes (1914) 406f
—Amsterdam (1924) 270, 262
Eucharistic triduum 405
Eucken, Rudolf 454
Evangelischer Bund (Germany) 75, 213
Evolutionism 321, 322, 431, 454
Exegesis, see Biblical exegesis
Expatriation law (1874) 39
Expressionism 299, 301
Ex quo, apostolic letter (1910) 344

Faith 458
Falconi 389
Falk, Adalbert 33f, 36, 38, 61
Family 200, 208
Fanna, Fidelis a 313
Farmers, associations 219f
Fascio democratico cristiano 94
Fascism and the Church 492f
Fathers of the Holy Cross
—in India 533
—in Portuguese West Africa 547
—on Madagascar 556
Faulhaber, Michael von, cardinal 500
Federer, Heinrich (Senex) 83
Feigenwinter, Ernst 80f
Felicitate quadam, constitution (1897) 270
Female labor 209
Feodorov, Leonid, exarch for Russia 370
Ferdinand I, tsar of Bulgaria 186
Férotin 466
Ferrari, Andrea, cardinal 468, 473
Ferrata, Domenico, cardinal 16, 22, 79, 102, 109, 114, 240, 520
Ferrini, Contardo 258, 490
Ferry, Jules 97, 101, 210
Fèvre, J. 385
Fiala, Friedrich, bishop of Basel-Solothurn 80
Filles de Notre-Dame 279
Fine, S.J. 479
Finke, Heinrich 429
First Communion 404
Fischer, Antonius, cardinal 499, 503f, 505, 506
Flandrin, Hippolyte 298
Fleming, P., O.F.M. 331, 433, 456
Flemish Christian People's Party (Belgium) 112
Fletcher, Philip 137
Florentini, Anton Krispin (Theodosius), O.F.M.Cap. 77, 232
Fogazzaro, Antonio 83, 248, 453f, 457, 490
Fonck, Leopold, S.J. 329
Fonsegrive-Lespinasse, G.-P. 247f
Fontaine, J., S.J. 433, 468
Fontes, Antonio Maria de 126
Forensen law (1894) 47
Förster, Heinrich, prince-bishop of Breslau 31, 40f
Fort Augustus (Scotland), abbey O.S.B. 273
Fortescue 466
Foucauld, Charles de 267, 546
Fournelle 225
Fracassini, Umberto 449f, 455, 462, 490
France 11, 13, 15, 24, 27, 29, 53f, 65, 193, 201f, 237ff, 239f, 242ff, 421, 465, 473, 497, 518, 522, 527
—anticlericalism 508ff
—anti-Semitism 106f, 218f
—Catholic associations 212
—Catholicism and nationalism 518
—Catholicism around the turn of the century 245f
—Catholic labor movement 226f
—Catholic press 216
—Catholics fail to reconcile with the Republic 96ff
—Catholic social movement 221f

—Catholic universities 252, 254
— — attempts and failure to reconcile (1892–99) 103ff
— — politics of reconciliation (1878–92) 100ff
— — republican Church policy 96ff
—charity 259
—Christian democracy 104ff
— — "second Christian democracy" 104
—Christian trade-union movement 228
—Church architecture 289ff, 295, 313
— — new art forms 305
—Church art 296f
—Church music 283
—clergy, episcopate, and laymen 98f
—de-Christianization 239
— — in the rural areas 257
—diocesan associations 516
—divorce (Loi Naquet) 97
—Eucharistic Congresses 260f
—integralism 477f
—missionary politics 530
—missionary societies 529f
—modernism 431f
—Neo-Thomism 315
—orders and religious associations 96f, 105f, 278, 507ff
—Ralliement, see Ralliement
—school question, school controversy 97, 100f, 210, 514
—secularization of public life 96
—separation of state and Church 107, 506ff
— — circumstances during the voting on the separation law (1899–1905) 507ff — — execution of the separation law (1906–24) 511ff
— — papal efforts toward unification 342f
— — Pius X and separation of state and Church 386
—state and Church 96ff, 507ff
Franchi, Alessandro, cardinal secretary of state 5f, 22, 56, 59, 68
Franciscans 316, 568, 573
—in Albania 188
—in Bolivia 131
—in Japan 538
—in Poland 174
—reorganization 270f
Franciscans, female, in Dutch East India 541
Franck, César 284
Franckenstein, Georg Arbogast von, baron 71
Franco-Prussian War 27
Franz I, emperor of Austria-Hungary 175
Franzelin, Johann Baptist S.J., cardinal
Franz Ferdinand, archduke of Austria-Este 51, 522
Franz Joseph I, emperor of Austria-Hungary 45, 47, 48f, 53f, 55f, 175, 274, 353, 387, 520ff
Freemasonry 24, 216ff, 263
—in the USA 160f
Freiburg im Breisgau, archbishopric 75
Freie Vereinigung katholischer Sozialpolitiker 207
Freitag, Anton, S.D.V. 573f
Frémont, G. 99, 460
Freppel, C.-E., bishop of Angers 108, 228, 236, 255
Frère-Orban 107ff, 114
Frères des Écoles chrétiennes 509
Fresco painting 297ff
Fribourg, canton 76
—university 252
Friedberg, Emil A. 36, 400
Friedrich, Caspar David 297f
Friedrich Wilhelm, crown prince of Prussia 58f
Friedrich Wilhelm IV, king of Prussia 291f
Frühwirth, Andreas, O.P., cardinal 276, 280f, 429, 504
Fuchs, Karl, S.J. 554
Führich, Johann 297
Funk, Franz Xaver von 322, 429
Funk, Philipp 429f
Fulda, bishopric 40f, 63, 65
Fulda memorandum (1872) 35f, 37
Furati, Filippo 227
Fustel de Coulenges 246

Gabet, P. 567
Galicia 175ff, 181, 345, 369
—development of Polish Catholicism under Austria 175ff
—Polish education 176
Galimberti, Luigi, cardinal 22, 57, 68f, 70ff, 339
Gallarati Scotti, T. 460, 490
Gallien, Carlo 337f
Gambetta, Léon 14, 96
García Moreno, Gabriel, president of Ecuador 132f
Gardaia, prefecture 546
Gardeil, Ambroise, O.P. 466
Garnie, Théodore 103f
Gasoni, Pius X's private secretary 390
Gasparri, Pietro, cardinal 92, 95, 142, 232, 253, 390, 398, 400ff, 403, 491
Gasquet, F. A., O.S.B. 141f
Gaudeau, B. 469f
Gaudí, Antonio 305
Gayraud, Hippolyte 104, 106, 219
Gemelli, Agostino, O.F.M. 464, 490
Geneva, canton 76, 78f
—Geneva question 12
—separation of state and Church 82
Génicot, E., S.J. 403
Gennari, Casimiro, cardinal 400, 403, 457
Genocchi, Giovanni 399, 449f, 453, 456, 464, 490
Georg V Surenian, Armenian catholicos 367
Georgia, Georgians
—orthodox Church 346, 352f
—Uniate 373, 377
George, Henry 156f, 164

Georgievski, Evlogi, Orthodox bishop 174, 349
Germania 215
German Idealism 317
German question 15
German Roman Catholic Central Society (USA) 153, 164
Germanos V, patriarch of Constantinople 359
Germanos Moakkad, Melchite archbishop of Baalbek 373
Germany, German Empire 12, 14, 20, 54, 56, 193, 201, 241, 243, 309, 421, 467, 517, 527
—antimodernist oath 464
—Catholicism and nationalism 517
—Catholicism around the turn of the century 250f
—Catholicism between the Kulturkampf and World War I 494
—Catholic labor associations 230f, 499ff
—Catholic labor movement 229ff
—Catholic press 215
—Catholic research around the turn of the century 253f
—Catholic social movement 219ff
— — farmers 220
— — middle class 221
—Catholic societies 212ff, 498
—charity 259
—Christian trade unions 229f
—Church architects 290ff
— — new art forms 305
—Church art 299f
—Church music 283f
—episcopal elections 495
—founding of the Empire (1871) 27
—industrialization 221
—Kulturkampf, see Kulturkampf
—liberalism 500
—missionary societies 529f
—modernism and integralism 476f
—nationalities in conflict in the eastern regions 177ff
—Neo-Thomism 313ff
—orders 278
—politics, Poland 177f
—Reform Catholicism 422ff
—school question 210
—State and Church 26ff
—state, Church, and school politics in the Prussian sector of Poland 177ff
—worship 257
Gesellenverein of A. Kolping 214, 221
Gezelle, Guido 115, 246
"Ghetto Catholicism" 10, 245
Gibbons, James, cardinal 152, 153ff, 156ff, 161ff, 163ff, 195, 331ff
Gibney, M. 150
Gies, Ludwig 300
Giner de los Ríos, Francisco 123
Gintovt, Kazimierz, archbishop of Mogilev 168
Gioberti, Vincenzo 8, 89
Giolitti, Giovanni 482, 486, 487, 488, 489, 492
Gisler, A. 83
Gismondi, P. 456
Gladstone, William Ewart 4, 13, 135, 139, 144ff
Glaire, Jean-Baptiste 325
Glass painting 298f
Gleich, Hermann 65
Glubovski, N. N. 351
Gneist, Rudolf 36
Gnesen-Posen, archbishopric 66f, 69, 73
Godts, P., C.S.S.R. 403
Goettsberger, Johannes 329
Goetz, Walter 14
Golubinsky, E. E. 351
Goluchowski, Agenor, count 175
Gonin, L., premier of Quebec 149
Gonin, M. 104
González, Ceferino, bishop of Córdoba 124
González, Joaquín V. 130
Goossens, Pierre-Lambert, cardinal 109, 112f, 114f, 261
Görres, Johann Joseph von 89, 253, 291f
Görres-Gesellschaft 75, 253, 255, 291f
Gortšakov Alexander, prince 167
Goßler, Gustav von 63, 72
Gothic architecture 290ff
Gotti, Antonio, O.Carm.Disc., cardinal 381ff
Gounod, Charles 284
Goyau, Georges 191, 573
Grabmann, Martin 312f, 314f
Graduals 287f, 409
Grande munus christiani nominis propagandi, encyclical (1880) 336
Grandmaison, Léonce de, S.J. 437, 440, 463, 466
Grand Orient, lodge
—in Canada 149
Gran Oriente Lusitano Unido, Portuguese Freemason lodge 126
Grauert, Hermann von 250, 255, 320, 424f, 429
Graves de communi, encyclical (1901) 21, 95, 233f, 242
Gravissimo officio, encyclical (1906) 514
Great Britain 13f, 135, 194, 386, 421, 527
—Anglo-Catholics 139f
—Catholicism around the turn of the century 245
—Catholic self-consciousness 135ff
—Catholic societies 139
—Church art 299
—dockworkers' strike (1889) 138
—missionary policies 531
—modernism 441ff
—orders 279
—orders and the secular clergy 137
—problem of unification of the Roman Catholic and the Anglican Church 139ff
—religious instruction 143
—religious liberalism 442

—school system, school question 136, 143, 211f
—social question 135, 138ff
—trade unions 138f
Greece 186, 188f
—Orthodox Church 346, 354, 357f
—state and Church 357
Greeks, Uniate 341, 372
Gregorian chant (chorale) 284f, 286ff, 407ff
Gregorian Society (Netherlands) 286
Gregorios, patriarch of Constantinople 335
Gregory I the Great, pope 18, 413
Gregory IV, patriarch of Antioch 361
Gregory IX, pope 18
Gregory XIII, pope 376
Gregory XVI, pope 7f, 11, 144
Gregory II Jessef Sayyur, Melchite patriarch 336, 338, 372
Greith, Karl Johann, bishop of St. Gall 76, 80
Grenier, J., S.J. 147
Greving, J. 320
Grillparzer, Franz 249
Gröber, Adolf 497
Grosoli, Giovanni, count 88, 473, 483
Grottaferrata, Basilian abbey 372
Gruber, H. J., S.J. 218
Gruscha, Anton Joseph, cardinal, prince-archbishop of Vienna 46, 48, 200
Guadalupe, place of pilgrimage in Mexico 133
Guatemala 133f
Guépin, abbot O.S.B. 411
Guéranger, Prosper Louis Pascal, O.S.B. 266, 271, 275, 287
Guevara, archbishop of Venezuela 132
Guichard, V. 96
Guilbert, bishop of Bordeaux 99
Guilds 19
Gul, Gerhard, Old Catholic bishop of Utrecht 175
Gundlach, Gustav, S.J. 203, 207
Gurlitt, Cornelius 302
Gutberlet, Konstantin 313

Haberl, Franz Xaver 287, 409
Habsburg, House of 28f
Hacks, Charles 218f
Haerent animo, exhortation (1908) 414
Haffner, Paul Leopold, bishop of Mainz 75, 251, 313
Hagen, Johann Georg, S.J. 254
Hagg, John, Maronite patriarch 339
Hague, peace conference (1899) 20
Hahn-Hahn Ida, countess 214
Halifax, Charles Wood 140ff, 340
Halka-Ledóchowski, see Ledóchowski
Haller, Michael 284
Handel-Mazzetti, Enrica von 54, 83, 249
Hannington, Anglican bishop in Uganda 551
Hansjakob, Heinrich 251
Harmel, Léon 222f, 228, 478
Harnack, Adolf von 433f, 450
Harrison, Benjamin, president of the USA 159f
Hartmann, Anastasius, bishop 574
Hartmann, F. von, archbishop of Cologne 213
Hayward, Fernand 11
Hébert, Marcel 431f
Hecker, Isaac Thomas 155, 332, 423
Hefele, Karl Joseph von, bishop of Rottenburg 45, 322
Heiler, F. 438
Heiligkreuz 282
Heinrich, Johann Baptist 313
Helfert, J. A. von 253
Helleputte, G. 111, 113, 220, 229
Hemptinne, Hildebrand de, O.S.B. 114, 274
Henninghaus, A. vicar apostolic 536
Herbart, Johann Friedrich 417
Herder, Johann Gottfried von 250
Hergenröther, Joseph, cardinal 280, 318
Herrera Restrepo, archbishop of Bogotá 132
Herriot, É. 516
Herrmann, Alois 45
Hertling, Georg von 206, 223, 250, 253, 255, 314, 424, 497, 498
Herzegovina 45
Herzog, Eduard 78f
Herzog, G. 462
Herzog, Robert, prince-bishop of Breslau 65
Hesse-Darmstadt
—Kulturkampf 44, 75
—school question 219
Hettinger, Franz 313, 500
Heylen, bishop of Namur 403
Hierotheos II, patriarch of Alexandria 360
Hinduism 569
Hinschius, Paul 36
Hintze Ribeiro 126
Hirscher, Johann Baptist 75, 423
Hispanidad 248
Historical method 431ff
Historisch-Politische Blätter 502
Hittorf, Jakob Ignaz 290
Hitze, Franz 204f, 213, 222, 230f
Hlinka, Andrej 183
Hochland 83, 252, 427f, 501f, 502f
Hofbauer, Klemens Maria, C.S.S.R. 258
Hofmannsthal, Hugo von 249
Hogan, John 414
Hohenlohe-Schillingsfürst, Gustav Adolf zu, prince cardinal 34f, 61, 64, 494, 497
Hohoff, Wilhelm 205
Holbein, Hans 297
Holnstein, count 58
Holy Family, devotion 265f
Holy Ghost Fathers 529
—in East Africa 552
—in Equatorial Africa 548
—in Germany 494
—in West Africa 547
Holy Scriptures 325, 457f

—see also Biblical exegesis
Holy Synod 347ff
Holzer, Karl Josef 65
Hoonacker, A. van 330
Hopkins, G. M., S.J. 146
Hort, F. J. A. 325
Höting, Bernhard, bishop of Osnabrück 65
Houtin, Albert 431, 436, 450
Huayek, Elias Peter, patriarch of the Uniate Maronites 339, 375
Hübner, Joseph Alexander, baron 49
Hübsch, Heinrich 294
Huby, P. 465
Hudal, Alois 520
Hüffer, H. 255
Hügel, Friedrich von 424, 429, 436, 442ff, 447f, 453, 455, 463
Hugo, Victor 147, 246, 290
Hülskamp, Franz 251
Hulst, Maurice d' 104, 253ff, 279, 315, 323f, 327, 331, 511
Human rights 199, 236
Humanum genus, encyclical (1884) 148, 160, 217
Humbeeck, van 108
Humboldt, Wilhelm von 250
Hummelauer, Franz von, S.J. 329f, 331
Hungary 13, 181f
—Kulturkampf 51f
—liturgy 51f
—Magyarization politics 183
—Orthodox Church 353ff
—religious instruction 183
—Uniate Ruthenians 370
—Uniates 345, 371f
Hunt, William Holman 299
Huonder, Anton, S.J. 571
Hussarek, Max von 47, 50
Huvelin, Abbé 444

Iconography, Christian 297
Iglesia Católica Filipina Independiente 540f
Iglesias, Pablo 120
Ignatius XXXVI Ebd' Allah III, Jacobite patriarch 364
Ignatius XXXVI Peter III, Jacobite patriarch 363f
Ignatius Ephraem II Rachmani 374
Il fermo proposito, encyclical (1905) 418, 482, 485
Il Rinnovamento 454, 490
Il Trust 473f
Immanence and transcendence 316f
Immanence apologetics 457
Immanentism 458ff
Immigrants, pastoral care of 151f
Immortale Dei, encyclical (1885) 196f, 235
Imperialism 522ff, 501ff
Inaugural encyclical of Pius X 388
Index Commission 463
Index (Congregation) 397f, 425, 429
India 568ff
—Church 532ff
Indians (American), mission 567f
Indigenization of the mission churches 561ff
Infallibility, dogma of 26f, 32f, 35, 37, 41
Ingres, Jean A. D. 298
Innocent III, pope 18ff
Innocent VI, pope 307
Inscrutabili Dei, encyclical (1878) 18
Inspiration 326ff, 440, 457
Instaurare omnia in Christo, motto of Pius X 389
Institut Catholique, Paris 315, 433, 468
Institut Catholique, Toulouse 435
Institut des Belles Lettres Arabes 569
Institute of Oriental Studies, Pontifical 346
Institut für Missionswissenschaft, Münster 465
Instituts catholiques 252
Institut supérieur de philosophie 315
In suprema, apostolic letter (1882) 337
In suprema Petri Apostoli Sede, encyclical (1848) 335
Integralism 254, 466
Internal mission 260
International mission conference, Edinburgh (1910) 571
Internationales Institut für missionswissenschaftliche Forschungen 572
Inter pastoralis officii, motu proprio (1903) 288
Intransigents (Italy) 89ff, 92, 448, 487
Ireland 13f, 135, 142, 237, 386
—Home Rule 145
—"revival" 245
—state and Church 144ff
Ireland, John, archbishop of St. Paul 123, 152ff, 158ff, 163, 164, 332f, 423
Irish College, Rome 145
Irish question 144ff
Islam 527
—in Africa 545f
Isoard, Monsignor 410
Istituto cattolico internazionale per il progresso delle scienze 256
Istria 183
Italian People's Party 489, 491
Italian question 14
Italo-Albanians 372f
Italo-Greeks 372f
Italy 14, 15, 20, 29f, 44, 49f, 54f, 65, 193, 240f, 245, 381, 421, 442, 497, 518, 573
—anticlericalism 84f
—antimodernist oath 463f
—Catholic Action 493
—Catholic Church and Fascism 492f
—Catholicism around the turn of the century 248f
— — and liberalism 486ff
— — and nationalism 518f
—Catholic movement 86ff, 91f, 94f, 219, 473, 481ff, 484f
—Catholic press 472f
—Catholics between the Vatican and the Quirinal 84ff

—Catholic worker societies 226, 232
—charity 259
—Christian democracy 93f, 449
—Christian syndicalism 488
—Church architecture 292
—Church art 298
—Church music 287
—civil marriage 84
—Freemasonic liberalism 84f
—industrialization 91
—militant Catholicism 86
—missionary societies 529
—modernism 442, 448ff
— — and Christian democrats 449
—national Eucharistic Congresses 261
—orders 84, 278
—priests, training, and reform of seminaries 414f
—religious instruction 84
—Roman question, see Roman question
—school question 210f
—secularization 84, 86
—social conventions 91
—socialism 90f, 487
— — and Catholicism 493
—social legislation 485
—state and Church 482
Iucunda sane accidit, encyclical (1904) 413, 455
Izvolsky, Alexander 342

Jacini, Stefano 90, 454, 463
Jacobini, Ludovico, cardinal secretary of state 22f, 60f, 64, 67, 70ff, 120, 121
Jacobites 363
—and the Thomas Christians 364f
—Uniate 374
Jaer, Gustave de 110
Jammes, Francis 246
Jandel, V. A., O.P. 275
Janiszewski, suffragan bishop of Posen 178
Jann, Adelhelm, O.F.M.Cap. 574
Jannsens, L., O.S.B. 333, 456
Jansenism 420
Janssen, Arnold, S.V.D. 118, 281, 529
Janssen, Johannes 320
Japan 564, 570
—Christianization 537f
Jaurès, Jean-Léon 510ff
Javouhey 548
Jeiler, Ignatius 313
Jerusalem
—Armenian patriarchate 367
—Orthodox patriarchate 362f
Jesuit law (1872) 35, 498
Jesuits 28f, 35f, 277f, 312, 316, 341, 390, 392, 427, 433, 568
—activities in education 211
—in Albania 188
—and "Americanism" 333
—in Australia 544
—in Belgium 113
—and Biblical exegesis 327ff
—in Bulgaria 187
—in Canada 149
—in China 535
—in the Congo 113, 550
—and devotion to the Sacred Heart 263
—in Dutch East India 541
—in England 136
—in France 97f, 248, 473
—and frequent Communion 403
—in Germany 494
—in Guatemala 133
—in India 532, 569
—and integralism 478ff
—in Japan 538f
—in Latin America 127
—in the Philippines 541
—in Poland 176f
—in Portugal 127
—in Portuguese East Africa 553
—in Rhodesia 554
—in Rumania 186
—in South Africa 555
—in Spain 122
—in the United States of America 158
—theory of inspiration 327ff
Jeunesse ouvrière chrétienne (Belgium) 113
Joachim III, patriarch of Constantinople 356, 359
Joan of Arc 518
Jogand-Pagés, Gabriel 217f
Johanns, P. 569
John IV, emperor of Ethiopia 366f
John XXIII, pope 343
John Chrysostom 344
John Papadopulos 372
Jonah, Nestorian bishop of Sunurgan and Urmia 363
Jonckx 469
Jonnart, Célestin 516
Jordan, Johann Baptist 113, 280f, 291
Jörg, Edmund 194
Joseph, Bulgarian Orthodox exarch 356
Joseph, devotion to 265
Joseph II, Austrian emperor 130
Joseph II Audo, patriarch of the Uniate Nestorians 336, 375f
Josephinism 55
Jounel, Monsignor 407
Juárez, Benito 133
Julien, André, bishop of Arras 516
Jung, Johann Baptist 81, 232

Kálnoky, count 52f, 65
Kant, Immanuel 250, 315
Kappeyne 116
Kaptere, N. F. 351
Karl I, king of Württemberg 44
Kasprowicz, Jan 249
Katchadar Chirojan, Armenian catholicos 367
Katechetische Blätter 417
Katechetische Monatsschrift 417

Katharina von Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen 271
Katholieke Staatspartij (the Netherlands) 116f
Katholische Kaufmännische Vereinigung (Germany) 214
Katzer, Friedrich Xaver, archbishop of Milwaukee 161, 334
Kaufmann, F. 470
Keane, John, Archbishop of Dubuque 153f, 155, 163, 164f, 313, 333f
Kehr, Paul 319
Keiling, L. A. 553
Keller, Émile 102
Kentiger-Milne, prior O.S.B. 273
Keppler, Paul Wilhelm, bishop of Rottenburg 428, 500f
Keßler, Joseph Aloysius, bishop of Tiraspol (Saratov) 169
Ketteler, Wilhelm Emanuel, bishop of Mainz 27, 30f, 33, 36, 75, 205, 223, 229
Kidana Maryam Kassa, bishop of Asmara 374
Kiefl, Franz Xaver 238, 427, 463
Kiev, monastery in cave 351
Kilger, Laurenz, O.S.B. 574
Kirsch, Johann Peter 465
Kißling, J. B. 258
Kitsch, religious 259f
Kittel, Rudolf 326
Klarenbeekse Club 118
Klein, Félix 332ff, 434
Klein, Karl, bishop of Limburg 73
Kleutgen, Joseph, S.J. 314
Kluczyński, Vincenty, archbishop of Mogilev 171
Knabenbauer, Joseph, S.J. 330
Knights of Columbus (USA) 161
Knights of Labor (USA) 161f
Knights of St. John (USA) 161
Knoblecher, Ignaz 548
Kolb, Viktor, S.J. 48
Kölnische Volkszeitung 215, 501f
Kolping, Adolf 214, 221
Konrad von Parzham 258
Kopp, Georg, cardinal 38f, 69f, 72f, 179, 231, 282, 382, 496f, 498f, 501, 503ff, 505f
Korea, Christianization 537
Korošec, Anton 184
Korum, Michael Felix, bishop of Trier 65f, 70, 73, 75, 193, 213, 218, 231, 273, 424, 499, 501, 503
Kowalski, Jan Maria 174f, 264
Kozielsko-Puzyna, Jan, prince-bishop of Cracow 176
Kozowska, Felicja 174, 264
Kralik, Richard von 428, 501f
Kraus, Franz Xaver 65, 239, 254, 321f, 424ff
Krek, Janez 184
Krementz, Philipp, bishop of Ermland 31, 34, 44, 66, 69f, 499
Kuefstein, Franz, count 202f, 204f, 207
Kugler, Franz Xaver 254, 291
Kulm, bishopric 73
Kulturkampf 12, 15f, 26ff, 177f, 201, 236
—assessment 74
—conclusion 55ff
—first moderation law (1880) 58, 62ff
—meeting in Kissingen (1878) 59, 61
—second moderation law (1882) 58, 63
—settlement 70ff
—third moderation law (1883) 58, 63f
Kutschker, Johann Rudolf, cardinal 46
Kyriale 409

Laaf, social chaplain 230
Laberthonnière, Lucien 248, 318, 439f, 450, 457, 471, 512
Labor movement 21, 74, 194, 204, 206, 209, 221f, 223ff, 230, 233, 499ff, 505
—see Social question and Social movement
Laboré, J. A., O.P. 276f
Labour Party 139
Lachat, bishop of Basel-Solothurn 78f
Lachmann, Karl 329
Lacordaire, Henri-Dominique 89
La Croix 103, 105f, 216
Lacroix, Lucien, bishop of Tarentaise 462, 463
La Démocratie chrétienne 104f
Laetitae sanctae, encyclical (1893) 263
Laflèche, bishop of Trois-Rivières 147
Lagrange, Albert-Marie-Henri (religious: Marie-Joseph) 255, 277, 323, 329ff, 333, 388, 432, 435, 437, 450, 456, 471, 512
Lahitton, J. 413
La Justice sociale 104
La lega Lombarda 90
Lambruschini, Luigi, cardinal secretary of state 7, 89
Lamennais, Jean-Marie de 109
Lamentabili sane exitu, decree (1907) 457f, 464
Lampertico 90
Lamy, Étienne 104, 105
Langbehn, Julius 428, 500
Langénieux, Benedict Maria, cardinal 261, 338, 339f
Lanzoni, Francesco 455
Laos 534
La Quinzaine 247, 515
La rassegna nazionale 487
Larroca, J. M., O.P. 275
La Sapinière, see Sodalitium Pianum
Las Casas 573
Lasker, Eduard 35
La sociologie catholique 105
Lateran treaties (1929) 493
Latin America 12, 127ff, 193
—failure of religious regeneration 134
—Freemasons 217
—orders and congregations 128
—Plenary Council in Rome (1899) 128f
—social question 129
Latour du Pin, R. 207

Latreille, André 516
Laurier, Wilfred, prime minister of Canada 148
Lausanne, canton 76
La Vérité 103
Lavigerie, Charles de, cardinal 101f, 530, 546f, 550
Law regarding the administration of diocesan property (1876), Germany 42
Law regarding the administration of property owned by Catholic congregations (1875), Germany 42f
Law regarding the administration of suspended bishoprics (1874), Germany 39
Law regarding the ecclesiastical property of the Old Catholic parishes (1875), Germany 42
Lay apostolate 418ff
Lay catechists 416f
Lay missal 114
Lazarists 35, 341
—in Bulgaria 372
—in China 535
—on Madagascar 556
Leagues of the Most Sacred Heart 405
Lebbe, Vincent 537
Le Bien Public 108, 113, 216
Lebon, J. 465
Lebreton, P. J. 463, 465
Lecanuet 104
Leclercq, Henri, O.S.B. 466
L'Eco di Bergamo 92
Le Coq d'Armandville, J. F., S.J. 542
Ledóchowska, Maria Theresia 529
Ledóchowski, Miecislaus Halka von, cardinal 3, 13, 29, 40f, 67, 69, 152, 178f, 181, 339, 479
Lega democratica nazionale 489f
Legislation, ecclesiastical, see Canon law
Leguía, A. 131
Lehmkuhl, Augustin, S.J. 225
Leister, P. 405
Lemire, Jules Auguste 104, 385, 512
Lemius, P. J., O.M.I. 458
Lemmi, Andriano 216f
Lemmonnyer 466
Lenormant, François 326, 511
Lenz, Desiderius, O.S.B. 298, 299
Leo I, the Great, pope 18
Leo XII (Annibale della Genga), pope 5, 6
Leo XIII (Vincenzo Gioacchino Pecci), Pope 3ff, 6ff, 49f, 52f, 64, 67ff, 73, 79, 82, 84ff, 88, 93, 94f, 100ff, 107, 108ff, 116, 119ff, 126ff, 132f, 136ff, 143f, 148, 151, 160f, 165, 176, 183, 188, 190ff, 195f, 200f, 205, 208, 210, 214f, 217, 224ff, 233, 235ff, 242, 244f, 247f, 252ff, 261, 262ff, 268, 270, 273ff, 276ff, 311, 315f, 319, 321, 333, 337ff, 359, 375, 382, 384, 391, 394, 395, 399, 402, 406, 407
—Aeterni Patris 307ff
—and "Americanism" 334
—and Bible exegesis, Bible question 331f, 431f
—bishop of Perugia 8f
—camerlengo of Pius IX 9
—and the China mission 535f
—and the Church in Canada 147ff
—and the Church in Colombia 131
—and the Church in Croatia 184f
—and the Church in Ecuador 132
—and the Church in Great Britain 135ff, 140ff
—and the Church in Mexico 133f
—and the Church in the Philippines 540
—and Church policy in Belgium 107ff
—and Church policy in France 100ff
—and Church policy in the Netherlands 115
—and Church policy in Spain 119ff
—and the Church in the Polish territories 171ff
—and the Church in Russia 166ff
—and the Church in the USA 150ff, 156f
—and Démocratie chrétienne 234f, 241
—education 6
—and the Italian question 14
—and the Latin American Church 127
— — Latin American Plenary Council (1899) 128f
—and the Latinization of the Uniate Eastern Churches 377
—missionary activities 527f, 559
—nuncio in Belgium 7
—"opportuniste sacré" 14
—orders and congregations 270ff
—piety 23
—and the Prussian Kulturkampf 15, 55ff, 178
—Ralliement policy, see Ralliement
—and the reform of the breviary 412
—reorganization of the orders 270ff
—and the Roman question 15ff
—social doctrine 11
— — see also Rerum novarum
—and the Uniate Churches 368ff
—and the union of the Anglican Churches 140ff
—unification efforts regarding the Eastern Churches 16f, 335ff, 341ff
—and worship during his pontificate 257ff
Leo Gesellschaft 253
Leopold I, king of Belgium 8
Leopold II, king of Belgium 110, 549f
Leopoldinen-Stiftung, Vienna 529
Lepidi, A., O.P. 333
Le Play, Fréderic 200, 222
Leray, Joseph, vicar apostolic of the Gilbert Islands 543
Lerolle, J. 515
Le Roy, Édouard 439ff, 450, 466
Le Saulchoir 466
Le Sillon, Sillonism 212, 228, 387, 419, 420, 424, 472, 473ff, 512f, 519
Lesser Sunda Islands 541
Lessing, Gotthold Ephraim 250f

Levroux, Alejandro 125
Liberalism 521, 26f, 32f, 35, 74, 194ff, 199, 420, 500
—see also the various countries
"Liberal Protestantism" 421
Liberatore, Matteo, S.J. 197f, 208, 312
Liberia, Christianization 546
Libermann, Franz Maria Paul 548
Libertas, encyclical (1888) 195, 237
Lieber, Ernst Maria 234, 496
Liechtenstein, Alois, prince 45f, 202
Lienbacher, Georg 45
Lievens, Konstantin, S.J. 533
Ligue Démocratique Belge 111f
Ligue des catholiques français pour la paix 519
Ligue internationale des pacifistes catholiques 519f
Likowski, Edward, archbishop of Gnesen-Posen 180
Lille, Catholic university 252
Limburg, bishopric 73
Linse, Leo, O.S.B. 273
Lintelo, Jules 406
Lippert, Peter 479
"Literary controversy" 250, 427
Lith, Franciscus van 542
Liturgical history 465
Liturgical movement 114, 406f, 412
—and Church architecture 302ff
Liturgical renovation 258
Liturgical utensils 300, 302
Liturgy 265ff
—Eastern rites 338f
—history 302ff
—in mission countries 570
Litzinger 230
Livingstone, David 550
Livinhac, Léon, M.A. 551
Llandaff, Lord 140
Loë, Felix von 35, 213
L'Œuvre d'Orient 341
Loi Naquet (Magnet Law) 97
Loisy, Alfred 327, 332, 431, 432ff, 440f, 442f, 450, 453, 456ff, 459f, 463, 466, 511
Longinqua Oceani spatia, apostolic letter (1895) 165, 196
Lorenzelli, Benedetto, cardinal 390
Lorenzi, Philipp de 65
Lotte, Joseph 515
Loubet, Émile 106, 510
Lourdel, Siméon 551
Louvain, Catholic University of 8, 114f, 252, 254, 311, 315
Löwenstein, Karl zu, prince 192, 202f, 207, 211, 217f, 479
Luca, Antoniono de, cardinal 310, 321
Lucerne, canton 76
Luçon, cardinal 475
Ludwig I, king of Bavaria 271, 357
Ludwigs-Missionsverein, Munich 529
Lueger, Karl 46, 48
Luis I, king of Portugal 126
Luise, G. de 399
L'Univers 103
Lüthen, B. 281
Luther, Martin 386
Lutz, Johann, baron 33, 35, 44f
Luxemburg
—associations and societies 111
—toward conservatism 118f
—orders and congregations 111
—religious instruction 119
—school question 118f
—socialism 119
Lwanga, Charles 551
Lynch, J. J., archbishop of Toronto 148, 163
Lyon, Catholic university 252
Lyon Missionaries 341
—in Africa 550
—in Liberia 547
—in South Africa 555

Maas, Otto, O.E.M. 572
Maasbode 117, 216
MacCabe, cardinal 144f
Macdonald, John A., prime minister of Canada 148
Macedonia 188, 356, 359
—vicariate apostolic 372
McGlynn, Edward 164
Machado, Domingos, O.S.B., archabbot 131
Mackau, Armand 103
McKinley 123
MacMahon, Patrice Maurice, French president 3
McNicholas, J. T., archbishop of Cincinnati 164
McQuaid, Bernard J., bishop of Rochester 156, 159, 161
Madagascar, Christianization 556
Maffi, cardinal 458, 478, 490
Maier, F. 477
Maignen, Charles 156, 333, 334, 472f
Mainz, Catholic Society 40
Makarios I, Orthodox archbishop of Cyprus 361
Malabars, Uniate 375ff
Malay Peninsula, Christianization 533
Mâle, Émile 292
Malebranche, Nicolas de 317
Mallinckrodt, Hermann von 27, 29
Manacorda, E., bishop of Fossano 89
Manchuria 565
Mandonnet, P. 313
Manna, Paolo, P.I.M.E. 562
Manning, Henry Edward, cardinal 3, 49, 135ff, 139f, 207, 279
Manteuffel, Edwin von 75
Manzoni, Alessandro 90, 248f
Marango, Hyacinth 372
Marchiafava 520f
Maredsous, abbey O.S.B. 114, 131, 266, 272
Margiotta, Domenico 218

María Cristina, queen of Spain 122
Maria Laach, abbey O.S.B. 275, 300
Marian Congregation 264
Marian congresses 264
Marianistes de Sainte-Croix 264
Marianists (Societas Mariae) 264
—in Japan 538
Mariannhill 556
Mariannhill missionaries 530, 556
—in East Africa 552
Maria-Stein, monastery 78
Mariavites 174f, 264
Marie du Sacré- Coeur, Mère 279
Marilley, Étienne, bishop of Lausanne-Geneva 76, 78f
Mariology 264
Marion-Brésillac, de 548
Marists, in the central Pacific 543
Maritain, Jacques 253
Mark VIII, Coptic patriarch 365
Markiewicz, Bronislaw 177
Marlé, R. 438
Marochetti, Carlo de 302
Maronite College, Rome 341
Maronites, Uniate 374f, 377
Marriage and family 208f
Martin, Konrad, bishop of Paderborn 40f
Martín, Luis, general S.J. 277
Martin, Thérèse, see Thérèse of Lisieux
Martina, G. 393
Martinelli, Sebastiano, Aug.Er., cardinal 158, 160
Marwitz, von der, bishop of Kulm 40
Marx, Karl 204f, 229
Mary, devotion to 257, 263
Masad, Paul, patriarch of the Uniate Maronites
Mass 266
Matiussi, P. 479
Matthew, abuna of the Ethiopian Church 366
Mauri, cardinal 270
Maurras, Charles 146, 212, 246, 248, 476, 520
Maus 470
Mausbach, Josef 313
Maximam gravissimamque, encyclical (1924) 516
Maxima quedem, decree (1910) 401
Maximilian, prince of Saxon 345
Maximos III Mazlum, Melchite patriarch of Antioch 372
Maximum illud, apostolic letter (1919) 559, 560, 561
Mayeur, J.- M. 460, 513
May laws 36ff, 41f, 57f, 61
—moderation laws 62ff
Mazzella, Camillo, S.J., cardinal 142, 192 208, 311ff, 315, 333, 433
Meda, Filippo 88, 92, 93, 491, 518
Medicaea 287f
Medici, Fernando, cardinal 287
Mediterranean entente (1887) 69
Mehrerau, monastery O.Cist. 279
Meignan, Guillaume René, cardinal 99
Meinertz, Max 465
Mejer, Otto 36
Melchers, Paulus, archbishop of Cologne 29, 32, 40f, 60, 66f, 69, 281
Melchites 360f
—Uniate 341, 372
Meletios II Doûmanî, patriarch of Antioch 361
Méline, Jules 104
Mellaerts 220
Méndez Medina, Alfredo 134
Menelik II, emperor of Ethiopia 366f, 374
Menéndez y Pelayo, Marcelino 123f
Menzingen, college 77
Mercati, Giovanni 410
Mercier, Désiré, cardinal 113, 115, 311, 315f, 412, 447, 451, 462f, 471, 478
Merkle, Sebastian 10, 207, 426, 429, 430
Mermillod, Gaspard, cardinal 78f, 82, 208, 261
Merry del Val, Raphael, cardinal secretary of state 83, 113, 142, 333, 391f, 400, 408f, 414, 470, 482, 484, 503f, 520f, 522
Methodius, St. 336
Metten, Abbey O.S.B. 272
Mexico
—orders and congregations 133
—state and Church 133f
Michael, Emil, S.J. 258
Michael (Mihailo), Serbian Orthodox Metropolitan 356
Michelis, Friedrich 32
Mickiewicz, Adam 177
Middle class
—Catholic associations 221ff
Middle East, national Churches 361f
Miglietti, Charles 469
Mignot, Eudoxe Irénée, archbishop of Albi 414, 433, 436, 452, 455, 460f, 463
Milan Missionaries, in India 533
Militia of Christ for Social Service, Catholic trade union in the USA 164
Millais, John 299
Millet system 358f, 367
Mill Hill Missionaries
—in Central Africa 552
—in India 533
—in New Zealand 544
—in the Philippines 541
Minocchi, Salvatore 450ff, 461
Miquel, Johannes von 35
Mirae caritatis, encyclical (1902) 262, 403
Mironescu, Athanasios, Rumanian metropolitan 355
Missal reform 389, 411f
Missal translations 266
Missiology 266
Missionaries of La Salette
—on Madagascar 556

Missionarinnen vom Heiligsten Herzen 151
Missionary associations 528
Missionary seminaries 562
Missionary societies 529
Missionnaires de Notre-Dame de La Salette 264
Missions
—and World War I 557ff
—colonialism and the mission 527ff, 557f
—exhibition 563
—expansions from the time of Leo XIII until World War II 527ff
—history 574
—independence of the new Churches 557ff, 561ff
—indigenization, accomodation, adaptation 561ff, 568f
—theory 574f
Missionsvereinigung katholischer Frauen und Jungfrauen 529
Mistral, Gabriele 134
Mivart, St. George 443
"Mivartism" 443
Mocquereau, André, O.S.B. 408f
Modernism 54, 254, 386, 387, 420ff, 500, 502
—condemnation (1907) 455ff
—in France 431ff, 449
—in Germany 421ff
—in Great Britain 441ff
—intervention by the ecclesiastical authorities and integralistic reaction 455ff
—in Italy 448ff
Möhler, Johann Adam 310
Molokans 348
Moller, H. 118
Monachism 564
Monasteries, Russian Orthodox 351
Monetti, P. G. 478
Mongolian mission 535
Monophysites 363ff, 368
Monsabré, Louis Jacques Marie, O.P. 218f, 276
Montalembert, Charles René Forbes 89
Mont-César, abbey 114
Monte Cassino, congregation O.S.B. 274, 300
Montel-Treuenfest, Johannes von 49, 55, 68
Montenegro 186, 188
—Orthodox Church 346, 354, 357
Montfort Fathers, in Liberia 547
Montini, G. 92
Moral theology 278
Moran, P. F., cardinal 149f
Moreau, Joseph, S. J. 554
Moreno, cardinal 120
Moreno y Díaz, E., Aug.Er., bishop of Pasto 132
Moravia 182f
Morris, William 299
Moser, Karl 305
Moufang, Franz Christoph Ignaz 60, 75, 223
Mtesa, king of Uganda 551
Muhammed Ali 360, 365
Mühler, Heinrich von, Prussian minister of religious affairs 29, 31, 32f
Müller, Adam 202
Müller, Josef 422, 425, 427
Multum ad movendos animos, brief (1870) 285
Mun, Albert de 101ff, 112, 124, 201, 206ff, 212, 223, 227ff, 236, 239, 478, 512
Munich catechetical method 417
Murri, Romolo 92, 93, 95, 212, 384, 387, 420, 451f, 455, 472f, 484, 489f
Mussolini, Benito 492f
Mutel, vicar apostolic of Korea 537
Muth, Carl 83, 250, 252, 427, 429, 501f

Nagel, F. X., archbishop of Vienna 48
Namszanowski, Franz Adolf, bishop, ordinary to the Prussian army 34
Napoleon III 290
Natal, Christianization 556
National Conference of Catholic Trade-Unionists 139
National Education Association (USA) 159
National liberalism 26ff, 32ff, 37, 39, 43, 422
Naudet, Paul 104
Navarre, L.-A. 544
Nazarenes 259, 297
Near East
—Leo XIII's unification efforts and Latinization 336ff
Nègre, Abbé 304
Neo-Gothic 293ff
—sculpture 301f
"Neo-Guelphs" 89
Neo-Scholasticism 244, 252f, 307ff, 311ff, 316, 320, 425, 427
Neo-Thomism 276, 311ff, 464
Nestorians 362f
—Uniate 375
Ne temere, marriage decree (1907) 170, 401
Netherlands 241, 243
—Catholicism and liberalism 115ff
—Catholic labor movement 117, 229, 231
—Catholic press 216
—Catholic social movement 220f
—Church music 286
—toward conservatism 115ff
—and missions 566
—orders 115, 118
—school question 115f, 117, 210
—social question 116f
—state constitution (1848) 115
Neto, cardinal 126
Neue Zeitschrift für Missionswissenschaft 574
Newman, John Henry, cardinal 89, 135f, 322f, 437,
New Zealand, Christianization 544
Niederbronn Sisters 282
Nietzsche, Friedrich 250
Nikanor, patriarch of Alexandria 360
Nikel, Johann Simon 465
Nikita, king of Montenegro 357

Nikolai, Orthodox bishop of Warsaw 174
Nicholas I, tsar of Russia 367
Nicholas II, tsar of Russia 168ff, 172f, 344ff, 367, 369
—toleration edict (1905) 348
Nijmegen, Catholic University of 118
Nina, Lorenzo, cardinal secretary of state 22, 59, 108
Nobilissima Gallorum gens, apostolic letter (1884) 15, 18
Noble and Most Holy Order of the Knights of Labor (USA) 161f
Nocedal 119ff, 124, 147
Nolde, Emil 301
Non expedit 240, 248, 493
—at the time of Leo XIII 84f, 91f
—at the time of Pius X, Benedict XV, and Pius XI until 1925 481ff
Non sine moerore, letter 86
Norfolk, Duke of 145
Nos quidem, brief (1901) 287
Nothomb, Belgian prime minister 8
Notre consolation, apostolic letter (1892) 237, 239
Núñez, R., president of Colombia 132

Oberdörffer, chaplain 213
Oblates of Mary Immaculate 529
—in Basutoland 555
—among the Eskimos 567
—in German South West Africa 555
—in Natal 556
Observants 270
O'Connell, Denis Joseph 152, 155, 160, 163, 165, 332
O'Connell, William H., cardinal 166
Octobri mense, encyclical (1891) 263
Odescalchi, Carlo, cardinal, S.J. 7
Œuvre des cercles catholiques d'ouvriers 201, 223
Officiorum ac munerum, constitution (1897) 330, 399
Officium divinum, see Breviary
O'Gorman, prefect of the English congregation O.S.B. 274
Ohm, Thomas, O.S.B. 573
Oksza-Stablewski, Florian, archbishop of Gnesen-Posen 179f, 494
Old Catholics, Old Catholic Church 28, 32, 42
Oldenburg 44
Olinda (Brazil), abbey and congregation O.S.B. 131, 275
Ollé-Laprune, Léon 318
Ontologists 8
Opera Bonomelli 453
Opera dei Congressi e dei Comitati Cattolici 84, 87f, 94ff, 214, 220, 226, 235, 240, 242, 387f, 419, 449, 452, 482ff, 501
Optatissimae, motu proprio (1895)
Orbin, Johann Baptist, archbishop of Freiburg 75
Orders, law regarding (1875) 41
Orders and congregations 269ff, 282f, 333, 389
—and canonizations 258
—in France 508
—in the Philippines 539f
—in Prussia 66, 70, 73
—see also the various countries
Oreglia, L., cardinal 5, 236, 390
Oriens christianus 341
Orientalium dignitas, brief (1894) 339, 343
Orientis Catholici, motu proprio (1917) 346
Orlando 491
Orthodox Church of the South Indian Thomas, Christians, see Thomas Christians
Ortynski, Stephan Soter, vicar apostolic 343
Osnabrück, bishopric 40, 63f
Osservatore cattolico 86, 88, 92
Otto I, king of Greece 357
Otto, Hubert, vicar apostolic 536
Ottoman Empire, see Turkey
Our Lady's Nurses of the Poor (Australia) 150
Overbeck, Johann Friedrich 297
Ozanam, Frédéric 87

Pacca, B. cardinal 7
Pacelli, Eugenio, see Pius XII
Pacific, missions 542ff
Pacifism 518f
Paderborn, bishopric 63f
Paes, Sidonio 127
Pagan missions, see Missions
Paganuzzi, G. B. 88, 94, 391, 484
Palestrina, Pierluigi da 284
Pállfy, count 521f
Pallotti, Vinzenz 258
Pallottines 280, 529
—Australia 150, 544
—Cameroon 547, 558
—Poland 177
Pallottines (female), in Cameroon 547
Palmieri, D., S.J. 311
Pan-Slavism 13, 166, 337, 348
Papacy 17ff, 27f, 340
Papal election 53f, 394
—(1878) 3ff
—(1903) 381ff
—Bismarck's telegram (1872) 41
Papal State 14ff, 28f, 65, 72, 86
Papal work for the propagation of the faith 566
Papini, Giovanni 490
Paredis, Johannes Augustus, bishop of Roermond 118
Paris, university 252f
Paris Missionaries 570
—in Annam 534
—in China 535
—in Japan 537
—in Korea 537

—in Tibet 536
Parker, Matthew 140
Parkinson, H. 139
Parocchi, Lucido Maria, cardinal 218, 261, 280, 331
Parti satholique (Belgium) 111, 113
Partido Socialista Obrero Español 120
Parties
—Catholic parties in a democracy 238f
Partito Popolare Italiano 84, 489
Pascal, Blaise 312
Pascendi dominici gregis, encyclical (1907) 54, 170, 256, 420, 429, 441, 447, 453, 455, 458, 464, 490, 513
Passavich, S.J. 482
Passionists
—in Bulgaria 187
—in Rumania 186
Pastor, Ludwig von 256, 319f, 424, 501, 502, 503
Pastor aeternus, constitution (1870) 22, 121, 336
Pastoral work 413ff
Pastor Bonus 311
Patmore, C. K. 146
Patriarchal conferences (1894) 339f
Patrizi, Constantino, cardinal 156
Patrizi, Francesco Saverio, S.J. 310
Patrology 324, 465
Patronate
—Portuguese (Padroado) in India 126
—Spanish in Chile 130
Patto Gentiloni 488f
Paul VI, pope 399
Paulinists 373
Paulists 334
Paul V Peter XIII, Armenian patriarch 377
Paulusverein 230
Pecci, Giuseppe, S.J., cardinal 6, 277, 278, 310
Pecci, Lodovico, father of Leo XIII 6
Pecci, Vincenzo Gioacchino, see Leo XIII
Pedemonte, Emmanuele, S.J. 548
Pedro II, emperor of Brazil 130f
Péguy, Charles 247
Pelczar, Jozef Sebastian, bishop of Przemysl 176f
Penitentiary 398
Pentateuch, criticism 277, 329
People's sovereignty (imperium populare) 235
Périer, president of France 22
Périn, Charles 107, 109, 199, 205
Perosi, Lorenzo 407
Perpetual Adoration 262
Perraud, Adolphe, cardinal 102, 435
Perret, Auguste 304
Perrone, G. 310
Perroni, F. 453
Personalism 316
Peru 131f
—civil marriage 131
Perugia, bishopric 8f
Pesch, Christian, S.J. 467
Pesch, Tilmann, S.J. 254
Pescini, Pius X's private secretary 390
Peter I, the Great, tsar of Russia 347, 357
Peter III, Orthodox metropolitan of Cetinje 357
Peter IV Garaigiry, Melchite patriarch 372
Peter VIII, Coptic patriarch 365
Petre, Maud 442f, 448
Petrone 490
Petrus-Claver-Sodalität 529
Pezzani, H. M. 400
Pfanner, Franz, O.C.R. 529, 556
Pfeiffer, P. 281
Pforr, Franz 308
Philip Argus, Syrian patriarch 336
Philippines
—Church around the turn of the century 539f
—separation of state and Church 540
Philosophisches Jahrbuch der Görres-Gesellschaft 311
Philosophy 277
—and theology 309
Photios, patriarch of Alexandria 360
Piacenza 411f
Pia Società dei Missionari di S. Carlo per gli Italiani emigranti 151
Picard, François 337
Picpus Fathers, in the eastern Pacific 543
Pidal, Alejandro 122
Pie, Louis Édouard, cardinal 101, 384
Pieper, August 213, 222
Piffl, Friedrich Gustav, cardinal 48, 54, 479
Pignatelli di Belmonte, Granita, nuncio in Vienna 54f
Pillet, A. 400
Piou, Jacques 103
Pious Union for the Communion of Children 405f
Pitra, Jean-B., O.S.B., cardinal 236, 321
Pius IV, pope 464
Pius V, pope 18
Pius VII, pope 3
Pius IX (Giovanni Maria Mastai-Ferretti), pope
—and missions 527
—and the Prussian-German Kulturkampf 38
—unification efforts 335
Pius X (Giuseppe Melchiorre Sarto), pope 10, 51f, 53f, 83, 84, 90, 113, 114, 117f, 124, 127, 128f, 166, 187, 227, 230, 256, 261, 277, 283, 288, 314, 321, 330, 359, 369f, 374, 377, 381ff, 407ff, 435, 451, 457, 463, 468, 469, 473, 477, 479ff, 489f, 495, 500ff, 510, 513, 515, 517, 519, 522, 530, 536f, 542
—canonization (1954)
—characteristics 383ff
—career 383
—and catechism instruction
—and the Catholic movement in Italy 481

—and Christian democracy 387f
—and Christian society 477f
—and the Church in Poland 173
—and the Church in the Philippines 541
—and Church music 407ff
—and Church policy in Germany 495ff
—codex reform 399ff
—conservative reformism 383ff, 481ff
—Eucharistic decrees 403ff, 407
—and the German Center Party 504f
—and German Reform Catholicism 428f
—and the German trade-union controversy 505f
—and integralism 467ff
—and the lay apostolate 417ff
—and Le Sillon 474f
—liturgical renewal 407, 413ff
—missal reform 411f
—missionary activities 528, 530, 556f, 559
—and modernism 455ff
—and Non expedit 481ff
—and pacifist tendencies 519
—pastoral improvements 413ff
—and politics 387
—and Protestantism 386
—reform of the breviary 409ff
—reform of the Curia 394ff
—reform work 394ff
—and the Roman question 481ff
—and the separation of state and Church in France 507ff
—and the Triple Alliance 522
—unification efforts regarding the Eastern Churches 343ff
—and World War I 519ff
Pius XI (Achille Ratti), pope 24, 244, 322, 516, 562ff, 567
—and missions 557ff
Pius XII (Eugenio Pacelli), pope 69, 275, 401, 523, 568
Pius Society 48, 220
Planque, Augustin, M.A. 550
Plater, C., S.I. 139
Plater-Zyberk, Cecylia, countess 173
Pobedonostsev, Constantin Petrovich, Russian chief procurator 167ff, 170, 347
Podechard, E. 330
Pohle, Josef 160, 313
Poland 13f, 30, 166ff, 170, 181, 386
—Catholicism around the turn of the century 249
—Catholicism in 1914 in the three Polish territories 171ff
—Catholic press 180
—Church and the German state in the Prussian part of Poland 177ff
—Church development in the three territories 171ff
— — in Galicia 175ff
— — in the Prussian area 177ff
— — in the Russian area 178ff, 172ff
—education in Galicia 176
—national consciousness and Catholic faith 180
—orders and congregations 173ff, 180
—religious instruction 173, 179
—school question 173, 179
—social question 177
—Uniates 173ff
Poels, H. 117
Poor Clares 271
Popiel, Vincenty Teophil, archbishop of Warsaw 168
Popoff, Raphael 372
Popolari 493
Portal, Fernand, C. M. 140ff, 340
Portugal 12, 193, 386
—Church between revolution and reaction 126f
—orders and congregations 126f, 278
—Padroado in Asia 551f
— — in East and West Africa 553
—religious instruction 127
—state and Church 126f
— — separation of state and Church 127
Portuguese College in Rome 126
Portuguese East Africa, Christianization 553
Portuguese West Africa, Christianization 553
Positivism 315
—in Mexico 134
Pothier, J., O.S.B., abbot 287, 408
Potocki, Alfred, count 175
Pottier, A. 111, 229
Poulat, É. 392f, 420, 436, 459, 468, 469, 470, 478
Powderly, Terence 161, 162
Praeclara gratulationis, apostolic letter (1894) 24, 217, 338f
Prat, Ferdinand, S. J. 329, 331, 465
Premonstratensians
—in Belgian Congo 550
—in Brazil 131
Pre-Raphaelites 299
Press, Catholic 214ff
Prezzolini 490
Priests
—education 413ff
—seminaries 413ff
Primacy, papal 41, 141
Profit-sharing, workers' 201
Progress, human 9
Propagation of the faith, see Missions
Proske, Karl 284
Protestantism 386
Provida matris, brief (1895) 340
Providentissimus Deus, encyclical (1893) 328f, 432, 433
Prussia
—Center Party 57, see also Center Party
—Church policy 32ff
—civil marriage 73
—conservatives 57
—Jesuits, prohibition of 73
—Kulturkampf 26ff

—orders 66, 72, 73
—politics, Poland 177f
—school question 210
—social democracy 58
—separation of state and Church 32, 41, 60
—state, Church sovereignty 73
—state, school supervision 73
—see also Germany, Kulturkampf
Przegląd Powszechny 176, 278
Przyluski, Leo von, archbishop of Gnesen-Posen 177
Psalter reform 410f
Psychology 315
Pugin, A. W. N. 292
Puppey-Girard, Abbé 222
Puttkamer, Robert von 61, 72
Puvis de Chavannes, Pierre Cecil 297
Puzyna, cardinal 53, 176, 382
Python, Georges 82

Quadragesimo anno, encyclical (1931) 207
Quadrotta, G. 453
Quamquam plures, encyclical (1889) 264
Quam singulari, decree (1910) 405
Quaracchi, Collegio di S. Bonaventura 312
Quemadmodum, decree (1890) 403
Quidquid consilii, apostolic letter (1908) 344
Quod Apostolici muneris, encyclical (1878) 197, 237, 242
Quod numquam, encyclical (1875) 41
Quo efficacius, instruction (1920) 561

Rački, Franjo 184
Radini Tedeschi, G., bishop of Bergamo 88, 95
Raiffeisen, Friedrich Wilhelm 220
Raimundi, Giovanni Battista 287
Ralliement, Ralliement politics 16, 17f, 107f, 105, 147, 201, 227, 234, 237, 239, 242, 332, 507
Rambler Group, England 442
Rambouillet, Abbé 323
Rampolla, Mariano, cardinal secretary of state 13, 15, 19, 22f, 48, 50, 52f, 67, 74, 92, 105, 121ff, 126, 141, 152, 161, 185, 200, 215, 234, 242, 256, 331, 339, 381ff, 392, 510
Raphael 297
Ratzinger, Georg 500
Rauscher, Joseph Otmar von, cardinal 46
Razón y Fé 122f, 278
Recherches de science religieuse 466
Recollects 270
Redemptorists 39, 278, 341
—in Belgian Congo 550
—in Germany 494
—in Poland 174, 177
Redner, Leo, bishop of Kulm 73
Reform Catholicism 421, 461, 500
Reichensperger, August 192, 291
Reichensperger, Peter 27, 30, 33
Religious freedom 195
Religious history 465
Religious instruction 32, 43, 210
—law regarding teachers (1888) 47
—see also the various countries
Religious studies 421, 425, 449
Renaissance, journal 442, 427
Renan, Ernest 99
Rende, di nuncio 101
Renouveau catholique 246, 248
Rensi, G. 454
Rerum Ecclesiae, encyclical (1926) 563
Rerum novarum, encyclical (1891) 19, 21, 88, 91, 95, 102, 111, 124, 163f, 177, 195, 197, 203, 206f, 208f, 224, 234, 242
Respighe, Pietro, cardinal 95
Resurrectionists 172
—in Bulgaria 372
Reuß, prince 61
Revelation 327
Revertera-Salandra, Friedrich, count 12, 16, 51, 202, 343
Revista popular 122
Revolution 237
Revue bénédictine (Messager des fidèles) 272
Revue biblique 329, 331, 432, 433, 471
Revue de l'Orient chrétien 341
Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques 466
Revue d'histoire et de littérature religieuse 433
Revue du clergé français 433
Revue moderniste internationale 463
Revue néo-scolastique de philosophie 311, 315
Revue Thomiste 311, 313
Reyes, Rafael 132
Reymont, Wladyslaw 173
Rezzara, L. 88, 95
Ribot, Alexandre 106
Ricci, Matteo 573
Richard de la Vergne, F.M.B., cardinal 333, 435
Richelmy, cardinal 479
Richter, Ludwig 297
Ridel, Felix-Clair, vicar apostolic of Korea 537
Riezler, Kurt 496
Rila, monastery 356
Rinnovamento, Milan 424, 457, 463
Rio Branco, Baron 131
Ripon, lord 140
Risorgimento 449
Ritter, baron 521
Rivista di filosofia neoscolastica 311, 464
Rivista internazionale di scienze sociali 200, 490f
Rivista storico-critica delle scienze teologiche 450
Rocco, Chaldean bishop 376
Rocco, A. 493
Roeren, Hermann 501
Rogier, A. 107
Roma e l'Oriente 345
Roman Catholic Clerical College, St. Petersburg 169, 171

Roman question 15ff, 18, 21, 58, 65, 85f, 90, 93f, 149, 192, 248, 384, 491, 493, 518
—and Italian Catholicism 481
Romanticism 250
Rome, the Holy City 5, 17
—diocese 394
Rommerskirchen, Johannes, O.M.I. 572
Roosevelt, Theodore 165
Roothaan, Joachim Philipp, general S.J. 546
Ropp, Eduard Baron von, bishop of Tiraspol (Saratov), after 1904 of Vilnius 169
Roquefeuil, Robert de 212
Rosary (prayer) 257, 263
Rosebery, lord 143
Rosegger, Peter 249
Rosmini-Serbati, Antonio 89, 249, 453
Rossetti, Dante Gabriel 299
Rössler, A., C.S.S.R. 427
Rossum, Willem van, C.S.S.R. 559, 562
Rota Romana 397
Rouault, Georges 301
Ruchonnet, Swiss president 82
Rudigier, Franz Joseph, bishop of Linz 47
Rudolf, archduke of Austria-Hungary 54
Rumania 183f
—monastic life, Orthodox 355
—orders and congregations 186f
—Orthodox Church 346, 354f
Rumanians, Uniate 371, 377
Ruskin, John 299
Russia 12, 53, 173, 187, 340, 346, 381, 386, 522, 527, 531
—agreement with the Vatican (1882) 167
—belief and toleration edict (1905) 169
—Catholic Church in the Russian Empire 166
—Church and state 347
—denominational and religious groups 168
—obstacles for the Catholic Church after 1906 170
—Old believers 169
—Russification measures employed against Catholics and Uniates 167, 169
—situation of the Uniates 166, 170, 370
—state church 166
Russian Orthodox Church 347
—National Council to Reform the Church (Moscow 1917/18) 352
—900th anniversary of Russia's Christianization 348
—organization and institutions 350
—restoration of the patriarchate 351
Ruthenian College, Rome 370
Ruthenians, Uniate 343, 369, 377
Rutten 229
Ryan, John 163
Ryllo, Maximillian, S.J. 548

Sabatier, Auguste 431
Sabatier, Paul 443, 463
Sabatier, S. 459
Sabler, C. V., chief procurator 170, 350
Sacchetti, G. 420
Sacerdotes Sanctissimi Sacramenti (S.S.S.) 262
Sacra congregatio negotiis religiosorum sodalium praeposita 283
Sacra Congregatio pro Ecclesia Orientali 346
Sacraments 440, 458
Sacred Heart devotion 259
—consecration of mankind to the Sacred Heart (1899, 1900) 26, 262
Sacred Heart priests (missionaries) 552
—in Adamaua 547
—in Belgian Congo 550
—in Dutch East India 541
—in New Guinea 544
—in the Philippines 541
—in the western Pacific 543f
Sacrifice of the Mass 262, 265f
Sacrorum antistitum, motu proprio (1910) 170, 463
Saepe numero, apostolic letter 322f
Sagasta 121
Sahut, Abbé 105
Sailer, Michael, bishop of Regensburg 284
Saint Anselmo, College of 274f, 337
St. Benedict, Rio de Janeiro, abbey O.S.B. 275
St. Gall, canton 76
St. Luke Fraternity 297
St. Matthias, Trier, abbey O.S.B. 273
St. Meinrad, Indiana, abbey O.S.B. 272
St. Ottilien, abbey O.S.B. 273
St. Raphael Society for the Protection of German Emigrants 151
St. Vincent, Pennsylvania, abbey O.S.B. 272
Sala, J. A., cardinal 7
Salama, abuna of the Ethiopian Church 366
Salesians 279, 341
—in India 533
Salisbury, lord 140
Saltet, L. 462
Salvadori, Giulio 490
Salvatorians 280
—in Belgium 113
Salvien, P., A.A., 469f
Salzburg, University of 253
Samassa, Josef, cardinal 50, 53
Sancha y Hervas, cardinal 124
Sancta Dei Civitas, encyclical (1880) 528
Sand, George 247
San Felice, cardinal 114
Sangnier, Marc 212, 473ff, 511, 513
Santi, S. J. 482
Sanvito, J. M., O.P. 275
Sapieha, F. A. 401
Sapientiae christianae, encyclical (1890) 214, 239
Sapienti consilio, constitution (1906) 166, 397f, 401
Sardi, Monsignor 458
Sarmiento, Domingo 129f
Sartiaux, F. 437
Sarto, Giuseppe, see Pius X
Satis cognitum, encyclical (1896) 340

Satolli, Francesco, cardinal 158, 161, 164ff, 310, 316, 331, 333
Sauer, Joseph 429
Saveriani 529
Savigny, Karl Friedrich 501
Savoy, Italian dynasty 90
Saxon
—Kulturkampf 44, 75
Scalabrini, G. B., bishop of Piacenza 90, 151f
Schaepman, A. J., archbishop of Utrecht 118
Schaepman, H. J. M. 116f
Schäzler, Constantin von 313, 314, 324
Scheeben, Matthias Joseph 313
Scheicher, Josef 54, 200
Scheiwiler, Alois, bishop of St. Gall 81
Schell, Herman 54, 219, 254, 313, 317, 332, 424ff, 428f, 457, 503
Scherer, Theresa, mother superior 77
Scherer-Boccard, Theodor 77
Scheut Fathers
—in Belgian Congo 549
—in the Philippines 541
Schiffini, S., S.J. 311
Schilling, Dorotheus, O.F.M. 573
Schindler, Franz Martin 54, 200, 203, 254
Schings, Joseph 230
Schinkel, Karl Friedrich 295, 298
Schlegel, Friedrich 250, 297
Schleiermacher, Friedrich E. D. 431
Schlözer, Kurd von 64f, 68, 71
Schmid, Christoph von 325
Schmidlin, Joseph 8, 11, 465, 571ff
Schmidt, Wilhelm, S.V.D. 465, 573
Schmidt-Rottluff, Karl 301
Schmid von Grüneck, bishop of Chur 83
Schnitzer, Joseph 461
Schnorr von Carolsfeld 297
Schnürer, Gustav 83
Scholasticism 307ff
—Scholastic renaissance 8
Schönborn, Franz, cardinal 48, 200
Schönburg-Hartenstein, prince 392
Schönerer, Georg Ritter von 46
School law, Baden (1868) 33
School question 209ff
—see also the various countries
School supervision law, Prussia (1872) 33f
Schorlemer-Alst, Burghard von 220f
Schott, Anselm, O.S.B. 114, 266
Schraudolph, Johann 298
Schroeder, Joseph 159f
Schubert, Franz 284
Schulien, Michael, S.V.D. 574
Schulte, Karl Joseph, cardinal 205
Schweizerische Kirchenzeitung 77
Schweizerischer Arbeiterbund 81f
Schweizerischer Katholikenverein 81
Schweizerischer Pius-Verein 77, 81
Schweizerischer Studentenverein 77
Schwer, Wilhelm 11
Scotland 135
Scotton 94
Sculpture, Church 301
Secco Suardo, D. 391
Seckau, abbey O.S.B. 273
Secretariat of State, papal 397, 398
Segesser, Philipp Anton 80
Segna, Francesco, cardinal 331, 390
Ségur, Gaston de 261, 403
Semaines de Missiologie (since 1922) 572
Semaines religieuses 98
Semaines sociales 512, 515
Sembratovitch Sylvester, cardinal 370
Semeria, Giovanni 451, 453, 454, 464, 490
Semimodernism 467
Seminaries 413ff
Senestréy, Ignaz von, bishop of Regensburg 72
Senex, see Federer, Heinrich
Separation of state and Church, see the individual countries
Septennate controversy 71f, 74, 240, 496
Serbia 181ff, 187ff, 517, 521ff
—Orthodox Church 346, 354, 356
—state and Church 356
Serbian Church of Karlowitz 346, 353
Sermon 389
Sertillanges, Antonin Gilbert, O.P. 253, 440
Servants of the Most Blessed Virgin Mary (Poland) 180
Seumois, A. 575
Shintoism 539
Siam, Christianization 533
Sickel, T. von 319
Sickenberger, Joseph 329, 429
Sickenberger, O. 427
Sienkiewicz, Henryk 173, 249
Siglo de Oro 123
Siglo futuro 119, 124, 147, 216
Sillonism, Sillonists, see Le Sillon
Simeoni, Giovanni, cardinal 145, 163, 310
Simon IX Benjamin, Nestorian catholicos 363
Simon XX Paul, Nestorian catholicos 363
Singulari quadam, encyclical (1912) 164, 477, 506f
Siri, cardinal 451
Sis (Cicilia), Armenian patriarchate (catholicate) 367
Sisters, associations of (in Japan) 538
Sisters of Charity, in Dutch East India 542
Sisters of Mercy of St. Charles Borromeo 282
Sisters of Mercy of the Holy Cross 77, 282
Sisters of our Lady of Sion, in Rumania 186
Sisters of Perpetual Adoration 262
—in Great Britain 137
Sisters of St. Joseph (Australia) 150
Sisters of the Archangel Michael 177
Sisters of the Child Jesus, in Great Britain 137
Sisters of the Holy Family, in Basutoland 555
Sisters of the Sacred Heart 158

Sisters of the Society of Jesus, Mary, and Joseph 542
Six, Paul 104
Sixtus V, pope 395, 399
Skoptsy 348
Slavonia 183
Slavs
—Catholicism until 1914 166ff
—in the Habsburg Monarchy 181ff
—Uniate 341f, 345
Slovaks 181f
Slovenes 13, 182, 183
Smedt, Charles de, S.J. 322
Smet de Naeyer, M. de 113
Smissen, van der 110
Snikers, bishop of Amsterdam 261
Sobornost, doctrine 362
Social democracy 43, 46, 213, 243
—see also the various countries
Social doctrine
—Catholic 224
—Church 11, 21
— — see also Rerum novarum
Socialism 198, 205, 241, 244
—Christian 420
Socialismo cattolico 453
Socialist law (1878) 35, 58, 60
"Social kingdom" 203f
Social movement, Catholic 453
—see also Labor movement and the various countries
Social philosophy, Neo-Scholastic 244f
Social question 191, 192f, 208
—see also the various countries
Società della Gioventù cattolica italiana 86
Società operaie cattoliche 200
Società S. Raffaele 151
Societas Divini Salvatoris (S.D.S.), see Salvatorians
Societas Mariae 264
Societas Verbi Divini (S.V.D.), see Steyl missionaries
Société Gratry pour le maintien de la paix entre les nations 519
Societies, Catholic 191, 212
Society for Christian Culture 429
"Society for the advancement of religion and culture" (Krausgesellschaft) 425
"Society of German Catholics" 35
Society of St. Jerome for the Propagation of the Holy Gospel 331
Society of the Divine Word, see Steyl missionaries
Sodalitium Pianum 469ff
Soden, Hermann von 325
Soderini, count 207
Sokolski, Joseph, Archbishop 372
Soler, Mariano, archbishop of Montevideo 128
Solesmes 266, 271, 284, 287, 407ff
—Gregorian chant 284, 288, 407ff
Solothurn, canton 78
Soloviev, Vladimir 341, 351
Solovki, monastery 351
Sommerwerck, Wilhelm, bishop of Hildesheim 40
Sonnenschein, Carl 227
Sons of the Immaculate Heart of Mary 264
Sophronios, Orthodox archbishop of Cyprus 361
Sophronios IV, patriarch of Alexandria 360
Soubirous, Bernadette 258
Soufflot, Jacques 290
South Africa 565
South America 566
Southeast Europe
—Catholicism 1914 186ff
—Orthodox Churches 354ff
South Slavic question 184
Spahn, Martin 427, 429
Spahn, Peter 497
Spain 12f, 20, 54, 193, 240, 245, 248, 386, 574
—Catholic labor movement 226
—Catholic press 216
—Church between revolution and reaction 119ff
—Church policy in the Philippines 539
—de-Christianization 125
—illiteracy and the school question 123
—internal Catholic differences 120ff
—liberalism 120ff, 124f
—missions 566
—orders and congregations 121, 124f, 275
—religious alienation among the rural proletariat 257
—religious instruction 125
—school question 125
—social question 119ff
—state and Church 120
—state religion and religious freedom 120
—workers' associations 124f
Spalding, John Lancaster, bishop of Peoria 156, 159
Spalding, Martin John, archbishop of Baltimore 156
Spanish College, Rome 122
Speyer, bishopric 44
Spillman, Joseph, S.J. 251
Spirituality of the 19th century
—externalization and internalization 257ff
Šrámek, Jan 182
Stablewski, see Oksza-Stablewski
Stadler, Joseph, archbishop of Sarajevo 51, 185
Standard catechism 416f
Stanley, Henry Morton 548
Starčević, Ante 185
State Church, liberal 32ff, 37
State intervention 224
Steenbrugge, priory 114
Stephen Peter X Azarian, Armenian patriarch 376
Steffes, Johannes Peter 573

Steinbach, Erwin von 290
Steyl missionaries 280, 281f, 529
—in China 536
—in Dutch East India 541
—in German New Guinea 544
—in Portuguese East Africa 553
—in Togo 547, 558
—in the Philippines 541
Steinhuber, S.J. 479
Stieglitz, H. 417
Stifter, Adalbert 45, 249
Stimmen der Zeit 479
Stojalowski, Stanislaw 176
Stolz, Alban 251
Stoppani, A. 89
Stötzel, J. 230
Strauß, David Friedrich 325
Streit, Robert, O.M.I. 571
Strike, right to strike 224f
Stroßmayer, Josip Jurij, bishop of Djakovo 51, 185, 187, 337, 340, 348, 371
Student associations, Catholic (Germany) 214
Studi religiosi 450f, 461
Stufler, Johann Baptist, S.J. 427
Stundists 348
Sturzo, Luigi 488f, 493f
Suárez 311
Suarezianism 316
Subiaco, congregation O.S.B. 274
Sudan, the, Christianization 548
Suermondt, C., O.P. 309
Sueur, bishop of Avignon 279
Sulpicians, in Canada 148
Sumatra 541
Summum semper, brief (1893) 275
Svampa, cardinal 90, 479
Syllabus (1864) 5, 9, 10, 26, 39, 54, 78, 236, 244, 400, 472
Syndicat des Employés du Commerce et de l'Industrie (France) 228
Synthetic Society 442
Syrians, Uniate 341, 374f, 377
Szembek, Józef Elias, archbishop of Mogilev 169
Szepticki, Andreas, duke, archbishop of the Uniate Ruthenians 344, 370f

Taaffe, Eduard, count 47, 49
Tablet 140
Taft, W. H., president of the USA 165
Talamo, Salvatore 200, 490
Tamisier, E. Marie 114, 260ff
Taparelli, Luigi 197
Tardivel, J. -P. (La Vérité) 147, 216
Tarte, J.-I. 148
Taschereau, E. -A., cardinal 147ff, 162
Taxil, Leo (Jogand-Pagés) 217f
Terörde, Anton, S.J. 554
Testem benevolentiae, apostolic letter (1899) 155, 333
Textbooks, Canada 148
Thalhofer, Franz Xaver 294
Theatines, in Georgia 373
The Guild of Our Lady of Ransom 137
Theiner, Augustin 318
Theology 277, 310, 431ff
—and philosophy 439f
Thérèse of Lisieux 24, 257, 268ff
Thomas, bishop of Rouen 236
Thomas Aquinas 19, 197, 263, 307ff, 315, 327
Thomas Christians 364f
—Uniate 532
Thomistic revival 307f
Thompson, Abbé 470
Thompson, Francis 146
Thomson, M. A. 469
Thorbecke, Jan Reed 115
Thorn-Prikker, Jan 298, 300
Thorwaldsen, Bertel 301
Thrace, vicariate apostolic 372
Thun, Leo, count 203
Tibet 527
Ticino 76, 78f
Tillmann, F. 477
Tinel, Edgar 285
Tittoni, Tommaso 486
Tixeront, Joseph 253, 323, 465
Toleration (tolerantia) 195f
Tolstoy, Dmitri, count, chief procurator 347
Tommaseo, Niccolò 90
Toniolo, Giuseppe 87f, 91, 94f, 200f, 478, 483, 490
Toorop, Jan 298
Torquebiau 397
Torrend, Jules, S.J. 554
Tosti, Luigi, abbot O.S.B. 85, 89
Töth, de 470
Touchet, bishop of Orléans 510
Toulouse, Catholic university 252f
Tovar, archbishop of Lima 128
Tovini, G. 88, 92
Trade-union controversy (Germany) 117, 230, 430, 477f, 497, 501, 505f
Trade unions, see Christian trade unions
Trade unions, mixed 206, 221
Tradita ab antiquis, constitution (1912) 345
Traditionalism, philosophical 8
Tragella, Giovanni Battista, P.I.M.E. 573
Trakl, Georg 249
Tra le sollecitudini, motu proprio (1903) 407
Transigents (Italy) 89ff
Transylvania
—Rumanian Byzantine rite in 371
Trappists 279
—in Australia 150, 544
—in Belgian Congo 550
—in Japan 538
—in Natal 556f
Treitz, I. 225
Tribunal of Ecclesiastical Affairs (Prussia) 37
Trier, bishopric 40
Trimborn, Karl 213
Triple Alliance 15f, 50, 65, 192

Troeltsch, Ernst 454
Trooz, de 113
Tübingen school 320
Tu-Duc, emperor of Annam 534
Turinaz, C. François, bishop of Nancy 332, 513
Turkey 51, 166, 186, 188, 531
—and the four old Orthodox Churches of the patriarchate 358
—state and Church 358f
Turmel, J. 323, 437, 462
Two-sources theory 329
Tychon, patriarch of Moscow 352
Tyrrell, George 442, 445ff, 448, 450, 452ff, 459, 461, 466
Tz'u-hsi, dowager empress of China 530

Ultramontanism 65f, 422, 425
Ullathorne, William Bernard, O.S.B., bishop of Birmingham 273
Umberto I, king of Italy 15, 126
Unamuno, Miguel de 124, 248
Uniate Eastern Churches 368ff
Unification, Pius IX's and Leo XIII's hopes for 335ff
Unio apostolica, community of priests 413
Unio Cleri pro Missionibus 562f
Union catholique de Fribourg 82, 201, 208
Unión Cathólica (Spain) 122
Union Councils
—Lyon (1274) 342
—Basel-Ferrara-Florence-Rome (1431–45) 342
Union de la France chrétienne 102f, 239
Unione cattolica per gli studi sociali in Italia 87, 91f, 200
Unione economico-sociale 227
Union fraternelle du Commerce et de l'Industrie 221
Union Nationale 103
Union of Priests and Missionaries 563
Unità cattolica 470, 473
United States of America 193ff, 195f, 238, 241
—Catholic associations and Freemason lodges 160f
—Catholicism and the socio-political question 161ff
—Catholicism around the turn of the century 245
—Church architecture 293
—de-Christianization 163f
—development of the Church 150ff
—episcopal elections 157
—immigrants, problems of 150ff
—missions 566
—orders 278
—Plenary Council of Baltimore (1884) 156ff
—population, development of 150
—school question 158ff, 211
— — "Faribault plan" 159
—"secret societies" 160ff
—social question 161ff
—state and Church 165
Upper Silesia Catholic workers' movement 226
Urosov, Leon, prince 167
Urráburu, J. J., S.J. 316
Ursel, Duc d' 112
Ursulines, in Dutch East India 541

Vacante Sede Apostolica, constitution (1904) 395
Valerga, Giuseppe, archbishop, patriarch of Jerusalem 335
Valamo, monastery 351
Vanderpol 519
Vannutelli, Serafino, cardinal 381f, 503
Vannutelli, Vincenzo, cardinal 143, 145, 337, 339f, 344, 519
Van onzen tijd 118
Vasari, Giorgio 290, 293
Vaterland 215
Vatican Archives 319
Vatican Council, First 31
—and missions 527
Vatican Council, Second 41
—church architecture 305
Vaughan, Herbert Alfred, cardinal 140ff, 281
Vaussard, M. 472
Vehementer nos, encyclical (1906) 513
Veith, Philipp 297
Vélez, Colombian ambassador to the Vatican 132
Vénard, L. 459f
Venezuela 131f
—state and Church 131
Verband katholischer Männer- und Arbeitervereine der Schweiz 80f
Verbeker, S. J. 261
Verdi, Guiseppe 286
Verhaegen, A. 111ff
Vérité 216
Verjus, St. E. 544
Verkade, Willibrord (Paul), O.S.B. 300
Verspeyen 113
Veuillot, Louis 147
Vianney, Jean-Baptiste 258
Vicent, Antonio 124
Victor Emmanuel II, king of Italy 293
Victor Emmanuel III, king of Italy 492
Victoria, queen of England 136, 149
Vidler, A. 448
Viennese school 200
Vigilantiae, apostolic letter (1902) 331
Vigouroux, Fulcrain Grégoire 325f
Vinck, H. 411
"Vincent Conferences," in Italy 87
Vincentians, female 280, 282
Vinco, Angelo 548
Viollet-le-Duc 292
Visitatio liminum 416
Vital, Julien, vicar apostolic 543

Vives y Tutó, Joseph Calasanz, O.F.M. Cap., cardinal 95, 128, 331, 390, 458
Vladimir I, grand duke of Kiev 348
Voce della verità 473
Vogelsang, Carl von, baron 200, 202ff
Vogüé, Eugène Melchior de 101, 248
Volksverein für das katholische Deutschland 75
Volpini, A. 208
Voltaire, François Marie 247
Vrau, Philibert 260
Vulgate 326ff

Waal, Anton de 253
Wacker, Theodor 192, 504
Wadkovski, Antoni, metropolitan of St. Petersburg 349
Wages, fair 209, 224
Wagner, Peter 407, 409
Wahrmund, Ludwig 55, 254, 461
Waldeck-Rousseau, Pierre 106, 507ff
Walega, Leon, bishop of Tarnow 176
Ward, Wilfrid 137f, 142, 442, 447
Warneck, Gustav 571
Washington, university 252
Wasmann, Erich, S.J. 254
Wattson, Paul J. Francis 344
Wawrzyniak, Piotr 179f
Weber, Friedrich Wilhelm 251
Weber, Josef, suffragan bishop of Lemberg 176
Weimar constitution 196
Weiß, Albert Maria, O.P. 204, 256, 313, 320, 500
Wekerle 52
Wellhausen, Julius 442
Welti, Emil 79
Wernz, Franz Xaver, general S.J. 478f
Werthern, count 58
Werthmann, Lorenz 260
Westcott, Brooke Foss 325
Wetering, H. van de, archbishop of Utrecht 117
White Fathers 341, 529, 569
—in Africa 546f
—in central Africa 551f
—in Rhodesia 554
White Sisters, in Africa 546
Wilhelm I, king of Prussia 29, 33, 38, 39, 43, 56, 292
Wilhelm II, emperor of Germany 10, 15, 275, 495, 507, 517
—Church policy 495ff
Wilhelmina, queen of the Netherlands 20
Willem I, king of the Netherlands 118
Willem II, king of the Netherlands 118
Willem III, king of the Netherlands 118
Willmann, Otto 307
Wilpert, Otto 410
Wimmer, Bonifaz, O.S.B. 272ff
Windthorst, Ludwig 22, 29f, 33, 38, 60, 63, 67f, 70ff, 73, 192ff, 213, 222, 496f, 502
Winterthur, canton 76
Wirz, A. 80
Wiseman, Nicholas 137
Witt, Franz Xaver 285f, 287
Witte, Serge, count 341
Woeste, C. 109ff
Wollmann, religion teacher 32
Wolter, Maurus, O.S.B. 114, 271, 273f
Wolter, Placidus, O.S.B. 114, 271ff, 275
Women's emancipation 209
Work of St. Peter 529, 563
World apostolate 566
World mission, see Missions
World prayer octave for the unification of divided Christianity 344
World war
—outbreak of World War I 517
Worship, forms of 257
Wrzesnia school strike (1901) 179
Wulf, Maurice de 315
Württemberg 44
—school question 218f
Würzburg, bishopric 44

Zaleski, L. M., patriarch 232
Zapletal, Vinzenz, O.P. 83
Zeitschrift für Missionswissenschaft 571
Zemp, Joseph 81
Zedlitz-Trützschler, Robert von, count 495
Zentralkomitee der Katholischen Vereine Deutschlands 202
Zentralverband christlich-sozialer Organisationen der Schweiz 81
Zigliara, Tommaso Maria, Cardinal 112, 208, 310
Cistercians 279f
—in China 568
—in Japan 568
—in Vietnam 568
Zocchi, Gaetano, S.J. 88
Zottmann, Franz Xaver von, bishop of Tiraspol (Saratov) 169
Zurich, Canton 76, 78
Zwanzigstes Jahrhundert, journal 427, 429
Zwirner 298

HISTORY OF THE CHURCH

X

HISTORY OF THE CHURCH

Edited by Hubert Jedin, Konrad Repgen and John Dolan

Volume X

THE CHURCH IN THE MODERN AGE

by

GABRIEL ADRIÁNYI–QUINTÍN ALDEA VAQUERO
PIERRE BLET–JOHANNES BOTS–VIKTOR DAMMERTZ
ERWIN GATZ–ERWIN ISERLOH–HUBERT JEDIN
GEORG MAY–JOSEPH METZLER–LUIGI MEZZARDI
FRANCO MOLINARI–KONRAD REPGEN
LEO SCHEFFCZYK–MICHAEL SCHMOLKE
ANTONIO DA SILVA–BERNHARD STASIEWSKI
ANDRÉ TIHON–NORBERT TRIPPEN–ROBERT TRISCO
LUDWIG VOLK–WILHELM WEBER
PAUL-LUDWIG WEINACHT–FÉLIX ZUBILLAGA

Translated by Anselm Biggs

CROSSROAD · NEW YORK

The Crossroad Publishing Company
18 East 41st Street, New York, NY 10017

Translated from the Handbuch der Kirchengeschichte
Vol. VII: Die Weltkirche im 20. Jahrhundert
© Verlag Herder Freiburg im Breisgau 1979

English translation © 1981 by The Crossroad Publishing Company

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise, without the written permission of
The Crossroad Publishing Company.

Printed in the United States of America

Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data
Weltkirche im 20. Jahrhundert. English.
The Church in the modern age.

(History of the Church; v. 10)
Translation of: Die Weltkriche im 20 Jahrhundert/
Anslem Biggs.
Bibliography: p.
Includes index.
1. Church history—20th century. I. Adriányi,
Gabriel. II. Biggs, Anslem. III. Series: Handbuch
der Kirchengeschichte. English; v. 10.
BR145.2.J413 1980, vol. 10 [BR479] 270s 81-5057
ISBN 0-8245-0013-X [270.8'2] AACR2

CONTENTS

Preface xi

Preface to the English Edition xv

List of Abbreviations xvii

SECTION ONE: THE INSTITUTIONAL UNITY OF THE UNIVERSAL CHURCH 1

Chapter 1: Statistics 1
- Statistics of the World's Population, Statistics of the World Religions, Proportion of Catholics 1
  - Statistics of the World's Population 1914–65 1
  - Statistics of the World Religions 1914–65 5
  - The Southward Movement of the Christian World 9
- The Organization of the Entire Church from 1914 to 1970 9
  - Congregations, Tribunals and Offices, Commissions and Secretariats of the Curia (1916–68) 11
  - The College of Cardinals (1916–68) 18
  - Titles and Areas of Jurisdiction in the Totality of the Hierarchy of the Catholic Church (1916–68) 18
  - Diplomatic Representations of the Apostolic See with the Nations and of the Nations with the Apostolic See (1916–68) 19

Chapter 2: Popes Benedict XV, Pius XI, and Pius XII—Biography and Activity within the Church 21
- Benedict XV 21
- Pius XI 23
- Pius XII 29

Chapter 3: Foreign Policy of the Popes in the Epoch of the World Wars 35
- The First World War and the Postwar Years: Benedict XV 35
  - Neutrality 35
  - Papal Measures of Assistance 38
  - Efforts for Peace 39
- Between the Two World Wars: Pius XI 47
  - The Lateran Treaties of 1929 47
    - The "Roman Question" to 1926 47; The Route to the Lateran Treaties (1926–29) 52; After the Lateran Treaties: The Crisis of 1931 and 1938 55
  - Pius XI and the Totalitarian Systems 59
    - Pius XI and the Soviet Union 60; Pius XI and National Socialist Germany: The Way to the Concordat with the Reich (April–July 1933) 63; Between the Concordat and the Encyclical Mit brennender Sorge 70; From the Encyclical Mit brennender Sorge to the End of the Pontificate (1937–39) 72
- The Second World War: Pius XII 77
  - Neutrality 79
  - Efforts for Peace 82
  - Papal Measures of Assistance 88
  - The Pope's "Silence" 93

Chapter 4: The Second Vatican Council 96
- John XXIII: Summoning and Preparation for the Council 96
- The First Session and the Change of Pontificate 106
- Second Session (1963) and First Results 116
- Third Session: Crisis of November and Constitution on the Church 125

Fourth Session and Closing. 135
Impact. 146

Chapter 5: The Code of Canon Law and the Development of Canon Law to 1974. 151
From the Promulgation of the Code to the Second Vatican Council. 151
The Codification of Canon Law. 151
The Development of the Law from 1918 to 1958. 153
Benedict XV 154; Pius XI 154; Pius XII 156
From the Convocation of the Second Vatican Council. 158
John XXIII. 158
Paul VI. 159
Organs 159; General Character 163; Individual Legislative Actions 167; Revision of the Code and of the Canon Law of the Eastern Church 173

Chapter 6: The Holy See's Policy of Concordats from 1918 to 1974. 177
Era of Concordats under Pius XI and Pius XII. 177
To the Beginning of the Second World War. 177
Point of Departure, Motives, and General Character 177; Individual Concordats: With the New States 183; With the "Separation Countries" of Europe 185; With the Latin American States 189; Germany 190
During the Second World War. 198
In the Postwar Period. 200
Fate of Concordats in Socialist Countries 200; Concordats with Free Countries 203
The Agreements under John XXIII and Paul VI. 209
The Significance of the Second Vatican Council for the Legal Relationship of Church and State. 209
The Individual Agreements. 213
The "Protocols" with Socialist States 213; The "Modus vivendi" with Tunisia 215; The Changes in Concordats in States Giving Preferential Status to the Catholic Church 216; Latest Concordats and Agreements with Free Countries 218

SECTION TWO: THE DIVERSITY OF THE INNER LIFE OF THE UNIVERSAL CHURCH. 229

Chapter 7: Society and State as a Problem for the Church. 229
The Social Claim to Educate and Its Bases: Natural Law and Revelation ("Question of Competence"). 232
Social Principles: Personality, Subsidiarity, Solidarity, Common Good, Universal Common Good. 236
State and State Power—Democracy. 242
The Church and the Social Errors of the Age. 248
Socialism–Communism. 248
Fascism–National Socialism. 253
Understanding of Peoples: "World State". 257

Chapter 8: Main Lines of the Development of Theology between World War I and Vatican II. 260
The Departure from Neo-Scholasticism in Systematic Theology. 260
Temporal and Intellectual Presuppositions. 260
The Turning of Dogma from "Reason" to "Living". 264
The "Theological" Deepening of Moral Theology. 272
From "Apologetics" to "Fundamental Theology". 277
The Evolution of Historical Theology with the Aid of the Historicocritical Method. 280
The Progress of Church History. 280
Overcoming Resistance to the Historical Method in Biblical Scholarship. . 283
The Rise of Pastoral Theology to a Scientific Theological Discipline. . . . 288
The Increased Significance of General (Fundamental) Pastoral Theology. . 288
The Catechetical Renewal. 291
The Turning of Homiletics to Kerygmatics. 293
The Reestablishment of Liturgy as "Theology of Worship" 295

Chapter 9: Movements within the Church and Their Spirituality. 299
The Liturgical Movement. 300
New Awareness of the Church and the Scriptural Movement. 305
Catholic Action. 307
The Spiritual Exercises Movement 310
Eucharistic Piety in Transition. 312
Devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus. 315
Devotion to Mary and Mariology. 318
The Spiritual Development of the Orders. 321
The Secular Institutes. 326
Worker-Priests. 331

Chapter 10: Developments in the Clergy since 1914. 336

Chapter 11: Religious Communities and Secular Institutes. 352
The Orders between Persistence and Change. 352
The Rise of New Types of Communities. 355
The Acclimatization of the Orders in Mission Lands 358
Religious Reform under Pius XII. 361
The Second Vatican Council and Its Effects. 364
The Orders in the Field of Tension between Church and State. 371

Chapter 12: Educational System, Education, and Instruction. 378
Church and Society in Their Relation to the Educational System. 378
Catholic Educational and School Doctrine. 380
The Second Vatican Council and the Postconciliar Period. 382
Catholic Education in the European and North American Educational Systems. 388
  Preschool Area. 389
  Primary and Secondary Spheres. 391
  Tertiary Sphere. 395
  Continuing Education (Education of Adults). 399
Conditions for Catholic Education in Other Areas of the World. 403

Chapter 13: Information and the Mass Media. 410
The Catholic Claim and the "Colorless Press". 411
Film and Radio in the Early Phase. 413
The Development of the Catholic Press in the International Survey. 415
Catholic News Agencies. 427
Radio and Television under the Restrictions of Commercial or of Public Control. 428
Church Journalism in the Third World. 430
Church and Mass Communication in Theory and Organization. 432

Chapter 14: Charity and Ecclesiastical Works of Assistance. 436
Laying the Foundations in the Nineteenth Century. 436
National Organizations. 441
International Cooperation. 443
Consolidation of Charity between the World Wars. 445
Charity in the Totalitarian State. 447
Assistance in Emergency and Catastrophe since the Second World War. . . . 448
Caritas Internationalis. 450
Catholic Works of Assistance. 453

Chapter 15: History of the Ecumencial Movement. 458
The Development of the World Council of Churches and Its Route from Amsterdam (1948) to Nairobi (1976). 458
The Share of the Roman Catholic Church in the Ecumenical Movement. . . 466

Chapter 16: The Dissident Eastern Churches. 473
The Orthodox Churches. 474
  The Four Ancient Patriarchates. 474

        - The Orthodox Church in Georgia. 478
        - The Patriarchates Originating in the Middle Ages and in Modern Times. . 479
        - Other Orthodox Churches. 488
            - In the Mediterranean Area 488; In East Central Europe and the Far East 492
        - Foreign Churches. 494
    - The Eastern Pre-Chalcedonian National Churches. 496
        - The Nestorian Churches. 496
        - The Monophysite Churches. 497

SECTION THREE: THE CHURCH IN THE INDIVIDUAL COUNTRIES. 505

Chapter 17: The Church in Northern, Eastern, and Southern Europe. 505
- The Scandinavian Countries. 505
- The Baltic Countries. 507
- The Soviet Union. 509
- Poland. 512
- Czechoslovakia. 516
- Hungary. 520
- Rumania. 523
- Yugoslavia. 526
- Bulgaria. 529
- Albania. 530

Chapter 18: The Church in German-Speaking Countries. 531
- Germany. 531
- Austria. 549
- Switzerland. 552
- The Situation in the German-Speaking Area after the Second Vatican Council. 553

Chapter 19: The Church in the Benelux Countries. 557
- Belgium. 557
- Luxemburg. 560
- The Netherlands. 561
    - Period of Flowering (1919–60). 561
    - Disintegration (1960–70). 564

Chapter 20: Catholicism in Italy. 569

Chapter 21: The Catholic Church of France. 583
- Under Benedict XV. 584
- Under Pius XI. 586
- Under Pius XII. 592

Chapter 22: The Church in Spain and Portugal. 600
- Spain. 600
    - The Monarchy of Alphonso XIII (1914–31) 601
        - The Problem of the Two Spains 601; Christian Syndicalism 603
    - Second Spanish Republic and Civil War (1931–39). 604
    - The Civil War (1936–39). 605
        - The Red Zone 606; The National Zone 607
    - Spain in the Postwar Period (since 1939). 608
        - The Twofold Trend: Traditional Generation 608; Critical Generation 609; Institutions: Episcopal Conference 609; Religious Communities 610; Catholic Action 610; Asociación Católica Nacional de Propagandistas 611
- Portugal. 611
    - The Anticlerical Revolution (1910–26). 611
    - The New Regime (1926–60). 612
    - Under the Influence of the Second Vatican Council (from 1960). 613

Chapter 23: The Countries of the English-Speaking Area. 614
- Europe. 614
    - Great Britain. 614

Population 614; Organization 615; Educational System 616; Social Movement 622; Catechetical and Apologetic Work 629; Liturgical Movement 630; Journalism 631

Ireland. 632

Population 632; Political Development 633; Ecclesiastical Organization 635; Relations with the State 635; Educational System 637; Social Movement 638; Lay Apostolate 640

North America. 642

The United States. 642

Population 642; Organization 643; Educational System 645; Social Movement 650; Liturgical Movement 657; The Situation in American Society 658; The Position of the Church in International Affairs 660; Lay Movements 663; Journalism 664

Canada. 667

Population 667; Organization 668; Educational System 668; Social Movement 670

Chapter 24: The Church in Latin America. 672

Brazil. 674

Ecclesiastical Organization 674; Lack of Priests 674; Catholic Action 675; Piety 675; Too Few Priestly Vocations 676; Care of Souls 677; Catholic Universities and School 680; Newspapers, Periodicals, Means of Social Communication 681; Ecclesiastical Shortcomings 681; Religious Orders, Pastoral Cooperation 682; The Postconciliar Period 683; Formation of New Priests 684; Catholic Missions among the Indians of Brazil 684; Fraternal Associations 684

Argentina. 685

The Argentine Church after the Council 686; Difficulties within the Argentine Church 687; The Determining of the Functions of Priests 688; The "Emergency Residential District" of Buenos Aires 689; The "Priests for the Third World" United with the People 689; The Church's Functions 690

Paraguay. 690

Ecclesiastical Organization 691; Educational Institutions 691; Protests of the Bishops 691; Two Worlds Developing 692; The Function of Priests 693; Church-State Relations 694

Uruguay. 694

Ecclesiastical Structure 695; Celibacy 696; Renewal in the Light of the Second Vatican Council and of the Congress of Medellín 696

Chile. 697

In Search of a Uniform Ecclesiastical Activity 698; Attempt at a Balance 699; Christians for Socialism 699; Situation of the Chilean Church 700

Bolivia. 701

Ecclesiastical Structure 701; Human Solidarity 702; Defense of the Miners 702; Miner Priests 703; New Initiatives 703; Increase of Priestly Vocations 704; Authentic Justice and Humanization 705

Peru. 705

Educational Institutions 706; The Social Sphere 706

Ecuador. 708

School System 709; Political and Socioeconomic Position of the Church 709; First National Assembly of Ecuadorian Priests 710; In Search of an Integral Development 710; The Church Facing the New Agrarian Law 711; The Church in the Present 711

Colombia. 712

School System 713; Missions and Missionaries 713; Catholic Initiatives 713; The Voice of the Bishops 714; Agricultural Reform 715; Communist Infiltration in the University 716; The Postconciliar Church 716; The National Plan for Pastoral Care 717; Pastoral Letter to the International Eucharistic Congress 717; The Priestly Group of Golconda 717; Implementation of the Medellín Decrees 717; Birth Control 718; Land Reform and Limitation of Property 718; Catholic-Anglican Dialogue 718; Social Security for the Clergy 719

Venezuela. 719
Ecclesiastical Organization 719; Situation of the Church 720; Social Works 721; Care of Souls 721
Cuba. 723
Ecclesiastical Structure 723; Pastoral Letter of the Bishops 724; The Economic Situation of the Cuban Church 724; The Persecuted Church 725; The Standpoint of the Bishops 726; Decrease of the Cuban Clergy 727
The Dominican Republic. 727
The Concordat between the Holy See and the Dominican Republic 728; The Church in Public Life 729
Panama. 730
The Situation of the Church 730; Social Revaluation 731; Religious Life in Central America and Panama 731; Arrest and Expulsion of Father Luis Medrano, S. J. 731; The Church and Reform of the National Constitution 732
Nicaragua. 733
Apostolic Activities 733; National Constitution 733; Activity of the Church 734
Honduras. 734
The Voice of the Bishops 735; Land Occupation 736
El Salvador. 736
The Land Problem and the Position of the Priests 737; Against the Use of Violence 738; Seminary for Priestly Vocations 738; The Abortion Law 738
Guatemala. 739
Tensions 739; Pastoral Guidelines 740; The Christian and Political Activity 740
Mexico. 741
Constitution of 1917 742; New Persecution: Plutarco Elías Calles 742; Economic Boycott, the "Cristeros War" 742; Papal Documents 743; Balance Sheet of the Persecution 744; Church and State since 1940 744; Organization of the Mexican Church 745; Parishes and Missions, Organization of the Clergy 746; Episcopal Documents 747; Piety of the Mexican 748; National Plan for Common Pastoral Care 748; "Priests for the Poor" 750

Chapter 25: The Young Churches in Asia, Africa, and Oceania. 751
The Young Churches in Asia. 753
The Far East. 753
China 753; Taiwan 757; Japan 758; Korea 761
Southeast Asia. 763
India 763; Pakistan 768; Bangladesh 769; Sri Lanka 769; Vietnam 771; Laos 773; Cambodia 774; Thailand 774; Burma 774; The Malay Peninsula 775; Indonesia 775
The Young Churches in Africa. 777
The Young Churches in Oceania. 795
Australia and New Zealand. 795
The Pacific Islands. 796
The Philippines. 802

BIBLIOGRAPHY. 805

INDEX. 853

PREFACE

The pretentious title of this volume* is justified by an overwhelming fact of both ecclesiastical and secular history: the Catholic Church, which has ceaselessly claimed to be universal, has actually become a world-church in our century. Restricted in antiquity essentially to the lands around the Mediterranean, cast back in the Middle Ages to the West by the encircling Islamic wall and the Eastern Schism, and still Europe-oriented in modern times despite the world-mission that had got under way, it developed in the twentieth century into a world-church. The Second Vatican Council, at which this development entered into the general consciousness, stands at the center of this volume. It does not pass over the fact that the spatial expansion, and even more the internal happenings, have created a critical situation, which shows itself in all three areas into which we have organized the matter: in the principle of unity, in the papacy, the council, and canon law; in virtually all the inner expressions of the Church's life, as much in theology as in spirituality; and finally in its members, the local churches of European and non-European countries.

We provide a cross section of the diversity of the Church's life, but our deeper motive remains the continuation of the longitudinal section which this series has striven to supply in its earlier volumes. Thus the association of this volume with the series is justified, but also its independence in so far as it offers the historical information, becoming ever more difficult, which is needed for an understanding of the present.

As the temporal point of departure there presented itself the year 1914, the outbreak of the First World War, joined to a change of pontificate. More difficult was the delimitation at the other end. "The present" is an elastic concept. From the start it was not intended to understand by it the year of publication of the volume. Some collaborators have excluded the last years, mostly with regard to developments still in progress; others have included the most recent events in their presentation.

---

* The original German title is Die Weltkirche im 20. Jahrhundert (The World-Church in the Twentieth Century).

To write the ecclesiastical history of the age is more risky than to deal with the political history. The growth of the Church moves in longer waves than does that of states: the era of National Socialism, as a historical fact, is behind us; the impact of the Second Vatican Council has not yet been evaluated. The sources accessible to the historian for political history are more abundant, whereas for ecclesiastical history important complexes of sources are not yet accessible. On the other hand, the remaining material which was to be assimilated is so bulky and many-layered that only specialists are in a position to acquire a survey and thorough view, to supply the existing trends, and to join them with the earlier. Hence, of necessity the number of collaborators has been increased and the coordination made more difficult, not only for the subjects of the Church's life, but also in regard to the accounts of countries, especially those of the Third World. In none of the previous volumes of the series were the selection and the gaining of competent collaborators so difficult as in this one. What was required of them was not only exact knowledge of events, but the ability to extract the essentials from the abundance of phenomena and to present them in the brevity demanded by the nature of a handbook. Some manuscripts had to be abbreviated, but nevertheless some excesses in bulk could not be avoided. The contributions made in a foreign language had to be translated. In spite of all the efforts of the editors, a certain amount of overlapping could not be avoided, for example, when the question of concordats concluded by the Holy See and the theme of papal external policy had to be treated according to their juridical content and in their social effects, as well as in other contexts. Hence it would not be appropriate to regard such overlappings as "repetitions." We have tried, by means of cross-references in the text, to facilitate the orientation; furthermore, the list of subject matter in the Index makes possible the locating of relevant passages.

As in the earlier volumes, so too in this one the editors have sought technically to standardize the individual contributions. For this purpose a conference of the contributors, arranged by Verlag Herder in July 1975, was helpful, but of course it had to be implemented by constant correspondence. If it has still not been possible to eliminate all lack of symmetry in the arrangement and the method of citation, this does no harm to the usability of the entire work.

Finally, as regards the inner orientation of the volume, it was, as in the case of the previous volumes, the basic principle that the authors speak for themselves and especially bear the responsibility for the judgments rendered. We did not regard ourselves justified to intervene in their formation of opinion and hence could not identify ourselves with every view here expressed. However, all collaborators were united in faith in the One, Holy, Catholic, and Apostolic Church, united in the conviction that Church history, including the ecclesiastical history of the contemporary period, must follow historical method. In selection and evaluation we have held to the principle which Joseph Ratzinger very recently formulated: "On the one hand, the Church must never be separated from its concrete manifestation, but, on the other hand, it must also never be entirely identified with it."

The present text was, to this point, formulated on 28 August 1977. Still lacking was only the constantly promised chapter on the "The Young Churches"; the rest of the volume was set and made up into pages; publisher and editors counted on publication in autumn 1977. But this was prevented because the author of this chapter fell seriously ill and finally gave up. It was not easy to find a new author. We are grateful to Father Metzler for stepping into the breach and quickly composing Chapter 25. When other, equally unforeseen hindrances had happily been overcome by the beginning of 1979, production could start without interruption.

The delay in publication for one and one-half years explains why the pontificate of Paul VI was not included: when the book was ready in these parts, this Pope was still alive and hence not yet a subject of history. His death on 6 August 1978 ended an important chapter of the most recent history of the Church. Whether the short pontificate of his successor, John Paul I, elected on 26 August and dead on 28 September 1978, still belongs to this chapter or means the beginning of a new one cannot be said scientifically at this moment with sufficient assurance—for this the contours of the new are not yet sharp enough, although there is much to be said for the view that 1978 will be a very important caesura in the history of the Catholic Church.

Hubert Jedin
Konrad Repgen

PREFACE TO ENGLISH EDITION

By a sad coincidence the translation of the final volume of the History of the Church was completed within the week of the death of Msgr. Hubert Jedin, 17 July 1980. Perhaps more widely recognized in Europe and Latin America than in the English-speaking world, his rapport with Protestant scholars bore fruit on both sides of the Atlantic. While his History of the Church (formerly Handbook of Church History) will no doubt serve as an impressive and lasting monument to his work as a Church historian it was in a sense peripheral to the great endeavor of his life, Geschichte des Konzils von Trient, a definitive work that he did not complete until shortly before his death. Yet long before the appearance of the first volume of the history of the council of Trent in 1949, Jedin had established himself as an authority on the history of the Reformation and the nature of historical methodology. His biography of Seripando and his study of Albert Pigge gave him an early international reputation. No work on the Thirty Years War or Wallenstein is complete without his reference to Piccolomini's correspondence. His pioneering efforts in the study of the writings of Luther's literary opponents opened a new field in Reformation studies and helped to place the future Second Vatican Council in proper historical perspective.

Jedin's basic premise that Church history can be understood only as the history of salvation was supported by his conviction that there is a difference between Church history and the history of Christianity, since the former is rooted in faith and therefore a theological discipline. As history, it is bound to certain rubrics: it is bound to its sources and the causal connection of the facts related; hence the importance of recognizing human freedom. "There are historical guilt and historical merit but the judgment of history is not a sentence pronounced upon the Church's past."

In all of his writings Jedin sought to see and describe the past in the spirit of veritas et caritas. It is hoped that the reader will find this same spirit in this volume that treats a Church so different from the Church of Trent and yet a Church, not unlike that of the sixteenth century, open to the perennial exhortation: ecclesia semper reformanda est.

John P. Dolan

LIST OF ABBREVIATIONS

AAS	Acta Apostolicae Sedis, Vatican City 1909ff.
ACJF	Action Catholique de la Jeunesse Française.
ADAP	Akten zur Deutschen auswärtigen Politik 1919–1945, Göttingen 1966ff.
ADSS	P. Blet, R. A. Graham (from Vol. 3), A. Martini, B. Schneider, eds.: Actes et documents du Saint Siège relatifs à la seconde guerre mondiale, Vatican City 1965.
AfkKR	Archiv für Katholisches Kirchenrecht, (Innsbruck) Mainz 1857ff.
AHC	Annuarium Historiae Conciliorum, Paderborn 1969ff.
AHP	Archivum historiae pontificiae, Rome 1963ff.
D. Albrecht I, II	D. Albrecht, ed., Der Notenwechsel zwischen dem Hl. Stuhl und der Deutschen Regierung. I: Von der Ratifizierung des Reichskonkordats bis zur Enzyklika "Mit brennender Sorge," Mainz 1965; II: 1937–1945, Mainz 1969.
D. Albrecht, Kirche	C. Albrecht, ed., Katholische Kirche im Dritten Reich. Eine Aufsatzsammlung, Mainz 1976 (with bibliography).
ALW	Archiv für Liturgiewissenschaft, Regensburg 1950ff.
ANEC	Asociación Nacional de Estudiantes Católicos.
AnGr	Analecta Gregoriana, Rome 1930ff.
ASS	Acta Sanctae Sedis, Rome 1865–1908.
Atlas hierarchicus	Atlas hierarchicus. Descriptio geographica et statistica ecclesiae catholicae tum occidentis tum orientis, ed. H. Emmerich, S.V.D., Mödling 1968.
Bihlmeyer-Tüchle III	K. Bihlmeyer and H. Tüchle, Kirchengeschichte III: Die Neuzeit und die Neueste Zeit, Paderborn 1968.
Bilanz der Theologie	H. Vorgrimler and R. Vander Gucht, eds., Bilanz der Theologie im 20. Jh., I–IV, Freiburg, Basel, Vienna 1969–70.
CADC	Centro Académico de Democracia Cristã.
CALA	Conferencia anglicana latinoamericana.
Catholica	Catholica. Jahrbuch (Vierteljahreszeitschrift) für Kontroverstheologie, (Paderborn) Münster 1932ff.
CEHILA	Comisión de Estudios de Historia de la Iglesia en América Latina.
CELAM	Consejo Episcopal Latino-Americano, Bogotá 1968ff.
CHR	The Catholic Historical Review, Washington 1915ff.
CIAS	Centro de Investigación y Acción Social.
CIC	Centrum Informationis Catholicum.

CIDSE	Coopération Internationale pour le Développement Socio-Économique.
CIMI	Consejo Indigenista Misionero.
CISOR	Centro de investigaciones en ciencias sociales, Caracas.
CivCatt	La Civiltà Cattolica, Rome 1850ff. (1871–87 Florence).
CLAR	Confoederatio Latino-Americana Religiosorum.
CNT	Confederación Nacional de Trabajo.
ComRel	Commentarium pro religiosis et missionariis, Rome 1920ff.
Concilium	Concilium, Internationale Zeitschrift für Theologie, Einsiedeln, Mainz, Zurich 1965ff.
CPA	Catholic Press Association.
CS	Communicatio Socialis. Zeitschrift für Publizistik in Kirche und Welt, Paderborn 1967ff.
DBFP	Documents on British Foreign Policy, 1947ff.
DCV	Deutscher Caritasverband.
DDF	Documents Diplomatiques Français.
DDI	Documenti Diplomatici Italiani.
DIP	G. Pelliccia and G. Rocca, Dizionario degli Istituti di Perfezione, Rome 1974ff.
ECQ	Eastern Churches Quarterly, Ramsgate 1936–64.
EKD	Evangelische Kirche Deutschlands.
EphLiturg	Ephemerides Liturgicae, Rome 1887ff.
EThL	Ephemerides Theologicae Lovanienses, Bruges 1924ff.
FRUS	Foreign Relations of the United States. Diplomatic Papers.
Giacometti, Quellen	Z. Giacometti, Quellen zur Geschichte der Trennung von Staat und Kirche, Tübingen 1926.
GS	Gaudium et spes.
GuL	Geist und Leben. Zeitschrift für Askese und Mystik, Würzburg 1947ff.
Hampe	J. C. Hampe, Die Autorität der Freiheit. Gegenwart des Konzils und Zukunft der Kirche im Ökumenischen Disput, 3 vols., Munich 1967.
Herder TK	Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil. Konstitutionen, Dekrete u. Erklärungen, lat. u. deutsch. Kommentare, ed. by H. Vorgrimler et al., 3 vols., Freiburg 1966–68.
HJ	Historisches Jahrbuch der Görres-Gesellschaft, Cologne 1880ff., Munich 1950ff.
HK	Herder-Korrespondenz, Freiburg 1946ff.
HOAC	Hermandad Obrera de Acción Catòlica.
Hochland	Hochland, Munich 1903ff.
HPTh	Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie, ed. Franz Xaver Arnold et al., Freiburg 1964ff.
IKZ	Internationale Kirchliche Zeitschrift, Bern 1911ff.
IRA	Irish Republican Army.
ISAL	Iglesia y sociedad para América Latina.
JbCarWiss	Jahrbuch für Caritaswissenschaft und Caritasarbeit, Freiburg 1957–68.
JAC	Jeunesse Agricole Catholique.

JEC	Jeunesse Étudiante Catholique.
JMC	Jeunesse Maritime Catholique.
JOC	Juventud Obrera Católica.
JOC	Jeunesse Ouvrière Chrétienne.
KH	Kirchliches Handbuch für das katholische Deutschland 1907–43.
KNA	Katholische Nachrichtenagentur, Bonn, Munich.
KNP	Katholiek Nederlands Persbureau.
Kolping	A. Kolping, Katholische Theologie gestern und heute. Thematik und Entfaltung deutscher katholischer Theologie vom I. Vaticanum bis zur Gegenwart, Bremen 1964.
A. Kupper, Staatliche Akten	A. Kupper, ed., Staatliche Akten über die Reichskonkordatsverhandlungen 1933, Mainz 1969.
LJ	Liturgisches Jahrbuch, Münster 1951ff.
LThK	Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 2d ed., Freiburg, 1957–68.
LWB	Lutherischer Weltbund.
M	E. Marmy, ed., Mensch und Gemeinschaft in christlicher Schau. Dokumente (from Gregory XVI 1832 to Pius XII 1944), Fribourg 1945.
MM	Mater et Magistra.
MThZ	Münchener Theologische Zeitschrift, Munich 1950ff.
Müller	Vaticanum secundum, ed. by O. Müller, W. Becker, J. Gülden, 4 vols., Leipzig 1963–66.
NCE	New Catholic Encyclopedia, New York 1967.
NCWC	National Catholic Welfare Conference.
NRTh	Nouvelle Revue Théologique, Tournai, Louvain, Paris 1879ff.
NZMW	Neue Zeitschrift für Missionswissenschaft, Beckenried 1945ff.
ÖAfKR	Österreichisches Archiv für Kirchenrecht, Vienna 1950ff.
OCIC	Office Catholique International du Cinéma.
OrChr	Oriens Christianus, Rome 1901ff.
OstkSt	Ostkirchliche Studien, Würzburg 1951ff.
PIME	Pontificio Istituto Missioni Estere.
PP	Poplurum progressio.
PrOrChr	Le Proche-Orient Chrétien, Jerusalem 1951ff.
PT	Pacem in terris.
QA	Quadragesimo anno.
REB	Revista eclesiástica brasileira, Petropolis 1941ff.
RHE	Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique, Louvain 1900ff.
RHMC	Revue d'histoire moderne et contemporaine.
Rohrbasser	Heilslehre der Kirche. Dokumente von Pius IX. bis Pius XII., ed. P. Cattin and H. T. Conus, transl. A. Rohrbasser, Fribourg 1953.
RPB I	Die Kirchliche Lage in Bayern nach den Regierungspräsidentenberichten 1933–1943, I: Regierungsbezirk Oberbayern, ed. H. Witetschek, Mainz 1966.
RPB II	II: Regierungsbezirk Ober- und Mittelfranken, ed. H. Witetschek, Mainz 1967.

RPB III	III: Regierungsbezirk Schwaben, ed. H. Witetschek, Mainz 1971.
RPB IV	IV: Regierungsbezirk Niederbayern und Oberpfalz, 1933–1945, ed. W. Ziegler, Mainz 1973.
RSR	Recherches de science religieuse, Paris 1910ff.
RSCI	Rivista di storia della Chiesa in Italia, Rome 1947ff.
RThom	Revue thomistique, Bruges 1893ff.
SEDOC	Serviço de Documentacão, Petropolis 1969ff.
Sic	Sic (periodical, ed. Centro Gumilla), Caracas 1938ff.
SOG	Solidaritätsgruppen der Priester.
SOG-Papiere	SOG-Papiere. Mitteilungsblatt der Arbeitsgemeinschaft von Priestergruppen in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland und der SOG-Österreich, ed. A. Schilling, Bochum 1968–73.
SPEV	Segretariato permanente del episcopo venezolano.
SSCC	Congregatio Sacrorum Cordium Jesu et Mariae.
Schmidlin	J. Schmidlin, Papstgeschichte der neuesten zeit I–IV, Munich 1933–39.
B. Stasiewski I, II, III	B. Stasiewski, ed., Akten deutscher Bischöfe über die Lage der Kirche. I: 1933–1934, Mainz 1968; II: 1934–1935, Mainz 1976; III: 1935–1936, Mainz 1978.
StdZ	Stimmen der Zeit (before 1914: Stimmen aus Maria Laach), Freiburg 1871ff.
StL	Staatslexikon, 6th ed., ed. H. Sacher, Freiburg, 1957ff.
STO	Service du Travail Obligatoire
ThGl	Theologie und Glaube, Paderborn 1909ff.
TheoluPhil	Theologie und Philosophie. Vierteljahreszeitschrift für Theologie und Philosophie, Freiburg 1966ff.
ThprQS	Theologisch-praktische Quartalschrift, Linz a. d. Donau 1848ff.
ThRev	Theologische Revue, Münster 1902ff.
ThQ	Theologische Quartalschrift, Tübingen 1819ff., Stuttgart 1946ff.
TThZ	Trierer Theologische Zeitschrift (until 1944: Pastor Bonus), Trier 1888ff.
UCIP	L'Union Catholique Internationale de la Presse.
UG	A. F. Utz, J. F. Groner, Aufbau und Entfaltung des gesellschaftlichen Lebens. Soziale Summe Pius' XII. I, II, Fribourg 1954.
UGT	Unión General de Trabajadores.
UISG	Unio Internationalis Superiorissarum Generalium.
UMAE	Unión de Mutua Ayuda Episcopal.
USG	Unio Superiorum Generalium.
VZG	Vierteljahreshefte für Zeitgeschichte, Stuttgart 1953ff.
L. Volk, Kirchliche Akten	L. Volk, ed., Kirchliche Akten über die Reichskontkordatsverhandlungen 1933, Mainz 1969.
L. Volk, Faulhaber Akten	L. Volk, ed., Akten Kardinal Michael von Faulhabers 1917–1945. I: 1917–1934, Mainz 1975; II: 1935–1945, Mainz 1978.
WACC	World Association for Christian Communication
WiWei	Wissenschaft und Weisheit, Düsseldorf 1934ff.
ZAM	Zeitschrift für Askese und Mystik, Würzburg 1926.
ZevKR	Zeitschrift für evangelisches Kirchenrecht, Tübingen 1951ff.

ZKG	Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte, Stuttgart 1876ff.
ZKTh	Zeitschrift für Katholische Theologie (Innsbruck), Vienna 1877ff.
ZMR	Zeitschrift für Missionskunde und Religionswissenschaft, Berlin 1886ff.
ZRGG	Zeitschrift für Religions- und Geistesgeschichte, Marburg 1948ff.
ZSavRG, KanAbt	Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Kanonistische Abteilung, Weimar 1911ff.

SECTION ONE

The Institutional Unity of the Universal Church

CHAPTER 1

Statistics

Statistics of the World's Population, Statistics of the World Religions, Proportion of Catholics

In order to be able suitably to estimate to some degree the importance of the Catholic population of the world absolutely and relatively, in the longitudinal section of the historical development and in the geographical cross section of the present, its numerical relationship to the total world population, its relative significance in the concert of the world religions, and finally the trend of the frequency distribution in the geographical sphere—north-south drift of the Christian or of the Catholic world respectively in the course of time—must be investigated. There are no absolutely reliable numbers for all three relationships, but—according to individual continents and countries with differently developed facilities for inquiry—more or less exact estimates and approximations.

STATISTICS OF THE WORLD'S POPULATION 1914–65

For the population problem and population statistics on both the national and the international level there is an almost incalculable abundance in publications, which can scarcely be controlled by even the experts.[1] Hence, in what follows there can be offered only a strictly consolidated and necessarily simplified summary, which is as reliable as the primary source material and becomes the more problematic as one moves into the past.

The most important factor in the population development is the present still extraordinarily different rate of growth in the individual continents and countries. In general it can be said that the rates of growth in the First and Second Worlds—the Western industrialized

---

[1] A very good and concise summary is provided by the international research and information center Pro Mundi Vita in its publication, Die demographische Explosion und die Zunkunft der Kirche no. 40 (1972), 6, rue de la Limite, Brussels.

TABLE 1: WORLD POPULATION FROM 1920 TO 1965
(IN MILLIONS)

Country	Year
	1920	1930	1940	1950	1960	1965
Africa	140	164	191	222	278	311
North Africa	46	39	44	53	66	75
Central and South Africa	94	125	147	169	212	236
America	208	242	274	329	413	460
North America	117	134	144	166	199	214
Central America	30	34	41	52	68	80
South America	61	74	89	111	146	166
Asia	966	1,120	1,244	1,381	1,659	1,830
East Asia	487	591	634	684	794	852
South Asia	479	529	610	697	865	978
Europe	329	355	380	392	425	445
Northern Europe	115	65	68	73	76	79
Western Europe		108	113	123	135	143
Central Europe	112
Eastern Europe		89	96	88	97	100
Southern Europe	102	93	103	108	117	123
Oceania	8.8	10.0	11.1	12.7	15.7	17.5
U.S.S.R.	158	179	195	180	214	231
Total World	1,810	2,070	2,295	2,517	3,005	3,295

SOURCES: UN Demographic Yearbook, Vol. 11 (New York 1959); UN Statistical Yearbook, Vol. 18 (New York 1967).

states, including Japan, and the Communist lands—are indeed still positive, apart from exceptions, but decidedly lower than in the Third World—the developing countries. In the Western nations the rate of growth at the end of the 1960s averaged less than 1 percent, so that, ceteris paribus, their population would about double in seventy years, whereas in Asia it averaged ca. 2 percent, which would lead to a doubling in some thirty-five years.[2]

In all the developing countries the population increases by leaps and bounds. "However, it should at once be explained that the problems which confront the majority of the underdeveloped countries do not result chiefly from their high birthrate, but rather from their mortality rate, which grows less from year to year . . . . This is a quite general problem today, affecting about two-thirds of mankind: 2.056 billion Asiatics, 283 million Latin Americans, and 344 million Africans."[3]

---

[2] Cf. ibid., 7.

This is above all true of the thickly populated countries of China and India. The last Chinese census was taken in 1953. Since then only fragmentary information has been at our disposal. Since the growth rate results from the birthrate less the mortality rate, a parallel development of the two rates—lowering of the birthrate by measures of population and family planning, and lowering of the mortality rate by hygienic and political health measures—will lead in time to a considerable growth. Accordingly, the results of the efforts in China for a reduction of the population growth can be evaluated somewhat as follows:

TABLE 2: THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE POPULATION IN CHINA FROM 1953 TO 1970

Year	Number of Inhabitants (in millions)	Birth Rate %	Mortality Rate %	Rate of Increase %
1953	589.7	43	29	14
1956	618.5	41	24	17
1959	649.9	38	23	15
1962	676.2	38	24	14
1965	705	35	21	14
1968	735.1	33	19	14
1970	757.3	32	17	15

SOURCE: Die demographische Explosion und die Zukunft der Kirche, no. 40 (Brussels: Pro Mundi Vita, 1972), p. 9.

Now as earlier, India, as the second most populous country on earth, is far from having found a solution for its population problem. "The population grew (therefore) from 356.9 million in 1951 to 498.7 million in 1966. Today India must have at least 547 million inhabitants. Hence, in each decade the population grew by ca. 100 million. According to the testimony of the population experts of the United Nations, in 1970 the population amounted to 554 million, the birthrate 42.8 percent, the mortality rate 16.7 percent, the growth rate 26.1 percent for the period 1966–70."[4]

In contrast to China, where the rate of growth was stabilized at ca. 15

---

[3] Ibid., 8f.

[4] Ibid., 9.

percent, in India it grew from 19 to 26 percent between 1951 and 1970.

Africa also shows high rates of growth, from 20 to more than 30 percent. Different but equally high rates of growth must be recorded for most countries of Central and South America.

The high birthrates in the countries of the Third World have led, together with a drastic decline of the mortality rates, to a very favorable age-group structure in these nations. But this is at the same time decisive for the development of the present population. "Even if there should be success in quickly and drastically decreasing the number of births per marriage in India and China, the population of these areas, just as that of most Latin American and African states, would grow further still over many decades because of their favorable age-group structure, that is, of the high proportion of young people old enough to have children."[5]

TABLE 3: POPULATION INCREASE IN INDIA FROM 1951 TO 1970

Year	Birth Rate %	Mortality Rate %	Rate of Increase %
1951–1960	42	23	19
1966–1970	43	17	26

SOURCE: Die demographische Explosion, p. 9.

TABLE 4: ESTIMATED POPULATION GROWTH IN VARIOUS LANDS AND AREAS IN 1985
(in percentages)

Age	North America	Europe	USSR	East Asia	Latin America	Africa	South Asia	Oceania
0–14	28.7	24.8	26.2	31.7	41.4	45.0	42.0	30.4
15–64	61.6	63.3	64.3	63.1	54.5	52.0	54.6	60.1
65 and older	9.8	11.8	9.4	5.3	4.1	3.0	3.4	7.4

SOURCE: Die demographische Explosion, p. 14.

---

[5] "Daten der Bevölkerungsentwicklung. Überblick und Vergleich der Entwicklung in den Industriestaaten und in den Ländern der Dritten Welt: Soziographische Beilage Nr. 24," Hk 27 (1973) 345 ff. Mit einem Begleitkommentar von Dr. Hermann Schubnell, Direktor im Statistischen Bundesamt, Wiesbaden; here p. 346.

This development is of an importance for the Christian Churches that must not be underestimated. The outcome will be that in the next decades the Christian world will shift ever more southward and into the lands of the Third World.[6]

STATISTICS OF THE WORLD RELIGIONS 1914–65

Exact and generally satisfactory statistics of the religions of the world are no more possible to obtain than are exact statistics of the world's population. The best information comes from national censuses to the extent that these are even taken. A good survey is provided by the U.N. Demographic Yearbook and the U.N. Statistical Yearbook. For many countries of the Third World we are referred to ecclesiastical data. They are especially problematic where a large part of the baptized maintain no living relationship with the Church. Also problematic are data on the countries of the Communist world. For the statistics of the world religions it is also true that information can be only as reliable as the primary material which can be obtained from the sources at our disposal.

Here follows a summary of religious statistics according to continents.

TABLE 5: RELIGIOUS STATISTICS OF EUROPE WITH SUBDIVISIONS FROM 1920 TO 1965
(in thousands and percentages)

Region	Total Population	Catholics	Protestants and Anglicans	Orthodox	Other Christians	Jews	Muslims	Others
Central Europe
1920	114,899	59,991	44,902	2,939	515	4,008	—	2,465
%	100	52.2	39.0	2.55	0.45	2.7	—	2.1
1935	127,247	67,789	46,916	4,335	1,047	4,335	—	104
%	100	53.3	36.9	3.47	0.8	3.47	—	0.62
1965	130,865	74,380	48,541	584	?	128	—	7,519
%	100	56.8	37.0	0.44	?	0.09	—	5.7
Northern Europe
1920	15,520	30	15,320	60	20	15	—	75
%	100	0.2	98.7	0.4	0.13	0.1	—	0.48
1935	16,833	35	16,607	70	1	17	—	104
%	100	0.2	98.6	0.41	—	0.1	—	0.62
1965	20,844	80	20,495	73	?	21	1	264
%	100	0.38	98.3	0.35	?	0.1	—	1.26

---

[6] Cf. Table 10, p. 9.

TABLE 5: (Continued)

Region	Total Population	Catholics	Protestants and Anglicans	Orthodox	Other Christians	Jews	Muslims	Others
Western Europe
1920	104,666	55,611	46,895	—	—	552	—	1,608
%	100	53.1	44.8	—	—	0.53	—	1.53
1935	109,558	56,502	48,165	140	20	843	100	3,808
%	100	51.6	43.9	0.13	0.02	0.77	0.09	3.5
1965	126,234	64,085	39,140	260	?	1,030	250	21,372
%	100	50.7	31.0	0.21	?	0.81	0.28	16.9
Eastern Europe
1920	43,075	12,925	3,606	22,076	6	1,437	2,850	175
%	100	30.0	8.3	51.2	0.01	3.3	6.6	0.4
1935	50,915	15,029	3,855	26,749	—	1,625	3,568	89
%	100	29.5	7.6	52.5	—	3.2	7.0	0.17
1965	54,838	13,352	4,262	29,521	?	277	3,922	3,350
%	100	24.3	7.8	53.8	?	0.51	7.1	6.1
Southern Europe
1920	75,410	66,276	168	6,419	—	55	1,015	1,477
%	100	87.9	0.3	8.5	—	0.07	1.3	2.0
1935	82,333	73,920	184	6,689	10	213	1,255	72
%	100	89.7	0.22	8.1	0.01	0.26	1.5	0.09
1965	102,476	93,887	301	8,143	?	47	108	304
%	100	91.6	0.29	7.9	?	0.05	0.1	0.29
Total (Europe)
1920	353,570	194,833	110,891	31,494	541	6,067	3,901	5,800
%	100	51.0	31.4	8.9	0.15	1.7	1.1	1.6
1935	388,615	213,283	115,755	38,521	1,078	7,032	4,932	8,014
%	100	60.3	32.7	10.9	0.3	2.0	1.4	2.2
1965	435,257	245,784	112,739	38,581	?	1,503	4,281	32,809
%	100	56.4	25.9	8.8	?	0.35	0.98	7.5

SOURCES: For 1920: H. A. Krose, ed., Kirchliches Handbuch für das katholische Deutschland, Vol. 7, 1930–31 (Cologne 1931), p. 263; for 1935: Zentralstelle für kirchliche Statistik des katholischen Deutschlands, Cologne, ed., Kirchliches Handbuch für das katholische Deutschland, Vol. 21, 1939–40 (Cologne 1939), p. 150; for 1965: Atlas Hierarchicus, 1968, p. 56 (without USSR).

The major European divisions are comprised of the following:

Central Europe: Danzig, German Reich including Saar region, Austria, Poland, Switzerland, Czechoslovakia;

Northern Europe: Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Finland;

Western Europe: Belgium, France, Great Britain and Ireland, Luxembourg, Monaco, the Netherlands;

Eastern Europe: Albania, Bulgaria, Yugoslavia, Romania, Hungary, the Baltic states;

Southern Europe: Andorra, Greece, Italy, Portugal, Spain, European Turkey.

TABLE 6: RELIGIOUS STATISTICS OF AMERICA WITH SUBDIVISIONS FROM 1910 TO 1966

(in thousands and percentages)

	Total Population	Catholics	Protestants and Anglicans	Orthodox	Jews	Other Religions	Others*
*North America
1910	94,583	17,364	69,332	?	1,837	550	5,500
%	100	18.3	73.0	?	1.9	0.58	5.8
1950	166,000[1]	34,717[2]	72,535[3]	2,030[2]	5,433[4]	76	51,209(?)
%	100	20.9	43.6	1.2	3.3	0.04
1966	210,357	54,171	76,743	3,406	5,944	70,089
%	100	25.7	36.4	1.6	2.8	33.3
Central America
1910	25,458	23,101	1,072	?	16	732	565
%	100	90.6	4.2	?	0.06	2.8	2.2
1950	52,000[1]	42,978[2]	3,242[3]	—	47[4]	158	557(?)
%	100	82.6	6.2	—	0.09	0.3
1966	66,830	60,408	3,892	—	112	3715
%	100	90.3	5.8	—	0.16	5.5
South America
1910	48,980	47,147	463	?	6	1,340	24
%	100	96.2	0.9	?	0.01	2.7	0.05
1950	111,000[1]	94,155[2]	5,876[3]	38[2]	582[4]	431	9918(?)
%	100	84.8	5.2	0.03	0.52	0.38
1966	152,008	137,923	6,054	480	685	5,366
%	100	90.7	3.9	0.3	0.5	3.5
Total Americas
1910	169,048	87,612	70,867	?	1,858	2,622	6,089
%	100	51.8	41.9	?	1.1	1.5	3.6
1950	329,000[1]	171,850[2]	81,653[3]	2,068[2]	6062[4]	665	66,702(?)
%	100	52.2	24.2	0.62	1.8	0.2	20.2(?)
1966	429,195	252,502	86,689	3,886	6,741	79,170
%	100	58.8	20.1	0.9	1.6	18.4

* "Others": Denomination not available or without denomination.

 "In South and Central America there are fairly reliable statistics on religion, but it is very difficult to evaluate the various denominations in the United States": H. A. Krose, ed., Kirchliches Handbuch für das katholische Deutschland, Vol. 3, 1910–11 (Freiburg i. Br. 1911), p. 202.

SOURCES: For 1910: H. A. Krose, ed., Kirchliches Handbuch für das katholische Deutschland, Vol. 3, 1910–11 (Freiburg i Br. 1911), p. 201; for 1950: [1]UN Statistical Yearbook, 18 vols. (1966) (New York 1967), p. 26; [2]World Christian Handbook, ed. E. J. Bingle et al. (London 1952), p. 266; [3]World Christian Handbook, ed. H. Wakelin Coxill (London 1962), p. 243; [4]World Christian Handbook, ed. E. J. Bingle et al. (London 1957), p. 173; for 1966: Atlas Hierarchicus, 1968.

Table 7: Religious Statistics of Africa from 1910 to 1960/65
(in thousands and percentages)

Year	Total Population	Catholics	Other Christians	Jews Muslims	Hindus Buddhists	Others without Denominations
1910	126,351	6,689	8,457	43,872	—	71,000
%	100	5.3	6.7	34.75	—	56.3
1950	223,000	18,193	17,495(?)	52,832	543	?
%	100	8.1	7.7	23.75	0.24	?
1960/65	317,545	31,782	33,890(?)	61,668	523	?
%	100	10.0	10.6	19.4	0.16	?

SOURCES: For 1910: H. A. Krose, ed., Kirchliches Handbuch für das katholische Deutschland, Vol. 3, 1910–11 (Freiburg i. Br. 1911), p. 200; for 1950: World Christian Handbook, ed. E. J. Bingle et al. (London 1957), pp. 162ff.; for 1960/65: World Christian Handbook, ed. H. Wakelin Coxill (London 1962), pp. 234ff., and Atlas Hierarchicus.

Table 8: Religious Statistics of Asia from 1910 to 1960/65
(in thousands and percentages)

Year	Total Population	Catholics	Other Christians	Jews Muslims	Hindus Buddhists	Others without Denomination
1910	828,455	12,661	19,079	155,845	624,000	16,870
%	100	1.5	2.3	18.78	75.0	2.0
1950	1,581,000	27,771	17,018	275,967	839,399	?
%	100	1.7	1.07	17.45	53.1	?
1960/65	1,831,640	43,947	22,907	355,175	501,479(?)	?
%	100	2.4	1.25	19.44	27.38(?)	?

SOURCES: as in Table 7.—For 1960/65 China is responsible for the great uncertainty.

Table 9: Religious Statistics of Australia and Oceania from 1910 to 1960/65

Year	Total population	Catholics	Other Christians	Jews Muslims	Hindus Budhists	Others without Denomination
1910	6,633	1,244	3,997	36	70	1,286
%	100	18.7	60.2	0.54	1.0	19.3
1950	14,600	2,108	10,562	58?	?	?
%	100	14.4	72.3	0.30	?	?
1960/65	17,722	3,782	10,342	89	?	?
%	100	21.3	58.43	0.5	?	?

SOURCES: as in Tables 7 and 8.

THE SOUTHWARD MOVEMENT OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

It has already been mentioned in another context that the different growth rates of the population in different parts of the world will bring great problems for the Church of the next years and decades. In this context we cannot go more deeply into this.[7]

Nevertheless, one important consequence of the different growth rates should be pointed out: the inexorable shift of the quantitative center of gravity of the Christian world into more southern regions and the nations of the so-called Third World. The problem can be best illustrated with the aid of the following Table 10, which we took from the often mentioned study by Pro Mundi Vita.

TABLE 10: SOUTHWARD MOVEMENT OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD, 1900–2000
(in millions and percentages; boldface = Christians)

	1900			1965			2000
Continent	Popu-lation	Chris-tians	%	Popu-lation	Chris-tians	%	Popu-lation	Chris-tians	%
Europe	298	260	87	440	385	87	526	404	77
North America	82	41	50	213	192	90	354	300	85
U.S.S.R.	130	91	70	231	60	26	353	92	26
Total population of developed world	510			884			1,233
Old Churches		392	77		637	72		796	65
Asia	902	9	1	1,827	62	3	3,457	165	5
Africa	118	4	3	306	75	24	768	351	46
Oceania	6	3	50	17	13	77	32	27	85
Latin America	64	51	80	245	220	90	638	575	90
Total population of Third World	1,090			2,395			4,895
Churches of Third World		67	6		370	15		1,118	23
Total World Population	1,600	459	28.7	3,279	1,007	30.7	6,128	1,914	31.2
Total Non-Christians		1,141			2,272			4,214

SOURCE: Die demographische Explosion, p. 16.

The Organization of the Entire Church from 1914 to 1970

The whole Church, as a spiritual community of believers and necessarily "visible" and as such an organized society of believing human beings within the world, needs an organization that is capable of functioning in order to be able as effectively as possible to carry out the tasks proper to it. The actual organization of the entire Church has changed in many ways in the course of history. At one time it was the result of long experience, but at another time the outcome of more or less spontaneous developments and decisions of individual Popes and/or bodies representing the whole Church, especially councils.

---

[7] If one is interested in details, one is referred to Die demographische Explosion . . . ; cf. there especially pp. 21ff.

The central institution for the administration of the whole Church under the Pope is the Roman Curia (Curia Romana), by which since the end of the eleventh century the totality of the chief administrative offices and courts in Rome that act in the Pope's name for the government of the Catholic Church are designated. In the broader sense the papal household (Familia Pontificia) and the persons bound to participate in the papal liturgy (Cappella Pontificia) are also counted in the Curia. In 1588 Pope Sixtus V reorganized the Curia in order to modernize it and established as the new permanent form of authority the so-called congregations of cardinals. By the constitution Sapienti Consilio of 29 June 1908 (AAS 1 [1909], 7–19) Pius X fundamentally reorganized the Curia. Except for individual decisive changes under Pope Paul VI in 1967[8] the reorganization under Pius X still forms the basic type of the curial constitution. To the Roman Curia belong (Canon 242 of the Code of Canon Law): a) the congregations of cardinals, b) the Paenitentiaria, c) the tribunals and curial offices, d) various commissions of a permanent nature and most recently various secretariats. To the official staff belong the cardinals, the higher officials (officiales maiores: prelates), and also the lower officials (officiales minores), who are designated as "curiales" in the narrower sense.[9]

After the Pope, the cardinals are today the ranking dignitaries of the Catholic Church. They are his advisers and first collaborators in the direction of the entire Church, whether this be within the Curia or outside Rome, especially in the great and important metropolitan sees.[10] Hence these last likewise play a significant role within the organizational structure of the whole Church.

Finally, also counted in the organizational and functional structure of the entire Church is the whole ecclesiastical hierarchy, especially the bishops, governing iure divino their particular churches as ordinary shepherds in communion with the Pope and the college of their episcopal confreres.

The institutional and personal functionaries just mentioned constitute the organization framework of the whole Church ad intra.[11] Externally, that is, in regard to many nations of the world and to international organizations, such as the U.N., UNESCO, and so forth, not the Church but the Holy See maintains diplomatic or quasi-diplomatic relations in the sense of active—nuncios, internuncios, and so forth—and passive—messengers, envoys, and so forth—diplomatic law. Even though this complex does not pertain directly to the formal organization of the whole Church, nevertheless at least the active agents of diplomatic relations on the part of the Holy See are not unimportant for the direction of the whole Church because of their membership in the hierarchy or in the College of Bishops respectively, and because of their actual exerting of influence on the formal members of the ecclesiastical organization, for example, cooperation in the nomination of new bishops.

---

[8] By the apostolic constitution Regimini Ecclesiae universae of 15 August 1967 (AAS 59 [1967] 885–928); cf. HK 21 (1967) 460ff.

[9] On individuals cf. N. del Re, La Curia Romana. Lineamenti storico-giuridici, 2d ed. (Rome 1952); C. A. Berutti, De Curia Romana (Rome 1952); LThK 2d ed., 6 (Freiburg, 1961), 692–94.

[10] Cf. H. W. Klewitz, Die Entstehung des Kardinalskollegiums. Reformpapsttum und Kardinalskollegium (Darmstadt 1957); LThK 2d ed. (Freiburg 1960), 1342–44.

CONGREGATIONS, TRIBUNALS AND OFFICES, COMMISSIONS AND SECRETARIATS OF THE CURIA (1916–68)

Congregations

Congregations are permanent bodies of the Roman Curia, collegially constituted of a certain number of cardinals, with a legally determined content of duties and powers for the government of the entire Church.[12] After Sixtus V had created a comprehensive system of fifteen congregations with defined spheres of business by the constitution Immensa aeterni of 21 January 1588, their number was subject to strong changes in the course of time. Around the middle of the nineteenth century there were almost thirty, and when Pius X succeeded to the papacy there were still twenty-one. In his reform of the Curia this number was restricted to eleven. At the beginning of the period here treated, under Benedict XV, there were thirteen congregations, including the special Congregation for the Fabric of Saint Peter's Basilica, which however did not belong to the general congregations of cardinals.

---

[11] From the organizational-sociological viewpoint one can name the traditional organizational framework of the Catholic Church, as regards the center of gravity, as a "line system" in which, generally with a weak reaction to the at times subordinate stages, essentially directions were given "from above to below," whereas only since the council has this traditional organizational model been gradually completed by elements of a "staff system" on different levels of the line system ("Councils" from the Priests' Council even to the "Council of the Laity" in Rome).

[12] Complete presentation in F. M. Cappello, De Curia Romana; V. Martin, Les Congrégations romaines; in addition, numerous monographs on individual congregations; cf. also E. Eichmann and K. Mörsdorf, Lehrbuch des Kirchenrechts 7th ed. (1953), I, 360ff.

In 1917 Benedict XV abolished the Congregation of the Index. A creation of Benedict's as an autonomous congregation was the Congregatio de propaganda Fide pro negotiis Rituum orientalium.[13]

Tribunals and Offices

The real courts (tribunals) of the Roman Church are only the Rota (Sacra Romana Rota) as the highest court of appeal (Canon 259 of the Code of Canon Law; for details see Canons 1598ff.) and the Segnatura Apostolica (Supremum Signaturae Apostolicae Tribunale) as

---

[13] By the motu proprio Dei providentis of 15 January 1917 (AAS 9 [1917], 529). Following the reorganization resulting from the motu proprio Sancta Dei Ecclesia of Pius XI of 25 March 1938 it became competent for all affairs of the Eastern Churches under the title "S. C. pro Ecclesia Orientali" (AAS 30 [1938], 154ff).

TABLE 11: THE CONGREGATIONS FROM 1916 TO 1968

Name Sacra Congregatio	1916 Benedict XV	1923 Pius XI	1939 Pius XII	1961 John XXIII	1968 Paul VI
Sancti Officii	exist.	exist.	exist.	exist.	since 12/7/1965 Congregatio pro Doctrina Fidei
Consistorialis	exist.	exist.	exist.	exist.	since 8/15/1967 Congregatio pro Episcopis
de Propaganda Fide pro negotiis Rituum Orientalium	exist.	exist.	since 1938 S.C. pro Ecclesia Orientali	exist.	exist.
de Disciplina Sacramentorum	exist.	exist.	exist.	exist.	exist.
Concilii	exist.	exist.	exist.	exist.	since 8/15/1967 Congregatio pro Clericis
Negotiis religiosorum sodalium praeposita	exist.	exist.	exist.	exist.	since 8/15/1967 Congregatio pro Religiosis et Institutis saecularibus

TABLE 11: (Continued)

Name Sacra Congregatio	1916 Benedict XV	1923 Pius XI	1939 Pius XII	1961 John XXIII	1968 Paul VI
de Propaganda Fide	exist.	exist.	exist.	exist.	since 8/15/1967 Congregatio pro gentium Evangelisatione seu de Propaganda Fide
Rituum	exist.	exist.	exist.	exist.	exist.; after 1969 divided into the two following congregations
pro Cultu Divino	—	—	—	—	since 5/31/1969 from the previous congregation
pro Causis Sanctorum	—	—	—	—	since 5/31/1969 as the previous congregation
pro Sacramentis divinoque Cultu	—	—	—	—	since 7/31/1975 from a combination of the two previous congregations
Caeremonialis	exist.	exist.	exist.	exist.	1967; abolished
pro Negotiis Ecclesiasticis extraordinariis	exist.	exist.	exist.	exist.	1967; abolished, in hands of Secretary of State
de Seminariis et Universitatibus studiorum	exist.	exist.	exist.	exist.	since 1967 Congregatio pro Institutione catholica
Indicis	3/25/1917 abolished	—	—	—	—

SOURCES: H. A. Krose, ed., Kirchliches Handbuch für das katholische Deutschland, Vol. 5, 1914–16 (Freiburg i. Br. 1916), pp. 13ff.; ibid., Vol. 11, 1922–23 (Freiburg i. Br. 1923), pp. 8ff.; Zentralstelle für kirchliche Statistik des katholischen Deutschlands, ed., Kirchliches Handbuch für das katholische Deutschland, Vol. 21, 1939–40 (Cologne 1940), pp. 14ff.; F. Groner, ed., Kirchliches Handbuch. Amtliches statistisches Jahrbuch der katholischen Kirche Deutschlands, Vol. 25, 1957–61 (Cologne 1962), pp. 8ff; ibid, Vol. 26, 1962–68 (Cologne 1969), pp. 9ff. All mentioned sources refer to corresponding years of the Annuario Pontificio.

the highest court of administration and reversal of judgment (Canon 259; for details see Canons 1602ff.). The Sacra Paenitentiaria, on the contrary, is the curial court of grace for the internal forum. Since it predominantly grants pardons, it should be considered rather as an administrative office than as a court (Canon 258).[14]

Since they are charged only with duties of administration, the curial offices are merely administrative offices and, in contrast to the congregations, have not a collegial but a monocratic constitution. This was even

TABLE 12: TRIBUNALS AND OFFICES OF THE CURIA FROM 1910 TO 1968

Tribunals Offices	1916 Benedict XV	1923 Pius XI	1939 Pius XII	1961 John XXIII	1968 Paul VI
Tribunals: S. Romana Rota	exist.	exist.	exist.	exist.	exist.
Supr. Signaturae Apost. tribunal	exist.	exist.	exist.	exist.	exist.
S. Paenitentiaria	exist.	exist.	reorganized 3/25/1935	exist.	exist.
Offices: Cancellaria Apostolica	exist.	exist.	exist.	exist.	exist.
Dataria Apostolica	exist.	exist.	exist.	exist.	—
Camera Apostolica	exist.	exist.	exist.	exist.	exist.
Praefectura rerum oeconomicarum S. Sedis	—	—	—	—	8/15/1967 established
Administratio Patrimonii Apost. S. Sedis	—	—	—	—	8/15/1967 established
Apost. Palatii Praefectura	—	—	—	—	8/15/1967 established
Generale Ecclesiae Rationarium	—	—	—	—	8/15/1967 established

SOURCES: as in Table 11.

---

[14] For details see Eichmann-Mörsdorf, op. cit., 369ff. For historical details cf. A. Perathoner, Das kirchliche Gesetzbuch, 5th ed. (Brixen 1931), 147ff., 549ff.

TABLE 13: PAPAL COMMISSIONS FROM 1916 TO 1968
(list incomplete)

Name and Year of Establishment	1916 Benedict XV	1923 Pius XI	1939 Pius XII	1961 John XXIII	1968 Paul VI
Christian Archaeology (1852)	exist.	exist.	exist.	exist.	exist.
Scriptual Studies (1902)	exist.	exist.	exist.	exist.	exist.
Revision and Improvement of the Vulgate (1914)	exist.	exist.	1933 reorganized	exist.	exist.
Authentic Interpretation of the CIC (1917)	—	exist.	exist.	exist.	exist.
For Protection of the Artistic Monuments of the Holy See (1923)	—	exist.	exist.	exist.	exist.
Religious Art in Italy (1924)	—	—	exist.	exist.	exist.
Codification of Eastern Canon Law (1935)	—	—	exist.	exist.	exist.
Film, Radio and Television (1948)	—	—	—	exist.	exist.
Papal Charities (1953)	—	—	—	exist.	exist.
Historical Sciences (1954)	—	—	—	exist.	exist.
Latin America (1958)	—	—	—	exist.	exist.
Revision of the CIC (1963)	—	—	—	—	exist.
Social Communications Media (1964)	—	—	—	—	exist.
The New Vulgate (1965)	—	—	—	—	exist.
The Interpretation of the decrees of Vatican II (1968)	—	—	—	—	exist.

SOURCES: as in Table 11.

true, until the so-called little reform of the Curia by Paul VI in 1967, of the Chancery (Cancellaria Apostolica), which was responsible for the preparation and dispatching of bulls (Canon 260), the Datary (Dataria Apostolica), which was competent for the conferring of the lesser ecclesiastical benefices (Canon 261), the Chamber (Camera Apostolica), to which was entrusted the administration of the temporal property and rights of the Holy See (Canon 262), and finally the Secretariat of State (Secretaria Status), on which was incumbent the responsible direction of the policy of the Holy See. Alongside the Chancery, whose competence was changed by Paul VI, and the Chamber, three new offices were established on 15 August 1967: the Prefecture of the Economic Affairs of the Holy See (Praefectura rerum oeconomicarum S. Sedis), the Administration of the Patrimony of the Holy See (Administratio Patrimonii Apostolicae Sedia), and the Prefecture of the Apostolic Palace (Apostolici Palatii Praefectura). The competence of the Secretariat of State was again defined. It is employed for the immediate aid of the Pope in his efforts for the entire Church as well as for the individual departments of the Roman Curia. At the same time the newly created Office for Ecclesiastical Statistics (Generale Ecclesiae Rationarium) was incorporated into the Secretariat of State. The Datary was abolished.

Commissions

Special tasks, for the most part of a rather lengthy character, are managed by permanent commissions, partly in association with a congregation, partly independently. In the course of time their number has undergone considerable variation and most recently has been greatly enlarged.

Secretariats

Under Pope John XXIII and following the council various secretariats were established in order to assist in realizing in the postconciliar period the basic concern of the council—dialogue of the Church with the world. They are:

—the Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity (motu proprio Superno Dei nutu of 5 June 1960: AAS 52 [1960], 433ff.);

—the Secretariat for Non-Christians (proclaimed in the homily of Paul VI on Pentecost 1964; AAS 56 [1964], 560);

—the Secretariat for Unbelievers (established on 7 April 1965: Annuario Pontificio 1966, p. 1111);

—the Council on the Laity (motu proprio Catholicum Christi Ecclesiam of 6 January 1967: AAS 59 [1967], 25ff.);

—the Papal Commission for Studies Ivstitia et Pax (ibid.).

Table 14: The College of Cardinals According to the Nationality of its Members, 1916–1968
Numbers of Living Members

Land (Nationality)	Numbers in Year
	1916	1923	1939	1961	1968
Italy	29	31	32	34	35
France	6	7	6	8	8
Spain	5	5	3	5	6
United States	4	2	3	6	7
Germany	2	4	4	3	5
Austria	3	2	—	1	1
England	2	2	1	2	2
Portugal	2	1	1	1	2
Hungary	2	1	1	1	1
Netherlands	1	1	—	—	2
Belgium	1	1	1	—	1
Ireland	1	1	1	1	2
Brazil	1	1	1	3	4
Poland	—	2	1	1	3
Canada	—	1	1	2	3
Czechoslovakia	—	1	1	—	1
Argentina	—	—	1	2	2
Syria	—	—	1	1	1
Colombia	—	—	—	1	1
Cuba	—	—	—	1	—
Armenia	—	—	—	1	1
Mexico	—	—	—	1	1
Ecuador	—	—	—	1	1
Uruguay	—	—	—	1	1
Venezuela	—	—	—	1	1
India	—	—	—	1	1
China	—	—	—	1	—
Japan	—	—	—	1	1
Philippines	—	—	—	1	1
Australia	—	—	—	1	1
Portuguese East Africa	—	—	—	1	—
Tanganyika	—	—	—	1	—
Switzerland	—	—	—	—	2
Bolivia	—	—	—	—	1
Chile	—	—	—	—	1
Peru	—	—	—	—	1
Algeria	—	—	—	—	1
Upper Volta	—	—	—	—	1
South Africa	—	—	—	—	1
Tanzania	—	—	—	—	1
Ceylon	—	—	—	—	1
Indonesia	—	—	—	—	1
Egypt	—	—	—	—	1
Yugoslavia	—	—	—	—	1
Total Number	59	63	59	85	109

SOURCES: as in Table 11.

THE COLLEGE OF CARDINALS (1916–68)

The Cardinals constitute the Pope's Senate and are his chief advisers and assistants in the government of the Church (Canon 230). They form a college, whose membership declined in number in the Middle Ages but was fixed by Sixtus V in 1588 at seventy, with reference to the seventy elders of the Israelites (Num. 11:26). They are divided into the orders of cardinal bishops, cardinal priests, and cardinal deacons—formerly 6+50+14. For the first time in the modern period Pope John XXIII exceeded the number seventy in the consistory of 15 December 1958. Only since Pius XII and more strongly since John XXIII, in connection with the numerical enlarging of the Sacred College, was account taken of the stronger internationalization of the College of Cardinals recommended by the Council of Trent.[15]

TITLES AND AREAS OF JURISDICTION IN THE TOTALITY OF THE HIERARCHY OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH (1916–68)

During the pontificate of Pius XI (1922–39) there occurred a strong extension of the number of titles in the totality of the Catholic

TABLE 15: EXISTING TITLES OF THE HIERARCHY OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH FROM 1916 TO 1939

Title	1916	1923	1939
Cardinals	75	70	70
Patriarchs	14	14	14
Metropolitans with residence	214	216	219
Archbishops with residence (without metropolitan rights)	—	—	36
Bishops with residence	849	874	935
Bishops in personal union	65	—	—
Permanent Administrators	9	—	—
Titular Archbishoprics and Bishoprics (without residence)	558	599	772
Archabbeys, Abbeys, Priorates and other Prelates Nullius	23	28	50
Apostolic Delagates	13	18	—
Vicariates Apostolic	172	206	292
Apostolic Prefectures	69	67	135
Missions and Autonomous Areas	—	—	19
Total Number	2,061	2,092	2,542
(Without Titles: = approximate numbers of areas of jurisdiction)	(1,503)	(1,493)	(1,770)

---

[15] Session XXIV de ref. c. 1.

TABLE 16: DEVELOPMENT OF JURISDICTIONAL AREAS FROM 1961 TO 1968

Jurisdictional Areas	Europe		Africa		America		Asia		Australia
	1961	1968	1961	1968	1961	1968	1961	1968	1961	1968
Patriarchates	—	2	2	2	—	—	10	11	—	—
Exarchates	9	10	2	—	1	3	1	1	—	1
Metropolitans (without suffragans)	112	111	40	44	122	146	65	81	6	11
Suffragan Bishops	432	436	151	231	423	510	210	287	22	45
Archbishops (without suffragans)	23	27	3	2	3	1	15	22	2	2
Exempt Bishops	97	89	11	13	8	10	32	26	—	2
Exempt Prelates	7	8	—	1	52	76	7	11	—	—
Exempt Abbeys	13	10	3	3	3	3	1	1	1	1
Administrators	9	5	—	1	1	1	2	2	—	—
Vicariates Apostolic	6	6	20	19	48	41	50	18	28	1
Apostolic Prefectures	—	—	46	20	21	16	57	38	3	—
Independent Mission Areas	—	—	—	—	—	—	5	5	1	1
Ordinariates	3	3	—	—	2	2	—	1	—	—
Priorates	—	1	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—
Total Number	711	728	278	336	684	809	455	504	63	64

SOURCES: Annuario Pontificio, 1961 and 1968; also as in Table 11.

TABLE 17: DEVELOPMENT OF TITLES AND AREAS OF JURISDICTION FROM 1916 TO 1968 (CONSOLIDATED FROM TABLES 15 AND 16)

Year	1916	1923	1939	1961	1968
All titles	2,061	2,092	2,542	3044*	4,205*
Areas of Jurisdiction	ca. 1,503	ca. 1,493	ca. 1,770	2191	2,441

* Without Cardinals, whose number since 1968 has fluctuated between 100 and 130.

hierarchy. In particular, the Pope erected thirty-one mission stations, 139 prefectures apostolic, 113 vicariates apostolic, twenty-three prelacies nullius, 110 episcopal sees, and twenty-seven archbishoprics[16]

DIPLOMATIC REPRESENTATIONS OF THE APOSTOLIC SEE WITH THE NATIONS AND OF THE NATIONS WITH THE APOSTOLIC SEE (1916–68)

The Apostolic See exercises the active and the passive diplomatic right (Canons 265ff.). It appoints extraordinary envoys for specific

---

[16] Cf. Kirchliches Handbuch für das katholische Deutschland 21 (1939–40) (Cologne 1939), 2ff.

TABLE 18: ACTIVE REPRESENTATION OF THE HOLY SEE, 1916–1968
(a) with governments and governmental agencies
(b) governments at the Apostolic See

Rank of the Representative (Apostolic See only)	1916		1923		1961		1968
	(a)	(b)	(a)	(b)	(a)	(b)	(a)	(b)
Nunciatures	4		19		31		61
Pro- or Inter-nunciatures	5		5		11		1
Delegations	6		—		17		16
Total Number	15	16	24	25	59	47	78	65

SOURCES: as in Table 11.

occasions and maintains permanent representatives in nations or in larger areas—nuncios, internuncios, apostolic delegates. By tradition the apostolic nuncio is the dean of the diplomatic corps accredited to the state in question. The internuncio holds the rank of a minister plenipotentiary. The extraordinary envoys also have diplomatic status; the delegates do not.

The Apostolic See also receives the diplomatic representatives of states, partly extraordinary and temporary, partly ordinary and permanent. They enjoy all privileges and freedoms which by international law pertain to diplomatic representatives, even with respect to Italy, in whose territory they live. All accredited representatives of the states together constitute the diplomatic corps at the Apostolic See. The representatives bear partly the title "Ambassador Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary" (Ambasciatore Straordinario e Plenipotenziario), partly the title "Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary" (Inviato Straordinario e Ministro Plenipotenziario).[17]

In addition, the Apostolic See maintains representation, chiefly by so-called "permanent observers," at the following international organizations: (1.) The United Nations in New York; (2.) Office of the United Nations and Special Institutes in Geneva; (3.) International Atomic Energy Office in Vienna; (4.) Organization of the U.N. for Food and Agriculture (FAO) in Rome; (5.) Organization of the U.N. for Education, Scholarship, and Culture (UNESCO) in Paris; (6.) Council of Europe in Brussels; (7.) International Institute for the Standardization of Private Law in the Vatican; (8.) International Committee for the study of Military Medicine and Health in Tirlemont; (9.) International Union for the Official Tourism Organizations (UIOOT); (10.) International Geographical Association.[18]

---

[17] Cf. U. Stutz, "Die päpstliche Diplomatie under Leo XIII. nach den Denkwürdigkeiten des Kardinals Domenico Ferrara," op. cit.; A. Verdross, "Die Stellung des Apostolischen Stuhles in der internationalen Geminschaft," Österr. Archiv für Kirchenrecht 3 (1952), 54–68; G. de Marchi, Le Nunziature Apostoliche dal 1800 al 1957 (Rome 1959); Annuario Pontificio.

Final Observation: The development of the organizational structure of the entire Church, unchanged in essence since 1914, increasingly takes into account, in almost all its institutional and personnel function-population.[19] This applies to the greater internationalization of the College of Cardinals as well as to the expansion of the ecclesiastical hierarchy in the countries of the Third World. This process of regrouping seems to have thus far affected even the Roman Curia itself.

---

[18] F. Groner, ed., Kirchliches Handbuch. Amtliches Statistisches Jahrbuch der katholischen Kirche Deutschlands 26 (1962–68) (Cologne 1969), 16.
[19] See Table 10, page 9.

CHAPTER 2

*Popes Benedict XV, Pius XI, and Pius XII Biography and Activity within the Church

Benedict XV

Giacomo Paolo Battista Della Chiesa was born at Genoa on 21 November 1854, the son of the Marchese Giuseppe; he had two brothers and a sister. A great-uncle was a Capuchin. After finishing his college preparatory work, from 1869 as an extern he studied philosophy in the archepiscopal seminary and then, at the University of Genoa, the laws, in which he took his doctorate in 1875. As a member of the Capranica College at Rome he studied theology and listened to the Jesuit Franzelin; on 21 December 1878 he was ordained a priest and until 1882 continued his studies in the Accademia dei Nobili. After he had finished them, he was accepted, on Rampolla's recommendation, into the Congregation for Extraordinary Ecclesiastical Affairs. In 1882 Rampolla took him along as secretary to the Spanish nunciature. In Madrid he was known to the poor as "Curate of the Two Pesetas" because of his generous alms.

When in 1887 Rampolla was appointed cardinal secretary of state, Della Chiesa became his close collaborator, first as minutante and from

---

* Hubert Jedin

1901 as Sostituto (undersecretary of state). It was a purely diplomatic career, but parallel with it went a zealous activity in the care of souls at the church of Sant'Eustachio and catechetical instruction in the Girls' Home of the Daughters of Charity, besides conferences in the boarding school at Santa Trinità. The undersecretary of state survived Rampolla's fall, because the latter's successor, Merry del Val, could not do without the experienced Sostituto. Only in 1907 was he named, not nuncio in Madrid, as he had wanted, but archbishop of Bologna. His episcopal ordination by Pius X in the Sistine Chapel on 21 December 1907 called forth the expression that, while he had to yield to the new course in the Secretariat of State, he still possessed the personal good will of the Pope.

Giacomo Della Chiesa was small of stature, slight, and somewhat misshapen, but of an active mind, clear thinking and clever, a finished diplomat, filled with zeal for souls. He took his removal from the Vatican well, visited the 390 parishes of his diocese, held conferences of deans, and twice, in 1910 and 1913, convoked his suffragan bishops in council. Not until seven years after his appointment as archbishop of Bologna did he receive the red hat, on 25 May 1914. When his mother complained to Pius X about the long delay, she received the reply: "Your son takes few but long steps." The prediction was verified. As he began his journey to Rome for the conclave, a fellow countryman reminded him of his predecessor at Bologna, Prospero Lambertini, who had mounted the See of Peter as Benedict XIV: "Prospere, procede, et regna" (Ps. 44:4). The Cardinal replied dryly: "My name is not Prospero, but Giacomo."

In the conclave (31 August to 3 September 1914)[1] the norms decreed by Pius X were strictly observed, the Italian state guaranteed freedom of election, the imperial German government permitted Cardinal Mercier to leave occupied Belgium. Of the sixty-five qualified electors, sixty took part in the election. Confronting each other were the "Pius Circle," as whose head ranked the influential De Lai and as whose candidate there first came forth during the conclave the former abbot general of the Subiaco Congregation, Domenico Serafini, and on the other side the circle of "progressive" cardinals, which was for Ferrata or Gasparri. At the start the most promising candidacy seemed to be that of Cardinal Maffi of Pisa, "italianissimo" and a diocesan bishop, like the last three Popes; on the second ballot he received sixteen votes, the same number as Della Chiesa, whom the German and Austrian cardinals preferred. From the fifth ballot Della Chiesa moved ahead of

---

[1] Summarized on the basis of the literary remains of Lafontaine and, for 1922, of Piffl. J. Lenzenweger in Linzer Theol-Prakt. Quartalschrift 1964, 51–58.

Serafini, who in the eighth ballot still obtained twenty-four votes, but the tenth ballot brought the decision: thirty-eight votes out of fifty-seven for Della Chiesa. The adherents of Rampolla had carried the day.

None of the papal garments on hand was small enough for the newly elected Pope. In memory of his great predecessor Lambertini, who had likewise come from Bologna, he called himself Benedict XV. Familiar with persons and the spirit of the Vatican because of his long activity in the Secretariat of State, from the first moment he moved with assurance and awareness of his goal. He transferred his coronation on 6 September to the Sistine Chapel, named as his secretary of state the former nuncio at Paris, Ferrata, and, after the latter's death on 10 October, Gasparri. The Pope's first pastoral word on 8 September and his first encyclical on 1 November were calls for peace.

In the next four years the world war put narrow limits on the Pope's activity within the Church. Not until after the armistice did there come the doctrinal letter on Saint Jerome (15 September 1920)[2] and the naming of Saint Ephrem the Syrian as a Doctor of the Church[3] (5 October 1920); he honored Dante on the six-hundredth anniversary of his death[4] and the founder of the Order of Preachers, Dominic, who is buried at Bologna, on his seven-hundredth.[5] The canonizations of Margaret Mary Alacoque and Joan of Arc were regarded by the French as a triumph of victorious Catholic France.

In accord with the program of Leo XIII, he founded Catholic universities at Lublin and Milan. The ecclesiastical event of the pontificate that had the widest influence was the new codification of the Canon Law, planned since the close of the sixteenth century but again and again postponed (see Chapter 5). The Uniate Eastern Churches were removed from the competence of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith in 1917 and a special Congregation for Seminaries was founded in 1915. The greatest merit of the skillful, diplomatically experienced Pope was that he had piloted the ship of the Church through the reefs of the First World War and was able to maintain the neutrality of the Holy See (see Chapter 3). He died on 22 January 1922.

Pius XI

Achille Ratti came from the industrial middle class of Lombardy. His father was employed as a factory manager in the silk industry. His mother was Teresa Galli. Born on 31 May 1857, his parents' fifth child, he attended the private elementary school of the priest Volontieri and spent the vacations with his uncle, Damiano Ratti, provost of Asso. From 1867 he pursued his classical studies at the seminaries of Seveso, Monza, and San Carlo, but concluded them at the Milan State Lyceum. After a three-year course at the Milan seminary for priests, he went in 1879 to the Lombard College at Rome, heard lectures on canon law at the Gregoriana, where the later general of the Jesuits, Wernz, was one of his teachers, and also theology at the Roman Sapienza and philosophy at the Academy of Saint Thomas. He was ordained a priest in the Lateran on 20 December 1879.

---

[2] AAS 12 (1920), 385–422.

[3] Ibid., 457–71.

[4] AAS 13 (1921), 209–17.

[5] Ibid., 329–35.

Having returned to Milan in 1882, he worked for five years as professor of homiletics and of dogma at the seminary until in 1888 he was admitted to the College of Doctors of the Ambrosian Library. As librarian he displayed versatility and established relations with scholars of many countries, including Grabmann, Ehrhard, and Kehr; with the last named he practiced his German. In 1907 he succeeded Ceriani as prefect. The fruit of his scholarly works was the Acta ecclesiae Mediolanensis, with Charles Borromeo as the center, and the Missale Ambrosianum. As an Oblate of San Sepolcro he was active in the care of souls, and he was on friendly terms with Catholic intellectuals, such as Contardo Ferrini. His recreation was Alpine climbing, including the ascent of Mont Blanc and the Matterhorn, and journeys to Germany and France.

At the suggestion of Ehrle he became vice-prefect, then in 1914 prefect of the Vatican Library. But as early as the beginning of 1918 he was removed from this activity and named apostolic visitor in Poland, which was at that time still occupied by German and Austrian troops. By way of Munich, Vienna, and Berlin, where he called on Imperial Chancellor Hertling, he reached Warsaw on 30 May 1918. Politically much was in a state of flux: the visitor assured the bishops whom he called on and the Polish people of the Pope's good will. After the Republic of Poland had been established, he became nuncio and titular archbishop of Lepanto; on 19 July 1919 he presented his credentials to President Pilsudski.

Nuncio Ratti succeeded in restoring five bishoprics that had been suppressed under Russian rule, in seeing to the appointment of new bishops, and in bringing about the first episcopal conferences. When in August 1919 the Bolshevik armies stood before Warsaw, the nuncio remained at his post. He was able at least to mitigate the oppression of the Ukrainian Uniates but not, however, to go into the Soviet Union and Finland. Appointed apostolic visitor of the area of Upper Silesia that was subject to a plebiscite, he went to Oppeln in April 1920 and in July also into the part of East Prussia that was subject to a plebiscite. His conduct in the struggle over the plebiscite satisfied neither side. When on 29 November 1920 Prince-Bishop Bertram of Breslau (Wroclaw), with the Pope's consent, forbade political propaganda to the Upper Silesian clergy of both nations, under threat of suspension, the Poles obtained the recall of the nuncio.

There followed a sudden rise. Appointed archbishop of Milan and cardinal on 13 June 1921, he entered his diocese on 5 September 1921 after a month of quiet recollection at Monte Cassino and immediately displayed an almost feverish-seeming activity: when visiting the monasteries and ecclesiastical institutes he sometimes preached from five to ten times a day. On 8 December he opened the Catholic University of the Sacred Heart. He held up as models of his episcopal work the two great bishops of Milan, Ambrose and Charles Borromeo, with whom he had occupied himself as a scholar. But only five months of episcopal activity were granted to Ratti in his home diocese. The death of Benedict XV called him to Rome for the conclave of 2 to 6 February 1922.[6] Fifty-three cardinals took part in it, including thirty-one Italians. At the start the same factions stood in confrontation as in the conclave of 1914. The German and Austrian cardinals—Bertram, Faulhaber, Schulte, and Piffl—at first came out for Gasparri, until now secretary of state. The candidacy of Merry del Val, which had found some response in the first five ballotings, proved to be hopeless, and so the moderate Lafontaine, patriarch of Venice, came into prominence and received twenty-three votes on the eleventh ballot; the representative of the other faction, Gasparri, obtained twenty-four votes on the eighth ballot. Neither of the parties could achieve the two-thirds majority. This reason procured for the compromise candidate, Ratti, an increasing number of votes from the eleventh ballot. He was elected on the fourteenth ballot, 6 February 1922, with forty-two out of fifty-three votes; even Maffi and Mercier were for him. He chose as his motto Pax Christi in Regno Christi, which was explained in his first encyclical, Ubi arcano, and was later enlarged on in the encyclical on the Kingship of Christ in 1925: Christianity and Church must not, as liberal laicism wished, be excluded from the life of society but must be active in it.

He was the first scholarly Pope since Benedict XIV. He was recommended by his broad knowledge, his considerable knowledge of languages and international relations, and not least his acquaintance with modern scientific investigation. But not only by these gifts. As a pious priest, he had constantly been active in pastoral care, and as nuncio he acquired experience of ecclesiastical politics. His special energy gave promise of initiatives in many areas of ecclesiastical life. His health was excellent, his springy gait, even when he was in his seventies, made clear that he had succeeded in maintaining it by regular walks in the Vatican gardens.

---

[6] See above n. 1; the acts, AAS 16 (1924), 109ff.

"Life is action" ("La vita è azione," according to Confalonieri) was one of his maxims; another was "Don't put off until tomorrow what you can do today." Of a character like granite, "born to command" ("nato per il comando," according to Confalonieri), the formerly reserved Pope radiated inner assurance and a strong consciousness of authority. With strict objectivity and painstaking order he carried through in deliberate calmness his program of work, in which the several hours of constant reception of pilgrimages, which he addressed if at all possible in their native languages, occupied a broad, perhaps too broad, part. He did not think much of delegating the preparation of papal decisions to commissions: not entirely without reason was he reproached for an authoritarian, even autocratic, conduct of his office. The College of Cardinals was strongly deemphasized. Still another maxim: "Laws are to be observed, not to be dispensed with" (Confalonieri). Was he a fighter? It is certain that, where Christian principles and the Church's basic rights were at stake, he was as unflinching as his model, Ambrose. His devotion was "una pietà all'antica"; even at the age of eighty he held fast to the exercises of piety with which he was familiar from his seminary days: the breviary, the rosary, visit to the Blessed Sacrament, retreats. Lest even the suspicion of nepotism should appear, he received his relatives, not in his private apartments, but in the official reception halls.

The pontificate began with a surprise. Pius XI, as he called himself, because he was born under one Pope Pius and had come to Rome under another Pope Pius, imparted the blessing "Urbi et Orbi," customary at the proclaiming of the election, from the external loggia of Saint Peter's Basilica, thereby indicating that he intended to move toward a solution of the Roman Question. Even before his coronation on 12 February, he confirmed the previous secretary of state, Gasparri, in his office and thus made known that he planned to maintain the previous direction of Church government; when he sent him to Loreto as papal legate, he called him "the most loyal interpreter and implementer of his will." Even more decisively than Benedict XV, he held himself aloof from certain measures during the strife over Modernism, in which he rehabilitated Francesco Lanzoni and without advance concessions restored to Albert Ehrhard the prelatial dignity he had been deprived of. The scholarly Pope regarded the promotion of science and of serious scholarship as his peculiar duty. He had the reading rooms of the Vatican Library modernized and enlarged; he gave the purple to his predecessor in the position of prefect of the library, Franz Ehrle, and to his successors, Giovanni Mercati and Eugène Tisserant. The Oriental Institute founded by Benedict XV and the Papal Archaelogical Institute established by himself obtained sumptuous sites near Santa Maria Maggiore. For the Vatican collection of paintings he erected the new Pinacoteca. The means for all this were provided by the indemnity payments agreed to by the Italian government in the Lateran Treaties.

The Italian bishops were instructed to take care of a better preservation and organization of existing archives. In order to complete the collection of papal documents to 1198, begun by Paul Kehr, he established the Piusstiftung in Switzerland. Of great importance was the reform of priestly formation, into which modern scientific methods, for example, the employment of seminars and the production of scholarly dissertations, were incorporated.[7] A historical section for the completing of the processes of beatification and canonization was added to the Congregation of Rites. The Pope took into account the significance of the natural sciences, with the results of which he was completely fascinated, by founding in 1936 an Accademia delle Scienze, into which were admitted important students of science from the entire world.

The Pope exercised the apostolic teaching authority in numerous encyclicals, which in part were related to historical anniversaries. In his first encyclical of 23 December 1922[8] he admonished the victors of the world war to reconciliation of peoples. On the occasion of the ecumenical conferences of Stockholm and Lausanne he warned against vague formulas of union and urged unity in faith.[9] As "Pope of Jubilees," he liked to use historical anniversaries to consider problems of the present: on the three-hundredth anniversary of the death of Francis De Sales the connection of being in the world and loyalty to principle;[10] six hundred years after his canonization he called Thomas Aquinas the "Guide in Studies";[11] seven hundred years after the canonization of Francis of Assisi he aimed to strengthen the Franciscan spirit in the Church;[12] fifteen hundred years after the death of Saint Augustine he glorified him as a light for his contemporaries and for our age;[13] and the Jubilee of the Council of Ephesus in 1931 gave him the opportunity to strengthen devotion to Mary.

Other encyclicals recommended participation in retreats, devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus and the rosary, or inculcated the bases of Christian education[14] and Christian married life.[15] The encyclicals on Catholic Action and against atheistic Communism[16] advanced still farther into the social field. Out of the conviction that in Fascist Italy no political but only a religious association of Catholics was possible, he sought to realize this insight in the whole Catholic world. For Italy a Central Council of Catholic Action had been appointed as early as November 1922: it supervised the activity of the organizations, of the diocesan commissions, of the youth organizations, and of the university federations. During the succeeding years Catholic Action was introduced in many countries—Spain, Portugal, Poland, Yugoslavia, Austria. In Switzerland and the Anglo-Saxon countries there were hesitations, because its basic aim had already been realized. For the same reason there existed doubts in already overorganized Germany; nevertheless, the Pope pressed for the introduction in his letter to Cardinal Bertram of 13 November 1928. That it was not to be understood as a withdrawal of the Church to a ghetto was made clear by the encyclical Quadragesimo anno, which attached itself directly to the social program of Leo XIII (see Chapter 7).

---

[7] Constitution Deus scientiarum in AAS 23 (1931), 241–84, supplemented by the encyclical on the priesthood of 22 December 1935 in AAS 27 (1935), 5–51.

[8] AAS 14 (1922), 673–700.

[9] AAS 20 (1928), 5–16.

[10] AAS 15 (1923), 49–63

[11] AAS 15 (1923), 309–26.

[12] AAS 18 (1926), 153–75.

[13] AAS 22 (1930), 201–34.

The "Pope of Jubilees" celebrated three Jubilee Years: the Jubilee falling according to the cycle in 1925, for which more than a half million pilgrims came to Rome; the missionary exposition organized at the same time attracted seven hundred fifty thousand visitors; the Holy Year closed with the instituting of the solemnity of Christ the King. Extraordinary jubilees were celebrated on the occasion of the Pope's golden jubilee of his priesthood in 1929 and in memory of the Incarnation and Redemption by Jesus Christ from Easter 1933 to Easter 1934; in the following year it was extended to the whole world. The world Eucharistic Congresses at Rome in 1922, Amsterdam in 1924, Chicago in 1926, Sydney in 1928, Carthage in 1930, Dublin in 1932, Buenos Aires in 1934, Rio de Janeiro in 1936, Manila in 1937, and Budapest in 1938 made people aware of the universality of the Church.

In the allocutions customary before Christmas the Pope took care to give to the College of Cardinals summaries of the most important ecclesiastical events of the year. Thus in 1923 he spoke of the aid to the populations of the Central Powers and of Russia, in 1926 and at other times of the persecution of the Church in Mexico, the menacing development in China, but also of the important happenings in Europe. He strengthened the College of Cardinals by eight members in his first creation; in the next years he filled up only with difficulty the vacancies caused by death and extended, though again only slowly, the representation of other continents in the college: in 1924 through the elevation of the archbishops of New York and Chicago, in 1930 of the archbishop of Rio de Janeiro. Not until 1935 did there follow a great promotion of twenty cardinals, but there were only two non-Europeans among them—Buenos Aires and the Syrian patriarch of Antioch. He left to his successors the step discussed by him toward a numerical internationalization of the College of Cardinals.

---

[14] AAS 21 (1929), 723–62.

[15] Casti conubii of 31 December 1930 in AAS 22 (1930), 539–92.

[16] Divini Redemptoris in AAS 29 (1937), 65–106.

Noteworthy among the numerous beatifications and canonizations are those of: Robert Bellarmine, beatified in 1923 and canonized and declared a Doctor of the Church in 1930; Peter Canisius in 1925, when he was also declared a Doctor of the Church; Albertus Magnus in 1931, also a Doctor of the Church; the curé of Ars in 1925; Don Bosco, beatified in 1929 and canonized in 1935; Conrad of Parzham in 1934; Bernadette Soubirous, beatified in 1925 and canonized in 1933. In addition to many founders of religious institutes, martyrs in the missions were preferred: in 1935 John de Brébeuf and his companions, who had shed their blood in Canada in the seventeenth century; the Korean martyrs of 1839 in 1926; the Syrian martyrs of 1860 in 1926. The most imposing canonization of this sort was that of the English witnesses to the faith, John Fisher and Thomas More, in 1935.

Through all the internal ecclesiastical activity of Pius XI there runs like a red thread the awareness that the Church, to a degree never achieved before in its history, had become a World Church. This fact found expression in the extension of the international relations of the Holy See: at the end of the pontificate it maintained thirty-seven nunciatures and twenty-three apostolic delegations, and thirty-six ambassadors or ministers were accredited to the Pope.

Already marked by a mortal illness, the Pope planned an address that was to be delivered on the anniversary of the "reconciliation" with a fierce protest against the ecclesiastical policy of Fascist Italy, but he died on the previous evening, 10 February 1939. His successor was his secretary of state, Pacelli.

Pius XII

Pius XII came from a family of Roman jurists closely connected with the papacy. His grandfather, Marcantonio (1804–90), was from 1851 to 1870 deputy of the papal minister of the interior; the latter's son, Filippo (1837–1916), second oldest of ten children, was an advocate at the Rota and from 1896 consistorial advocate; as a legal adviser he participated in the codification of the canon law. By his wife, Virginia

Graziosi (1844–1920), he had two sons: Francesco, who played a role in the preparatory negotiations of the Lateran Treaties, and of whom were born the papal nephews, Carlo, Marcantonio, and Giulio; and Eugenio, the future Pope. In addition, the Pope had two sisters, Giuseppa Mengarini and Elisabetta Rosignani.

Eugenio, born on 2 March 1876, attended the state secondary school Visconti and, after finishing there, he pursued philosophy at the Gregoriana from 1894 to 1899, while he was a member of the Collegio Capranica. He studied theology at Sant'Apollinare as an extern, but at the same time for an entire year he heard lectures at the state University Sapienza, including those of the ancient historian Beloch. He was ordained to the priesthood on 2 April 1899 by the cardinal vicar of Rome in the latter's private chapel. He celebrated his first Mass in the Borghese Chapel of Santa Maria Maggiore, and on the next day a Mass at the tomb of Saint Philip Neri in the Chiesa Nuova. This procedure is informative for his later career.

Favored by Cardinal Vannutelli, a friend of his father's, after the completion of his legal studies at Sant'Apollinare (1899–1902), he entered the Congregation for Extraordinary Ecclesiastical Affairs as a minutante in 1904; its secretary, Pietro Gasparri, requisitioned him for cooperation in the codification of canon law. Pacelli became undersecretary in 1911 and secretary of the congregation in 1914. Parallel to this, from 1909 to 1914, he was teaching at the Accademia dei Nobili and performing pastoral work as confessor, preacher, and lecturer.

The career of the young Pacelli was exclusively carried out in the area of Rome and the Vatican until on 20 April 1917 he was appointed nuncio in Munich. Benedict XV himself ordained him as archbishop of Sardes on 13 May 1917 in the Sistine Chapel and thereby made clear that he enjoyed the full confidence of the Pope in the discussion to be undertaken by him of the aims of the war with the German government. On 26 June the nuncio conferred with Imperial Chancellor Count von Hertling and on 29 June he was received in the imperial headquarters (see Chapter 3).

After the overthrow of the monarchy, Pacelli was on 22 June 1920 made the first nuncio to the German Republic, while retaining temporarily the Munich nunciature, and, as its occupant, on 29 March 1924 he signed the Bavarian concordat. Not until 1925 did he move definitively to Berlin. The reputation and influence of the "perhaps most skillful diplomat of the Curia," as the German evangelical Korrespondenz put it, grew from year to year. He regularly participated in the German Catholic Days, at which he gave the address. Later he remembered with pleasure these years in Berlin.

Recalled at the end of 1929 and created a cardinal on 16 December, on 7 February 1930 he became Gasparri's successor as secretary of state, and as such he signed concordats with Baden and Austria as well as the concordat with Germany. On 25 March 1930 he was named archpriest of Saint Peter's as successor of Merry del Val. He became known to the Universal Church through legations to Buenos Aires in 1934, Lourdes and Lisieux in 1935 and 1937 respectively, and Budapest in 1938. In 1936 he visited the United States in a private capacity. And so, at the end of Pius XI's reign he was the best known cardinal, and in the College of Cardinals there was a consensus that he was preeminently qualified to guide the Universal Church through the storm of the threatening war, as had Benedict XV, who had had a similar career, during the First World War. The conclave lasted only one day, 2 March 1939: Pacelli was elected as early as the third ballot, with forty-eight out of sixty-three votes, and assumed the name Pius XII. No secretary of state had obtained the tiara since 1667. His coronation on 12 March took place, out of regard for the masses of people whom Saint Peter's could not hold, on the loggia over the principal portal. It was the first to be carried on radio. As his secretary of state the new Pope named the Neapolitan Luigi Maglione, who had been nuncio at Paris until 1935.

When in the summer of 1939 the danger of war grew more real, the Pope in a radio broadcast to the world on 24 August urged peace: "Nothing is lost through peace; all can be lost through war." The appeal was made in vain. When the new Pope's first encyclical appeared on 20 October, the Second World War had begun. While it raged, the Pope, relying on his moral authority, could only urge peace again and again and demand a just and humane treatment of the civil population in the militarily occupied areas. The information bureau set up in the Vatican collected the names of prisoners of war and the missing and supplied information on them to their families—from July 1941 to December 1946, 1,162,627 particulars were furnished. After the bombing of 19 July 1943 the Pope personally visited the severely hit city quarter of San Lorenzo and succeeded in getting the Italian government to declare Rome an "open city." In order to improve the providing of foodstuffs to the city crowded with refugees, provisions were brought from central and upper Italy in Vatican truck convoys.

Like Benedict XV after the First World War, so also Pius XII did not regard the time as suitable for filling the vacancies in the College of Cardinals until after the concluding of the armistice. In order to make of this a "living image of the universality of the Church," on 18 February 1946 he named thirty-two cardinals from all parts of the world, among them Armenian Patriarch Agagianian and the archbishops of New York, Saint Louis, Toronto, São Paulo, Rio de Janeiro, Santiago de Chile, Lima, Havana, Sydney, Lourenço Marques, and the Chinese Tien; the Pope displayed courage by giving the purple also to three Germans: to Archbishop Frings of Cologne and Bishops Count Galen of Münster and Count Preysing of Berlin. A further step toward internationalizing the College was the promotion of twenty-four cardinals on 19 January 1953. Among them were the archbishops of Los Angeles, Montreal, Quito, Bahia, and Bombay. The proportion of Italians dropped to one-third.

In the thirty-three canonizations which Pius XII performed, French and Italians predominated, among the latter being Pius X in 1954.

Unaffected by the war was the exercise of the papal teaching office, which in several respects prepared the ground for the Second Vatican Council: the encyclical Mystici Corporis of 29 June 1943 on the Church,[17] followed on 30 September of the same year by the encyclical Divino afflante Spiritu on Holy Scripture, which encouraged the investigation of the literal sense and regard for literary forms and allowed biblical scholarship more freedom than had been permitted it during the defense against Modernism.[18] The constitution Sacramentum ordinis of 30 November 1947 defined as the essence of the Sacrament of Orders the invocation of the Holy Spirit through the imposition of hands; the symbolic presentation of chalice and paten do not pertain to it.[19] The bull Munificentissimus Deus of 1 November 1950 defined, without eliminating all the scientific difficulties, the dogma of the bodily Assumption of the Mother of God into heaven. The constitution Sempiternus Rex of September 1951 laid the foundation for the encyclical Haurietis aquas of 15 May 1956 on devotion to the Sacred Heart.[20] The encyclical Humani generis of 12 August 1950 basically accepted theological progress but warned against the relativization of dogmas and the all too close accommodation to the trends of the day.[21] The constitution Sedes sapientiae of 31 May 1956 extended the circle of theological departments of study in accord with the demands of modern pastoral work.[22]

No Pope before Pius XII treated as often and as forcibly as he in his numerous and always carefully prepared addresses to pilgrims, participants in congresses, and members of the most varied professions the general themes of Christian life—human dignity, formation of conscience, marriage and the family—and questions of professional ethics—jurists, physicians, natural scientists, and others—and referred to the importance of the mass media—press, film, radio, and television. To the Lenten preachers of Rome he took care to speak on the sacraments as sources of sanctification. He remained rather reserved in regard to the ecumenical movement that grew so powerfully after the war.

---

[17] AAS 35 (1943), 143–248.
[18] AAS 35 (1943), 297–325.
[19] AAS 40 (1948), 5–7.
[20] AAS 48 (1956), 303–53.
[21] AAS 42 (1950), 561–78.
[22] AAS 48 (1956), 354–64.

But his liturgical reforms were epoch-making. Accepting the basic idea of the liturgical movement, the encyclical Mediator Dei of 20 November 1947 demanded the active participation of the faithful in the Sacrifice of the Mass, declared the reception of Communion to be desirable, though not necessary, and rejected the move to do away with cult forms that were unknown in antiquity.[23] The Evening Mass, granted during the war out of regard for nocturnal bombardments, was definitively allowed by the constitution Christus Dominus of 6 January 1953, and at the same time the Eucharistic fast was modified.[24] But perhaps the Pope's greatest deed in this field was the decree of the Congregation of Rites of 1 February 1951, which restored the Easter Vigil Liturgy. The new translation of the psalms, introduced in 1945, eliminated the translation mistakes in the Vulgate, but in the next years had to be again assimilated to the text made sacred by tradition. In September 1956 the First Liturgical World Congress met at Assisi.

Of the exhaustive legislative activity of the jurist Pope (see Chapter 5), to be singled out because of their general importance are the new decrees on the conclave and the papal election: photographic and radio apparatus could not be brought in, and television speakers and writers could not be employed; one vote over the two-thirds majority was needed to elect the Pope.[25] A step on to new ground was the constitution Provida Mater Ecclesia of 2 February 1947: it laid down rules for secular institutes, whose members bound themselves to the observance of the evangelical counsels without living in community.[26]

The slender, ascetically active Pope with the Roman head, who always took great care of his external appearance, was without doubt in the succession of Popes of the twentieth century the most brilliant phenomenon, admired by non-Catholics even more than by Catholics. He appeared to them as the perfect Pontifex, in form and looks the incarnation of the Roman Catholic Universal Church. The Romans never forgot that in the most difficult days of the war he had stayed with them and had been their single protector. Although he had three Germans in his immediate entourage—the Jesuits Robert Leiber and Augustine Bea and the former leader of the Center Party, Ludwig

[23] AAS 39 (1947), 521–95.
[24] AAS 45 (1953), 15–24.
[25] AAS 38 (1946), 65–99.
[26] AAS 39 (1947), 114–24.

Kaas—and as his housekeeper Sister Pasqualina of the Congregation of the Swiss Sisters of the Cross, and although he employed the German Jesuits Gundloch and Hürth as advisers, he was far from favoring Germany or even of pursuing a pro-German policy. Earlier than many Germans, he had recognized the threat to Christianity from National Socialism, although the threat from Bolshevism seemed to him still greater. He, and only he, piloted the Universal Church; in his hand all the strings of the Church's direction ran together. In a clearly superhuman working achievement he obtained for himself from acts the insights from which his decisions proceeded. After the death of his secretary of state, Maglione, on 22 August 1944, he appointed no successor and governed in direct contact with the heads of the two departments of the Secretariat of State, Montini and Tardini. As time passed, the College of Cardinals was more and more removed from transactions. In his relations with people he astounded them by his unerring remembrance of persons and charmed them by his amiability. His undoubted deep personal piety was strongly Marian under the influence of the apparitions at Fatima and misled opportunistic theologians to an excessive Mariology. Though viewed from without, the Catholic Church under the pontificate of Pius XII operated as a monolith in the whirlpool of the upheavals of world history, the Pope could only hesitatingly draw under the spell of his juridically stamped image of the Church the results that presented themselves and were even necessary for the accommodation to the new hour of world history. Only his successor dared to do so, and the Second Vatican Council introduced the new epoch. It must remain undecided whether he would have implemented the plans attributed to him of reorganizing the Curia and summoning a council,[27] even if the deterioration of his strength from which he suffered in his last years and which his physician sought in vain to arrest, had not impaired his activity.[28] Painful indiscretions of the physician overshadowed his last days and his death on 9 October 1958 at Castel Gandolfo.

---

[27] G. Caprile, "Pio XII e un nuovo progetto di concilio ecumenico," CivCatt 117, 2 (1966), 209–27.

[28] Presentation by the physician R. Galenzzi Lisi, Dans l'hombre et dans la lumière de Pie XII (Paris 1960).

CHAPTER 3

*Foreign Policy of the Popes in the Epoch of the World Wars

The First World War and the Postwar Years: Benedict XV

Benedict XV has frequently been called a "political" Pope in contrast to his predecessor, who was a "religious" Pope. This is correct to the extent that Benedict XV, who was likewise a "religious" Pope, was confronted in foreign policy by problems of greater impact than was any of his predecessors since 1815. As early as the beginning of September 1914 the war had expanded beyond the boundaries of Europe and become a "world war." It soon took on proportions for which historical memory could find no comparable examples. Two-thirds of the Catholics of the time were directly involved in this war, 124 million on the side of the Entente, 64 million on the side of the Central Powers. The third of the Catholics living in countries not engaged in the war were, except for German-speaking Switzerland and Spain, under the overwhelming propaganda influence of the Entente Powers.

It goes without saying that the war, with its presumed consequences, constituted a powerful criterion for the voting of the cardinals in the conclave of 1914, which was able to take place without hindrances, but it was hardly the decisive factor. Thus, the papal electors from the Central Powers were from the start for Della Chiesa, but the ecclesiastical questions—integralism and its problems—were more important to them than political considerations.[1] The same must have been true of most other cardinals.

For the new Pope the question of the correct foreign policy course never became publicly a problem for the solution of which there would basically have been alternatives. From the first hour three points of orientation determined his answer to the challenge of the war: strict neutrality, charitable measures of assistance, and the call for peace and reconciliation.

NEUTRALITY

The basis of political neutrality can be precisely grasped in the papal allocution of 22 January 1915.[2] In it the Pope claimed for himself without restriction the right to be "summus interpres et vindex legis aeternae." He also declared in the abstract that he in no way sanctioned violations of rights but condemned them. He avoided with difficulty a concretizing and actualizing in regard to the problems which the war had raised. Hence he did not take a stand on the question of war guilt and of the infringements by German troops in Belgium or of the Russian occupation in Galicia. The war was by no means made less demanding: it was rather a "butchery" (trucidatio) than a fight (dimicatio). To intervene with papal authority into the confrontations of the warring parties was, however, neither significant (conveniens) nor useful (utile); on the contrary, the Holy See must remain neutral (nullius partis), however difficult this might be. Christ died for all men; the Pope is the Vicar of Christ for all men and on all sides of the war has children for whom he bears responsibility. And so he must not look at the rationes proprias separating them, but he must pay attention to the common bond of faith which unites them. Should the Pope act otherwise, he would not be promoting the cause of peace but further jeopardizing the interior unity of the Church. To be sure, he called emphatically and urgently for peace and reconciliation. Earlier the first encyclical (1 November 1914) had invited rulers and governments to peace negotiations: There are better means and ways to restore violated rights that war.[3]

---

* Konrad Repgen

[1] Cf. Piffl's diary for 2 and 5 September 1914 (M. Liebmann, "Les Conclaves du Benoît XV et Pie XI." La Revue Nouvelle 38 [1963], 45. Also J. Lenzenweger, "Neues Licht auf die Papstwahlen von 1914 und 1922," [Linzer] Theologisch-praktische Quartalschrift 112 [1964], 51–58).

[2] AAS 7 (1915), 33–36.

This program, to which the Pope held firm during the succeeding years without essentially new arguments and ideas, was the opposite of a preaching crusade: incomparably moderate and temperate in goals and hence without any emotional force of enthusiasm. The war was still young, and the propaganda organs were running at full speed. At this moment few were ready to listen to the Pope; in fact, he was reproached with the charge that his peace-preaching crippled the moral power of resistance against the (unjustified) attack of the enemy among his (own) Catholics. The Pope presumably was under no illusions as to the direct effects of his appeal. But the essentially pastoral outlook enabled him to look beyond the clamor of the day.

Pius XII followed this fundamental orientation in the Second World War. It may seem today in retrospect as a sheer foregone conclusion, but it was at first nothing of the sort. To establish and stick to such a tradition required considerable and continuous efforts. Of course, in regard to ecclesiastical interests and understanding, there were no acceptable alternatives.

A withdrawing from the principle of neutrality would necessarily have meant taking one side or the other. Just as the Pope would have had to establish this morally, legally, and politically, so right and wrong, guilt and innocence were by no means one-sided, clear, and undoubted in this or that warring coalition of powers. The Pope could identify himself with none of them. But even if this should have been possible, the Vatican, in the translating of such a concept into practical political activity, would soon have run up against scarcely surmountable barriers. The papacy of the High Middle Ages had not been able to realize in praxi the theoretical claim to be judge of the world. Between 1914 and 1918 the word of the Bishop of Rome meant incomparably much less. Among non-Catholics the political authority of the Holy See had dropped to its nadir under Pius X.[4] Then people listened all the less to the Pope when even Catholics loyal to the Church did not collectively turn to Rome politically either predominantly or exclusively. This was especially true of the levels and groups that were then in any way "modern." Because a nationalism extending even to chauvinism was the prevailing tendency of the age, whoever wanted to obtain "contact" with his "contemporary age" could let himself be swept along easily and far by the nationalist movements. To accuse the Holy See that before 1914 it did not proceed energetically enough against this probably overestimates the possible influence of the ecclesiastical leadership and the political conduct of the faithful in purely political matters and leads ultimately to the posing of the question to which history from Gregory VII to Boniface VIII had already given a clearly negative answer. Hence, even with regard to the real ability to implement, neutrality was the only Vatican foreign policy that was available. A prudent judgment of the moral-legal situation of the military leadership and a skeptical evaluation of the readiness of the Catholics to echo the concrete political postulates of the Pope corresponded with Benedict XV's understanding of his office. This successor of Peter could and would "act [only] as the merciful Samaritan, not as judge of the world."[5] That persons, both in the camp of the Central Powers and among the Allies, again and again imputed to the papal policy prejudice or partisanship for the respective other side[6] is not a refutation of our thesis but indirectly a confirmation.

---

[3] Ibid. 6 (1914), 565–81, here 567.

---

[4] Sali's report for 1916–22 in T. E. Hachey, Anglo-Vatican Relations 1914–1939, 1–72, here 4.

[5] L. Volk, "Kardinal Mercier, der deutsche Episkopat und die Neutralitätspolitik Benedikts XV. 1914–1916," StdZ 192 (1974), 611–30, here 628.

[6] For accusations from French and Italian circles cf. G. Jarlot, Doctrine pontifical et l'histoire. L'enseignement social de Léon XIII, Pie X et Benoît XV vu dans son ambiance historique (1878–1922) (Rome 1964); for the German side the paper edited by the Evangelisches Bund, "Papst, Kurie and Weltkrieg. Historisch-kritische Studie von einem Deutschen" (Berlin 1918).

As a consequence of the Vatican's neutrality and the Pope's reserve with statements containing concrete proposals, much political latitude was possible for the Catholics and their organizations in the different countries. For most of them identification with the cause of their own state, regarded as good and just, was important. Hence the Pope hardly determined the political attitude of the Catholicism of the countries and nationalities affected by or participating in the war in the specific problems which the war raised. Whether this may be regarded as a failure of papal policy is questionable, for in this regard Benedict XV probably had no wish to lead. Conversely, his neutrality was the indispensable presupposition for extensive humanitarian measures of assistance and for diplomatic activities to prevent the spread of the war and for the restoration of peace.

PAPAL MEASURES OF ASSISTANCE

Humanitarian measures of assistance fade easily and fast in historical memory. But, especially in war time, they require much patience, time, energy, and flexibility. The papal measures of help were supplied without regard to the religious, national, or ethnic membership of those affected, as the cardinal secretary of state had expressly prescribed on 22 December 1914.[7] This conduct found widely noticed recognition through the erecting of a great monument for Benedict XV at Constantinople in December 1921, hence in his own lifetime. The dedication speaks of the gratitude of the East for the Benefactor of peoples, who provided aid without distinction of race and religion.

In the First World War cruelties occurred in the Mideast which recall the Second World War, but were and are only lightly regarded by the historical memory of the Western world. For example, after the retreat of the Russians from eastern Anatolia one hundred twenty five thousand Assyro-Chaldeans were first driven into western Azerbaijan and from there back into the area of Mosul, modern Iraq, where most of them starved. Deportations and massacres among the Armenians[8] cost about 1 million human lives. A like fate was spared the Christians of Lebanon, but they too were decimated by hunger. The Pope could not prevent these happenings. But by avoiding branding them publicly, he continued in his neutral position and for this reason and by means of personal letters to Sultan Mehmed V he was able to bring about the partial halting of the massacres, to save from execution those condemned to death, and to insure that surviving children of the victims were cared for. An orphanage set up for this purpose in Constantinople received the name of Benedict XV.

---

[7] AAS 6 (1914), 7f.

[8] J. Deny, "Arminiya," Encyclopedia of Islam, 2d ed., I (Leiden and London 1960), 634–50, here 640f.; G. Jaeschke, "Das Osmanische Reich vom Berliner Kongreß bis zu seinem Ende (1878–1920/21)," T. Schieder, ed., Handbuch der europäischen Geschichte VI (Stuttgart 1968), 43, remarks that the treatment of the Armenians "was not undeserved by them." The Armenian revolts from 1890 would have simultaneously supplied motive, pretext, and excuse.

On the other hand, the war in Europe was on the whole oriented in some degree to the contemporary norms of international law. Accordingly, the Vatican's measures of assistance in this sphere bore the charitable character of "normal" war care. First, from the spring of 1915, an exchange of prisoners unfit for military service succeeded by means of Switzerland, then the liberation and exchange of interned civilians, then the lodging of sick and wounded prisoners of war in neutral countries, to a total of over one hundred thousand, and finally the exchange of prisoners of war who were fathers of families of many children and the permitting of consumptive Italians to return from Austro-Hungarian prisons. In addition, collections of money prepared the way for these measures, and the Vatican's own resources were given to a total amount of approximately 82 million gold lire. Furthermore, efforts were undertaken or supported to put into motion again the postal exchange between the occupied and the unoccupied areas of a state, and, above all, corresponding institutions were established for the pastoral and charitable care of prisoners of war. Not least of all, with the help of these institutions the Vatican took part in the search for the missing. The office maintained by the German episcopate alone investigated eight hundred thousand applications, on which the state offices could give no information; one-eighth of these missing could be identified, and of these sixty-six thousand were still alive. Measured by the misery of the years-long war of attrition for soldiers and the civilian population, such measures of assistance were, to be sure, only a palliative. But in the framework of what was possible much was attempted and far more was accomplished than in the field of "pure" foreign policy.

Efforts for Peace

The Holy See's strivings for peace were first concentrated on Italy, the history of which in the period from September 1914 to the declaration of war on Austria-Hungary on 23 May 1915 is nothing other "than the history of the overwhelming of a reasonable but impassive majority by an enthusiastic or unscrupulous, but in any case tirelessly active minority," in which it was not clear "who had used or compelled whom: the active minority the government, or conversely."[9] Benedict

---

[9] E. Nolte, "Italien von der Begründung des Nationalstaats bis zum Ende des I. Weltkriegs (1870–1918)," T. Schieder, ed., Handbuch above, n. 8, 427.

XV was fundamentally interested in the outcome of these internal Italian struggles. It was of course unclear whether and how the Prisoner in the Vatican could at all continue the central government of the Universal Church if a state of war occurred in Italy. Besides, for the Italian Catholics loyal to the Church the Bishop of Rome had a special moral and political leadership responsibility. Finally, in the event of an Italian defeat in the Appenine peninsula there loomed the threat of a revolution from the left; in the event of an Austro-Hungarian defeat the collapse of the Hapsburg Empire and hence the end of the last great Catholic monarchy. Hence the Pope's aim was that Italy should stay neutral.

The conservative intransigents loyal to the Pope within Italian political Catholicism consistently upheld this goal.[10] The other large groups, the moderate so-called Clerico-Moderati, who sought a compromise with and an integration into the liberal state, conformed to all the changes of the government; they began with neutrality and ended with interventionism. The other, smaller groupings were partly for and partly against entry into the war. This variety and these oppositions were apparently accepted by the Pope without his pressing for a uniform formation of purpose in the sense of the Vatican program and carrying this through. He did not prevent substantial portions of Italian Catholicism from coming out for intervention from March 1915.

On the other hand, Benedict XV made intensive use of the traditional means of diplomacy to move the Dual Monarchy to timely and adequate concessions to Italian nationalism and to keep the Italian government from joining the Triple Entente.[11] He was unable to put across these aims, either at Vienna or in Rome. Austria-Hungary only proposed negotiable offers for Italy when the Kingdom had long before committed itself to the Entente in the London Treaty of 26 April 1915. ARTICLE 15 of the treaty, of which the Vatican learned as early as the end of 1915[12] and which the Bolsheviks published in Izvestia on 28 November 1917, was at first secret. By this article the Holy See was excluded from all peace negotiations. Behind it lay the traditional anticlericalism of the Freemasonic Risorgimento and the fear that otherwise the "Roman Question" could be referred to an international conference. Attempts in 1918 to change this article failed.[13]

---

[10] P. Scoppola, "Cattolici neutralisti e interventisti alla vigilia del conflitto," G. Rossini, ed., Benedetto XV, 95–152; A. Prandi, "La guerra e le sue consequenze nel mondo cattolico italiano," ibid, 153–205.

[11] Cf. F. Engel-Janosi, Österreich und der Vatikan 1846–1918, II: Die Pontifikate Pius' X und Benedikts XV. (1903–1918) (Graz 1960), 190–247.

[12] Proof: the acts in W. Steglich, Friedensappell, 27–30. The contrary claim of the Gasparri Memoirs, 169, is false.

The legal and practical consequences for the Holy See at an outbreak of the state of war in Italy were after 1870 governed neither by international nor by Italian law.[14] Hence the government of the Kingdom had theoretically a free hand. The diplomatic representatives accredited to the Holy See by Austria-Hungary and Germany withdrew immediately to Switzerland on 24 May 1915, after the Secretariat of State had refused to accommodate them in the Vatican. In other respects the Italian government observed its unilateral obligations according to the Law of Guarantees of 1871 throughout the war and showed itself generous in some matters not regulated by that law. The Holy See's freedom of movement was, it is true, limited by the Italian state of war; for example, Osservatore Romano was bound by the Italian rules of censorship. But on the whole the Vatican had to deal with fewer difficulties than had been previously feared. Even during the war the Curia was able to operate as the center of the Universal Church, and the Pope could continue his foreign policy. In this field his prestige even increased: in 1915 the Netherlands and Great Britain undertook diplomatic relations with the Holy See and sent their representatives to the Vatican. Formal relations with France did not yet materialize, it is true, and in Vatican-Italian relations there persisted the coexistence traditional since 1870 of legal nonrecognition and in practice the possibility of a many-sided contact. At the beginning of the First World War there were fourteen diplomatic missions of states at the Holy See, and at the end seventeen.

After Italy's entry into the war papal foreign policy strove ceaselessly to support whatever could offer a certain prospect of bringing the warring nations to the negotiating table. In this connection the Vatican also followed unconventional routes. Thus from May 1915 to May 1916 it accepted offers of contact from Jewish personalities of France, from whom it apparently expected influence on the Jewish organizations in the Western nations and thereby again on the foreign policy of the Entente Powers.[15] How difficult it was in the hate-filled atmosphere to make progress with peace probings appeared, for example, in the fact that the Pope could not get the future Cardinal Baudrillart in the fall of 1915 to bring a Vatican paper on possibly acceptable conditions of peace to the official notice of the French government.[16]

---

[13] Cf. R. Mosca, "La mancata revisione dell'art. 15 del Patto di Londra," G. Rossini (ed.), Benedetto XV, 401–13. A new investigation by W. Steglich is expected; cf. idem, Verhandlungen, 407, n. 151.

[14] Cf. R. A. Graham, Diplomacy, 305–17. On the plans for building a Vatican State system, cf. S. A. Stehlin, "Germany and a Proposed Vatican State," CHR 60 (1974), 402–26.

While, except in eastern Central Europe, the Catholics of all the warring countries very unselfishly carried out their duties as citizens, the Pope continued to be abstract in his frequent public expressions on peace and war,[17] though individual concrete statements positively impressed themselves on the memory, as from his address of 28 July 1915[18] the formula "that the nations not die." On the other hand the "Peace Appeal" of 1 August 1917 to the heads of the warring nations contains declarations of concrete content.[19]

The beginning of this diplomatic action went back to the turn of the year 1916–1917. It assumed concrete forms when the new nuncio at Munich, Eugenio Pacelli, on 13 June 1917 received instructions for personal soundings in Berlin.[20] He discussed this on 26 June with Imperial Chancellor Bethmann Hollweg and Secretary of State Zimmermann. The pivot was Belgium. Bethmann had earlier offered the restoration of the nation only among "real guarantees" for Germany; now he promised "complete independence" of all three great powers—a fundamental concession, for which he had not yet internal agreement. A meeting of Pacelli with Austrian Emperor Charles I on 30 June showed that the Hapsburg Monarchy apparently still maintained its readiness of May 1915 for concessions to Italy. These verbal promises of Berlin and Vienna were materially so important that the Vatican could go further with them. Belgium should be the starting point.

It was precisely on this point that the papal action become jammed. The fall of Bethmann Hollweg on 13 July 1917 contributed to this. His successor Michaelis was not prepared for domestic policy promises that had not been assured. The Curia could not know this, and overestimated the actual chances of success, but apparently placed itself under a portentous time pressure, because it seemingly wanted to publish it unconditionally on 1 August, the beginning of the fourth year of the war. Nevertheless the new Center-Left majority of the Reichstag on 19 July rejected the celebrated peace resolution[21] which came close to the Vatican program and had been accepted by the new imperial chancellor.

---

[15] Cf. P. Korzec, "Les relations entre le Vatican et les organisations juives pendant la première guerre mondiale: la mission Deloncle-Perqual (1915–1916)," RHMC 20 (1973), 301–33. In this context there came about a remarkable official comment by the Holy See against anti-Semitic actions in Poland: Gasparri to the American Jewish Committee, 9 February 1916 (ibid, 320 ff.).

[16] J. Leflon, "L'action diplomatico-religieuse de Benoît XV en faveur de la paix durant la première guerre mondiale," G. Rossini, ed., Benedetto XV, 62–64.

[17] Texts in A. Struker.

[18] AAS 7 (1915), 364–77.

[19] Officially published on 1 September 1917 in AAS 9 (1917), 417–20; often printed since 15 August 1917. Critical text in W. Steglich, Friedensappell, 160–62.

[20] Content in A. Martini, Preparazione, 128f.

Before the Pope turned to all the powers, the concrete formulations with Berlin had to be unambiguously agreed to. To this end Pacelli on 24 July submitted in Berlin the so-called "Pacelli Punctation"[22] that had been elaborated in Rome at the beginning of July. This was a memorandum in seven points, the first four of which described concrete material regulations—freedom of the seas; limitation of arms; international arbitration; German withdrawal from France, restoration of the complete political, military, and economic independence of Belgium with regard to Germany, England, and France, and on the other hand the return of the German colonies by England—while the last three enumerated the other subjects to be treated at the peace conference—economic questions; Austrian-Italian and German-French boundaries; Poland, Serbia, Rumania, Montenegro.

This memorandum corresponded to the status as of 26 June. But now Berlin at once raised objections, especially in relation to Belgium, where again there was talk of "guarantees." The written reply, the German counterstatement,[23] was not presented until 12 August. The Vatican did not wait for it before drawing up[24] and delivering the papal peace appeal.

The "peace appeal" is a document of Benedict XV, backdated 1 August, to the heads of state of the warring nations, which the cardinal secretary of state officially[25] delivered to the powers on 9 August. The note consists of three parts: a review and recalling of the papal admonitions to peace, previously made, but in vain; a summons to the governments to reach an understanding on the points sketched in what followed as the basis of a just and lasting peace; a moving closing appeal to put an end to the more and more "useless carnage" (inutile strage) through negotiations. The crucial second part corresponded in content to the Pacelli Punctation with regard to the verbal German replies of 24 July, except for the point of Belgium.

---

[21] Often printed. Critical text in E. Matthias-R. Morsey, eds., Der Interfraktionelle Ausschuss 1917/18 I (Düsseldorf 1959), 114f.

[22] Often printed. Critical text in W. Steglich, Friedensappell, 133.

[23] Text in W. Steglich, Friedensappell, 151–55.

[24] Cf. A. Martini, La Nota, 418f.

[25] Since the Holy See maintained no diplomatic relations with the United States, France, and Italy, the notes for these powers were directed through the English ambassador at the Vatican. Russia and Belgium received the notes through their representatives in Rome; Germany, Bavaria, and Austria-Hungary, through the nuncios in Munich and Vienna.

It could not be proved at the time which prospects the Pope had assigned to his step. If one starts with the probably compelling assumption that he had reckoned on the chances of success, then one must presume that, despite the replies of 24 July, he had estimated Bethmann's promise of 26 June as capable of being revived. This would have—thus, for example, may one understand the Vatican's assessment—released so much political leverage that the Entente could scarcely have avoided serious negotiations resulting from it, step for step. Hence, because the stone which the avalanche would set in motion was the German promise of 26 June concerning Belgium, the reply of Germany to the papal peace appeal acquired special importance. It consisted formally of a note from the imperial chancellor to the cardinal secretary of state of 19 September,[26] which was followed by a confidential letter of Michaelis to Pacelli of 24 September.[27]

The note of 19 September contains various civilities but no clear acceptance of the matter of the statements of the peace appeal. An evasion of this sort, especially in regard to Belgium, had been suspected by the Curia at the latest since 12 August. Thereafter Vatican diplomacy sought persistently and ingeniously somehow to obtain, vis-à-vis the Entente, a usable German declaration of renunciation of Belgium. This policy of delimitation culminated in a letter from Pacelli to Michaelis of 30 August[28] which, with the adding of the English interim reply of 21 August to the papal note, demanded precise statements on Belgium as a presupposition "to further progress of the negotiations." Michaelis rejected such a declaration on Belgium on 24 September, since "certain preconditions" were still "not sufficiently explained." His letter was a provisional decree: the door was not slammed shut. But the papal effort at mediation had come to a halt: the precise German declaration did not come later either, so that the Curia could never again take up the thread.

The already mentioned notes of 21 and 30 August and of 24 September were published by the Germans at the end of July 1919 and were long the subject of passionate controversies, which in the meantime cleared the way for more quiet and painstaking investigations.[29] It is firmly held today, in contradiction to Erzberger's claim in 1919, that Berlin with the German replies of September 1917 had wasted no unconditionally certain opportunities for peace. It is likewise established that Michaelis had not let himself be influenced in his treatment of the peace note by Protestant prejudices against Pope and Church. But there is today still not complete agreement on the bases and the consequences of the German decisions in September. Of course, it is known that Michaelis aligned himself in foreign policy alongside Secretary of State Kühlmann, and the latter, like Bethmann-Hollweg, wanted to give Belgium complete independence. For reasons of negotiating tactics in foreign policy and perhaps also from domestic policy considerations, Kühlmann, however, was willing to use the Vatican's mediation only at the end of a three-phased plan. First he envisaged private probings through the Spanish diplomat Villalobar in England with a declaration of German concessions on Belgium; this should be followed by German-British preliminary peace negotiations and then more formal peace negotiations mediated by the Vatican with a definitive declaration of the renunciation of Belgium. This oversubtle concept foundered in Madrid and in London. Whether a renunciation of the three-phase plan and a direct acceptance of the papal proposal was capable of being realized in Germany's domestic politics and of producing more success in foreign policy cannot be clearly stated, because here many hypotheses must be fitted together. Important, however, in this context is the attitude of the other powers to the peace appeal.

---

[26] Often printed. Critical text in W. Steglich, Friedensappell, 197–202, with the full, complicated history of the origin. The note was delivered to Pacelli on 20 September, published on 22 September.

[27] Often printed. Critical text in W. Steglich, Friedensappell, 361–63.

[28] Often printed. Critical text in W. Steglich, Friedensappell, 342f.

The three other Central Powers likewise replied formally to the Pope and in fact did not depart substantially from the German line;[30] Russia, France, and Italy, on the contrary, chose one of the more rude types of rejection by not replying. The answer of the United States, on 27 August,[31] was mainly conditioned by domestic policy. Wilson declared an Imperial Germany incapable of peace negotiations. British policy did not conform to this denial. The English envoy at the Vatican was instructed on 21 August[32] to give an interim answer, which "to a certain degree conformed to the papal action" (W. Steglich). For reasons not clearly determinable, Paris at first attached itself to this step, and London communicated this to Rome on 23 August.[33] The London instructions of 21 and 23 August led to the Vatican's overestimating France's readiness for negotiations completely and England's considerably. On 26 August France made an about-face in regard to England and pressed for aloofness. To what extent London agreed is controverted.[34] England's actual readiness for negotiations from 30 August was probably described most precisely by Steglich, who thinks that London "wanted to defer the definitive stand until clarity had been obtained in regard to the willingness of the Central Powers to make concessions."[35]

---

[29] Basic are W. Steglich, Friedensappell I, and V., and Conzemius, L'offre. To be added for French policy is P. Renouvin, "Le gouvernement français devant le message de paix du Saint-Siège (août 1917)," Festschrift A. Latreille. Religion et Politique. Les deux guerres mondiales. Histoire de Lyon et du Sud-Est (Lyon 1972), 287–302; for English policy, W. Steglich, "Die Haltung der britischen Regierung zur päpstlichen Friedensaktion von 1917," Verhandlungen, 365–409.

[30] Often printed. Critical text in W. Steglich, Friedensappell, 210f. (Austria-Hungary, 20 September 1917), 227f. (Bulgaria, 20 September 1917), 231–33 (Bavaria, 21 September 1917), 223–25 (Turkey, 30 September 1917).

[31] Often printed. Text in W. Steglich, Friedensappell, 422–24.

From these relations it becomes clear how very much Pacelli had to believe at the end of August that with a German renunciation of Belgium the open sea of the peace negotiations had been reached, but also that at the end of August such a declaration would in no way have guaranteed surer success. How London would have decided if it had resulted cannot be said. Historically it must be held that the German silence on Belgium on 19 and 24 September spared the English government from finding a political reply to Germany, which it could have stuck to internally and could have subscribed to externally.

The failure of the action of 1 August 1917 did not induce the Pope to a fundamental correcting of his readiness to mediate. For example, in February 1918 Gasparri offered the Italian government mediation in special negotiations with Austria-Hungary, which also led to the formulating of corresponding plans, but because of internal Italian differences was not pursued farther.[36] But Benedict XV no longer expressed himself publicly in the further course of the war on concrete problems of peace.

The Pope did not need to observe this discretion during the Paris peace negotiations. He could, of course, exercise no influence on the content of the treaties,[37] since he was excluded from the congress as well as from the League of Nations. Nevertheless, the secretary of the Vatican Congregation for Extraordinary Ecclesiastical Affairs, Bonaventura Cerretti, stayed for some time in 1919 at the congress as the Pope's secret representative. In this way he established numerous contacts which led to the assuming of diplomatic relations with the new eastern central European nations and constituted the point of departure for the concluding of many concordats. Altogether the Vatican foreign policy worked for the most extensive possible international presence and for contractual accommodation with all nations, in connection with which it was shown to be quite prepared for concessions. For example, it was an unmistakable sign of reconciliation when the encyclical Pacem Dei munus of 23 May 1920[38] abolished the regulations which since 1870 had restricted the visits of Catholic heads of state who had been received at the Quirinal. This encyclical also directed the episcopate to exert itself for the promotion of a real attitude of peace among the faithful and thereby unambiguously distinguished itself from the Paris peace achievement, which was not characterized by the spirit of reconciliation. A great success of the Vatican's desire for reconciliation was the resumption of diplomatic relations with France in 1921. When Benedict XV unexpectedly died on 22 January 1922, the foreign policy presitge of the Holy See, as measured against 1914, had risen remarkably. That the number of diplomatic representatives at the Vatican had more than doubled was a clear indication of this.

---

[32] Critical text in W. Steglich, Friedensappell, 335.

[33] Critical text in W. Steglich, Friedensappell, 337.

[34] The sources say nothing about it. Cf. the declarations in P. Renouvin, Le gouvernement français, 298, and W. Steglich, Die Haltung, 380.

[35] W. Steglich, Die Haltung, 390.

[36] Cf. F. Margiotta Broglio, 45–49.

[37] Nevertheless it was obtained that ARTICLE 238 of the Treaty of Versailles turned over the mission stations to the Vatican, cf. G. Jarlot, 440f.

Between the Two World Wars: Pius XI

THE LATERAN TREATIES OF 1929

The "Roman Question" to 1926

Also for the election of Pius XI on 6 February 1922, not primarily political but inner ecclesiastical reasons were decisive. At this moment no one could know that this political novice, who had spent his life among books and manuscripts until 1918, would conclude the Lateran Treaty and thereby bring about the most important foreign policy decision of the papacy since 1870. The agreements of 11 February 1929 sealed the end of the more than millennial history of the Papal State: at the same time they did away with the "Roman Question" that the Holy See had left open since 1870.

In the decades since 1870 there had been no dearth of deliberations, proposals, and exertions for the elimination of the "Roman Question" by reconcilation (conciliazione).[39] But nothing had been achieved in principle. Hence even Pius XI, in his first encyclical, Ubi Arcano Dei, of

---

[38] AAS 12 (1920), 209–18.

[39] Survey in P. Scoppola, La Chiesa.

23 December 1922,[40] though in a conciliatory form, repeated the legal reservation of his predecessors against the occupation of the Papal State, which had made the Pope the "Prisoner of the Vatican," and against the Italian "Law of Guarantees" of 13 May 1871.

Meanwhile, the "Roman Question" had lost its first-class significance for Italian domestic policy. This facilitated an accommodation for the Kingdom. In addition, the liberal governments had become increasingly dependent on the Catholic voters. Out of reasons of principle and tactics the leading politician of the period before 1914, Giolitti, had already substituted for Cavour's old formula of the "Free Church in a Free State" of 27 March 1861 the new view of 30 May 1904, that of "Two Parallel Lines" which never meet in a contractual arrangement but also can never collide in conflict. Under Pius X a conciliazione policy on this basis was not timely.

It was otherwise under Benedict XV. In an interview of 28 June 1915[41] that became renowned, Secretary of State Gasparri broke with the tradition of the inflexible policy of revindication and a little later let the powers know by diplomatic means that the Vatican sought a compromise with Italy not through political pressure but through negotiation and compromise. So long as the war lasted, there was no prospect of this, and even afterwards the exclusion of the Holy See from the peace discussions made the including of Italian-Vatican negotiations among the business of the other states impossible. However, on the periphery of the Paris conference there occurred on 1 June 1919 discussions between Cerretti and Italian premier Emmanuele Orlando on a text[42] which Gasparri had composed. It must have included: first, the demand for a material revision of the Italian Law of Guarantees of 1871; second, the renunciation of formal internationalization of the Roman Question, but assurance of the outcome or negotiations on the part of the other states through the entry of the Vatican State into the League of Nations; third, agreement of the Kingdom with the Papacy through Italian recognition of a sovereign Vatican State with an expanded territory. Differing from the arrangements of 1929, Gasparri's appunto certainly did not contain the demand for a simultaneous financial compensation and probably not a concordat that was to be signed at the same time.[43] Orlando accepted Gasparri's plan but could not obtain the approval of the King of Italy for it.[44] After

---

[40] AAS 14 (1922), 673–700.

[41] To the leading Catholic daily, Corriere d'Italia. Text in CivCatt 66, 3 (1915), 236–39.

[42] For a reconstruction of the content, cf. P. Scoppola, La Chiesa, 4–6.

[43] Thus P. Scoppola, 5f.; there also the differing views, to which can be added G. Martina, 119.

[44] F. Margiotta Broglio, 366f., 537f.

Orlando's fall on 19 June 1919 contacts in this affair were not broken off, but the new minister-president, Nitti, probably again ran aground on King Victor Emmanuel III.[45]

In these first postwar years there appeared many sorts of indications of the Vatican's readiness for negotiations. It was waiting, as Gasparri made clear in an interview of 29 September 1921,[46] for a statesman with whom there could be discussion of the matter. The program of the Catholic Popular Party, Partito popolare italiano,[47] founded on 18 January 1919, contained no direct allusion to a definitive contractual settlement of the "Roman Question" as an immediate aim, while the atheistic Fascist leader, Benito Mussolini, had departed in a famed speech in parliament on 21 June 1921[48] from his previous antiecclesiastical expressions and had signaled his readiness for reconciliation with the papacy. Thus matters stood when Benedict XV died.

The change of pontificate meant no alteration of the direction of Vatican foreign policy. This already appeared in the fact that Pius XI, contrary to tradition, left the cardinal secretary of state in office. To stress the significance of this continuity of personnel does not mean to imply that Pius XI was to a degree dominated by his bureaucracy. On the contrary, while Achille Ratti was an outsider to the Curia, he was a strong personality with a pronounced talent for independent judgment, quick grasp, and energetic action. And so the Lateran Treaties are historically his work, especially as he took a personal share in the origin of the treaty to the smallest formulation. Still, his treaty policy was completely in continuation of that of Benedict XV. Likewise, the replacing of Gasparri by Pacelli on 9 February 1930 meant no change of direction. The actual motives of the Pope for this change, over which there has been much speculation,[49] cannot be determined.

Mussolini's rule—he became minister-president on 30 October 1922—offered from the first a very confusing picture. Measures friendly to the Church stood alongside shock-troop violence. At first the Vatican reacted with a policy of the most extreme caution. No understanding on principles was sought, but on timely individual questions.[50] This was apparently the result of a secret meeting of Mussolini with Gasparri on 19 or 20 January 1923 in the residence of the president of the Banco di Roma, Carlo Santucci. In this interview there was presumably question especially of this Vatican-controlled bank, which had fallen into difficulties. Its failure, which could only mean catastrophic consequences for Italian Catholicism,[51] could not be averted without state help. Moreover, the two sides felt each other out and presumably agreed here to use the Jesuit Pietro Tacchi-Venturi for the future as go-between; his first intervention with Mussolini is demonstrable on 9 February 1923.

---

[45] Thus F. Margiotta Broglio, 71; P. Scoppola, La Chiesa, 32.

[46] Text again in P. Scoppola, 46–51.

[47] Also G. de Rose, Storia del movimento cattolico in Italia, II: Il partito popolare italiano (Bari 1966).

[48] Extract from the text in P. Scoppola, La Chiesa, 52f. On the matter, cf. R. de Felice, Mussolini il fascista, I: La conquista del potere 1921–1925 (Turin 1966), cited as R. de Felice II, 126f.

[49] A survey of the contemporary commentaries in Ecclesiastica 10 (1930), 135–39. A. Ottaviani, "Pio XI e i suoi Segretari di Stato," Pio XI nel trentesimo della morte (1939–1969) (Milan 1969), offers nothing more but is a very important source for the history of the two secretaries of state.

The Vatican's cautious reserve probably sprang first of all from the desire to avoid a frontal collision with Fascism, apparently especially because of the feared reaction on the Catholic organizational system. Only for a certain time, to the end of May 1923,[52] and not beyond a certain limit was the Popular Party defended by the Vatican. Between the end of July 1923 and the end of October 1924 the Holy See by stages removed its founder, Don Luigi Sturzo (1871–1959), from political life.[53] So long as the Vatican documents on these problematic proceedings are not accessible, it is difficult to make a correct judgment.[54] In the election campaign of 1924 the Vatican prudently acted with reserve while clearly denouncing Fascist violence.[55] On 9 September 1924 the Pope personally and publicly condemned a Popular Party coalition with the Socialists loyal to the constitution.[56] When Mussolini had successfully weathered the Matteotti crisis on 3 January 1925, there began the real construction of the Fascist regime, which lasted until 1943. It was essentially characterized by repression of revolutionary radical, properly[57] Fascist elements and by concessions of Mussolini to the more conservative forces and groups that supported him, hence, in a certain sense, moderates. It was firmly established with the November decrees of 1926.

---

[50] R. de Felice II, 497.

[51] The Banco di Roma was the principal bank of many Catholic organizations, financed the Catholic Press, and occasionally also aided the Popular Party, and had especially close economic relations with the Credito Nazionale and the network of Catholic Raiffeisen banks built in the nineteenth century. On the meeting between Gasparri and Mussolini, cf. R. de Felice II, 494ff.

[52] On 24 May 1923 Osservatore Romano still stood behind the policy of de Gasperi (R. de Felice II, 527f.).

[53] The decisive steps were: 7 July 1923, retirement as political secretary of the PPI; 19 May 1924, retirement from the directorate of the PPI; 25 October 1924, emigration to London. For the pressure which the Vatican exercised at each of these stages, cf. Sturzo to Cardinal Bourne, 15 November 1926, in F. Piva and F. Malgeri, Vita di Luigi Sturzo (Rome 1972), 291, n. 8.

[54] On the Sturzo problem cf. the important remarks in this connection in L. Volk, Geschichte, 125f.

[55] Cf. R. de Felice II, 578–89 (elections on 6 April 1924).

[56] Cf. R. de Felice II, 659ff.

At this time there began, on Italy's part, the policy which led to the Lateran Treaties. At the beginning of 1925 the government convoked a commission for a revision of the law of Church and state; it engaged in the work of amending from February to December.[58] A former deputy of the Popular Party's center-right wing occupied the chair, and with papal permission, three canons of the Roman major basilicas belonged to the commission. The commission's final report was unanimously adopted. It made many concessions to the Church. The Italian episcopate reacted altogether positively toward it. As regards substance, the outcome of these consultations was already a piece of the Lateran Concordat of 1929. But the Pope rejected it, first orally on 26 December 1925 and then definitively by a letter of 18 February 1926 to Cardinal Secretary of State Gasparri[59] and thus produced a linking between this work of amendment and a contractual regulating of the Roman Question.

This attitude seems the more astounding since at that time there were present agreeing views on the Roman Question on both sides of the Tiber, as the Vatican knew fully. In the spring of 1925 Carlo Santucci, acting in a private capacity, had elaborated a "project" on the regulating of the Roman Question.[60] It treated the individual problems in general along the line of the Gasparri program of 1919, but deviated from it in two significant points: Santucci went into the financial problems passed over in 1919[61] and had misgivings in regard to the internationalization of the Roman Question. Santucci envisaged as the method of procedure an agreement of Italy with the Holy See on the material content but a formal regulation by a unilateral amending by the state of the law of 1871. On this point the Italian minister of justice was of another mind. He held that a regular treaty should be negotiated and included in [57] "Properly" in the meaning of the period before 30 October 1922 and after 25 July 1943. On what follows, R. de Felice II, 729, as well as idem, Mussolini il fascista II: L'organizzazione dello Stato fascista 1925–29 (Turin 1968), cited as R. de Felice III, 3ff.

---

[58] The protocols in P. Ciprotti, ed., Atti della Commissione per la reforma delle leggi ecclesiastiche del Regno (12 febbraio–31 dicembre 1925) (Milan 1968).

[59] Text in P. Scoppola, La Chiesa, 117f.

[60] Text in G. de Rosa, I conservatori nazionali. Biografia di Carlo Santucci (Brescia 1962), 195ff.; also F. Margiotta Broglio, 226–48.

[61] In the Law of Guarantees of 13 May 1871 the Italian state had offered to the Pope, as compensation for the papal income from the Papal State, an annual payment of 3.25 million lire, which he never accepted. Because of the subsequent decline of value, this sum was completely inadequate according to its current evaluation.

Italian legislation and announced to the foreign governments. This was an overly clear offer of negotiations. The Pope, as Santucci later experienced, is said to have expressed the view that this sort of regulation of difficult matters had probably better be left to his successor.[62]

Hence in the summer of 1925 the Holy See dropped Santucci's project and in the winter of 1925–26 rejected the acceptance of "unilateral" state legal reform. The reasons for these can be stated only hypothetically.[63] It is certain that the Curia took its time, because so much was at stake for the Church's future. The negotiations which led to the Lateran Treaties began on 5 August 1926.

The Route to the Lateran Treaties (1926–29)

The secret negotiations on the Lateran Treaties lasted two and one-half years, from 5 August 1926 to 10 February 1929, even though not continuously. Discretion was facilitated by the hardly exalted rank of the negotiators. On the Vatican side this was Francesco Pacelli, a layman, jurist in Vatican service, and brother of Eugenio Pacelli. For the discussion of the material of the concordat Prelate Borgongini Duca of the Secretariat of State was also involved. The Italian negotiator was, until his death on 4 January 1929, the state councilor Domenico Barone. Thereafter Mussolini himself, supported at the conclusion by high government officials, conducted the negotiations. The signing of the treaties and of the documents of ratification on 7 June 1929 was done on the Italian side by Mussolini, on that of the Vatican by Gasparri. The content of the negotiations was allotted to three treaties: the Lateran Treaty proper, which politically settled the "Roman Question," to which was added as Appendix IV a "Financial Agreement," and the Concordat.

The historical-legal aspect of the treaties of 1929 is discussed elsewhere, in Chapter 6. Here only the political aspect is to be treated, in which of course the details of the history of the treaty[64] cannot be debated. The route was from the start determined by the fact that both sides had, even before entering upon the official preliminary negotiations, discussed their minimum demands and had reached agreement on the essential points of the Lateran Treaty proper: Mussolini's sole condition, that the Holy See recognize the regulating of the Roman Question as definitive and thereby say "yes" to 1870, was accepted by the Pope. Conversely, Italy had absolutely admitted the sovereignty of the Vatican, even though the important expression Stato for Vatican City was not conceded by Italy until 22 January 1929.[65] In principle the Kingdom had recognized its debts to the Holy See from ARTICLE 3 of the Law of Guarantees of 13 May 1871.

---

[62] P. Scoppola, La Chiesa, 111.

[63] Also R. de Felice III, 29f., 106–15, where the other hypotheses are also discussed.

[64] A useful introduction is supplied by G. Martina, "Sintesi storica," A. de Gasperi, Lettere sul Concordato (Brescia 1970), 113–73.

The final great material difficulties and ceaselessly numerous small detailed questions of the form of the text were settled in January and February 1929. In the school questions Italy countered a Vatican maximal program—in a draft concordat of 5 December 1926[66]—with its own minimal program of 22 February 1927.[67] The final compromise in ARTICLE 36 meant, it is true, a very solemn affirmation of the Church's principles, but drew from them only very limited consequences. And so in substance there was no agreement through a compromise. Similarly, even if it was much more favorable for the Vatican side, an agreement was reached in the complex of marriage law: when on 19 January 1929 the Italian minister of justice stated that, by the adopting of the canon law of marriage by the state, the Italian civil law was turned upside down—sovvertimento delle norme—the Pope on 20 January declared any concession in the substance of this point to be unacceptable; rather should conciliazione founder. He thereby got his way.[68] He was able to be so firm at this time also because he had immediately before lowered the financial demands already accepted by Mussolini on 14 January from 2 to 1.75 billion lire, whereby methods of payment tolerable for Italy had been worked out.[69]

If one inquires into the historical and political importance of the treaties, it is undisputed that their signing meant for Mussolini a "great, undoubted success," according to the judgment of his competent biographer, "one of the greatest which he ever gained,"[70] in which there is no doubt that the "reconciliation" of 1929 had for him only the character of a tool and was purely tactically conditioned. The significance of the treaties for the Holy See, on the other hand, is very much disputed, so that there can certainly be no talk of a "success" without limitations, even if details that can be criticized are disregarded. One must proceed from the self-understanding of the modern Church, which wants to be a pastoral Church, and from the great aims of the Pope, whose whole activity here, as also elsewhere, was apparently not determined primarily by political goals but by the desire to create better and more effective possibilities for the care of souls.[71] Under this aspect the short-term and the long-term must be separated.

---

[65] F. Pacelli, Diario, 170.

[66] Text of ARTS. 31–41 in F. Pacelli, Diario, 260ff.

[67] Text of ARTS. 36 and 37 in F. Pacelli, Diario, 282.

[68] F. Pacelli, Diario, 116.

[69] 750 million lire to be paid in cash, 1 billion in Italian state loans at 5 percent (16 January 1929, F. Pacelli, Diario, 162).

[70] R. de Felice III, 415.

From the short-term the Lateran Treaties offered the Church undeniable advantages. The intervening of the state into the Italian Church and church administration was ended. The Vatican could cast off historically obsolete ballast and finally place the central government of the Universal Church economically on its own feet again—an advantage for the essential independence of the papacy that must be very highly evaluated. Furthermore, through the article of the concordat on the protections of associations—ARTICLE 43, par. 1—the Church obtained a powerful legal position for the defense of the Catholic organizational system. This assured their presence in the Italian world, far beyond the limits of clergy and episcopate, over which the state now lost its most extensive personal political influence. Besides, the general jubilation in the country on the sudden report of the concluding of the treaty speaks for itself. So authentic a Catholic and a democrat as Alcide de Gasperi (1881–1954), the last secretary of the meanwhile forbidden Popular Party, thought, under the immediate impression of the signing, that even Don Sturzo, if he were Pope, would have had to sign this treaty, which definitively freed the head of the Church from the burden of temporalia.[72] Of course, the Lateran Treaties strengthened the regime and hence the dictatorship: but this would pass. For the future, in any case, the Church should no longer be, as hitherto, constantly in search of unsuitable concessions for a solution of the Roman Question, and the solution should be obtained without the complication of an international guarantee. This outweighed all else. Problematic for the future was rather the concordat policy.

With this the second aspect is reached—long-term consequences. Precisely here opinions have been very much in conflict until today. Decisive is the question whether the Church, while letting itself be embraced by Mussolini's regime, jeopardized or sacrificed its own proper self. This did not happen. If Pius XI in the first weeks after the signing of the treaty, in favor of which he said little, hoped that Italy would now again become a "Catholic state"—in the sense of the preliberal epoch—Mussolini's arguments in May in the parliamentary debates on ratification unmistakably taught him otherwise. Two and one-half months after the signing the differences were so great that on 6 June it was still entirely unclear whether the treaties would become effective on the seventh. Ratification became possible only when both parties joined in a dilatory formal compromise which concealed the disagreement over pinciple.[73]

---

[71] G. Martina, 134, leaves the "political" interpretation open.

[72] Letter of 12 February 1929 to S. Weber (A. de Gaspari, Lettere, 63).

In the next years Mussolini could not but recognize that the Church never unconditionally supported him—not in domestic policy and not at all in foreign policy. On the contrary, Catholic Action received a lift, especially the youth and student groups. This meant a serious hindrance to the penetrating of all of Italian society with Fascist tendencies, as Mussolini gradually became aware. Thus matters arrived at the great crisis of 1931, in the course of which the papal foreign policy advanced to the limits of its possibilities and finally had to accept a severe setback.

After the Lateran Treaties: The Crises of 1931 and 1938

Mussolini produced the crisis of 1931, chiefly from domestic policy considerations.[74] Catholic Action had gained too much ground for him. The great confrontation began in March with the accusations in the Fascist trade-union press that Catholic Action was overstepping its competence and interfering in the political-social sphere. In the background of the Fascist-Catholic journalistic polemic that now began, the government in April made demands through the diplomatic route which the Holy See rejected. At stake were two problems: the essential question of where the boundary ran between "ecclesiastical" and "extraecclesiastical," and the political question of who was to define the courses of this boundary. In the second question the Church claimed an unlimited autonomous competence. In the first question it demanded the right to have not only purely religiously oriented organizations, such as the liturgy and the administration of the sacraments, but also to be able to include the field of social Catholicism. In the Concordat Italy had recognized Catholic Action and its organizations as subject to ecclesiastical direction, so far as they "displayed their activity outside every political party for the spread and implementation of Catholic basic principles" (ARTICLE 43, par. 1).

From 19 April Pius XI publicly intervened in these confrontations.[75]

---

[73] The four drafts of the text of the communiqués in F. Pacelli, Diario, 151–53. At issue was the contractual law question of whether the Lateran Concordat was an integral element of the Lateran Treaty, and hence, like the latter, unchangeable, or not. Pius XI had written to Gasparri, 30 May 1929 (text in Osservatore Romano, 6 June 1929, then, AAS 21 (1929), 297–306; repeated in extract in P. Scoppola, 217–25): "Ne viene che 'simul stabunt' oppure 'simul cadent'; anche se dovesse per conseguenza cadere la 'Città del Vaticano' col relativo Stato. Per parte Nostra, col divino aiuto impavidum ferient ruinae."

[74] R. de Felice IV, 250–53.

[75] Address before the Diocesan Committee of Catholic Action of Rome (Osservatore Romano, 20–21 April 1931).

He placed himself before the "social" Catholic organizations, which are "legitimate," "necessary," and "irreplaceable," and in an open letter of 26 April[76] to Cardinal Schuster of Milan he bitterly assailed the Fascist education of youth, oriented to hate and irreverence. In these circumstances the grandly staged ecclesiastical demonstrations gained more special political emphasis in mid-May.[77] On 29 May Mussolini dissolved all Catholic youth and student groups by administrative measures.[78]

After useless protests and exchanges of notes, the Pope turned against this police action with the encyclical Non abbiamo bisogno of 29 June 1931.[79] The choice of this method of fighting was a political challenge of the first rank. In long and bitter passages the encyclical condemned the Fascist attack as clearly an injustice hostile to the Church. Mussolini's monopoly of the education of children and youth was founded on a "world of ideas which led professedly to a true and authentic deification of the state, which stands in full opposition, no less to the natural rights of the family than to the supernatural rights of the Church." The Fascist "notion of the state, which" claims "for it the young generation entirely and without exception," is "for a Catholic not compatible with Catholic teaching." The oath required of the members of Fascist organizations is "therefore, as its exists, not permitted," and hence at the least it must be taken with a reservatio mentalis. But the encyclical did not amount to a definitive break with the regime. It emphasized that the Pope had hitherto refrained from a "formal and express condemnation" and here too "in no sense" condemned "the Fascist Party as such." Rejected and condemned were only that part of its program and practice which are "irreconcilable with the name and profession of a Catholic."

And so the encyclical bore a contrary character: it could signify defining and signal readiness for negotiation. This ambivalence was perhaps the result of an inner-Vatican compromise between two groups with distinct notions in regard to the actual conflict.[80] In any event, as early as 23 July the Pope had entered into compromise discussions with

---

[76] AAS 23 (1931), 145–50.

[77] Celebration of the fortieth anniversary of the encyclical Rerum novarum and First General Assembly of Catholic Action of Italy. Cf. Ecclesiastica 11 (1931), 267–80, 290–94.

[78] R. de Felice IV, 258f.

[79] AAS 23 (1931), 285–312, delivered on 6 July; Osservatore Romano had carried the text on 5 July; F. Engel-Janosi, Vom Chaos zur Katastrophe. Vatikanische Gespräche 1918 bis 1938, vornehmlich auf Grund der Berichte des österreichischen Gesandten beim Hl. Stuhl (Vienna and Munich 1971), 229–55.

[80] According to R. de Felice IV, 264f., Gasparri and Pacelli belonged to the more moderate faction, Marchetti-Selvaggiani and Borgongini Duca to the more intransigent.

Mussolini, which led in September to a written agreement[81] that ended the strife and—with reference to the conciliazione of 1929—is frequently termed the reconciliazione.

The September Agreement was, of course, not a compromise without victors and vanquished, but a clear success for Mussolini.[82] The agreement described the organization and functions of the associations protected by concordat and hence meant a renunciation of autonomous ecclesiastical regulation and, with this, a definition in principle unfavorable to the Church. As regards substance, in most points the state had carried the day. Italian Catholic Action was parceled into 250 diocesan units independent of one another and had to accept a sort of prohibition of former members of the Popular Party for its leadership. Trade-union and quasi-trade-union functions were in general forbidden to it, and in its work of social formation it was virutally bound to a support of the idea of the Fascist corporate system, a few months after Quadragesimo anno (cf. Chapter 7). Nothing was said of the suppression of the objectionable Fascist oath. The counterconcession was that the youth groups could again exist under a new name, now patterned to purely religious aims, and with the explicit prohibition of pursuing sports—which meant renunciation of an essential part of modern education of youth.

The reason for these papal concessions was presumably that no better alternative was at hand. From 9 July the provincial prefects reported to Mussolini that the encyclical did not go over well among the people, not even the clergy: agreement and peace were desired.[83] The capacity of the clergy for a long fight with the state on the question of the Catholic system of associations was clearly slight. The ecclesiastical leadership could not ignore this. On 2 September it contented itself with the part of the education of youth which was permitted to it. It was much less than it wanted. But this little it had to accept, if the alternative was "still less."

---

[81] Text often printed, most recently A. Martini, "Gli accordi per l'Azione Cattolica nel 1931," CivCatt 111, 1 (1960), 574–91, repeated in idem, Studi, 147–73, here 171; R. de Felice IV, 268f. Basic for the crisis of 1931 is A. Martini, op. cit., also idem, "Il conflitto per l'Azione Cattolica nel 1931," CivCatt 111, 1 (1960), 449–58, repeated in idem, Studi, 131–46.

[82] Thus P. Scoppola, 225f., R. de Felice IV, 269. Differing is A. C. Jemolo, Chiesa e Stato in Italia negli ultimi cento anni (Turin 1952), 666: "Pace di compromesso, senza vincitori né vinti." J. Schmidlin IV, 113, judges differently. An interesting report on Sturzo's opinion of 5 September 1931 in R. de Felice IV, 270f.

[83] R. de Felice IV, 263. In the 1931 annual report the English Ambassador Forbes said that the encyclical had confused the problem, since as a further climax there would have remained to the Vatican the possibility of excommunicating Mussolini or interdicting all Italy; the Pope had, in the crisis, "in many cases been badly advised" (T. E. Hachey, Anglo-Vatican Relations 1914–1939, here 213).

The long-range political expectations which in 1929 could have been attached to Catholic Action became largely illusionary through the events of 1931. It was eliminated as politically dangerous opposition for Mussolini. Whether the successful preservation of the organizational framework of Catholic Action, especially of the youth and student groups, which as late as 1933 were joined by an academic organization,[84] would alone have sufficed to prevent the advancing loss of the political importance and identity of Catholicism vis-à-vis Fascism is questionable.

The crisis of 1938 took place under changed political conditions; it was part and sequel of the gradually more open confrontation of Church and regime after the radical wing of fascism had gained ground remarkably since the foreign policy rapprochement of Italy to Germany since 1936.[85] The partial imitation of the anti-Jewish German policy by Mussolini aroused a spontaneous resistance among churchmen, to whom the Pope made it unmistakably clear that National Socialist notions of race stood in an irreconcilable opposition to the Catholic faith. Open conflict erupted in the fall, when the government amended the Italian marriage law in accord with "racial" viewpoints in a law of 17 November 1938. This meant that a marriage entered into in the Church between a baptized or unbaptized Jew and a Catholic lost its effect in civil law, which had been agreed to in ART. 34, para. 1 of the Lateran Concordat. As soon as the Holy See learned of these aims, it made use of its diplomatic means to prevent the introduction of these new forms or to modify their implementation.[86] Seemingly in this there was question "only" of a peripheral problem, for in Italy in that year that there were about three hundred thousand marriages performed in the Church in comparison to a few dozen marriages which were affected by the amendment.[87] But for the Church there were here at stake the validity and binding force of its sacramental law and its general mandate to the human race. Hence no one displayed any readiness for concession in principiis. The Vatican's protest notes did not, of course, prevent the Italian amendment from going into effect. To this extent the Holy See suffered another foreign policy defeat. But in regard to its intransigence it had churchmen on its side. In the long run this was a perhaps more important political event.

---

[84] On their non-Fascist function cf. P. Scoppola, 283ff.

[85] Basic for what follows is A. Martini, "L'ultima battaglia di Pio XI," CivCatt 110, 2 (1959), 574–91; 110, 3 (1959), 572–90, repeated in idem, Studi, 175–230; R. de. Felice, Storia degli ebrei italiani sotto il fascismo (Turin 1972), 285–91.

[86] Cf. the compilation of the Secretariat of State, ADSS 6, 532–36 (of 14 November 1938), as well as R. de Felice, Storia degli ebrei, 550–52.

[87] Osservatore Romano, 14–15 November 1938, repeated in P. Scoppola, 323–26.

The Holy See did not exploit the 1938 violation of the Concordat to put entirely in question the treaty work of 1929.[88] For twenty years the framework was maintained. On the tenth anniversary of the Lateran Treaty Pius XI would have risked a break in a public accounting with Mussolini if death had not meanwhile overtaken him. The outline of the text of the papal address,[89] published in 1959, has pulled the rug from under this supposition. Pius XI intended before the entire assembled Italian episcopate to complain and to accuse the regime, but not to break with it. Hence the change of pontificate in 1939 meant in principle no alteration of course in Vatican foreign policy, even if a new handwriting and another political style are unmistakable. In fact, little changed—little was able to change: As the crisis of 1938 shows, the government of the Church, as soon as the sphere of the doctrinal and moral teaching was touched, could make no real concessions, even not with a dictatorship equipped with the twentieth century's techniques of power. The Church may be incapable of bringing the state or the prevailing regime to observance of the norms represented by it (which holds not only for our century), but it must insist on the validity of these norms.

PIUS XI AND THE TOTALITARIAN SYSTEMS

Opposition between the normative bases of a state and the teaching of the Church did not mean compulsion to renounce Vatican foreign policy with this state. So long as Catholic norms were not thereby sacrificed, the question of the beginning, continuing, or ending of the foreign policy activity of the Church with any state or regime was a question of expediency, in which the advancement of the possibilities of pastoral care represented the ultimate goal. In this way the lack of means of power and often the difficulty of gauging the consequences and side effects for the entire Church constituted the characteristic dilemma of papal foreign policy with reference to normative and/or in praxi hostile states. This dilemma appeared especially in relation to the really[90] totalitarian systems of our epoch: Bolshevik-dominated Russia and national socialist-ruled Germany. In this connection "totalitarian" means the claim to dispose, without limit and exclusively, of the totality of human existence, even in the sphere of conscience.[91]

---

[88] On the Vatican side one spoke not of a "violation" of the concordat but of (this added) "vulnus."

[89] Osservatore Romano, 9 February 1959, repeated in P. Scoppola, 334–41; cf. A. Martini, Studi, 231–51.

[90] In contrast to the Italian "Stato totalitario" of the late 1930s.

Pius XI and the Soviet Union

At the Vatican there was never any question that the old ecclesiastical delimitations vis-à-vis socialism were true to a still greater degree in regard to the Communism recognized as totalitarian—not yet according to the idea, but in fact. If, nevertheless, between 1921 and 1927 the Holy See three times seriously explored whether and under what conditions formal, perhaps even diplomatic, relations could be established with the Soviet Union, it let itself be guided by the same principles which in an entirely different context Pius XI expressed on 14 May 1929 in the pointed statement: "If there would be a question of saving a single soul, of warding off a greater harm from souls, then We would have the courage to treat with the Devil in person."[92] The details of these Vatican-Soviet conversations and negotiations are knowable only in outline in the present state of research;[93] but the aims pursued in them by the Holy See and the reasons for the failure can be described sufficiently clearly.

The starting point of the first attempt was the frightful famines following the Russian civil war, which in 1921 led to extensive internationally organized acts of assistance.[94] Because of an Italian protest the Holy See could not take part in these directly and had to organize its own activity, which called for contact with Russian authorities. In this connection there appeared in Rome on 18 December 1921 a sketch signed by Pizzardo of a Vatican-Russian agreement[95] which went far beyond the technical problems of the distribution of charitable measures. In it the agents to be sent by the Holy See were designated as missionaires, to whom every sort of political action and propaganda was to be forbidden, but they were allowed by treaty to set up schools and provide religious instruction (éducation morale et religieuse). To permit such beginnings of pastoral care and mission was an impossibility to the Bolshevik ecclesiastical policy of the time (see Chapter 17). Accordingly, the definitive agreement,[96] signed at the Vatican on 12 March 1922, strictly limited the papal mission of assistance to distributing food to the starving population and spoke of mere "agents" (envoyés). On the basis of this agreement, from July 1922 to September 1924 a Vatican mission composed of thirteen priests from various orders was active in several Russian cities.[97] Although the regime had on 26 February 1922 just taken a new step in the persecution of the Church by the expropriation of liturgical vessels of the churches, the Curia apparently tried to utilize even the slightest opportunities to counteract the oppression and suppression of pastoral care in Russia.

---

[91] The literature on the problem of totalitarianism is listed in Chapter 7. Especially useful in our context is H. Buchheim. Totalitäre Herrschaft, Wesen und Merkmale (Munich 1962).

[92] "Quando si trattasse di salvare qualche anima, di impedire un maggiore danno alle anime. Ci sentiremmo il corraggio di trattare col diavolo in persona" (Osservatore Romano, 16 May 1929). The contemporary translation of KIPA (Ecclesiastica 9 [1929], 255) weakened it to "struggle even with the incarnate devil."

[93] For what follows cf. R. A. Graham, Diplomacy, 349ff. Because of the details which the author obtained from the archives of the papal Secretariat of State, H. Stehle is important, although the necessary scholarly precision is missing from his presentation.

[94] Cf. H. H. Fisher, The Famine in Soviet Russia 1919–1923. The Operations of the American Relief Administration, 2d ed. (New York, 1935).

[95] Text in J. Kraus, 190, 192.

This goal becomes still clearer in the second action which occurred on the borders of the World Economic Conference of Geneva from 16 April to 19 May 1922. For the first time the new Russia had been invited again into the society of nations. The Holy See used this as an occassion to formulate in a memorandum[98] addressed to the conference general conditions to which Russia should be bound as condition of "reentry into the circle of civilized powers": full freedom of conscience, freedom of the private and public exercise of religion and worship, as well as restoration of expropriated property to the "religious corporations." What was important in this démarche, which the collapse of the conference deprived from the outside of any prospects, was not least of all its universal concern: the Vatican demands affected all religious communities, not only the Christian. The Pope did not speak only pro domo.

In the third attempt, which was drawn out from the winter of 1923–24 to December 1927, at stake was the concrete question of what returns the Soviet Union offered if the Vatican changed the de facto into a de jure recognition. Since the Soviet Union was then very much concerned for legal recognition by the rest of the world, the presence of a papal nuncio at Moscow would have been a great Russian success. The Vatican had, apparently from tactical reasons of negotiations, brought up the question, not of a nunciature, but of merely an apostolic delegation, hence a representative without diplomatic character.[99] The negotiations became jammed on the question of whether the Vatican conditions of 21 February 1924[100] should be the presuppositions for the erecting of a delegation or the subject of negotiations with the future delegate in Moscow. For unknown reasons the discussions were now transferred to Berlin and there continued by Pacelli. In February 1925 he negotiated with the Russian envoy Nikolai Krestinski about two Russian outlines—"theses"[101]—both of which were unacceptable to the Pope, because they implied unilateral Vatican advance concessions. In place of this, Pacelli in a note of 7 September 1925 apparently designated two points as conditio sine qua non: appointment of bishops and freedom of religious instruction for youth within church buildings. It was only on 11 September 1926 that the Russian government replied, offering not a reciprocal agreement but a unilateral one, hence an internal right of religion revocable by the state at any time.[102] Pacelli discussed this on 14 June 1927 with the Russian Foreign Minister Čičerin in Berlin, again unsuccessfully, because the Soviet Union would not concede religious instruction.[103] The Pope apparently wanted now to cancel the negotiations, but was induced by the nuncio in Berlin and Gasparri to one last, clearly doubtful attempt. It is contained in a communication from Pacelli of 5 October 1927.[104] Thereafter the Holy See would have been prepared, in the event that seminaries were opened and ecclesiastics could be sent from the Vatican, to appoint only such bishops and send only ecclesiastics who would be acceptable to the Bolshevik regime. Here it can be seen that there was a question of the absolute minimum possibility in pastoral care. But Moscow apparently rejected this too. Thereupon, on 16 December 1927 Pius XI directed that further discussions be stopped, so long as the persecution of the Churches lasted.[105] And there things remained. The breaking off of the negotiations with the Soviet Union by the Curia in December 1927 clearly denoted the hopelessness of a situation. Basically this was the same problem that was included in Hitler's long-range goals.

---

[96] Text in J. Kraus, 191, 193.

[97] The Moscow leadership of the mission made use of the news associations of the German embassy in Moscow for the connection with the Secretariat of State.

[98] Text in Osservatore Romano, 15–16 May 1922.

---

[99] A convenient survey of the ranks and titles of papal representatives in I. Martin.

[100] Text in F. Margiotta Broglio, 464f. (letter of Silj to Acerbo, 22 February 1924).

[101] Cf. H. Stehle, 92 (communications of the Secretariat of State).

[102] Cf. Ibid., 127f.

[103] Cf. ibid., 132f. (according to Hencke's communications).

[104] Tel. 101 Bergen, Rome, 24 October 1927 (Pol. Archiv des Auswärtigen Amtes in Bonn: Geheimakten, Vatikan Pol. 3 [=K 012074]. Wrong date in H. Stehle, 141; ibid., 445, n. 19, another wrong date and wrong locality; hence the polemic against E. Winter, based on the false locality, is irrelevant.

[105] Cf. H. Stehle, 143 (communication of the Secretariat of State).

Pius XI and National Socialist Germany

THE WAY TO THE CONCORDAT WITH THE REICH (APRIL–JULY 1933.) Pius XI's foreign policy related to Hitler is marked in its first phase by the concluding of the concordat with the Reich. Next to the Lateran Treaties, it attracted contemporary attention as did no other concordat of the period between the wars. Its significance has again been much debated since the historical-political discussion in the early 1960s[106] of the attitude of German Catholicism to Hitler's seizure of power. After the fundamental publication of the acts in 1969[107] an unprecedentedly high state of research was achieved with a comprehensive monograph on the history of the concordat with the Reich by Ludwig Volk in 1972.

He positively confirms earlier communications of Robert Leiber,[108] according to which the Holy See exercised no influence on Hitler's gaining of powers in the spring of 1933. The naming of Hitler as chancellor on 30 January, the Emergency Decree of 28 February,[109] and the Reichstag elections on 5 March were never in question. A part of the research argues differently in relation to the yes of the Center to the Enabling Act and the not much later proclamation of the Fulda Episcopal Conference. Both groups, the Center Party of the Reichstag and the bishops, yielded, according to this view, to National Socialism, with an eye to the concordat that was being sketched, or, to put it crudely, accepted the dictatorship in return for cultural-political concessions. The sources do not uphold this view. A future concordat played no role[110] in the yes of the Center on 23 March. Likewise, an exact analysis of the origin of the bishops' statement of 28 March,[111] with which, conditionally, the prohibitions of national socialism, lasting for years, were annulled, shows that neither the Vatican nor the Berlin nunciature had exercised any influence on it. Conversely, however, it is probably true that Hitler's declaration on 23 March of his government's friendliness toward Christianity and the Church, the subsequent yes of the Center to the Enabling Act, and the canceling of the earlier episcopal prohibitions of National Socialism on 28 May compelled the Vatican to act when the Catholic vice-chancellor, Franz von Papen, appeared on 10 April at the office of the cardinal secretary of state with the offer of concluding a concordat with the Reich and from the outset, among other items, offered in the law of education what the Curia had been unable to obtain in its negotiations since 1920 with the Weimar government.

---

[106] Also U. von Hehl, "Kirche, Katholizismus und das national-sozialistische Deutschland," D. Albrecht, ed., Kirche, 219–51.

[107] A. Kupper, Staatliche Akten; L. Volk, Kirchliche Akten.

[108] Most recently in R. Leiber, "Der Vatikan und das Dritte Reich," Politische Studien 14 (1963), 293–98.

[109] The importance of this Emergency Decree can scarcely be overestimated; for Hitler's seizure of power it was at least as important as the Enabling Act (cf. K. Repgen, "Hitlers Machtergreifung und der deutsche Katholizismus. Versuch einer Bilanz," D. Albrecht, ed., Kirche, 6, n. 10 [with reference to Bracher]).

[110] Exact proof in L. Volk, Geschichte, 80–83 (also in critical evaluation of the contrary and erroneous assertions of the Brüning Memoirs).

[111] Text in B. Stasiewski I, 30–32; also, L. Volk, Geschichte, 76ff.

For the Holy See there was obviously no question that it could not disregard this offer of negotiations. The widespread view that Hitler's rule would be of only short duration was not taken into consideration in the Vatican as the premise of a possible alternative. It is well attested that from the start Cardinal Pacelli was prepared for a long duration of the "Third Reich."[112] Nothing to the contrary is known as regards the Pope. True, in contrast to his secretary of state, Pius XI had in the spring of 1933 thought for a brief time that in Hitler he could perhaps find an anti-Communist defense agent.[113] This consideration was no longer present publicly on 19 May, when the bishop of Osnabrück visited him; he now fluctuated over the judgment of the internal German situation, in which pessimism apparently prevailed.[114] At the end of August he condemned the persecution of Jews in Germany in very strong words as an affront "not only to morality but also to civilization."[115]

Decisive for the Vatican's readiness for negotiations was the new dimension of danger in Germany. With the Emergency Decree of 28 February and the Enabling Act of 24 March the two "fundamental laws of the National Socialist state coming into being," as Volk puts it, were created. Now in case of need the government could itself decide whether it intended to deviate from the constitution; this deprived the Catholic Church in Germany of all previous legal protection. Hence to a hitherto unknown degree it was "in need of a concordat"; for if the previous legal assurances were refused, it had to look for others, if possible. Thus the concordat with the Reich was understood by the Holy See as a defensive weapon from the negotiations in 1933—in contrast to the Lateran Treaties.

The external course of the negotiations for the concordat with the

---

[112] For Pacelli's pessimism, cf. L. Volk, Geschichte, 63, n. 21.

[113] Also L. Volk, Geschichte, 64f.; also, idem, Faulhaber-Akten I, 745.

[114] L. Volk, Kirchliche Akten, 33.

[115] Kirkpatrick's report of 28 August 1933 (text in L. Volk, Geschichte, 217, n. 20).

Reich is not very involved. Von Papen conducted discussions in Rome from 10 to 18 April. In these was reached a preliminary draft on the part of the Church, which led on 20 April, out of consideration for changes in the Pope's wishes, to a sketch called "Kaas I" in the research. This was replaced on 11 May, not essentially altered, by the draft "Kaas II,"[116] which went both to Berlin and to the Fulda Episcopal Conference on 31 May. The desired changes of the episcopate were communicated to the government in mid-June. On 28 June Von Papen again took up his own negotiations on the Tiber, whereas he had entrusted the business of the concordat since 18 April to Prelate Ludwig Kaas,[117] who was staying in Rome. Von Papen brought along a new text outline. From 30 June to 2 July the negotiations were in the Vatican, from 1 July including Archbishop Gröber of Freiburg. On 2 July agreement was reached on a text ready for initialing,[118] which the Pope approved the same evening, but Hitler did not. The latter sought to gain time, then brought in the really appropriate Interior Ministry of the Reich, and on 5 July sent the director of the ministry, Buttmann, as a new, supplementary negotiator to Rome. On 8 July, after further negotiations, the text ready for initialing[119] was achieved and the Reichskabinett approved it on 14 July, so that Pacelli and von Papen could sign in the Vatican on 20 July.

The politically disruptive points during the three months of negotiations were until 1 July the de-politicization of the clergy (ARTICLE 32), then the protection of Catholic organizations (ART. 31). The German initial demand for a general prohibition of all partisan political activity by the clergy had been parried by Kaas in April by an extraordinarily clever counterproposal. It amounted, in a corresponding good conduct by the state, to promising by treaty a certain numerical reduction of the politically active pastoral clergy by canonical measures and actually meant "little more than nothing."[120] But at the end of June the political scene in Germany had completely changed. Like the other parties, so too the Center was no more. Its dissolution was directly at hand.[121] When this was once accomplished, ART. 32 was no longer a real concession of the Church, but on the contrary a "protection of the Church against a Nazi invasion of the clergy," as Leiber's votum on 29 June explicity stated.[122] When on 1 and 2 July the Vatican conceded ART. 32, scarcely anything was therefore really "sacrificed," but perhaps the opportunity to save Catholic organizations was seen. The concrete alternative to negotiations was narrowed to the concordat with the Reich—or renunciation of the organizations.

---

[116] Text in A. Kupper, Staatliche Akten, 41–55.

[117] Kaas, the best German expert on the concordat, was until 6 May 1933 still chairman of the Center Party. His function in the negotiations for the concordat with the Reich cannot be clearly classified in a formal manner. The charges lodged against him in connection with the concordat negotiations (most recently in 1970 in the Brüning Memoirs, the composition of which in these passages goes back to the period after 1945) are untenable (details in L. Volk, Geschichte, 201–11; general: R. Morsey, "Ludwig Kaas," idem, ed., Zeitgeschichte in Lebensbildern. Aus dem deutschen Katholizismus des 20. Jahrhunderts [Mainz 1973], 263–72.

[118] Text in A. Kupper, Staatliche Akten, 149–63; L. Volk, Kirchliche Akten, 95–106.

[119] Text in A. Kupper, Staatliche Akten, 199–213.

[120] K. Repgen, "Das Ende der Zentrumpartei und die Entstehung des Reichskonkordats," idem, ed., Historische Klopfsignale für die Gegenwart (Münster 1974), 109.

As early as April 1933 the German Catholic associations, in existence since the nineteenth century, and a greatly admired network of organizations strong in membership, were considered in jeopardy. True, they survived more intact during the following months than, for example, did the trade unions or the parties, since they were not exposed in the same degree to direct Nazi attacks and displayed a stronger willingness to assert themselves and to stay autonomous. But danger threatened them also from without. The sketch "Kaas I" had, therefore, envisaged a general article of protection for the Catholic societies, and then the Fulda Episcopal Conference had both expanded it and made it more concrete. On the other hand, according to the government's draft of the end of June a significant part of the doubtful organizations was to remain unprotected by concordat. This signified the worst, because it had meanwhile become apparent, through waves of political elimination of the opposition and police action, that now in Germany in this area also definitive facts were to be settled by force. The greatest part of the politically relevant Catholic associations were already dissolved or quite directly threatened by incorporation into Nazi units when the meetings at the negotiating table began in Rome.

And so, in this situation there was presented to the Holy See the basic question of whether there could be any negotiations at all. The issue was apparently decided by Gröber, the representative of the German bishops. On 1 July he saw only the alternative of allowing everything to collapse or, "at least temporarily," to recover the status quo ante.[123] On 2 July he more reflectively posed the condition that the government publicly disavow its most recent police action—of 1 July—and offer guarantees for the future.[124] This route was followed. At the moment of initialing Hitler publicly withdrew most of the measures of 1 July against the organizations and their heads and forbade a repetition.[125] In contrast to the trade unions and the parties, therefore, the Catholic organizations continued, with some exceptions, in the summer of 1933, but of course not unassailed and also only for a while. For them the concordat with the Reich implied no concluding of peace but a pause in the struggle, according to Volk.

---

[121] The Socialist trade unions were brought into line on 2 May 1933, the Christian on 23 June. The SPD was forbidden on 22 June, although it had assented to Hitler's governmental declaration of 17 May. In Bavaria on 25 June 2,000 representatives of the BVP, including 200 priests, were jailed in order to accelerate the dissolution. The DNVP was dissolved on 27 June, the DDP (State's Party) on 28 June. On 29 June Brüning predicted the dissolution of the Center for 30 June; it was actually dissolved on 5 July (self-dissolution). On 4 July the BVP and the DVP had dissolved themselves. For the end of the Center Party, see R. Morsey, Der Untergang des politischen Katholizismus (Stuttgart 1977), a completely new edition of his basic studies of 1960; also U. von Hehl, 228f.

[122] Text in L. Volk, Kirchliche Akten, 86–89, here 89.

This is connected with the entangled story of the origin of ART. 31. The definitive formulation contained an unconditional guarantee for the Catholic associations which served exclusively religious and purely cultural and charitable ends (para. 1); the others enjoyed this guarantee, according to para. 2, only under definite preconditions. Paragraph 3 defined that the clarification of which societies should enjoy the protection of the concordat was to be regulated between the government of the Reich and the German episcopate. The concordat contained no explicit definition of the criteria and competence for this regulating. The fact that, nevertheless, the Holy See signed on 20 July was characterized by the competent expert in the Interior Ministry of the Reich as perhaps the "worst tactical blunder" of the Curia in the concordat.[126] He cannot be contradicted. Immediately after the treaty took effect the state exploited the holes and claimed the decisive competence for establishing the principles and the drawing up of the protected list. The Vatican did not accept this. The (for the Church) unsuccessful struggle over the "principles of interpretation" and over the list of protected societies constituted a substantial part of Vatican-German relations after the concluding of the concordat with the Reich.

Perhaps the Church could still have settled the unresolved problems of ART. 31 if it had made ratification dependent on this. This did not occur because the German bishops at Fulda from 29 to 31 August were of the opinion "the sooner, the better."[127] Urging this on the one hand was anxiety lest Hitler lose interest in the concordat, while on the other hand it was expected that one could make better headway with a treaty binding in law against the continuing anti-Catholic actions. The Holy

---

[123] Gröber to Pacelli, 1 July 1933 (L. Volk, Kirchliche Akten, 92f.)

[124] Gröber to Pacelli, 2 July 1933 (L. Volk, Kirchliche Akten, 107).

[125] Text in A. Kupper, Staatliche Akten, 219f.

[126] W. Conrad, Der Kampf um die Kanzeln. Erinnerungen auf die europäischen Katholiken (Berlin 1957), 44.

[127] Gröber to Leiber, 2 September 1933 (L. Volk, Kirchliche Akten, 242).

See treated lightly some hesitations in regard to the desire of the German episcopate and on 10 September the ratification took place—that of the secret appendix on 2 November.

As in the case of the Lateran Treaties, the historical significance of the concordat with the Reich can be understood only if one distinguishes between short-range and long-range consequences. Incontestably Hitler gained prestige; his propaganda interpreted the signature of the cardinal secretary of state as papal legitimation of National Socialism. This was actually false, but politically inevitable. Of course, this propaganda operated in various ways. The concrete foreign policy of the other nations was hardly affected by it. "The concluding of the concordat implied very little sympathy of the Vatican for the Nazi regime in Germany," maintained the British envoy at the Vatican in retrospect at the end of the year.[128] Equally slight was the impact on European Catholics outside Germany, somewhat stronger perhaps in Latin America, where, however, other factors were more important. More powerful was the effect on the German Catholics, even if here one must be careful of exaggeration. It was not established that by this agreement "the power of resistance of the German Catholics to a criminal regime had been broken," as was claimed on the political side in the 1950s[129] and was repeated in the following decade by a too biased historiography.[130] The concordat with the Reich probably offered a starting point to a series of Catholic journalists, who then came forward for the easing of tensions by the building of bridges to Nazism. Meanwhile this small portion of German Catholics—in contrast to a not inconsiderable proportion of German Protestantism—sacrificed nothing of the content of faith, insisted on the Church's share in the right to issue rules in res mixtae, and furthermore claimed autonomy for the Catholic associations. Hence persons based on the illusory premise the expectation that the other side was ready for substantial restrictions of its totalitarian claim. This promise very quickly proved to be false. The Catholic attempts at bridge building came to an end, with a few exceptions, in the winter of 1933–34 and at the latest in the summer of 1934.

---

[128] T. E. Hachey, Anglo-Vatican Relations 1914–1939, 252.

[129] Thus Thomas Dehler, chairman of the FDP Party of the German Bundestag, on 11 March 1956; cf. J. M. Görgen, Pius XII. Katholische Kirche und Hochhuths "Stellvertreter" (Buxheim 1964), 42. The circulation of the most important Catholic opposition newspaper, Junge Front, rose from 85,000 at the beginning of 1933 to 120,000 at the end, and at the time it was prohibited at the beginning of 1936 it was 330,000 (cf. K. Gotto, Die Wochenzeitung Junge Front/Michael [Mainz 1970], 225 f). Between the middle of 1933 and the middle of 1934 the male Catholic youth lost about one-third of its membership, but the circulation of its association journals rose rapidly; cf. B. Schellenberger, Katholische Jugend und Drittes Reich. Eine Geschichte des Katholischen Jungmännerverbandes 1933–1939 unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der Rheinprovinz (Mainz 1975), 178, 198. J. Artez, Katholische Arbeiterbewegung und Nationalsozialismus. Der Verband katholischen Arbeiter- und Knappenvereine Westdeutschlands 1923–1945 (Mainz 1978), estimates that, on the other hand, the loss of membership of West German workers' unions between mid-1933 and the end of 1934 amounted to only about 8 percent. For the other situation among Catholic academicians no study has been made. For the Catholic public school male teachers (not the women teachers!), cf. H. Küppers, Der katholische Lehrerverband in der Übergangszeit von der Weimarer Republik zur Hitler-Diktatur. Zugleich ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des Volksschullehrerstandes (Mainz 1975).

[130] Thus G. Lewy, Die katholische Kirche und das Dritte Reich (Munich 1965), 109; also U. von Hehl, 238ff., as well as L. Volk, "Zwischen Geschichtsschreibung und Hochhuthprosa. Kritisches und Grundsätzliches zu einer Neuerscheinung über Kirche und Nationalsozialismus," D. Albrecht, ed. Kirche, 194–210.

On the other hand, in the short view the concordat meant a great success for the Church. The catastrophe of the Catholic associations was literally prevented at the last minute. One who stresses the negotiating blunders in ART. 31 must also emphasize this achievement. Precisely in the period immediately after the ratification the concordat with the Reich was, for the most endangered groups, an irreplaceable help in the struggle for self-assertion. In contrast to German Protestantism, the Catholic Church in Germany could at first remain for some time what it had hitherto been. This was attentively recorded on the part of ecumenism. "The position of the Roman Catholic Church in Germany was never so strong as now," wrote its probably best expert in Germany on 30 September 1933.[131] "It stands on its principles, which were guaranteed in the concordat. Priests are free to teach old and young in their churches what they [spacing of the author] wish without encountering the possibility of any secular interference."[132]

In the long run, on the other hand, the concordat brought Hitler little, in fact no advantage at all. It did not, as was later said, get the German bishops back into line,[133] but was, on the contrary, experienced by Hitler as an irksome fetter. Precisely for this reason he had it more and more disregarded, when and to what extent this seemed fitting to him, and this was not unexpected at the Vatican.[134] But not all the rules were broken at once, and with the existence of the concordat the Church was given the possibility of complaining about and denouncing every violation. The concordat was an outstanding defense line—the cardinal secretary of state prophesied this in August 1933[135] and, now as Pope, was able to repeat it as a historical fact on 2 June 1945.[136] For the concordat with the Reich essentially helped the Church in Germany to achieve the not self-evident accomplishment of maintaining its autonomy despite Hitler's rule to such a degree that the bishops and the clergy could proclaim the doctrine of faith and morals undiminished and administer the sacraments. That German Catholicism survived the Third Reich essentially more intact than almost all other comparable large bodies was, therefore, also a long-range effect of the agreement of 20 July 1933. It "created with its guarantees the legal basis by which resistance to totalitarianism could be and was realized."[137]

---

[131] A. Koechlin to G. Bell, 30 September 1933 (A. Lindt, ed., George Bell-Alphons Koechlin. Briefwechsel 1933–1954 [Zürich 1969], 47).

[132] Elly Heuss-Knapp, wife of the first president of the German Federal Republic, wrote in a letter of 18 May 1933: "Our friends . . . have at least proclaimed loud and clearly that the Aryan article is impossible in the Church. I go even farther and clearly declare to everyone that I shall leave the Church on the day when it is implemented. That I will then enter the Catholic Church I do not say so clearly to everyone, but I am thinking of it" (M. Vater, ed., E. Heuss-Knapp, Bürgerin zweier Welten. Ein Leben in Briefen und Aufzeichnungen [Tübingen 1961], 228).

[133] Thus G. Ritter, Carl Goerdeler und die deutsche Widerstandsbewegung (Stuttgart 1954), 114.

BETWEEN THE CONCORDAT AND THE ENCYCLICAL Mit brenneder Sorge (1933–37). To maintain the administration of the sacraments and the proclamation of the faith in Germany remained, after the signing of the concordat, the chief goal of papal foreign policy. This becomes evident in the long quarrel over the "principles of interpretation" and the list of protected associations according to ART. 31.[138] The Holy See went to great pains to make up here for the failures of July 1933. It did not succeed in this, but it contributed significantly to seeing that the concluding of agreements which would have been still more unfavorable for the Church than the situation without an agreement was prevented. At the beginning of 1935 the negotiations were practically wrecked because of Nazi intransigence, even though they were not formally declared to be ended by either party. The Ecclesiastical Ministry of the Reich, established in July 1935, in September 1935 once more asked for episcopal proposals and then conducted oral and written discussions. These were tacitly interrupted by the state in the spring of 1936. The resumption on 10 December 1936 was explicitly designated as "superfluous," because a new situation had arisen.[139] The bishops would have been as ready in principle for further discussions, as was also the Vatican—but only to supply no pretext to the other side for easily disavowing the obligations of the concordat.

---

[134] Kirkpatrick's report of 19 August 1933 (repeated in L. Volk, Geschichte, 250f.)

[135] Cf. n. 134.

[136] AAS 37 (1945), 163.

[137] K. Gotto, "Katholische Kirche und Nationalsozialismus," StL, 10th ed., 10 (Freiburg 1970), 489.

[138] The ecclesiastical documents and the texts of the draft now in B. Stasiewski I–III, and D. Albrecht I.

[139] Cf. D. Albrecht I, 195, n. 7.

At stake in these exhausting negotiations was whether the Church could act beyond the walls of the sacristy or not. Every ecclesiastical concession extended totalitarian rule, every intransigence raised up obstacles to the Church. In this respect the question was where to draw the line—to a certain degree a problem of judgment. In general the Curia avoided letting the German bishops have a voice in this point. Its apodictic "no"[140] to a draft[141] agreed to in June 1934 by the episcopal delegation was an exception, scarcely to be overestimated in its importance, in which the Vatican of course knew that the affected societies in Germany were entirely behind it and with its protest strengthened their position vis-à-vis the bishops. Seen in its totality, the defense line of the Catholic societies was sought relatively far to the front, although this principle constantly encountered reductions in concrete details. For example, the Holy See consistently claimed only "partisan political" activity was forbidden to the associations, as the text of the treaty said; on the other hand, the Curia insisted on a general political right of activity for the organizations, hence on involvement with basic problems of political and social life. As a consequence the assertion of rights which the Church had negotiated for itself in the concordat created a dam against the totalitarian flood. While the Church was defending its own position with the means appropriate to it, it was at the same time a general antitotalitarian factor of importance.

On another plane a like function was performed by the thick exchange of notes of the Holy See with the German government, which began on the Vatican's initiative immediately after the ratification of the concordat. "Soul and mover"—such are the words of D. Albrecht—of this exchange of notes was the cardinal secretary of state with the intimate cooperation of the Pope. In almost wearisome repetition "again and again the brutal discrepancy" of the government "from law in accord with the concordat and activity hostile to the concordat" was brought up.[142] In this connection Pacelli proceeded from the Church's Leonine neutrality in regard to all types of states. He used this start in order to define the moral minimal conditions which every form of state must realize, by which principles of natural law served as the rule of conduct. In statements of principle of great strength the notes registered charges against rule by force. "There is no regulation of the concordat which could oblige the Church to recognize state laws as binding on its members which were lacking in the requisite of morally obligatory state laws, that is, conformity with the divine law."[143] A basic principle of National Socialism was sharply rejected: "Human norm is unthinkable without anchoring in the divine. This ultimate mooring cannot lie in an arbitrary 'divinity' of race. Not in the absolutizing of the nation. Such a 'God' of blood and race would be nothing other than the self-made reflection of one's own narrowness and tightness."[144] The editor of these documents has correctly established in summary that here, on the basis of the concordat, the "painful truth was for years spoken directly into the face" of the government of the Reich, "as those could not do who would also have wanted to do, and those did not do who otherwise could have done."[145]

---

[140] First by Pacelli to Bertram, 23 July 1934 (B. Stasiewski I, 762–69).

[141] Text in B. Stasiewski I, 744–46.

[142] D. Albrecht I, p. XXI.

On the other hand, it is objected that a real giving of witness would have demanded publicity "with ultimate personal risk," and this in fact was not the case in regard to statements of principle, but remained in the diplomatically internal official documents.[146] In this view the goal which the notes pursued was not entirely known. They were not only diplomatic documents of a confidential nature. The most important pieces in the exchange of notes were printed by the Holy See in three issues in 1934 and 1936 as a white paper. The government of the Reich had a suspicion of this. It had to include the constantly threatening publication of these documents in its political calculations. It was still more significant that the white papers had been transmitted to the German bishops each time, and described the line of the Vatican's formation of view and will to the German episcopate; in this way they became an essentially inner-ecclesiastical instrument of government. In addition, in 1935 the contents of two very clear notes was published in Osservatore Romano and from there were taken into the official ecclesiastical newspapers of the German sees.[147] This was already "publicity," if only officially. Entirely public and official was finally the encyclical Mit brennender Sorge. Concordat—exchange of notes—encyclical were logical steps of a uniform defensive struggle by the Church.

FROM THE ENCYCLICAL Mit brennender Sorge TO THE END OF THE PONTIFICATE (1937–39.) The encyclical Mit brennender Sorge, dated 14 March

---

[143] Ibid. I, 255 (10 July 1935).

[144] Ibid. I, 146 (14 May 1934).

[145] Ibid. I, p. XXIV.

[146] E. W. Böckenförde in Der Staat 8 (1969), 266f.

[147] L. Volk, Enzyklika, 175f.

1937,[148] was read in the Catholic churches of Germany on 21 March, Palm Sunday, and was immediately distributed in print in an extensive issue. It is the best known papal document of the Catholic Church's struggle with Hitler. The German bishops had given the official impetus in the traditional letter of homage of the Fulda Episcopal Conference on 18 August 1936.[149] Five of the bishops were invited to Rome for January 1936 to deliver a report: the three cardinals and two of the youngest:[150] Clemens August von Galen of Münster and Konrad von Preysing of Berlin, who belonged to the "hard" wing of the Episcopal Conference. Several discussions produced unanimity to adhere to the Concordat as far as possible; although it was disputed whether a papal encyclical would jeopardize the concordat, there was agreement that such a pastoral letter was desirable. In addition, in strict secrecy Faulhaber prepared a first draft for Pacelli on 21 January 1937.[151] Then, until 10 March, the cardinal secretary of state composed the definitive text, presumably with the collaboration of Kaas, demonstrably under the personal supervision of the Pope.

Faulhaber was an important preacher. He intended his draft as a homily. It described the most serious present dangers for the Catholic faith, proceeding first from the positive—"pure" divine faith, "pure" faith in Christ, "pure" faith in the Church, "pure" faith in the papal primacy; then, in a polemical defense against Nazi premises and methods, it warned against what would today be called "remodeling" ("no novel interpretation of holy values"). There followed an exhortation to the young as well as to the priests and the "loyal," especially the members of the associations and Catholic parents—struggle over the denominational schools.

The Faulhaber draft was a "letter for teaching and encouraging," says Volk. Pacelli added a third leitmotiv. The persecution of the Catholic Church in the Third Reich was not only described by him as a fact but it was brought back to its political bases and aims. This gave the encyclical its timely sharpness. The other side, said the Pope, has "made the reinterpretation of the treaty, the undermining of the treaty, finally the more or less public violation of the treaty the unwritten law of operation." The "visual instruction of past years" reveals "machinations which from the first knew no other goal than a war of annihilation." That this war of annihilation had its cause in the irreconcilability of Catholic faith and national socialist principles of government is worked out in copious detail. "Whoever dissociates race or the people or the state or the type of state, the executors of political power, or other basic values of the organization of the human community—which claim an essential and honorable place within the earthly order—from this secular value scale of theirs, makes them the highest norm of all, even of religious values, and deifies them with an idolatrous worship, overturns and falsifies the divinely created and divinely commanded order of things." Ideas of race, the Führer principle, and totalitarianism were thus repudiated by faith. Man has "as a personality God-given rights," which "must remain immune" to any "interference on the part of the community"; in the context of school registration there was mention of the "condition of notorious absence of freedom." In contrast to Non abbiamo bisogno, the encyclical of 1937 is incomparably harsher. But, as in 1931, here too the Pope did not want to burn all bridges.

---

[148] AAS 29 (1937), 145–67; M, 211–38. There is no Latin version of this encyclical, but an Italian translation (ibid. 145–67). Often printed, it is now best in D. Albrecht I, 404–43.

[149] Text in B. Stasiewski III, no. 315/IIa.

[150] The age of the German bishops in 1937 amounted, in numerical average, to 64 years (7 over 70, 9 between 60 and 70, 8 between 50 and 59, and 1 under 50). Von Galen was 59 years old and three years a bishop; von Preysing was 57 and four years a bishop.

[151] Text now in D. Albrecht I, 404–43; ibid, 402f., the fundamental investigations of A. Martini are discussed.

The impact of the encyclical can be described only in connection with its aims. The papal pastoral letter was intended as "a word of truth and of pastoral support." In groups loyal to the Church, which were amenable to the intellectual level of the encyclical, it presumably had this limiting effect to an optimal degree. In other groups, which could hardly receive the ingenious sentence structure of this text without assistance, the theoretical understanding may have been slight, but not the solidifying effect.[152] The individual distinctions and conclusions were indeed far less important than the unprecendented fact that the Pope proclaimed publicly to the world: The Church in Germany is fighting for life and death; you German Catholics, you who are persecuted, are in the right; do not be confused; I am standing behind you.

Corresponding to the direct impact of the encyclical was the reaction of the other side, which had only learned of the imminent reading at the last minute.[153] The Nazi leadership did not make the risky attempt to suppress the reading on 21 March in the 11,500 parish churches; instead, it exerted itself for the drastic stopping of further distribution and took up massive measures of retaliation. Of these the most spectacular was a barrage of propaganda. On 6 April Hitler ordered the immediate resumption of the trials on morals charges against Catholic religious and priests which had been halted the previous year. Thereby was inaugurated a propaganda action of unusual perfection and radical nature, the aim of which was to destroy the bonds linking the faithful to their clerical leadership.[154] Not without a very active counterdefense by the bishops and clergy did the loyalty of German Catholics endure this ordeal.

---

[152] The RPB from Bavaria are ambiguous on this point; cf. RPB I, 211f; II, 167; III, 128; IV, 121.

[153] Cf. L. Volk, Enzyklika, 182–85.

Meanwhile, the government, taking up considerations from the period before the encyclical, prepared to give notice of denouncing the concordat.[155] Into these plans there burst on 19 May a report which even further embittered German-Vatican relations. Because of an indiscretion of the press it was learned that the cardinal of Chicago, George William Mundelein, in the presence of five hundred priests of his diocese had condemned the Nazi regime and had characterized Adolf Hitler as "an Austrian paperhanger, and a poor one at that." German policy made an issue of this. It let its minister at the Holy See go ostentatiously on leave and on 29 May delivered a testy note, which demanded "redress."[156] The war of nerves against the Church was now pushed to its climax in Germany,[157] but apparently this did not greatly impress the Vatican. Its reply of 24 June[158] contained no apologies or weakening, but turned the tables and on its part again rejected the German policy. Furthermore, the Curia continued the war of notes in the previous form until in the summer of 1938 it was in practice called off, for reasons thus far unknown.[159]

Berlin's plans for denouncing the concordat were put aside, unrealized, in the fall of 1937, without the relevant motives being clearly known. Presumably Hitler, as he was about to enter upon immediate preparations for his expansionist policy, desired relative peace on the domestic policy scene, in any case not an added burden because of this action.

Until the Pope's death the situation of the Church in Germany did not improve. Quite the contrary: the prohibition of youth associations and the abolition of denominational schools were now implemented by the state. At the same time there appeared areas not covered by the concordat: Austria after the Anschluss of 13 March 1938 and the [154] H. G. Hockerts, Die Sittlichkeitsprozesse gegen katholische Ordensangehörige und Priester 1936/37. Eine Studie zur nationalsozialistischen Herrschaftstechnik und zum Kirchenkampf (Mainz 1971), 74.

---

[155] Cf. D. Albrecht I, 373f., n. 3.

[156] Text in D. Albrecht II, 23f.

[157] Cf. H. G. Hockerts, 132–46.

[158] D. Albrecht II, 24–30.

[159] The view of the German ambassador to the Holy See: D. Albrecht II, 81f., n. 2.

Sudetenland from 1 October 1938. The German government refused, using legal arguments, to extend the validity of the concordat to these areas,[160] and also rejected new agreements. The positive results of the concordat in the "Old Reich," despite serious inroads precisely in 1938 and 1939, here became well known. The Holy See, like many other powers,[161] most of which were economically affected, did not lodge a diplomatic protest against the German Jewish pogrom in November 1938, whereas in the same days it pushed to its climax its conflict with Mussolini's "race legislation." In the long-run the encyclical accomplished nothing, in so far as the actual relations thereafter became, not better, but worse.

It likewise meant no turn in the ecclesiastical battle tactics of the Fulda Episcopal Conference. Preysing and Galen apparently desired this. They felt that permanent mobilization of publicity against violations of rights was a more effective method than Bertram's previous "petition policy."[162] The majority of the Episcopal Conference did not agree. Hence the putting to the test did not occur. The chances of such an attempt could be assessed with difficulty because it could not be said how long the episcopate, considering corresponding countermeasures of Hitler, could have kept the faithful on a permanent collision course. The Holy See did not meddle in these confrontations over the better defense tactics, although Pacelli would probably have been glad to see if Galen and Preysing were to be followed. Hence to this extent the encyclical was "not a caesura" (L. Volk).

On the other hand it incontestably produced a clarification whose long-term consequences must not be underestimated. Not only for foreign lands was it declared that the Catholic Church was in fact persecuted in Germany and that between Hitler and the Pope there existed an unbridgeable opposition: this clarification was of the utmost importance for the clergy and faithful in Germany. They found authentically marked here the route and the direction and indeed in the genuine ecclesiastical sphere of faith and morals, hence in an area in which the claim to obedient hearing was then undisputed. Exactly because the encyclical did not directly argue politically was it so demanding. The Church defended not its "influence" in the "world" but its proprium. No one could seriously challenge the legitimacy of this position. But by defending what was its own and by persevering in what was its own, it showed that it did not fit into Hitler's totalitarian system. Whether through a defense on a more political line the Catholic Church in Germany would have been able to retain as many people in the same degree before the intellectual accommodation to National Socialism as was possible to it according to the judgment of its Nazi enemies and the experience of contemporaries may be doubted.

---

[160] Also D. Albrecht II, 80f.

[161] Cf. the statement of the Germany report of the Berlin Foreign Office of 20 December 1938: ADAP D V, 769–73.

[162] Also basic is L. Volk, "Die Fuldaer Bischofskonferenz von Hitlers Machtergreifung bis zur Enzyklika 'Mit brennender Sorge,'" as well as idem, "Die Fuldaer Bischofskonferenz von der Enzyklika 'Mit brennender Sorge,' bis zum Ende des NS-Herrschaft," D. Albrecht, ed., Kirche, 35–102; W. Adolph, Hirtenamt und Hitlerdiktatur (Berlin 1965).

When the foreign policy of Pius XI vis-à-vis Hitler is surveyed from the beginning to his death, the absence of genuine alternatives becomes obvious. What would have happened if Hitler had not unloosed the Second World War and lost no one can positively say. Everything suggests that the Catholic Church in his sphere of rule would then have fallen into a situation without hope of escape, similar to that in Stalin's Russia.

The Second World War: Pius XII

More than in 1914 and 1922, political reasons, in addition to ecclesiastical, may have been decisive in the election of Pius XII on 2 March 1939. Anything more precise is unknown.[163] The Second World War, which had already cast its shadows, by which it could be gauged that it would cause much greater spiritual and material damage than in 1914–18, brought the papacy far more difficult tasks than the first. This was very well known to the Pope, who had had experience in important political posts in the First World War. It was depressing for this austere observer that, despite the entirely correct insight, he could change so little in the course of things.

Most of Pacelli's contemporaries were of the opinion that he endured this ordeal magnificently. Apart from coarse Communist polemic,[164] after 1945 a vast increase in the prestige of the Holy See was testified to by the Protestant[165] and also by the liberal side and was referred essentially to the demonstration of the high, statesmanlike qualities[166] of the Pope in the Second World War: "At no time since 1848 has the papacy had so good an international press as today."[167] Correspondingly it could be written at the Pope's death in 1958 that Pius XII had "brilliantly" discharged the heavy task of leading the Church through the Second World War. "In this epoch of raw force, of hatred, and of murder, the Church only gained in prestige, trust, and possiblities of effectiveness."[168] Five years later a play by the hitherto unknown German poet Hochhuth, with its serious charges against Pius XII, evoked a uniquely passionate debate in the Western world, with numerous discussions, seventy-five hundred letters to editors, and so forth.[169] The hitherto almost universal high esteem now changed in many to the opposite, even to scorn and hatred. Even a part of the literature appearing at the time and making a claim to scholarship did not hold itself far aloof from emotions, posing of problem questions, and even clear errors in method.[170] This "Hochhuth Debate" produced for scholarship a substantial profit to the extent that the Holy See at the turn of the years 1964–65 gave to a group of internationally recognized historians of the Society of Jesus[171] the task of publishing its acts and documents for the history of the Second World War. This voluminous publication appeared since 1965 and was to be completed in 1978. Research then had firm[172] ground under its feet.

---

[163] The comment in D. Tardini, Pius XII. als Oberhirte, Priester und Mensch (Freiburg 1961), 34, is very cautiously expressed.

[164] Cf. M. M. Scheinmann, Der Vatikan im Zweiten Weltkrieg (East Berlin 1954). Criticism from the other side was less noticed. On the one hand, it came to a head in the charge made by the Russian Orthodox, American Protestant, and Freemason side that Pius XII, like the other Popes of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, pursued politics and thereby failed in his ecclesiastical duty, and on the other hand in the reproof from the Jewish side (L. Poliakow) that he pursued politics too little, or even the wrong politics, and championed the Jews in Rome so little in order not to jeopardize his relations with Germany (cf. P. Duclos, 11f.).

[165] H. Hermelink, 2.

[166] Thus Sumner Wells, The Time of Decision (New York and London 1944), 142.

As with Benedict XV, the foreign policy of Pius XII is summarized from three points of view: neutrality—exertions for peace—humanitarian measures of assistance. To these is added as a fourth the problem of his "silence."

---

[167] L. Salvatorelli, Chiesa e Stato dalla rivoluzione francese ad oggi (Florence 1955), 139.

[168] R. Leiber, "Pius XII," StdZ 163 (1958–59), 88.

[169] A selection of the contemporary contributions to the discussion, not made from a scholarly point of view, in F. J. Raddatz, ed., Summa injuria oder Durfte der Papst schweigen? Hochhuths "Stellvertreter" in der öffentlichen Kritik (Reinbek 1963); Der Streit um Hochhuths "Stellvertreter." Theater unserer Zeit (Basel, Stuttgart 1963); also, cf. U. von Hehl, 236f., as well as, collectively, V. Conzemius, Églises, 487ff.

[170] For G. Lewy, The Catholic Church and Nazi Germany (New York and Toronto 1964), cf. above n. 130. Striking errors in method in S. Friedlaender, Pie XII et le IIIe Reich. Documents (Paris 1964). Also cf. A. Martini, "Un concerto non mai eseguito alla presenza di Pio XII," CivCatt 116, 1 (1965), 538–46; P. Blet, "Pio XII e il Terzo Reich," CivCatt 116, 2 (1965), 251–58; R. Lill, "Die Kirche und das Dritte Reich. Ein Forschungsbericht," W. P. Eckert, ed., Judenhass—Schuld der Christen?! Ergänzungsheft (Essen 1966), 62–64; V. Conzemius, Églises, 491–93; R. Graham, "Come non fare il processo 'storico,' " idem, Il Vaticano, 283–92.

[171] Pierre Blet, R. A. Graham, A. Martini, and B. Schneider (the last named is now deceased). They have made sure that for their edition the same rules hold as for other historical source publications (ADSS 1, p. IX).

[172] The doubts about the objectivity of the editors in B. Martin, Friedensinitiativen und Machtpolitik im Zweiten Weltkrieg 1939–1942 (Düsseldorf 1974), 371ff., are not substantiated and so irrelevant.

NEUTRALITY

The reasons which had persuaded Benedict XV to opt for neutrality persisted in the Second World War. Two more were added. One was founded in Pacelli's personality. Pius XII, whom a bon mot characterized as the complete "diplomate de l'ancien régime,"[173] was by background, nature, self-evaluation, and experience an outspoken man of peace—but not at the cost of evil compromise. International law provided the other reason. In the Lateran Treaty the Holy See had assumed the obligation of holding itself aloof from the properly political problems of international politics (ARTICLE 24). This principle was, however, limited by two provisos: first, the Pope reserved the right to mediate peace in the event that both parties requested it, and, second, it had reserved the right to vindicate the moral and the ideal in every case. Tradition, circumstances, and legal situation converged in the Holy See's neutrality.

For this neutrality Pius XII, who was accustomed to think and to speak in very distinct ways, preferred the term "impartiality."[174] In this manner the political facts should be removed from the moral circumstances. "Neutrality," Pius XII declared to the cardinal of Munich, "could be understood in the sense of a passive indifference," which in a period of war such as this "was unbecoming" to the head of the Church. "Impartiality means for us judgment of things in accord with truth and justice," by which, however, in public announcements he granted "to the situation of the Church in the individual countries every possible consideration in order to spare the Catholics there hardships that could be avoided."[175] In other respects, like his predecessor Benedict XV, he declared: The Church "does not have the function of intervening and taking sides in purely earthly affairs. She is a mother. Do not ask a mother to favor or to oppose the part of one or the other of her children."[176]

The consequences of such a neutrality were observed by Pius XII "almost rigoristically," according to J. Becker. It was certainly his view, even before 1944,[177] that a war of aggression is not a morally and legally legitimate means of politics. With regard to his obligations of international law, before the outbreak of the war and during the war he refrained with difficulty from any explicit condemnation of many acts of aggression on the part of Germany,[178] Italy,[179] the Soviet Union,[180] the Allies,[181] and Japan,[182] and made only a much pondered exception in regard to the Benelux countries on 10 May 1940.[183] He was likewise careful to see that the Vatican did not become entangled in any crusade propaganda of one of the warring sides—neither from 1939 to 1941 against Hitler and Stalin nor, from 1941, when both the anti-Communist and the anti-Nazi crusade would have liked to appeal to a papal support. Even the term "Communism" disappeared from the vocabulary of the Holy See, and the idea of "West" was pretty much avoided from this period.[184] The maintaining of such an impartiality was very much more difficult in comparison to the First World War. It required "almost superhuman exertions" in order "to keep" the Holy See "above the strife of parties," the Pope confided to the archbishop of Cologne.[185] In this connection the integrity of the Vatican State represented the lesser, even if not a slight, problem.

---

[173] W. d'Ormesson, "Pie XII tel que je l'ai connu," RHD 82 (1968), 21

[174] For example in the Christmas address of 1942 (cf. below n. 200).

[175] B. Schneider, Piusbriefe, 215 (31 January 1943).

[176] Thus in the Christmas address of 1946, AAS 39 (1947), 7–17; UG II, 1919–32. Similarly in his address of 2 June 1939, ADSS 1, 163.

[177] P. Duclos, 47ff., bases himself on the Christmas address of 1944 (cf. below n. 202).

The Lateran Treaty had guaranteed to the Holy See perfect independence and the possibility of communication with the rest of the world even in the event of a renewed state of war in Italy. These contractual decisions were not fully observed, but still, by and large, certain limits of flagrant violations of rights were not exceeded. The actual state of affairs depended on the general situation. Since Italy did not enter the war until 10 June 1940, the Vatican had to put up with relatively few restrictions until the beginning of the German campaign against France on 10 May 1940. Now matters underwent a change. Not only did measures such as blackouts and various other war-economy restrictions have to observed; Italy exerted strong pressures for the limiting of the Vatican's propaganda possibilities. The possibilities of communications by press (Osservatore Romano) and radio (Radio Vaticana) were thereupon curtailed; from the end of April 1941 Radio Vaticana discontinued its broadcasts on the status of the Church in Germany.[186] On the other hand, direct diplomatic contact with the powers hostile to Italy was maintained even after June 1940. When, contrary to the treaty, Mussolini withdrew their extraterritoriality, the Pope did not have them withdraw, as in 1915, to Switzerland, but gave them cramped quarters in the Vatican State, where finally a dozen representatives were lodged. Their contact with the Curia was thereby facilitated, and they were not entirely cut off from their governments; there remained radio communication and the possibilities of travel. Roosevelt's deputy, Myron C. Taylor,[187] went to Rome seven times for brief and long stays up to 1944; the English representative, Osborne, was able to journey to London and back for some time in the spring of 1943, and Archbishop Spellman of New York spent a few days in Rome. Conversely, in 1944, when Rome obtained an Allied garrison, the Holy See sheltered the diplomatic representatives of Germany, Japan, Hungary, and so forth. True, their possibilities of working were limited, but they were preserved in substance.

---

[178] 15 March 1939, occupation of Czechoslovakia; 23 March 1939, occupation of Memel; 1 September 1939, attack on Poland; 9 April 1940, occupation of Denmark, attack on Norway; 10 May 1940, attack on Luxemburg, Belgium, and The Netherlands; 6 April 1941, attack on Yugoslavia and Greece; 22 June 1941, attack on the Soviet Union.

[179] 7 April 1939, attack on Albania; 28 October 1940, attack on Greece.

[180] 17 September 1939, occupation of eastern Poland; 30 November 1939, attack on Finland; 4–17 June 1940, occupation of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania; 21 June 1940, occupation of Bessarabia; 25 August 1941, occupation of Iran.

[181] United States, July 1941, occupation of Iceland; England, 10 May 1940, occupation of Iceland, 25 August 1941, occupation of Iran.

[182] 7 December 1941, attack on the United States.

[183] Cf. J. Becker, 174f.

[184] Evidence in P. Duclos, 127–35.

[185] B. Schneider, Piusbriefe, 280 (3 March 1944).

Hence during the entire Second World War the central authority in the Universal Church could continue to operate essentially intact and keep contact with its nuncios and the episcopate to the extent that this was not regionally and locally restricted and paralyzed, especially in the areas under German and Russian rule.[188] This was not self-evident. From the spring of 1941 the Curia reckoned with the possibility of a German occupation of Vatican City and the forcible withdrawal of the Pope;[189] it made preparations in case the central authority should no longer be capable of functioning. These measures reached their climax before and after the fall of Mussolini on 25 July 1943, which was followed on 8 September by the occupation of Rome by German troops and police. Then the foreign diplomats at the Vatican burned their papers; the Pope had a part of his documents hidden in his palace, and microfilm photographs of others sent to Washington in order to save them. The extraterritoriality of the Holy See was violated in December 1943 and February 1944 by police raids on political and racial refugees in papal buildings outside Vatican City.[190] But the Vatican state remained outside Hitler's direct clutches. The reasons for this are not evident. But it is indisputable that the Pope and his collaborators had to take this possibility into consideration on the basis of their information since 1941, and they were delivered from this anxiety only by the Allied occupation of Rome on 5 June 1944, although many restrictions and limitations were still protracted beyond the war.

---

[186] Cf. P. Duclos, 32–36; ADSS, 4, 18–33; R. A. Graham, "La Radio Vaticana tra Londra e Berlino. Un dossier della guerra delle onde: 1940–1941," CivCatt 127, 1 (1976), 132–50. Compensation was sought through new means. Thus the organ Parola di Papa was issued as a new publication, which was sent to all Italian parish priests. According to P. Duclos, 34, n. 1, the Christmas address of 1941 was published in Italy with a circulation of 370,000.

[187] Cf. G. Q. Flynn, Roosevelt and Romanism. Catholics and American Diplomacy, 1937–1945 (Westport 1976), 106ff.; cf. idem, CHR 58 (1972), 171–94.

[188] The Warsaw nunciature was not able, after the nuncio had withdrawn with the Polish government to Rumania, to be opened again; the nuncios in Brussels and The Hague had to depart in July 1940 on German orders, the nuncios in Kovno and Riga in August 1940 on Russian orders. Conversely, from 1943 there were also difficulties for the Vatican in the territories occupied by the Allies.

[189] Also R. A. Graham, "Voleva Hitler allontanare da Roma Pio XII?" CivCatt 123, 1 (1972), 319–27, 454–61, repeated in idem, Il Vaticano, 89–110.

Also the considerable, altogether rather successful exertions of papal policy to keep Rome as a city out of the events of the war[191] were not only conditioned by humanitarian reasons; at the same time they aimed at preserving the neutral independence of the papacy, not only for reasons of international law but still more from ecclesiastical motives. To the Pope belonged as a principal task of his office, in accord with the Church's understanding of itself, the preservation of the Church's unity. This presupposed unconditional loyalty of all Catholics, behind whichever warring front they stood, to the common Supreme Head of the Church, which could only be maintained if people knew that the Pope's independence guaranteed his impartiality. If Rome were involved in the direct action of the war, it was not to be expected that the Vatican's walls would thereafter protect its independence. Hence, as he himself wrote to the bishop of Berlin,[192] the "further[193] involvement of Rome in the war intensified to the intolerable" the excessive dangers to Church unity. This trial was spared the Church. Just as Benedict XV, Pius XII was therefore able to carry out a humanitarian, charitable activity and promote peace initiatives. In these two fields much was attempted but much or little was achieved in different ways.

EFFORTS FOR PEACE

The Pope's exertions for peace began immediately after his election and were continued to the end of the war with undiminished readiness. They took place on two different planes, in the area of teaching and in that of practical politics. In both fields the difference between the pontificates of Benedict XV and Pius XII became obvious.

---

[190] P. Duclos, 30f.

[191] Also A. Giovannetti, Roma aperta citta (Milan 1962).

[192] B. Schneider, Piusbriefe, 291 (21 March 1944).

[193] The text alludes to air attacks on Rome.

Benedict XV developed no real doctrine of peace, no coherent system of detailed expressions on theoretical bases and aims, on practical assumptions and possibilities of a domestic and international order of peace. He had been content to admonish abstractly to peace in his public statements and put the rest aside for negotiations which should lead to a compromise. It was different with his successor in the Second World War. Already his first public announcement as Pope on 3 March 1939[194] contained the keywords of a universal program for peace. He again took up these points in his Easter homily of 1939,[195] further pursued it in his first encyclical, Summi Pontificatus (20 October 1939),[196] and put it in the center of his Christmas address of 1939,[197] in which the five basic conditions of a lasting international peace were discussed. All subsequent Christmas addresses, which were likewise planned with a view to the greatest possible publicity, treated pretty much in detail, and sometimes exclusively, problems of the ethics of peace—in 1940 the moral assumptions of a peaceful international order;[198] in 1941 the bases of a new international order;[199] in 1942 the basic elements of national and international community life;[200] in 1943 the moral presuppositions for a world peace among victors and vanquished;[201] in 1944 the bases of a true democracy;[202] in 1945 the Universal Church and universal peace.[203] On other public occasions, especially regularly on 2 June, he constantly returned to it.[204]

The Pope's concern was to develop the conditions, not for just any peace, but for a just and hence lasting peace.[205] On the basis of natural law he displayed the ideal of an international order which should guarantee security and existence equally to all nations and national minorities, as the personal dignity of the individual human being demanded. His view was not restricted to the legal but was directed to the economic order—distribution of wealth—and to society. Special attention was applied to the problems of disarmament. Decisively but also prudently were treated the bases of the law of treaties, by which treaties were to be maintained or, if necessary, to be revised—a recalling of the treaty of Versailles. Not least, the creating of supranational institutions with real competence was indispensable.

---

[194] Text in ADSS 1, 97f.; AAS 31 (1939), 86–87.

[195] Text in ADSS 1, 104–10; AAS 31 (1939), 145–51; UG II, 1862–68.

[196] Draft of the parts referring to peace in ADSS 1, 315–23; text in AAS 31 (1939), 413–35; UG I, 5–40.

[197] Draft of the parts referring to peace in ADSS 1, 353–61; text in AAS 32 (1940), 5–13; UG II, 1869–82.

[198] Draft of the parts referring to peace in ADSS 4, 307–13; text in AAS 33 (1941), 5–14, UG II, 1824–38.

[199] Draft in ADSS 5, 337–50; text in AAS 34 (1942), 10–21; UG II, 1944–59.

[200] Extract in ADSS 7, 161–67; text in AAS 35 (1943), 9–24; UG I, 98–119.

[201] Draft of the parts referring to peace in ADSS 7, 732–34; text in AAS 36 (1944), 11–24; UG II, 1962–79.

[202] Text in AAS 37 (1945), 10–23; UG II, 1771–88.

[203] Text in AAS 38 (1946), 15–25; UG II, 2091–2105.

[204] The texts are most conveniently found in AAS and UG respectively.

[205] A concise but penetrating systematic treatment in P. Duclos, 70–103.

These instructive discussions by the Pope, in which actual everyday cases and principles were blended, clearly had a threefold aim. In the rather long run, material should here be circulated which would be further debated by the Church's social doctrine, by practical philosophy, and by the juristic disciplines.[206] Thereby Pius XII intended to provide guiding principles to the political thought of the faithful and at the same time influence concrete political decisions to the degree this should be possible. The fact that between his concepts and the peace aims of Hitler or Stalin there ran insurmountable abysses was beside the point. But there were also important differences and contradictions relative to the guiding ideas of the Western democracies. Thus on 1 September 1943 the Pope expressed himself, both from considerations of principle and for tactical reasons, against the formula of "unconditional surrender" of the Casablanca Conference of January 1943,[207] and he did not support the Atlantic Charter of 14 August 1941, which coincided with his ideas in important but not in all points.[208] The maxims of Pius XII's peace doctrine drew collectively "the consequences from the frustrated peace of 1919," according to J. Becker; its increased repetition in a harsher form should be avoided. While it had little influence on the postwar planning of the victorious powers, it did perhaps on the political development after 1945. To this degree it was not in vain.

On the other hand, with his exertions to prevent the outbreak of war and then Italy's entry into it and thereafter to bring about the ending of the conflict, Pius XII had as little success as Benedict XV, although the experience of 1914–18 must have been constantly present to the Pope, and he strove to avoid the mistakes of that period.

Three actions before the outbreak of the war must be mentioned: First, at the beginning of May 1939, probings for a five-power conference[209] for discussion and regulation of the present German-Polish and French-Italian oppositions. They found rejection among all those addressed and were canceled on 10 May.[210] Next, in close agreement with the English government, an extremely urgently formulated public appeal to reason and negotiation was presented on the evening of 24 August.[211] The essential statement came from a preliminary draft by the future Pope Paul VI and read: "Nothing is lost with peace. All can be lost with war."[212] Finally, on 30 August, there was the desperate attempt to gain Poland at the last minute for concessions to Germany,[213] which originated with Mussolini and was supported by England, as well as, on 31 August, a plea to the powers[214] for a just and peaceful solution of the conflict.[215] In a declaration personally originating with the Pope, Osservatore Romano on 13 September 1939 remarked that the Holy See had "exhausted all possibilities which" had offered "in any way still some hope for the preservation of peace or at least the excluding of the immediate danger of war."[216] This view was shared by the British government.[217] The collapse of the papal efforts for maintaining peace was mostly caused by the policy of Hitler, who was unimpressed by reasonable motives in the framework of a possible revision of the Treaty of Versailles. Polish intransigence in August 1939 made the German dictator's game easier.

---

[206] A first detailed effort by an author close to the Curia: G. Gonella, Presupposti di un ordine internazionale (Vatican City 1942).

[207] AAS 35 (1943), 277–79, here 278; UG II, 2020–24, here 2022; draft also in ADSS 7, 600.

[208] Cf. ADSS 5, 17f.

[209] Poland, Germany, England, France, Italy.

Meanwhile, on 1 September 1939 Italy proclaimed itself "not at war." The Curia had gone to great pains to nail Mussolini down to this and for this purpose assured itself of the support of Roosevelt, who at Christmas 1939 had entered into diplomatic relations with the Pope.[218] The Vatican's internal démarches, strengthened by spectacular public happenings—on 21 December the visit of the King of Italy to the Pope;[219] on 28 December, the return visit of the Pope to the King;[220] on 5 May 1940, the Pope's homily at Santa Maria sopra Minerva[221]—and a personal letter from the Pope to Mussolini on 24 April 1940[222] were unable to keep the Italian dictator aloof from the suggestion which the victorious march of the German armies in France exercised in the way of anticipation. Italy's declaration of war on 10 June 1940 confirmed the dread that had been pervading the Vatican for months.

---

[210] ADSS 1, 139f.

[211] ADSS 1, 230–38 (with the different drafts).

[212] B. Schneider, "Der Friedensappell Papst Pius' XII, vom. 24. August 1939," AHP 6 (1968), 415–24.

[213] ADSS 1, 263f.

[214] To Germany, England, France, Spain, Italy, Poland.

[215] ADSS 1, 271f.

[216] ADSS 1, 303.

[217] ADSS 1, 299

[218] ADSS 1, 348f. (Roosevelt to Pius XII, 23 December 1939).

[219] ADSS 1, 345f.

[220] ADSS 1, 362f.

[221] ADSS 1, 437f.

[222] ADSS 1, 425f.

Immediately after the French armistice of 25 June 1940 the Pope formally made preliminary soundings in England, Germany, and Italy in regard to possible negotiations for a "just and honorable peace."[223] Behind these stood the wish at least to preserve England intact, before it could be overrun by a German invasion, as a European counterweight to German hegemony.[224] When this preliminary probing found consent in none of those concerned,[225] the diplomatic possibilities of the Vatican were at first exhausted. Whether in May and June 1940 the West had lost only a battle, as Churchill and de Gaulle said, or the war, as Mussolini felt, or whether this question could not yet be answered, as presumably Pétain and Franco thought, was unclear.[226] How the Pope evaluated the views cannot be known in detail, because on that point there are hardly any sources. The editors of the papal acts warn, not by chance, that one must be cautious with judgments concerning the secret considerations of the Pope.[227] In the period between the end of the war in France and the beginning of the war in Russia he presumably placed his hopes rather on a change in domestic politics in Germany than on a military victory of England over Hitler.[228]

With the German attack on Russia on 22 June 1941 and the Japanese attack on the United States on 7 December 1941, the acts of war expanded into a global world war. At first there were no diplomatic possibilities of peace. Politically significant was a papal decision in September 1941 which, giving a theologically not unproblematic interpretation to Pius XI's Communism encyclical Divini Redemptoris of 19 March 1937, made it possible to overcome the hesitations of conscience of North American Catholics in regard to military support of the Soviet Union.[229] The Curia did not share the illusions in regard to Russian policy[230] which underlay later American planning for peace. "I am surprised," noted the secretary of the Congregation for Extraordinary Ecclesiastical Affairs, Domenico Tardini, on 22 September 1942, "that such clear matters are not seen [simply] by governments and by such important politicians."[231] As though Communist Russia after victory would return like a brave little lamb into the family of European states! "If Stalin wins the war," he stated to Taylor, "he will become the lion that devours all of Europe." Neither Hitler nor Stalin could be peaceable, satisfied members of the European family of nations. In the smaller states, situated diagonally along the war fronts, people shared the Curia's anxieties since the German defeat at Stalingrad in the winter of 1942–43 and would have been glad to steer toward a compromise peace under papal mediation before Russia became overmighty.[232] The Secretariat of State saw no concrete hopes for this in the spring of 1943[233] and had to be content with opposing Allied appeasement in regard to Russia[234] with the facts known to it and the cares derived therefrom, which were proved later to be correct.[235] This did not mean relying instead on Hitler's Germany, which since 22 June 1942 rejected the Holy See as a partner in discussions and negotiations for the area outside the "Old Reich,"[236] after it had not recognized the German annexations as definitive.[237] Apart from other weighty reasons, such an attitude was forbidden as a result of the persecution of the Catholic Church in Hitler's entire sphere of dominion, worst of all in Poland.[238] "Two dangers threaten European and Christian civilization—Nazism and Communism. Both are materialistic, antireligious, totalitarian, tyrannical, cruel, and militaristic," declared Tardini to the English chargé d'affaires on 30 May 1943.[239] Only if the Second World War eliminates both dangers can the future Europe find peace. If either of them survives the war, "a peaceful and ordered coexistence of European nations" would be "impossible," and in the not distant future a new, still worse war would be faced.

---

[223] ADSS 1, 497f.

[224] Cf. R. A. Graham, "La missione di W. d'Ormesson in Vaticano nel 1940. Intervista inedita," CivCatt 124, 4 (1973), 145–48, here 146f.

[225] ADSS 1, 500f. (England), 501f. (Italy).

[226] Cf. ADSS 4, 3.

[227] Ibid. 1, 98.

[228] Cf. ibid. 4, 58.

[229] Cf. Tardini's notes of 12, 13, 14 and 15 September with the instruction to Cicognani, 20 September 1941 (ADSS 5, 202–6, 208f., 215–18, 240f.).

[230] Cf. Taylor's memorandum of 22 September 1942 (ADSS 5, 694f.).

---

[231] ADSS 5, 694, n. 2.

[232] An attempt by Switzerland was spontaneously agreed to by the diplomats of the Lithuanian and Polish governments-in-exile, neutral Spain, Greece, and Brazil against the Axis warring powers, as well as of Hungary on the side of the Axis warring powers; cf. ADSS 7, 225–28, 234.

[233] ADSS 7, 258 (instruction to the Berne nuncio, 3 March 1943).

[234] Cf. the English aide-mémoire of 4 March 1943 (ADSS 7, 259–61) and the note of 20 April 1943 (ibid. 7, 306–9).

[235] Cf. ADSS 7, 277f. (Maglione, 27 March 1943), 281f. (Tardini, 1 March 1943), 378–80 (idem, 30 May 1943).

[236] Text in ADAP E III, 40–42.

[237] Note of 18 January 1942 in D. Albrecht II, 116–30. For the whole problem cf. D. Albrecht, "Die Politische Klausel des Reichskonkordats in den deutsch-vatikanischen Beziehungen 1936–1943." idem, ed., Kirche, 128–70.

[238] The often printed, comprehensive Vatican note on these proceedings, of 2 March 1943, now (with commentary) in D. Albrecht II, 135–49.

[239] ADSS 7, 378.

The Vatican could not translate this insight into direct foreign policy because it lacked the means for putting it into effect and the preserving of the principle of impartiality and noninterference in domestic political problems became ever more difficult. This also determined the attitude of the Holy See toward Italy. It was able to avoid becoming involved in the preparations for the fall of Mussolini, who on 12 May 1943[240] completely shut his eyes[241] to a very clear papal hint. A firsthand document, prepared as early as June, for the King of Italy was spared the Curia through a favorable turn of circumstances.[242] The Holy See participated only on the periphery in the negotiating of the Allied armistice with Italy.[243]

It is all the more astounding to "assess the extraordinary readiness of the Pope to incur risks" as J. Becker expresses it; in the winter of 1939–40 he was in intimate contact with the German military opposition, whose ideas he sent on to England, and functioned as connecting link.[244] In 1944 also he still had contacts with this part of the German opposition.[245] Perhaps toward the turn of the years 1943–44 the Pope's expectation was based on this, that perhaps "after not too long a time" the responsible statemen would listen to the peace proposal of his 1943 Christmas address, "which then, God willing, would grow into a peace mediation."[246] This did not happen, for the opposition was unable to topple Hitler. But "another Germany" was a presupposition that could not be waived[247] for a realization of the papal peace idea by means of concrete politics in the last years of the war, although the individual details for 1944–45 are still secret until the publication of the acts of this period.

PAPAL MEASURES OF ASSISTANCE

The cruelties of the Second World War, not restricted to the military conduct of the war, by far surpassed the horizon of ideas originating in 1914–18. The Pope understood this as a challenge, which must not be evaded. The question was not whether one should help, but how one could. In this regard, no role was played, as also under Benedict XV, by the religious, ethnic, or national background of those concerned, and the Vatican began, it goes without saying, from its experiences with the organization of measures of help of the First World War. However, there appeared entirely new forms and types of needs of gigantic proportions, in regard to which nothing could be achieved with the hitherto customary means. Time after time this forced an effort to achieve something in new and different ways. There was no lack of readiness to assist. But there survived an oppressive difference between being willing and being able as an historical experience from this epoch, in which aid for the politically and racially persecuted became necessary as a new problem for the Western world; for it there were no regulations of international law and no precedent by which to orient oneself.

---

[240] Ibid. 7, 330f.

[241] Ibid. 7, 334.

[242] Cf. ibid. 7, 37–39, and especially 431–35 (report of Borgongini Duca, 17 June 1943).

[243] Cf. ADSS 7, 56f.

[244] H. C. Deutsch, Verschwörung gegen den Krieg. Der Widerstand in den Jahren 1939–1940. (Munich 1969) (English: Minneapolis 1968).

[245] P. Hoffman, Widerstand, Staatsstreich, Attentat. Der Kampf der Opposition gegen Hitler (Munich 1969), 347.

[246] Cf. the expunged passage in the letter to Bertram, 6 January 1944, in B. Schneider, Piusbriefe, 266, n. q.

[247] Also, most recently, A. Martini in CC 128, 2 (1977), 232ff.

The territorial war order of The Hague of 18 October 1907, supplemented in the Geneva Agreement on 29 July 1929, had fixed clear norms for the treatment of prisoners of war and had entrusted the implementation to the International Red Cross, but this did not exclude supplementary actions of other institutions. As in the First World War, from the start the Vatican would have gladly participated in the search for the missing and in the transmission of news about prisoners of war and civilian internees to their families. Under the responsibility of the later Pope Paul VI, who was then Sostituto, an "information bureau" was set up in Section II of the Secretariat of State in 1939; it was directed by Msgr. Alexander Evreinoff and was competent for measures of that sort.[248] However, its possibilities of action were limited; for Germany and Russia refused and thwarted all cooperation. And so the "information bureau" had to limit its activity to the prisoners of states allied with Germany, which observed the tradional rules of war—Italy, Slovakia, Hungary, Rumania—and also, even though here not continuously accepted,[249] of the Western Allies and Japan. Corresponding to the course of the war, it developed its chief activity, whose happy impact on those affected can scarcely be overestimated, after 1943[250]

Furthermore, there was erected in November 1941, likewise under Montini's responsibility, an "Assistance Commission" (Commissione per i Soccorsi) within Section II of the Secretariat of State, whose secretary was Prelate Mario Brini.[251] It was competent for the properly charitable measures, and this forced it to ever new improvisation and work techniques. In other respects, the entire well-coordinated apparatus, which the Curia and especially the Secretariat of State displayed, was requisitioned for these measures of assistance, so far as they were appropriate in individual cases. A complete history of these undertakings has not yet been written. However, the documents published in recent years, for the period to the end of 1943, make it impressively clear that a very considerable part of the diplomatic activities of the Vatican in the Second World War, despite all the daily failures, was unflinchingly put at the selfless service of these charitable exertions. The Pope intentionally insisted as little as possible on it from without, because in most cases—in contrast, for example, to the present-day possibilities of effectiveness by Amnesty International—publicity impaired or even destroyed the chances of success. This affected especially those most in need of help—the Jews. If in the official sphere of activity of the Holy See for 1939 there was still mention of Vatican aid for "persons" who "were regarded as racially non-Aryan and hence were punished by laws of certain nations," this ceased for the succeeding years, after the German ambassador at the Vatican had called Berlin's attention to it in January 1940.[252] The more Hitler's murderous grip closed on the Jews, the more laconic became the particulars from the Secretariat of State. "The Holy See did, does, and will do all that is within its power" was the stereotyped information from the Secretariat of State.[253] This was not an alibi for indifference or inactivity but the indispensable presupposition for the efforts, renewed every day and perseveringly undertaken, to bring help whenever even only the slightest opportunities presented themselves. The number of cases is legion. Here only some outlines can be indicated.

---

[248] Report of activity: La Chiesa e la guerra. Documentazione dell'Opera dell'Ufficio Informazioni del Vaticano (Vatican City 1944).

[249] Cf., for the difficulties with England, ADSS 8, 12–14.

[250] The "information bureau" published a monthly bulletin, Ecclesia. Statistics for June 1941 to the end of April 1943 in ADSS 9, 603f. The acts of the "information bureau" are not generally included in the ADSS; cf. ADSS 6, 9.

The attempts to help the politically and racially persecuted in Germany and Italy went back to the days of Pius XI.[254] They were continued under the new Pope. Once there was a question of not quite one thousand individual cases.[255] In addition, help for those wishing to emigrate required great pains, in which the German Sankt Raphaelsverein in Hamburg played a substantial role until its forcible dissolution on

---

[251] ADSS 6, 9.

[252] Cf. ibid. 6, 10.

[253] Cf. ibid. 9, 39.

[254] Cf. Pacelli's circular of 30 November 1938 and his telegram to Cardinal Hinsley of London and the letter of Pius XI to five American archbishops of 10 January 1939 (ADSS 6, 49f., 539, n. 3, 50f.).

[255] ADSS 6, 23.

26 June 1941.[256] Not least of all, there was a question of the effort to impede the "racial" legislation of states in the German sphere of influence or, if that was not possible, to effect modifications in the practical enforcement. In Germany, of course, influence was without prospects,[257] but not in Italy. The presence of the Holy See contributed to the fact that the Italian Jewish policy throughout the war was in very favorable contrast to the German: up to his downfall, Mussolini did not release any Jews for deportation to the extermination camps of the S.S., and the Social Republic of Salò, to the extent that it could function, preserved this orientation in principle.[258] In Rumania, supported by the stipulations of the concordat, relatively much was accomplished;[259] Hungary, despite racial legislation, treated the Jews the least inhumanely;[260] in Slovakia the Vatican chargé d' affaires had at first to limit himself to observing.[261] The curial policy had especially in view the situation of baptized Jews or of Jews married to Catholics, since they were the farthest excluded from the aid given by the organizations of believing Jews.

After the outbreak of war the worst fate first affected the Poles, not only in the German-occupied area: in the Russian-occupied part the situation was scarcely less horrible. However, this area was almost hermetically sealed off from the rest of the world. News hardly got through, and Vatican help was completely impossible. The Curia did not succeed in learning anything substantial of the fate of those deported from there—one reckons with about 2 million—not even with the aid of the diplomatic representatives of other powers in Moscow.[262]

In spite of ceaseless difficulties, the intelligence connections with the German-occupied part of Poland were better. In the winter of 1939–40 the Curia hoped to be able to help with food and clothing; but at the end of 1940 the Secretariat of State had to admit that the German authorities had intentionally and successfully boycotted the papal initiatives.[263] Matters were otherwise in relation to the Polish refugees in other countries. In Hungary, Rumania, France, and Italy the Vatican, with the financial aid of American Catholics, could at first do something, but in Germany, on the contrary, it could do little.[264] Even in Spain, basically amenable to Vatican requests, it required very much effort and patience to assist the Polish refugees.[265]

---

[256] Also cf. L. F. Reutter, Die Kirche als Fluchthelfer im Dritten Reich (Recklinghausen 1971).

[257] On the visit of the German foreign minister in 1940, the most recent is M. Clauss, "Der Besuch Ribbentrops im Vatikan," ZKG 87 (1976), 54–64.

[258] Cf. ADSS 6, 22; 9, 36, as well as R. de Felice, Storia degli ebrei, 447–50, 463–67.

[259] Cf. ADSS 9, 27–32; A. Martini, "La S. Sede e gli ebrei della Romania durante la seconda guerra mondiale," CC 112, 3 (1961), 449–63.

[260] Cf. ADSS 6, 24; R. A. Graham, "Pio XII e gli ebrei di Ungheria nel 1944," idem, Il Vaticano, 241–48 (first in English in Historical Records and Studies 50 [1965], 5–26).

[261] Cf. ADSS 6, 24; 8, 45–47; 9, 22–27; F. Cavalli, "La S. Sede contro le deportazioni degli ebrei dalla Slovacchia durante la seconda guerra mondiale," CC 112, 3 (1961), 1–18.

[262] ADSS 6, 28f.; 8, 53–55; 9, 48–50.

The year 1941, in which the war essentially altered its countenance, also signified a caesura for the assistance measures of the Holy See. The restricted possibilities of emigration from Europe almost entirely ceased.[266] Vatican exertions for aid from overseas for the hungry civilian populations of Belgium and Greece were wrecked on the English blockade.[267] "Deportation" of Jews now became a new catchword of papal anxieties. To prevent it or at least to limit and restrict its volume became a chief item of papal assistance efforts, even where there was still no information on the mass-produced organized murders in the extermination camps.

In the present state of knowledge what was thereby accomplished cannot be put in precise figures, and in consideration of the situation of the sources will perhaps never be possible. One may proceed, in regard to a total number of victims, to a high of about 5 million.[268] In addition, some nine hundred fifty thousand are said to have survived.[269] The individual numbers from which this total sum is arrived at may be open to criticism, but hardly the order of magnitude. If it is estimated that, of the nine hundred fifty thousand saved, some 70 to 90 percent owed their life[270] to measures taken by the Catholic Church, as the specific numbers are also subject to discussion in this case, on the whole, however, this result must be striking. In view of the number of murdered, the number of the saved is depressingly small. But behind it stands a desire of the Catholic Church under Pius XII to stand up for every individual human life, which cannot be minimized.

---

[263] Ibid 6, 492–96, as well as the survey, ibid, 25–28. For the further Polish policy of the Vatican, basic is ADSS 3, I. II, with detailed introduction; cf. also R. A. Graham, Il Vaticano, 207–20.

[264] ADSS 6, 29–31.

[265] Cf. ibid. 8, 64–67.

[266] Ibid. 8, 16ff.

[267] Ibid. 8, 58–64; A. Martini, "La fama in Grecia nel 1941 nella testimonianza dei documenti inediti vaticani," CivCatt 118, 1 (1967), 213–27.

[268] G. Reitlinger, Die Endlösung. Hitlers Versuch der Ausrottung der Juden Europas 1939–1945 (Berlin 1956), 573; English edition 1953; cf. I. Arndt and W. Scheffler, "Organisierter Massenmord in nationalsozialistischen Vernichtungslagern," VZG 24 (1976), 112–35. They start with a figure of more than 3 million who were killed by being gassed.

[269] P. E. Lapide, Rom und die Juden (Freiburg 1967), 185, estimates "at least a million."

[270] Thus ibid., 188; cf. 359, n. 189. J. Chevalier, 133f., accepts these figures.

In individual cases the measures differed from country to country and also changed in the course of time. On the whole it can be said that the success of the papal rescue exertions was the greater the more the political influence of the Holy See continued on the government of the territory concerned; in other words: the less direct the possibilities of Hitler's grasp were, so much the more could the Pope accomplish. In Slovakia, Hungary, Rumania, Croatia,[271] and especially in Italy relatively much succeeded. In Rome, which was characterized as typical of the alleged indolence of Pacelli in regard to the annihilation of the Jews,[272] the quick cessation of the celebrated police raid of 16 October 1943 demonstrably goes back to a personal initiative of the Pope.[273]

In summary, today it may be held that the papal measures of assistance of the Second World War, accomplished under entirely different difficulties, need not at all fear comparison with the time of Benedict XV.

THE POPE'S "SILENCE"

In the debate of the 1960s over the Pope's conduct in the Second World War there was a question of his alleged silence at the extermination of millions of Jews. In this connection the expression "silence" was supposed to suggest a reprehensible omission of possible and/or necessary actions, while the opposite—"to speak," "to say," "to protest"—referred to morally mandated sympathy, signified willingness to help, or even stood symbolically for "help." This terminology is not suited to characterize the real problem to which the Hochhuth Debate,[274] in which the picture of Pius XII was distorted into caricature, can point: It is the question in what manner a Pope is bound, by virtue of his office, to bear witness against the violation of elementary human rights, such as the genocide of the Second World War. This question was itself posed at that time;[275] he was confronted with it by others as well;[276] and even in war he knew it had to be settled "with painful difficulty."[277] The decisions of the Pope were taken neither blindly nor easily, but were pondered responsibly. For him the alternatives were not simply "to speak or keep silent." The question amounted to much more: how clear must be the word which was offered by virtue of office, how concrete may it be if the consequences are taken into account.

---

[271] ADSS 9, 32–34.

[272] Thus Hochhuth (because of the Pope's avarice) and S. Friedlaender (because of the Pope's anti-Communism).

[273] ADSS 9, 509f. and 510, n. 2: Hudal's letter of noon, 16 October 1943 to General Stahel, who brought about the halting of the raid, was suggested by Carlo Pacelli on orders of the Pope. On the matter the most recent is O. Chadwick, "Weizsäcker, the Vatican and the Jews of Rome," Journal of Ecclesiastical History 28 (1977), 179–99; cf. also R. A. Graham, "La strana condotta di E. von Weizsäcker, ambasciatore del Reich in Vaticano," CivCatt 121, 2 (1970), 455–74; repeated in idem, Il Vaticano, 49–73.

[274] Cf. above, n. 169.

It was a curial tradition to speak, not of the erring, but of the errors, not of people, but of the mistakes of people.[278] Pacelli's theological conception was in accord with this tradition. It amounted to this, that the Pope had to formulate the general and the fundamental, while it pertained to the bishops to translate the principle into the concrete, on the spot, with regard for all circumstances. This suggested to the Pope to condemn the false ideological directions and the violations of rights without "directly naming their proponents or perpetrators," according to J. Becker. This was the line which Pius XII followed in his many public utterances—every expression about peace was linked with these themes.

How strong his anxiety was about whether in view of the unleashed terror he was satisfying the duties of office by this behavior can be known from that fact that he several times clearly considered proceeding beyond the general condemnations. I must utter real "words of fire" on "the frightful things which are occurring in Poland," he hurled at the Italian ambassador on 13 May 1940. Only the knowledge that the fate of the unhappy Poles would then become still worse held him back from doing so.[279] The intention of preventing worse was "one of the reasons why We impose restrictions on Ourselves in Our utterances," he wrote to the bishop of Berlin on 30 April 1943.[280] The Pope and his collaborators were, on the basis of their experiences with National Socialism, firmly convinced that a flaming papal protest would not put a stop to the murders but would increase their tempo and magnitude and at the same time destroy the remaining possibilities of diplomatic action in favor of the Jews in states such as Hungary and Rumania.

In this regard, the Secretariat of State was informed relatively early of the manner in which the murder of the Jews was organized and, in contrast to many others,[281] trusted these reports. Communications from Jewish sources that the deportation meant for many of those affected a sure death sentence were obtained from Pressburg and Budapest[282] in the spring of 1942. In December the Polish ambassador-in-exile at the Vatican correctly concluded from the fact that the aged, sick, women, and children were deported that the aim of deportation was not "workers' camps"—whatever persons might mean by that—but places erected especially for the "killing of persons in various ways."[283] On 7 March 1943 the Vatican chargé d'affaires at Pressburg finally sent the report of a parish priest, who had credibly learned that deported Jews were killed by gassing; the corpses were used for making soap.[284] Perhaps this report was already on hand when the Secretariat of State on 3 April 1943 laconically telegraphed to the apostolic delegate in Washington: "The Holy See continues its exertions for the Jews," after the delegate had been asked by three rabbis to induce the Pope to a "public appeal" which might put a halt to the systematic extermination of the Jews.[285] Privately the Secretariat of State thought of this: "A public appeal would be inappropriate"; Germany had to be prevented from taking it as an occasion "to carry out even more rigorously the anti-Jewish measures in the areas occupied by it and exercise new, stronger pressures" on the Jewish policy of the satellite nations.[286] On 5 May 1943 an entry in the documents of the Secretariat of State spoke of the "frightful situation" of the Jews in Poland and mentioned "gas chambers."[287]

---

[275] ADSS 1, 454f.

[276] Ibid. 3, II, 633–36 (Radonski to Maglione, London, 14 September 1942). Von Preysing's inquiry of 6 March 1943 (B. Schneider, Piusbriefe, 239, n. 1) moved in the same direction.

[277] Pius XII to Archbishop Frings, 3 March 1944 (B. Schneider, Piusbriefe, 280).

[278] P. Duclos, 21, n. 5.

[279] ADSS 1, 455.

[280] B. Schneider, Piusbriefe, 240.

Against this background must be understood the sharp and impressively composed Christmas address of 1942, which proclaimed a catalogue of the inalienable basic rights of every person and thought explicitly of the "hundred thousands of persons," who, "with no guilt of their own, partly only because of their nationality or race (stirpe)," were delivered up "to quick or slow death" ("destinate alla morte o ad un progressivo deperimento")[288] Privately the Pope thus characterized the purpose and reaction of this word on the extermination of the Jews: "It was brief but it was well understood."[289] In the address of 2 June 1943 he repeated his condemnation with a quite similar formulation.[290]

---

[281] Cf. L. de Jong, "Die Niederlande und Auschwitz," VZG 17 (1969), 1–16, with striking examples to prove that the extermination camps first became a psychological reality when they no longer existed.

[282] ADSS 8, 453 (Burzio report, Pressburg, 9 March 1942); 470 (Rotta report, Budapest, 20 March 1942).

[283] ADSS 8, 755 (19 December 1942).

[284] Ibid. 9, 177f., n. 6.

[285] Ibid. 9, 206f., 207. n. 3.

[286] Ibid. 9, 217.

[287] Ibid. 9, 274.

[288] AAS 35 (1943), 23; UG I, 118.

Hence the Pope also "spoke," but the "speaking" was not his chief or exclusive means in the struggle against Hitler's Jewish policy. After clear condemnation he followed the ethical demand of conscience, but predominant for him was the ethically responsible aspect that he must avoid choosing a form of provocation which would not bring a halt to the evil but would increase the evils: The extermination of the Jews could not be undone by a public appeal, but perhaps drastic retaliation against Jews, Catholics, and the Church lay in the logic of the Nazi system of government. Conversely, the papal policy preserved for the Holy See the opportunity to save the Jews in the future. As proof that this opportunity was effectively used, "the warmest recognition of his saving work" was at the time "expressed by the Jewish chief centers"[291] to the Pope.

---

[289] B. Schneider, Piusbriefe, 242 (to von Preysing, 30 April 1943).

[290] AAS 35 (1943), 165–71, here 167; UG II, 1909–17, here 1912f.; ADSS 7 does not contain the draft of this part of the address.

[291] Pius XII to von Preysing, 30 April 1943 (B. Schneider, Piusbriefe, 242). ADSS 9, 59–61, provides a list of the expressions of gratitude, then either in the Vatican or otherwise known, from the Jewish side.

CHAPTER 4

*The Second Vatican Council

John XXIII: Summoning and Preparation for the Council

The convoking of the Second Vatican Council was the action of Pope John XXIII. His election, after a brief conclave (25–28 October 1958), seemed at first the solution of a transition or at least of a perplexity. But it soon became evident that it was a decisive turning point in the history of the Church.

Angelo Giuseppe Roncalli was born in Sotto il Monte (Province of Bergamo) on 25 November 1881, the fourth of fourteen children of the farmer Battista (d. 1935) and his wife Marianna Mazzola (d. 1939), and was baptized the same day by the parish priest Rebuzzini; his godfather was his devout great-uncle Zaverio.[1] After attending the minor and the major seminaries at Bergamo from 1892 to 1900, he continued his theological studies at the Roman Seminary of Sant'Apollinare from 1901 to 1905, interrupted by one year of military service at Bergamo, "un vero purgatorio," as he wrote to the rector of the seminary, V. Bugarini. From his professor of church history, Benigni, he received the advice, "Read little but well"; of his superiors, the vice-rector Spolverini was closest to him. His Roman studies were crowned by the doctorate in theology on 13 July 1904 and ordination to the priesthood on 10 August 1904. After the completing of his studies, he participated in the fall of 1905 in a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. Then Giacomo Maria Radini Tedeschi, appointed bishop of Bergamo, took him along as secretary to his home diocese of Bergamo, where from October 1906 he also lectured on church history in the seminary and later on patrology and apologetics and edited the ecclesiastical journal, La vita diocesana. At that time he began the editing of the visitation documents of Saint Charles Borromeo in the diocese of Bergamo, the last volume of which could, however, not appear until 1957. In a memorial lecture on the occasion of the three-hundredth anniversary of the death of Cardinal Cesare Baronio he extolled the compiler of the Annals of ecclesiastical history as the renewer of historical studies.

---

* Hubert Jedin

After the death in 1914 of Radini Tedeschi, who as no other had formed his first priestly years, he wrote his biography. During the war (1915–18) he served as a military chaplain; it was probably the experiences then gained which induced the bishop to entrust to him, as chaplain of the seminary, the spiritual direction of the theologians returning from the field (1918–20). Then he went back to Rome for four years as president of the Italian work of the Propagation of the Faith. On 3 March 1925 he became apostolic visitor in Bulgaria and on 19 March was ordained as titular archbishop of Areopolis in San Carlo al Corso; as his motto he selected "Obedientia et Pax," Baronius's motto.

The position of the visitor at Sofia was in several respects not easy: the Queen was a daughter of the King of Italy, and hence a Catholic; the King was Greek Orthodox; the authority of the visitor over the approximately fifty thousand Catholics was not sharply defined. He saw himself reduced to an eremitical life, which did not gratify his need for activity, and he complained of "acute, intime sofferenze." After ten difficult years he was, on 24 November 1934, named apostolic delegate in Turkey and Greece and at the same time administrator of the vicariate apostolic of Istanbul; he thereby obtained greater pastoral duties. This activity satisfied him: "I feel young in body and mind," he wrote in 1939 in his spiritual diary. The delegate paid a visit to the ecumenical patriarch on 27 May 1939, spent a rather long time at Athens, especially after Greece was afflicted by war, and visited Syria and Palestine.

---

[1] For the life and character of Pope John XXIII the following especially were consulted: the notes edited by his secretary, Loris Capovilla, during the retreats and days of recollection in the Giornale dell'Anima, the fragment of an autobiography begun in 1959 (419–28), and the attached chronology (pp. XXXI–XLIV). A curriculum vitae: AAS 50 (1958), 902. On the Pope's choice of a name, Schwaiger in AKR 132 (1963), 7: the number XXIII presupposes that the Popes of the Pisan Obedience, Alexander V and John XXIII, were considered illegitimate, although the later Alexanders—Alexander VI to VIII—took the first named into account in their enumerations.

When, after the retreat of the German troops from France and the victory of the Allies, General de Gaulle demanded the removal of thirty-three bishops who had been adherents of the Vichy regime, Roncalli was made nuncio to France on 22 December 1944. He achieved a compromise. After the concluding of the armistice he instituted at Chartres theological courses for German theological students who were prisoners of war. Made cardinal on 12 January 1953 and three days later named patriarch of Venice, he felt fortunate to be able to live completely his episcopal-pastoral duties. The small area of the diocese permitted him frequent journeys, including visits to the Marian pilgrimage sites of Lourdes, Einsiedeln, Mariazell, Fátima, and Czestochowa.

The new Pope's personality was stamped by his ancestral home and his spiritual instructors, Rebuzzini, Spolverini, and Radini Tedeschi; his spirituality was thoroughly traditionally Catholic. His spiritual diary indicates that he frequently read The Imitation of Christ and regularly made the Ignatian exercises. The rosary was a fixed ingredient of his strictly regulated order of the day: praying of the breviary, Mass, a half-hour's meditation, weekly confession. His spiritual models were Francis de Sales and Philip Neri and, as a pastor, Charles Borromeo: as regards the otherwise highly venerated Baronius, it struck him that he never laughed. The craftiness of the peasant was in him united to the humor of the peasant; of no Pope since Benedict XIV have so many anecdotes been handed down. The young professor of church history unambiguously held himself aloof from Modernism, but he still did not thereby escape the suspicion expressed concerning him in the Benigni Circle and remained convinced that positive theology must be more intensively pursued than was then usual in Italy. Different from that of Pius X, whom he revered in his lifetime as a model pastor, his outlook for the task of the mission and for union was broadened by activity in the work of the propagation of the faith and the two decades in the Middle East. The other task of the Church, to work for a "better world," was for him not an item of a program but a foregone conclusion resulting from his simple origin; the admonition of Father Lombardi to the bishops of the region of Venetia in the retreat of 1955, to be concerned for the social question, would hardly have been needed by him personally, "I am one of you," he exclaimed to the faithful of a Roman suburban community; to his brothers and sisters he gave the advice, "You do well in living even more frugally," and he himself wanted "to be born poor and to die poor." Throughout his life bound to his Bergamo homeland, as nuncio he obtained the family's original fifteenth-century house as a place of holiday and rest; he firmly repelled any advancement in status of his brothers, sisters, and nephews, who lived in modest circumstances.

Although in his youth Pope John had lived at Rome a rather long time and had then been active in the service of the Curia for almost three decades, he was no "curialist." He never regarded himself as a curial official, and constantly desired to be only a "good shepherd"; it was no accident that in the first year of his pontificate, on 1 August 1959, he devoted an encyclical to the Curé d'Ars, to him the "imago sacerdotis." Before his departure for the conclave, he had exclaimed to the seminarians of his diocese: "The Church is young, it remains, as constantly in its history, amenable to change." The statement is that of a program. As a church historian, familiar with the historical change of the Church in a constantly changing world, Pope John was convinced that the Church must adapt its preaching, organization, and pastoral methods to the fundamentally changed world, and for this he coined the much disputed notion of aggiornamento.[2] In an effort to realize it, he convoked the Council.

In the presence of the cardinals gathered for the stational Mass in San Paolo fuori le mura on 25 January 1959 he announced a Roman diocesan synod and an ecumenical council. This announcement was certainly prepared for by his development, but in no sense was its result. Both in private conversations and in the opening address of the Roman diocesan synod on 24 January 1960 he understood it as the challenge of God, divinum incitamentum, but in no way was it the implementation of a long prepared plan. There is no evidence that he resumed the project of a general council pondered by Pius XII.[3] The Pope, who had nothing more in mind than to carry out the will of God, recognized the kairos and followed the inspiration of the Holy Spirit.

---

[2] In defining the content of aggiornamento one must begin with the literal meaning of aggiornare, which the widespread Dizionario della lingua italiana of Zingarelli (p. 33) gives as mettere al corrente libri, registri. However, there can be no doubt that in the mouth of John XXIII not only an adaptation to the age but also an inner renewal was meant, as Urs von Balthasar, Ratzinger, et al. have rightly noted.

[3] G. Caprile, "Pio XII e un nuovo progetto di concilio ecumenico," CivCatt 117, 2 (1966), 209–27.

The announcement of an ecumenical council operated as a blare of trumpets, within and almost even more powerfully outside the Church. It was forgotten that, in Catholic usage and also in canon law, "Concilium oecumenicum" was the designation of the general councils embracing the whole Church; the Pope intended to convoke a general council of the Catholic Church, but from the start, and at the beginning more decidedly than in later stages, there moved before his view a participation, somehow constituted, of the Christians separated from Rome as a first step toward Church unity; he could hardly have been thinking of a great union-council of representatives of all Christian Churches and ecclesial communities. Osservatore Romano, reporting the talk at San Paolo, spoke of the Pope's aim "to invite the separated communities to the quest of unity." That there was no thought of a formal invitation to the separated Churches to full participation first appeared definitively from a press conference held by Cardinal Secretary of State Tardini on 30 October 1959; in it there came forth for the first time the plan of inviting the separated Churches to send official observers.

Meanwhile, the Pope had set for the future council its task of renewal within the Church. In the first session of the Antepreparatory Commission (Commissio antepraeparatoria), established on 17 May 1959, he declared on 30 June 1959 that the Church strives, "loyal to the holy principles on which it is built and the unchangeable doctrine which the Divine Founder entrusted to it . . . with courageous energy to strengthen again its life and its unity, even with regard to all circumstances and demands of the day," hence both inner renewal and entry into the problems of the age. At the same time he announced in the encyclical Ad Petri cathedram the revision of canon law; the goal of his pontificate was the proclaiming of the truth, peace among peoples, and the unity of the Church in doctrine, government, and worship.

The preparation of the council began when the bishops—all together 2,594—and 156 superiors of religious institutes and also the Catholic universities and faculties were called upon by Secretary of State Tardini on 18 June 1959 to submit suggestions for the program of consultation. The 2,812 postulate thereupon sent in were sifted by the Antepreparatory Commission and turned over to the competent curial offices, which for their part composed the suggestions and admonitions (Proposita and Monita). After the sifting of the material was completed, the motu proprio Superno Dei nutu of 5 June 1960 introduced the proximate preparation.

The motu proprio determined for the first time the name of the future council: The Second Vatican Council. Then ten "preparatory commissions" (Commissiones praeparatoriae) were formed to work out the draft of decrees to be laid before the council. Nine of these were modeled, in accord with their defined purpose, but also in organization, on existing central offices of the Roman Curia: the Theological Commission was competent for all questions of the teaching office, which pertained to the competence of the Holy Office; the Commission for the Bishops and the Government of Dioceses corresponded to the Consistorial Congregation; the Commission for the Discipline of the Clergy and the Christian People, to the Congregation of the Council. The Commissions for the Discipline of the Sacraments, (ecclesiastical) Studies and Seminaries, the Sacred Liturgy, the Eastern Churches, and the Missions received essentially the same tasks as the corresponding central offices, whose heads were at the same time the chairmen of the related commissions. Only the Commission for the Apostolate of the Laity was not modeled on any congregation, because none such existed.

If these preparatory commissions are compared with the five of the First Vatican Council, important differences appear: through their chairmen and their composition they were more closely bound than the earlier ones with the central offices in which the tradition of the Curia is incarnate; they were not composed, like the earlier ones, almost exclusively of theologians and canonists, that is, periti who had no right to vote in the council, but included up to about one-half bishops and religious superiors, hence future council fathers with a right to vote. The first measure subjected the preparatory commissions to the strong influence of the curial official mechanism, the second enhanced its power in so far as the participation of the future council fathers made these latter familiar with the themes presumably to be discussed at the council and seemed from the start to recommend them to the periti for the conciliar commissions to be set up later. On an equality with the ten commissions in respect to the preparation of the schemata, as an agency of contact with the churches not united with Rome, but going beyond their competence, was the Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity under the direction of Augustin Bea, S. J., Rector of the Pontifical Biblical Institute, named a cardinal on 14 December 1959.

The examining and coordinating of the drafts prepared in this manner was incumbent on the Central Commission, set up on 16 June 1960, to which belonged, in addition to the presidents of the commissions, the chairmen of national and regional episcopal conferences; their number rose finally to 102 members and 29 consultants; the future secretary-general of the council, Pericle Felici, acted as secretary. Since the commissions were continually expanded by the naming of new members, their total number increased at the end of 1961 to 827, two-thirds of them Europeans.

The work of the preparatory commissions in the almost two years from the fall of 1960 to the summer of 1962 suffered from the fact that no directives had been given them for the constituting of centers of gravity. It was undoubtedly an advantage that they were free in the choice and elaboration of the themes, but on the other hand it worked in favor of the strong influence of the Curia, of the Roman universities, and of the central authorities of religious institutes in the tendency that the sixty-nine schemata submitted by them to the Central Commission were rather a summary of papal statements during the last decades or, respectively, an inventory of the theology and practice prevailing in Rome rather than the hoped for advance into new areas. The Central Commission first met on 12 June 1961; this session was followed by six more. In addition to the schemata submitted to it, it also drew up the rules of procedure.

If it was possible to hear during the period of preparation that the Second Vatican Council would be the best prepared council in the history of the Church, it soon became evident that the material collected in overwhelming mass was chosen unilaterally and did not satisfy the council. Of the seventeen schemata which had been worked out by the Commission for the Discipline of the Clergy and the Christian People under Cardinal Ciriaci, not a single one was approved in this form by the council; of the six texts of the Theological Commission under Cardinal Ottaviani, after complete revision only two; of the nine of the Commission for the Discipline of the Sacraments, not even one obtained the acceptance of the council. Only the Commissions for the Sacred Liturgy, Religious, and the Apostolate of the Laity submitted each only one document, which constituted the point of departure of the corresponding conciliar decrees. Out of the five texts prepared by the Commission for Studies and Seminaries there originated through concentration and revision two conciliar decrees on the formation of priests and Christian education; the four schemata worked out by Bea's secretariat went, after amalgamation with related material of the Theological Commission and the Commission for the Eastern Churches, into the Decree on Ecumenism, and the declarations on religious freedom and non-Christian religions. Nevertheless, the work of the preparatory commissions was not in vain: it furnished a voluminous collection of material, few new viewpoints. Only at the council did these break through.

The preparatory work was kept strictly secret, so that only a small part of it leaked to the public. Thus it could hardly fail to happen that during the long waiting period a certain disappointment began to spread, especially since the Roman Diocesan Synod, which the Pope himself had opened on 24 January 1960, moved in the traditional routes and gave little notice of the desire for bold reforms and large-scale ecumenism, which appeared in numerous books and articles of theologians and lay persons. The expectations had been strained too tightly, it had not been made sufficiently clear that councils had never been revolutionary, but instead the necessary new elements had to be consciously linked with the proven old elements. But even during the years of preparation unmistakable were the voices from the episcopate that "all problems posed by the development of the world" must concern the council, according to the message of the French cardinals and archbishops of 26 October 1961, that the Church must be universal in the true meaning of the word, as Cardinal Frings said at Genoa on 19 November 1961, that a decentralization called for by Cardinal Alfrink of Utrecht and a deeper and broader ecumenical understanding, urged by Archbishop Jaeger of Paderborn, were necessary. In February 1962 Cardinal Montini of Milan demanded a discussion of the nature and function of the episcopate in unison with the Roman Pope; a deepened self-awareness, he said, would enable the Church to adapt itself to the needs of the age. But he warned against seeing in a council a healing means of miraculous and immediate effect.

Earlier than anticipated, on 25 December 1961, the council was summoned to Rome for the next year by the constitution Humane salutis, but still without indication of the opening date; the motu proprio Concilium diu of 2 February 1962 appointed 11 October of the same year as the opening day. In these documents the tasks of the council were again sketched only in very general outlines. The promulgation, surrounded with unusual solemnity, of the constitution Veterum sapientia on 22 February 1962, whereby Latin was imposed as the language of ecclesiastical speech and theological instruction, was in opposition to the wishes prevalent in the Preparatory Commission for Studies and Seminaries and strengthened the impression that everything would continue as before. The paving of the way for church unity was not expressly mentioned, but a step was taken in this direction when the churches and ecclesial communities not united with Rome were invited through the Secretariat for the Promotion of the Unity of Christians to send official observers to the council. The invitation met a better reception among Protestants than among the Eastern Churches. The Anglican Church, whose head, Archbishop Fisher of Canterbury, had paid a visit to the Pope on 2 December 1960, sent three representatives; the Evangelical Church of Germany sent the Heidelberg professor Schlink; the Lutheran Reformed World Union and the Ecumenical Assembly in Geneva acceded to the invitation; on the other hand, the Orthodox patriarchs of the East reacted with hesitation. The patriarchate of Moscow agitated powerfully against the "sirens" from the Vatican. All the greater was the surprise when, on the eve of the opening of the council, it became known that two representatives of Patriarch Alexius were en route to Rome. This about-face was due to a visit to Moscow of the closest collaborator of Cardinal Bea in the Secretariat for the Promotion of the Unity of Christians, his eventual successor, Johannes Willebrands. The other dissident patriarchates later followed the Russian example.

By means of the motu proprio Appropinquante concilio of 6 August 1962 the Pope gave the council its agenda, the Ordo Concilii Oecumenici Vaticani II celebrandi.[4] It had been worked out by a subcommission of the Preparatory Central Commission under the presidency of Cardinal Roberti and his secretary, Vincenzo Carbone, and in seventy articles defined, first, the rights and duties of those participating in the council and, second, the general, and, third, the special norms for the order of business.

As at Trent and the First Vatican Council and in conformity with Canon 223, paragraph 1, of the Code of Canon Law, the right of deciding on proposals pertained only to the plenary session of the council fathers qualified to vote in the general congregations and sessions. The direction of the discussions was entrusted to the presidency, consilium praesidentiae, of ten cardinals appointed by the Pope. It devolved on the ten permanent conciliar commissions to draw up the drafts of decrees (schemata) to be submitted to the council and to modify them, having regard for the motions offered by the council fathers; of its twenty-four members, two-thirds were to be elected by the council, one-third and the chairman were named by the Pope. To the full members entitled to vote were added periti, summoned by the Pope, without the right to vote; among them were laymen; at the beginning of the fourth session they numbered 106. An entirely new category was constituted by the observers (observatores) sent by the churches and ecclesial communities not in communion with the Holy See; all texts were delivered to them and, like the periti, they were entitled to participate in the general congregations. Not yet envisaged in the agenda were the "hearers" (auditores), who were permitted in the aula of the council from the second session, and who from the third session also included women. At the head of the official machinery of the council stood the secretary-general named by the Pope; to him were allotted several Undersecretaries.

---

[4] Text in AAS 54 (1962), 609–31; cf. H. Jedin, "Die Geschäftsordnung des Konzils," Herder TK III, 610–23; critical notes by Mörsdorf, ibid. II 144f.

The routine was as follows: The drafts submitted by the presidency were explained by one or more commentators; the general debate on the schema as a whole was followed by special debate on its individual parts. For the adoption of a text a two-thirds majority was required. Out of regard for the number of council fathers, oral intervention in the general congregations was made dependent on previous written notice and its length was restricted to ten, finally eight, minutes; the council fathers had the right to present written suggestions for changes, which were to be submitted to the commissions. The process was continued until a two-thirds majority was achieved, and the promulgating of the text could take place in the solemn session.

In the course of the very first session of the council it appeared that the Ordo in its existing form was inadequate to achieve concrete results in a reasonable period of time. And so it was revised on 13 September 1963, with regard for various modifying motions made by, among others, Cardinals Döpfner and Spellman: The direction of the general congregations was turned over to four moderators, again named by the Pope, and, together with the presidency, now expanded to twelve members, they constituted the Presidential Council. For the rejecting of a proposed schema now a simple majority of those present sufficed; fifty fathers could submit a new draft to the moderator, who could bring about the close of the debate by a simple majority decision; the minority in the case was protected by this, that it might have its viewpoint set forth by three speakers. The same end was served by changes in the composition and procedure of the conciliar commissions. By the side of the chairmen were two vice-presidents, who were to be named with the consent of the commission; they together determined the commentator (relator) or commentators.

A second modification of the Ordo, of 2 July 1964, went into effect during the third session. Speakers who acted in the name of at least seventy council fathers received certain privileges; the distributing of propaganda material in the aula and nearby required the approval of the Presidential Council.

Even in this altered form, the Ordo could not eliminate all defects and confusion from the routine. The relationship of the Pope to the council, severely burdened by history, led to tensions also at the Second Vatican Council. As head of the council, the Pope had the right to intervene in the procedure, and both Popes of this council made use of this right when unexpected difficulties arose. He could approve the decrees and promulgate them, but he could also refuse his assent. It was not foreseen in the Ordo in what form he, as a member of the council, which he was, could make known his view to the council in the course of the deliberations. Also unclarified was the question of whether a vote was necessary at the end of the general debate. Rightly was the question posed whether it was significant to permit only placet and non placet in the voting on the individual parts of a text, but placet iuxta modum, that is, consent with reservation, in the voting on the chapters as a whole; the opposite would have been preferable.

As regards the form of the conciliar decrees, in conformity with Pope John's wish but different from all earlier councils, the council refrained from condemning errors by means of canons with a subjoined anathema. The texts approved by it bear three different signs in which their authority is graduated: at the head are four constitutions—on the liturgy, the Church, divine revelation, and the Church in today's world; then follow nine decrees and three declarations. Two other forms, considered for a time, propositiones and vota, were finally not used. The council also abandoned the pastoral instructions that it had also pondered for a while.

An actual change of the procedure was under way toward the end of the council in this regard, that the real work of the council was transferred more and more to the commissions, and the general congregations were more and more filled with voting, which could be carried out far more quickly with the aid of a punch-card system than at the First Vatican Council. Still other technical contrivances contributed to overcoming the problem of sheer numbers. An especially well operating loudspeaker system assured the understanding of the spoken word in the gigantic aula. The otherwise inevitable losses of time, which at the last council arose from the coming and going of individual speakers, were avoided by the fact that in each section of the aula microphones were installed, before which they spoke. The prescribed language of the council, Latin, on the whole stood the test; an already installed device for simultaneous translation into the languages of the world was not put to use, because it proved to be impossible then to assure the necessary precision of expression.

The First Session and the Change of Pontificate

The opening session on 11 October 1962 by far surpassed in grandeur that of the First Vatican Council. Two thousand five hundred forty council fathers with the right to vote took part in it, a number not even remotely reached at any previous council. The Pope was borne through the bronze door to the entrance of Saint Peter's on the sedia gestatoria, but then he left it and walked through the ranks of the council fathers; the fact that on this occasion he wore, not the tiara, but the miter, had symbolic value. The rite was basically that usual since the Council of Vienne: Veni Creator and Mass of the Holy Spirit, celebrated by Cardinal Tisserant; enthroning of the gospel on the council altar erected in front of the presidents' table; making of the profession of faith; the conciliar prayer, Adsumus; singing of the gospel (Matt. 28:18–20 and 16:13–18) in Latin, Greek, Old Church Slavonic, and Arabic.

In his opening talk the Pope repeated the conviction that the summoning of the council followed an inspiration from above and indicated to the council its direction: to bring to mankind the sacred wealth of tradition in the most effective way, with regard for changed conditions of life and social structures; not to condemn errors but "fully to declare the strength of the Church's life" ("doctrinae vim uberius explicando"). The council was charged to move nearer to the unity willed by Christ in the truth ("conferre operam ad magnum complendum mysterium illius unitatis"). Overcome by the magnitude of the moment, the Pope ended with a prayer for the divine assistance.

The council assembled in the nave of Saint Peter's was the most universal in church history. Not only in accord with its mandate and claim, but in fact the Church of the twentieth century was a Universal Church. All five continents were present in their episcopates. Europe, which at the medieval councils was virtually the only continent represented, sent only a mere half of those qualified to vote—1,041; America, which was not at all represented at Trent and only weakly at the First Vatican Council, sent 956 bishops, Asia more than 300, Africa 279. The numerical superiority of Italians, which had led to voting by nations at Constance and even at Trent had produced tensions, was ended: the 379 Italian bishops made up less than one-fifth of the council fathers, but just the same the Italian curial cardinals and high curial officials exerted an additional strong influence.[5]

The order of seating was more than a formality. The presidents, and later also the moderators, had places in front of the confessio; on the platforms to their right sat the cardinals, to their left the patriarchs of the Uniate Eastern Churches; then followed, on both sides, first the archbishops, then the bishops according to the date of their nomination. The generals of religious institutes had places on the front balconies, the periti on the others. For the observers a platform was designated to the left of the presidency; for the later admitted auditores platforms on the other sides of the high altar. Each general congregation was opened with Mass, frequently in an Oriental or the Slavonic rite.

---

[5] For the statistics refer to the publications cited in the bibliography for this chapter. Although the council's four periods of meeting are often called "sessions" in accord with parliamentary usage, I reserve this term for the solemn sittings.

That the council was esteemed as a world happening appeared from the presence of almost one thousand reporters sent by the press and the mass media. During the first session they almost entirely referred to indiscretions, which only a few, for example, La Croix of Paris and Il Tempo of Rome, exploited. The reports of the press office under the Frenchman Vallainc, consisting of seven members—one each for German, English, French, Italian, Polish, Portuguese, and Spanish—were jejune, and only from the second session were its members permitted in the aula, and the press office was no longer subject to the secretary-general but to a conciliar commission. Thereafter the official reports were fuller in content, and the still valid rule of silence was in practice relaxed. The edited reports, partly collected, form a not to be underestimated historical source, that must of course be used with caution.

Although the superficial facts are better known than in any previous council, there were also many enigmatic incidents in this council that are either unknown or demonstrable only with difficulty. Above all, in little more than a decade after the close an unambiguous evaluation of the effects which proceeded from the council is not yet possible. What follows is not a history of the council, but only a report in which should be noted what Oscar Cullmann said: that this council must be evaluated not only from the texts approved by it, but the total council event must be considered, for its impulses are as effective as the texts.[6] These were not produced by "parties" such as modern parliaments have, but proceeded from a tension-filled struggle between "intransigent" and "progressive" forces. The former, numerically weaker group had its firm prop in the Roman Curia, the latter was composed, in addition to bishops from central and western Europe and North America, suprisingly also of council fathers from so-called mission countries. Of great significance were the national and regional Episcopal Conferences, partly constituted only at the beginning of the council.

In the first general congregation on 13 October the election of the conciliar commissions was on the agenda. In addition to the ten ballots, on each of which sixteen names were entered, the lists of those qualified to vote who had belonged to the preparatory commissions—and a majority of them were candidates of the Curia—were given to the council fathers. Against this procedure misgivings were first expressed by Cardinal Liénart of Lille, then in more detail by Cardinal Frings of Cologne: We still know too little about one another; in view of the importance of these elections it is necessary to prepare them carefully:

---

[6] O. Cullmann in Was bedeutet das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil für uns?, ed. by W. Schatz (Basel, n.d.), 20.

they should be postponed for a few days. The motion was passed with overwhelming approval and became a decree.

In the next days the Episcopal Conferences caucused and drew up their own election lists. The most successful among them proved to be that prepared by the cardinals of central Europe and France, because it took into consideration distinguished experts from all parts of the world. Among the 160 commission members then elected on 16 October were twenty-six from Latin America, twenty-five from North America, nineteen from Asia and Oceania, seven from Africa; Europe supplied twenty Italians, sixteen French, eleven Germans, ten Spaniards, five Poles, and twenty-one from the other countries. The power of the Italians was enhanced by papal nomination of nine, instead of originally eight, more members of each commission.

The general congregations of 13 and 16 October were the "starting point" of the council. In them it made known its wish to make its decisions according to its own judgment and conscience, not merely to approve what was suggested to or submitted to it. This self-will of the episcopate became still more clearly visible in the debate on the liturgy schema, which began on 22 October and lasted to 14 November. Previously, on 20 October, the council issued a proclamation to the world, drafted by four French bishops and presented to the council in the Pope's name, to the effect that "the message of salvation, love, and peace which Jesus Christ brought to the world and entrusted to the Church" was announced to all mankind.

The liturgy schema drafted by the Preparatory Commission had adopted the basic notion of the liturgical movement, that the Christian people should not passively attend the worship of God but actively participate in it, not only hear but pray and act together; as a consequence it recommended an extensive introduction, to be determined in detail by the respective episcopal conferences, of the vernacular in the Liturgy of the Word at Mass and in the administration of the sacraments and envisaged a reform of the liturgical books and, on specific occasions, the reintroduction of Communion sub utraque specie. On these questions there was enkindled the opposition between traditionalists and progressives which, in changing groupings, was to put its stamp on the council throughout its duration. For the schema were especially cardinals and bishops of countries in which the liturgical movement had spread, at their head Cardinals Frings, Döpfner, Feltin, Lercaro, Montini, and Ritter; the opponents of the draft fought the substitution of Latin by the vernacular and the intervention of the episcopal conferences in its introduction. Cardinal Ottaviani implored the assembly to bear in mind that it was moving "on holy ground" and proposed that the schema be referred to the Theological Commission, which he headed, for revision. Agreeing with him were Italian bishops, such as Cardinal Ruffini of Palermo, and prelates of the Curia, such as Parente, Staffa, and Dante, and also Americans, notably Cardinals Spellman and McIntyre, but not leading prelates from mission lands, such as Cardinals Gracias of Bombay and Rugambwa of Dar es Salaam and the Chinese Archbishop Lokuang of Tainan. Bishop Duschak, vicar apostolic of Calapan, Mindoro (Philippines), even proposed on 5 November the introduction of an ecumenical Mass, which should, as far as possible, be free from all the historical links to the events of the Last Supper; it would also be comprehensible to the faithful in the missions without historical explanations and could take its place next to the historically developed liturgy as Missa orbis.

And so the surprise of the first general congregation was repeated: the bishops of Latin America, Asia, and Africa, although they were in great part trained at Rome, turned out to be, in the majority, thoroughly non-curialist and non-traditionalist; their pastoral experiences drove them to the side of the "progressives." What could be foreseen only with difficulty was that the "pastoral" goal which Pope John had set for the council was accepted by the majority of the council fathers.

In the course of the debate on the liturgy many requests were presented which had long ago been discussed in the pale of the Liturgical Movement: the adapting of the Divine Office to the spirituality of the diocesan clergy; the better choice and distribution of the scriptural readings; in the ecclesiastical calendar the deemphasizing of celebrations of the saints in favor of the Christocentric Church year; a reform of the calendar with a fixed date of Easter; ecclesiastical music and Christian art. The vote on 14 November produced a large majority—2,162 to 46, with seven abstentions—for the further revision of the schema, with consideration of the suggestions for change brought forward in the debate by the standing conciliar commission under the direction of Cardinal Larraona, of whose sixteen elected members twelve were on the central European list. Even before the council dispersed, on 7 December, the new first part, composed by the commission, was approved, but with 180 reservations.

Not so clear was the outcome of the debate begun on 14 November on the schema worked out by the Theological Commission under the centralized control of its Jesuit secretary, Tromp, on the sources of divine revelation.[7] It obtained its pungency first through the fact that the text submitted sought to exclude the interpretation of the Tridentine decree defended by the Tübingen theologian Geiselmann—"tradition" means that the Bible is to be interpreted by the Church, but does not represent, beside it, a second independent source of revelation—and through this intensified condemnation of the Protestant scriptural principle affected the ecumenical rapprochement. In addition, the draft was directed to damming up the penetration of modern biblical criticism into Catholic exegesis, over which a powerful controversy had erupted between professors of the Papal Lateran University and members of the Biblical Institute. In contrast to the "progressive" liturgy schema, which had evoked the resistance of the "traditionalists," now the "progressives" were the aggressors. Many fathers, including Cardinals Frings, Döpfner, König, and Alfrink, rejected the schema totally and had already prepared a new one; others, such as Cardinals Suenens and Bea and Bishop De Smedt of Bruges, demanded a complete revision and presented the principles to be taken into account. A vote on the schema as a whole, contrived on 20 November—the first of its kind—led to the result—probably as a consequence of the motion, which required a "yes" for the ending of the debate—that 1,368 council fathers voted placet, 822 voted non placet; hence the opponents of the draft did not obtain the two-thirds majority. On the other hand, it had become obvious that it could never count on adoption in its current form.

---

[7] On the prehistory of the text submitted on 14 November, whose original form was sent to the Central Commission on 4 October 1961 and to the council fathers in modified form in the summer of 1962, cf. J. Ratzinger in Herder TK II, 498ff., and, for

The Pope resolved the existing situation, not envisaged in the agenda, by setting up a mixed commission under the chairmanship of Cardinals Ottaviani and Bea for the further revision of the schema; in it both tendencies were represented equally. This measure, at first accepted with great skepticism, proved to be the right one: in protracted discussions a middle road was found.

In the debates over the schemata on the liturgy and revelation, the oppositions had collided harshly. Now a certain relaxing of tension showed itself in the fact that a proposal[8] prepared by the Secretariat for the Means of Social Communications and treating the mass media—press, cinema, radio, television—was submitted on 23 November. It essentially restricted itself to a fundamentally positive stance of the Church toward them, the possibilities of using them for the apostolate, the especially controverted Chapter 3, A. Grillmeier, ibid., 528ff. Further literature in the bibliography.

---

[8] German members of the secretariat were Bishop Kempf of Limburg and, as consultors, K. Becker, K. A. Siegel, and E. Klausener. According to Herder TK I, 112f., the secretary was A. M. Deskur, the undersecretary of the Papal Commission for Film, Radio, and Television and the dangers to be encountered. The schema had been only in the next to last place among the drafts sent to the council fathers in August 1962. Although the chairman of the conciliar commission, Cardinal Cento, and the commentator, Archbishop Stourm of Sens, had recommended the adoption of the text, in the debate from 23 to 26 November it encountered opposition because it one-sidedly stressed the Church's right to the modern means of communication and too little the right of persons to appropriate and correct information and did not condemn sharply enough the misuse of the mass media. Some speakers, for example, Cardinal Wyszyński and Bishop Charrière of Fribourg, demanded a theological and sociological deepening, others a stronger regard for the collaboration of the laity in this field. Cardinal Bea suggested a merger of existing Catholic news agencies into a world agency. On 27 November the council by a great majority—2,138 to 15— approved the substance of the schema, but demanded its abbreviation and limitation to instructional principles and pastoral guidelines. Apparently the theme was treated as marginal. A great part of the council fathers were not yet clear that there was a question here of a pastoral problem of the first rank; but it also took a long time in the sixteenth century before the significance of printing for Church and preaching was grasped.

In the treatment of the schema submitted on 26 November on the Eastern Churches it became clear how inadequately the preparatory work had been coordinated. The Preparatory Commission, under Cardinal Amleto Cicognani, the future secretary of state, with Father Welykyi as secretary, had, in addition to a schema De ecclesiae unitate, drafted fourteen brief texts, which were transmitted to the corresponding conciliar commissions, to which belonged only five members of the Preparatory Commission but all six Uniate patriarchs. The first part of the schema, which treated of the unity of the Church under one Supreme Shepherd, contained passages which, as was remarked in the debate by Patriarch Maximos IV and others, were suited rather to upset the Orthodox than to gain them. Cardinal Bea proposed that the draft be reworked with that of his Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity and merged with a third, which originated with the Theological Commission. On 1 December the council decided, 2,068 to 36, to send it back with this version to the commission.

As early as this debate it had been said by Archbishop Heenan of Liverpool that the difference between the Roman Catholic Church and the separated Eastern Churches lay less in a discrepancy of the doctrine of salvation than in the concept of the structure of the Church.

Nature and structure of the Church were the central theme of the schema De ecclesia, which the chairman of the Theological Commission, Cardinal Ottaviani, and Bishop Franič of Split, as relator, explained on 1 December. To no other theme were so many postulate appended, and no other would be so powerfully contested as this one. The draft occupying 123 printed pages linked the view of the Church, prevailing since Bellarmine, as an institution with ideas from the encyclical of Pius XII on the Church. Its twelve chapters were, as Cardinal Montini remarked in the course of the debate (1–7 December), placed side by side, not developed separately, and the doctrine of the Episcopal College was present only as a start. One of the leading minds of the traditionalists, Bishop Carli of Segni, defended the schema and used the opportunity for an emotional settlement with the "ecumenists" and "pastoralists" who, allegedly out of fear, were managing to attack dogmas and basic elements of Catholic piety as taboo. Other critics found the text too juridical and triumphal (De Smedt of Bruges) or failed to find in it a deeper treatment of the relation of Christ to the Church (Cardinal Montini) and of the doctrine of the Church as the People of God and of the Episcopal College (Cardinal Döpfner). They recommended a full revision of the schema and a rearranging of the material, so that the inner structure of the Church should precede its mission (Cardinal Suenens). Thus were the signposts for the further reworking set up, which, without a formal decree, was entrusted to the conciliar commission. The route which this draft had to travel was still far and full of potholes.

When on 8 December the Pope dismissed the council for the time being, none of the five discussed proposals was ready for publication. He comforted the fathers: "It is easy to understand that in a so broadly planned gathering a great deal of time must be devoted to achieving agreement." The public displayed disappointment over the absence of concrete results, many Catholics took offense at the "lack of unity" of the council fathers, which was in reality only the struggle, necessary in all councils, concerning the true and the right. One important result was achieved: The episcopate had learned to feel as a unity, had understood the council as its own affair and testified to its desire actively to form its decisions itself. Even if the council had not been continued, it would have left behind its mark on church history. But if it wanted to realize concrete results, priorities had to be established, the mass of current schemata had to be reduced, they had to be combined and abbreviated. The Secretariat for Extraordinary Affairs, set up in the procedure (ARTICLE 7, par. 2), had not sufficient authority for this. Such authority was given to a Coordinating Commission established by the Pope on 6 December. To it belonged: as chairman, Cardinal Cicognani, since 12 August 1961 successor of the deceased Cardinal Tardini as secretary of state, as well as Cardinals Confalonieri, Döpfner, Liénart, Spellman, Suenens, and Urbani. The Coordinating Commission was also instructed to turn over all details relative to the revision of canon law and the regulations for implementing the conciliar decrees to the postconciliar commissions. It acquitted itself of its mandate in close cooperation with the conciliar secretariat and the conciliar commissions,[9] but also in constant contact with the whole body of council fathers, whom the Pope in a letter of 2 January 1963, not published until 8 February, had called upon for cooperation. The drafts newly formulated in this manner, which at the beginning of May were sent to the council fathers, showed almost entirely another face than the drafts of the preparatory commissions. The will for renewal of the conciliar majority carried the day: the proponents came from the previous opponents. Only now was the direction of the council definitely decided. The resumption of the discussions was proposed for 8 September 1963. Pope John was not destined to witness them. Only with great effort had he, already marked by death, continued the usual reception of the Episcopal Conferences. On 3 June 1963 he died, mourned by the whole world, almost more outside than inside the Church.[10]

In his brief pontificate John XXIII, parallel with the council and supplementing it, had in several encyclicals shown the Church new routes and again taken up some earlier trodden. The mission encyclical Princeps pastorum of 28 November 1959 came out for a native clergy and the lay apostolate in the missions and approved the accommodation to non-European cultures.[11] Mater et magistra of 15 May 1961 aimed to continue the tradition of the great social encyclicals since Leo XIII, but with some new emphases.[12] The Pope regarded as his legacy the encyclical on peace, Pacem in terris, of 11 April 1963.[13] Cutting deeply into the traditions of the Roman Curia were the Pope's arrangements in regard to the College of Cardinals: The suburbicarian sees received residential bishops with full authority, while their former occupants, the cardinal-bishops, retained only the title. The cardinal-deacons also received episcopal ordination: on Holy Thursday 1962 the Pope personally ordained them.[14] In five consistories the Pope created fifty-two new cardinals and thereby definitively and basically exceeded the guiding number of seventy established by Sixtus V. The question was already raised of whether the College of Cardinals should retain the exclusive right to elect the Pope.

---

[9] The Coordinating Commission held five sessions from January to March 1963; on their importance, cf. G. Alberigo in Cultura e Scuola, 1968, 117ff.

[10] Some memorials on Pope John are in the bibliography. Carl Burckhardt wrote in a letter to Max Rychner of 4 June 1963, hence under the direct influence of his death: "He will change much, after him the Church will no longer be the same. Perhaps at the end of his days he will come to know fear. He remains worthy of love, also worthy of admiration": C. J. Burckhardt and Max Rychner, Briefe 1926–1965 (Frankfurt 1970), 246.

[11] AAS 51 (1959), 833–64.

[12] Ibid. 53 (1961), 401–64; see below, Chapter 7.

[13] AAS 55 (1963), 257–304; cf. E. Fogliazzo, Papa Giovanni spiega come giunse alla Pacem in terris (Rome 1964). The receiving of Khruschev's son-in-law, Adzhubei, after the freeing of the Ukrainian Greater Archbishop Slipyj was understood as a rapprochement to the Soviet Union; cf. also P. Camellini, Giovanni XXIII e i communisti (Reggio 1965).

In accord with the prevailing canon law, the council was suspended by the death of the Pope. But Giovanni Battista Montini, archbishop of Milan, elected Pope on 21 June 1963 after a conclave of only two days, from the outset allowed no doubt to arise that he was determined to continue the council.[15]

Paul VI (1963–78) was, by background, spiritual makeup, and the course of his education and his life, as different as possible from his predecessor. His father Giorgio (d. 1943) was a well-to-do publisher at Brescia and had been a member of the Popular Party and deputy in parliament. The son, born 26 September 1897, had in 1916 finished his schooling at the Liceo Arnaldo da Brescia, a public school, then attended the lectures in the seminary at Brescia, after ordination to the priesthood on 29 May 1920 studied canon law at the Gregoriana in Rome, then from 1922 prepared in the Accademia dei Nobili for an ecclesiastical diplomatic career, for which a short stay at the nunciature in Warsaw in 1923 could count as his first practical introduction. From 1924 he was active for almost three decades in the papal Secretariat of State, from 13 December 1937 as undersecretary (sostituto). After the death of Secretary of State Maglione in 1944, he remained, together with Tardini, secretary for extraordinary affairs, the closest collaborator of Pius XII. Parallel with his activity in the Secretariat of State proceeded zealous work in the pastoral care of students and academics (FUCI or Laureati Cattolici respectively). He first entered upon the normal pastoral care after his surprising nomination as archbishop of [15] The personality and work of a living person are not a subject of historical scholarship; hence only a few references to available sources and literature. M. Serafian, La difficile scelta. Il Concilio e la Chiesa fra Giovanni XXIII e Paolo VI (Milan 1964); F. García Salve, Vida de Pablo VI (Bilbao 1964); C. Pallenberg, Paul VI., Schüsselgestalt eines neuen Papsttums (Munich 1965); A. Hatch, Pope Paul VI, Apostle on the Move (London 1967). On the Oratorian Bevilacqua, friend of the Montini family, in A. Fappani, Giulio Bevilacqua, prete e cardinale sugli avamposti (Verona 1975). The Pope's speeches in: Discorsi al popolo di Dio (Rome, since 1964); Dialogo con Dio. Riflessi liturgici nei discorsi di Paolo VI (Vatican City 1966), with preface by Cardinal Lercaro; Cristo vita dell'uomo d'oggi nella parola di Paolo VI, ed. by V. Levi, II (Milan 1969); V. Levi, Di fronte alla contestazione. Testi di Paolo VI II (Milan 1970). For the opening address of 29 September, cited below, see Decreta, 895–927.

---

[14] AAS 54 (1962), 253–58.

Milan on 1 November 1954, where he succeeded Cardinal Schuster. From the outset he gave social impulses. At the council he was very reserved and intervened only twice; next to the outspokenly progressive Cardinal Lercaro of Bologna, he ranked as a moderate progressive, and it was as such that he was elected. He approved the course of his predecessor, but differing from him he controlled the keyboard of the Roman Curia and knew the opposition which had come out against the new course during the first session.

As early as the day after his election Paul VI announced in a radio message that he intended to continue the council and appointed 29 September as the beginning of the deliberations. On the solemnity of Peter and Paul he received about one thousand journalists and promised to improve their possibilities of information at the council. On 1 July, in a speech to the diplomatic missions that had come for the coronation on 30 June in the piazza of Saint Peter's, he took up the theme of the "Church in today's world." He showed his ecumenical attitude by sending a representative to the celebration of the Golden Episcopal Jubilee of Patriarch Alexius of Moscow. In a letter of 12 September to Cardinal Tisserant he expressed the wish that in the future more lay persons should be used as periti at the council and introduced a new category of participants, the auditores. On 14 September he appointed for the directing of the general congregations four moderators, not legates, as was originally considered: Cardinals Agagianian, Döpfner, Lercaro, and Suenens. In a speech to the members of the Roman Curia on 21 September he adhered to the principle already represented by the Popes of the Council of Trent, that the reform of the Curia was the concern of the Pope, not of the council, but at the same time demanded strict obedience from the members of the Curia. The warning was unmistakable.

Second Session (1963) and First Results

In his opening address on 29 September the Pope appointed, more precisely than his predecessor had ever done, four tasks for the council: a doctrinal presentation of the nature of the Church—whereby he advanced the schema De ecclesia to first place—its inner renewal, the promoting of the unity of Christians, and—in this form again new—the dialogue of the Church with today's world. For the first and now the chief task a guideline was given in the statement: "Without prejudice to the dogmatic declarations of the First Vatican Council on the Roman Pope, the doctrine of the episcopate, its tasks, and its necessary union with Peter, is to be investigated. From this will result for Us also guidelines from which, in the exercise of Our apostolic mission, We will derive theoretical and practical advantage." The collaboration of the bishops (adiutrix opera) in the exercise of the primatial authority, which he designated as desirable, already pointed to the future establishment of the Synod of Bishops. The inner renewal of the Church, the Pope continued, must orient it to Christ, but not as though it had abandoned him so that its traditions would have to be broken up and its life completely reorganized (ecclesiae vitam subvertere). In the ecumenical area another statement created a great sensation: "If any guilt in the separation is Ours, We humbly ask God's pardon and also seek forgiveness from the brethren who should have felt themselves separated from Us; for Our part, We are prepared to forgive the wrongs which have been done to the Catholic Church." This was no unconditional confession of guilt, such as that of Pope Hadrian VI of 3 January 1523, but the avowal that the causes of the ecclesiastical division lay not only on one side. The still existing great obstacles to union must not stifle the hope for it. The Pope greeted the observers present and then turned to those holding themselves aloof—adherents of non-Christian religions and atheists—and made mention of those persecuted for the sake of their belief.

The revised schema on the Church, which was explained on 30 September by Cardinals Ottaviani and Browne—the latter had been general of the Dominicans—was divided into four chapters: The Church as mysterium, its hierarchical structure, the People of God and the Laity, holiness of the Church. On the very first day of the debate Cardinal Frings moved to place the concept of "People of God" at the beginning, because hierarchy and laity together constitute the Church; furthermore, he recommended the adding of a chapter on the eschatological character of the Church and the incorporating of the text on the Mother of God into the schema.

A vote arranged for 1 October on the schema as a whole produced an overwhelming majority, 2,231 to 43, for further discussion. In the special debate, which was protracted throughout October, Cardinal Lercaro referred to the fact that Corpus Christi mysticum and "Visible Church" are not identical, because all the baptized belong in some way to the mystical body of Christ without their necessarily being members of the visible Catholic Church. But this very important question in the ecumenical view was soon eclipsed by the opposition which erupted in the debate on the second chapter, the hierarchical structure of the Church. It lasted from 4 to 16 October, and 127 speakers managed to be heard. The bone of contention for a minority, consisting especially but not exclusively of members of the Curia, was the doctrine that the College of Bishops, into which the individual is admitted by episcopal ordination, together with its head, the Pope, bears authority and responsibility for the whole Church. Speakers such as Cardinal Siri of Genoa, president of the Italian Episcopal Conference, Archbishop Staffa, secretary of the Congregation of Seminaries and Universities, Archbishop Parente, assessor of the Holy Office, and Bishop Carli of Segni saw in this teaching an encroachment on the papal primatial power and denied that it is based on scripture and tradition. Against them, the adherents of "collegiality," for example, Cardinals Liénart and Léger and Auxiliary Bishop Betassi of Bologna, pointed out that the papal primacy was clearly stressed in several passages of the schema, in conformity with the definition of the First Vatican Council, and the doctrine of the College of Bishops had a solid biblical basis in the mission of the Twelve and a foundation in tradition in texts of episcopal ordination and other testimonies.

A second, if not so strongly contested question was the restoration of the permanent diaconate. Since the Council of Trent the diaconate had been considered as a transitional stage to the priesthood. Now the lack of priests prevailing in many countries suggested the notion of gaining in deacons helpers for the steadily growing pastoral and charitable services. But since there was also consideration of freeing them from the law of celibacy, the proposal encountered powerful resistance, not only among clear traditionalists, so that in this question the factions were not identical with those in regard to collegiality.

The debate on the third chapter—People of God and Laity—offered the opportunity to refer to the coresponsibility of the laity, rooted in the universal priesthood and often claimed on the part of the Church, and the necessary overcoming of clericalism. There were not lacking voices which warned against an obliteration of the distinction between the general priesthood and the official priesthood of orders and saw in the "higher evaluation" of the laity a danger to ecclesiastical authority.

In the fourth chapter—the holiness of the Church—there was discussed, even if not yet in a gratifying manner, the call of all the baptized to sanctity, then the religious state and the evangelical counsels were treated in particular. There was no section on the diocesan priesthood and nothing about its goal, except perhaps in the different means of the way to holiness of religious and lay persons. Also the total picture of the Church drafted in the schema appeared unrealistic to Cardinal Bea; it did not accord with the reality of the Pilgrim Church.

The debate on the schema on the Church lasted an entire month. The question was: Which of the proposals of change should the commission adopt for the revision? Which corresponded to the will of the majority of the council? To produce clarity, Cardinal Suenens, as moderator in the general congregation of 15 October, had announced a preliminary vote on four controverted items. It did not take place. On 23 October the Presidential Council, on the motion of the moderators, decided with a bare majority the proposal of five, not four, questions: (1.) Whether episcopal ordination has a sacramental character; (2.) Whether the bishop ordained in communion with the Pope and the bishops becomes thereby a member of the Corpus episcoporum; (3.) Whether the College of Bishops (Corpus seu collegium episcoporum) is the successor of the College of Apostles and, with its head, the Pope, and never without him, possesses the highest authority over the entire Church; (4.) Whether this power is based on divine right; (5.) Whether it is fitting, in each case in accord with the needs of the Church in certain areas, to reinstitute the diaconate as a special and permanent degree of orders. The five questions did not have the character of final votes, but were related only to the future formulation of the schema by the commission.

Again a week elapsed until the five questions were submitted. The dissension was further increased by the fact that a powerful propaganda had been unleashed against the insertion, decided on 29 October with a simple majority, of the text on the Mother of God into the schema on the Church by broadsheets which were distributed in front of the conciliar aula or sent by mail, without any steps having been taken against their authors. Only on 30 October was there a vote on the five questions. Questions 1 and 2 were approved by a large majority, but in the case of the next three questions the number of "no" votes increased: 1,808 to 336; 1,717 to 408; 1,588 to 525. Although the opponents of collegiality and of the permanent diaconate urged that the vote was not binding, their future acceptance by a two-thirds majority now seemed as good as assured. The "October Crisis" was thereby overcome, and the general congregation of 30 October 1963 was a second climax of the council after that of 13 October of the previous year.

The confrontation over the structure of the Church naturally influenced the discussion of the schema on the pastoral office of bishops and the government of dioceses, which claimed nine general congregations from 5 to 15 November. The schema had originated in the combining of five texts of the Preparatory Commission and was submitted to the council fathers at the end of April. It was still restricted to the bishops' tasks of governing: their relation to the Roman central departments, the position of auxiliary bishops, the episcopal conferences, the boundaries of sees, and the administration of parishes; hence it proceeded from above to below, not from the local church. After its presentation by Cardinal Marella, chairman of the competent conciliar commission, it was accepted after a brief general debate, against 477 "no" votes, as the basis for the special debate. While some demanded that in the first chapter the outcome of the votes on collegiality be taken into consideration, its opponents—Ottaviani, Carli—contested the binding nature of the vote of 30 October. The chief problems were picked out: the reorganization of the Curia, the composition and rights of the episcopal conferences, the position of auxiliary bishops, and the question of an age limit for residential bishops.

Although the great majority was clear in regard to the desire that the request for reform of the Curia could be fulfilled only by the Pope, not by the council, far-reaching wishes were expressed: an episcopal council should be established in order to exercise the collegial direction of the Church (Cardinal Alfrink), and to it, so some thought, instead of to the College of Cardinals, could be entrusted the right of papal election. Many speakers indulged in complaints about the curial bureaucracy without taking into account its great importance as bearer of many centuries of traditions and experiences. The spectacular outcome of the debate was the demand made by Cardinal Frings on 8 November that, before condemning a doctrine or a book, the Holy Office must hear the relevant ordinary and the accused. Cardinal Ottaviani irritably defended his department, but the attack by the Cardinal of Cologne gave the signal for a reorganization of the Suprema. There had been regularly meeting episcopal conferences in Germany since 1848, and they had become usual in some other countries later, but plenary conferences of the bishops of France and Italy only very recently. The nine African episcopal conferences were constituted with a central secretariat under the leadership of Cardinal Rugambwa only at the council. Their structure and their authority had to be more precisely determined, because greater competence, for example, in the sphere of liturgy, needed to be given to them, especially the right to issue decrees binding on the members. In Germany and the United States they had hitherto got along without such a right, but it was to be expected that just this right was necessary to prevent dissension and even ruptures in certain areas, for example, the school system and trade unionism, and in dangerous situations of ecclesiastical politics.

Supported by the doctrine approved by the majority in the debate on the Church, that one becomes a member of the College of Bishops by means of ordination, the auxiliary bishops demanded an improvement in their legal position. African bishops spoke out against the naming of auxiliary bishops, because these latter jeopardized the unity of direction; also criticized was the naming of titular bishops for the sake of personal distinction. If the residential bishop is shepherd and teacher of his diocese, then would it not be desirable that, through establishing an age limit—in one comment the seventy-fifth year was given—the superannuation of the bishop could be prevented? It was easy to cite examples that a superannuated or sick bishop stubbornly refused to step down; but had not the council's Pope John been elected at the age of almost seventy-seven, and were there not men of more than eighty years among the most active and fertile in ideas among the council fathers? The list of problems touched on extended even to the complaint over the many tiny dioceses not capable of surviving by themselves and the dioceses that had become too large and tortuous around great cities and in high-population-density areas, over friction with the personal dioceses of Eastern Rites and with the military ordinariate, and finally over the lack of priests in Latin America. As hardly in any other debate the bishops spoke their anxieties and grievances from their hearts. One hundred fifty-eight fathers had spoken when the debate was closed on 15 November without a vote and the schema was referred back to the commission for further revision. Even before the session ended, the apostolic letter Pastorale munus of 30 November 1963 conferred on diocesan bishops forty powers of office and on all bishops, including titular bishops, a series of privileges by which the episcopal office was revaluated vis-à-vis the papal central authority and at least partly restored to its original extent.[16]

The schema De oecumenismo, debated from 18 November to 2 December, was, on the basis of the conciliar decree of 1 December 1962, revised and abridged by a mixed commission of members of the Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity and of the Commission for the Eastern Churches. It treated the principles of Catholic ecumenism (Chap. 1), its actual state (Chap. 2), the relations with the Eastern and, of course only briefly, with the Protestant churches (Chap. 3), the position of the Jewish religion in the history of salvation (Chap. 4), and the principle of religious liberty (Chap. 5). Whereas the first commentator, Cardinal Cicognani, claimed to understand the ecumenical efforts of the council merely as a continuation of the tendency "of almost all councils" to restore peace and unity, the second one, Archbishop Martin of Rouen, designated it as entirely new; the third, Coadjutor Archbishop Bukatko of Belgrade, who spoke for the Eastern Churches, took a stand for improvements.[17] In the course of the debate the question was posed: Just what is "Catholic Ecumenism"? Must the Church not seek union with the powerfully strengthened ecumenical movement? Does the Roman Catholic Church surrender its claim to be the true Church if it designates the separated ecclesial communities simply as "churches"?

---

[16] As K. Mörsdorf remarked in Herder TK II, 139, the text in AAS 56 (1964), 5–12, was altered in several passages in comparison with the original text presented to the council fathers. On the interpretation: K. Mörsdorf, "Neue Vollmachten und Privilegien der Bischöfe," AKR 133 (1964), 82–101; L. Buijs, Facultates et privilegia episcoporum concessa Motu proprio Pastorale munus cum Commentario (Rome 1964).

[17] Detailed assessment of the reports by W. Becker in Herder TK II, 25 ff.; on the debate, with the names of the speakers, E. Stakemeier in Müller II, 540–63.

The presentation of the common elements, just as that of the differences, in Chapter 3 satisfied neither the representatives of the Eastern Churches nor the Protestant observers. There was agreement only on this, that it was meaningless, as happened before the First Vatican Council, to invite to a return to the Catholic Church and to accentuate the existing differences, but that it was also not right to gloss over the existing doctrinal differences. The schema turned to Catholics with the invitation to make their Church a model by striving for Christian perfection; it recommended a mutual getting acquainted and dialogue, common prayer for unity but not common celebration of the Eucharist; it warned against any injury to love in the interchange. It was above all Cardinal Bea and Archbishop Jaeger of Paderborn—the latter well-known for his ecumenical work in Germany—who supplied as the guiding idea for the third chapter the stressing of the uniting elements in doctrine, piety, and Christian fulfillment. They found support from bishops from all parts of the world, for example, even from Spain, but of course also contradiction from those who already glimpsed a danger in the word "ecumenism." It remained controversial how far the collaboration of the denominations might and should go in the charitable and social sphere. The question of mixed marriages only appeared on the edges.

Despite many still unresolved problems, whose existence Cardinal Bea did not dispute, the debate left the impression that a genuine breakthrough to ecumenical thought had taken place. Strongly disputed, on the other hand, were the last two chapters of the draft, on the Jews and on religious liberty. The former seemed required by the unique position of Judaism in the history of salvation, but also operating was the motive of opposing to modern anti-Semitism a basic declaration that would correct earlier failings in the Church's behavior. Against it was raised opposition especially from bishops from Arab states, who feared from such a declaration, which would be interpreted as taking a position in favor of the State of Israel, a deterioration of their own already difficult situation and as a compromise wanted a word on Islam added.

The chapter on religious liberty had to be defended by its commentator, Bishop De Smedt of Bruges, against objections chiefly of a theological sort: that it equated truth with error. In many fathers there emerged doubts whether the last two chapters were in their right place at all. These doubts and the opposition from the Arab world declared that, although the schema as a whole had been accepted in the general voting of 21 November by a great majority, 1,966 to 86, as a working basis, there was no longer harmony on these two chapters. They continued in suspense; still powerful confrontations were imminent over both, not only their content but also their position.

In the drafts on the Church and ecumenism the council had laid hold of decisive problems of the Church's self-awareness without being able to satisfactorily solve them. Nevertheless, at the close of this second session, in Sessio III of 4 December 1963, two texts were adopted by vote: the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy and the Decree on the Media of Social Communication.

The voting was done by chapters on the schema on the liturgy, which had been once more basically revised by the conciliar commission in the spring, from 23 April to 10 May 1963; the voting took place during the debate on the schema on the Church. In regard to Chapters 2 and 3—on the Mass and the sacraments—so many reservations, 781 and 1,054 respectively, were made on 13 and 18 October that they had to be reworked. Not until the final vote on the constitution as a whole on 22 November did an overwhelming majority appear: 2,158 to 19. And so it could be confirmed and proclaimed by the Pope in Sessio III on 4 December. Its basic idea is the "full and active participation of all the people" ("totius populi plena et actuosa participatio") in the Easter Mystery, the fundamental concept of the liturgical movement. Subordinate to it was the authority conceded to the episcopal conferences to permit great parts of the Liturgy of the Word at Mass, especially the scriptural readings and the Universal Prayer before the preparation of the gifts, to be performed in the venacular and only in it, hence not also in Latin. Latin was by no means abolished as the liturgical language of the Western Church; on the contrary, "The use of the Latin language," it is said in ARTICLE 36, par. 1, "should be maintained in the Latin Rite to the extent that special rights do not oppose this." Enhanced significance was granted to the texts of Holy Scripture and the homily that explained them, and concern for congregational singing was recommended. For special occasions the concelebration of Mass by several priests was permitted.[18]

At the end of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy the formula of approval and promulgation, issuing from long consultations with periti, was first used. It was based on the Church's understanding that had been gained at the council: "What is expressed in this constitution, as a whole and in particulars, has obtained the assent of the fathers. And We, by virtue of the apostolic authority entrusted to Us by Christ, approve, decree, and enact it together with the venerable fathers in the Holy Spirit and command to the honor of God the publication of what has been ordered by the council."

---

[18] On the formula of approval, V. Fagiolo in Diritto ecclesiastico 75 (1964), 370–86; G. Alberigo, "Una cum patribus," Mélanges theologiques. Hommage à Mgr. Gérard Philips (Gembloux 1970), 291–319. Other literature on the Constitution on the Liturgy in the bibliography.

The rules for implementation were left to the episcopal conferences dependent on confirmation by the Holy See; the reform of the liturgical books, especially of the missal and the breviary, was entrusted to a postconciliar commission which was instituted by the Pope on 25 January 1964, shortly after the end of this session; it established numerous special commissions. The reform of the liturgy, thus introduced, broke with the rubricist rigidity of the last centuries: whether it would produce an organic further development of the liturgical heritage without substantial loss could not yet be foreseen.

Not so close to unanimity as in the case of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy was the assent of the council fathers to the Decree on the Media of Social Communication, greatly abbreviated by the conciliar commission under Cardinal Cento. Archbishop Stourm of Sens had explained it, as commentator, on 14 November. The new text defined the attitude of the Church to the press, theater, cinema, radio, and television, but still without seeking a theological and sociological deepening; especially missed was the elaboration of persons' right to information and the duty of state and Church to provide it. In a petition of 16 November American journalists, including J. Cogley, R. Kaiser, and M. Novak, spoke of a retrogression: they saw the freedom of journalists jeopardized. On 17 November ninety council fathers, including Cardinals Frings, Gerlier, and Alfrink, made a proposal to the commission to revise the schema again, but without success. This opposition explains the fact that in the final vote on 25 November a relatively large number of "no" votes (503) was cast against the 1,598 "yes" votes, so that for a moment it was doubtful whether the decree would be approved. But since a supplementary instruction was taken into consideration, for the working out of which more lay experts than previously were to be employed, in the session the "no" votes dropped to 164. It was noted that preconciliar vision of the Church was at the basis of this decree;[19] but if it is pondered how negatively for a long time the mass media were evaluated in ecclesiastical circles, it was certainly a forward step, even if it remains true that it did not yet take account of the current importance of the mass media.

---

[19] O. B. Roegele in Hampe III, 349–55; also the introduction by K. Schmidthüs, Herder TK I, 112–15. The Pope's closing address in AAS 56 (1964), 31–40; also Decreta, 928–45.

In his closing address the Pope admitted that the outcome of this session did not indeed correspond to all expectations, and still many tasks had to be accomplished. He indicated, alluding to the establishing of the Synod of Bishops and the reorganization of the Curia, that the "share of the bishops in the service of the Universal Church" would be made "still more effective." With satisfaction he stated: "We have mutually gotten to know ourselves better and learned to exchange ideas"; two important decrees had been passed. But the Pope warned against interpreting the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy arbitrarily before the necessary norms had been laid down. At the end of his talk, the Pope announced, to the great surprise of most, a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, during which a meeting with Ecumenical Patriarch Athenagoras was envisaged. It took place from 4 to 6 January 1964, followed by the world public with great attention. More than words could do, this act strengthened the ecumenical orientation of the council.

Third Session: Crisis of November and Constitution on the Church

The third session, which was opened on 14 September 1964 with a Mass celebrated by twenty-four council fathers, the first concelebration at the council, brought the climax of the council but also its most serious crisis. The commission work directed by the Coordinating Commission had in the meantime so broadly expedited six schemata than on 7 July there could be indicated to the bishops as program points of the coming deliberations: the Church, the episcopal office, ecumenism—hence the three chief subjects of the second session—revelation, discussed in the first session but tabled, the lay apostolate, and the Church in the world of today. The last-mentioned concern, the "Dialogue with the World," was touched by the Pope in the encyclical Ecclesiam suam of 6 August 1964, and thereby the catchword given by his predecessor, aggiornamento, had been made concrete; on the other hand, the Pope had warned against novelties, according to the view of which the Church must break radically with its traditions and find entirely new forms of its life. The stand against atheistic Communism and the mention of the Jewish religion and of Islam as partners in the dialogue seemed to broaden the council's program.

The Pope's opening address on 15 September,[20] however, made it clear that he, now as earlier, considered the schema on the Church as the most important subject of deliberation, and if he indicated that the nature and function of the episcopate as complement of the doctrine of the primacy must be clarified, this was an unmistakable sign to the opponents of collegiality to abandon their opposition, but at the same time to its adherents that there must be no undermining of the papal primacy in the extent defined in the First Vatican Council. On the basis of the preliminary votes on 30 October 1963, the commission had given to the schema on the Church a new arrangement and form, for which the Louvain professor of dogma, Philips, deserved great merit. To the schema, divided into six chapters, were added a seventh on the eschatological character of the Church and an eighth on Mariology. They still had to be debated from 15 to 18 September, and at the same time began the voting, without debate, on the first six chapters. The first two—Chapter 1: "The Mystery of the Church" and Chapter 2: "The People of God"— passed without serious opposition. But Chapter 3—"The Hierarchical Structure of the Church and the Episcopate in Particular"—was vigorously disputed. It was divided into thirty-nine sections for the voting from 21 to 30 September; on each of these the vote had to be placet or non placet. As regards the sections on the College of Bishops, which in its present form was defended by Archbishop Parente and rejected by Bishop Franič, the "no" votes mounted to more than 300: it was the influential group, which saw the papal primacy endangered in these statements. Far more numerous but differently made up were the 629 "no" votes against the conceding of the diaconal order to older married men; the concession to young men without the obligation of celibacy was rejected with 1,364 "no" votes. Although the opponents of collegiality had not by far mustered the necessary one-third for rejection, they sought in the final vote on Chapter 3, in which placet iuxta modum was permitted, still to put their views into the text. They may have constituted the great majority of the 572 votes with reservation, in addition to 42 "no" votes, cast on 30 September on the first part of Chapter 3. The curial opposition began to crumble, but it did not yet admit defeat. Chapter 4 on the laity was well received, as were Chapter 5 on the vocation to holiness and Chapter 6 on religious, the explanation of which was successfully defended by the commentator, Abbot Primate Gut. Chapter 7, "The Eschatological Nature of the Pilgrim Church and its Union with the Church in Heaven," drafted by Cardinal Larraona, could be substantially improved because of the debate of 15 and 16 September: the time between the Lord's Ascension and the Parousia was emphasized as the Age of the Holy Spirit, the Christocentric cult of the saints was approved. Greater resistance was evoked in the debate, from 16 to 18 September, on Chapter 8: "The Blessed Virgin Mary, Mother of God, in the Mystery of Christ and of the Church," the including of which in the schema on the Church had encountered powerful opposition and appeared to some zealous devotees of Mary to be minimalistic. The primate of Poland and some Spanish and Italian bishops desired a solemn consecration of the world to the Mother of God, some recommended the adoption of titles such as "Mother of the Church" and "Mediatrix" into the text, but Cardinals Bea and Frings raised scruples against this: One should stay on strongly dogmatic ground.

---

[20] AAS 55 (1963), 841–59; Decreta, 895–927.

Before it came to a vote on these last chapters the opposing views collided again more severely on the second schema, which was in the program as: "On the Pastoral Office of Bishops in the Church." The submitted text had originated through the curtailing of the draft debated in the second session on the episcopal office and its combination with a draft on the form of pastoral care in March 1964, and hence, because it had been greatly altered, it had to be discussed anew, from 18 to 22 September. Bishop Carli disputed the competence and responsibility of bishops for the Universal Church, on which the text was based; other critics, for example, Cardinal Léger and several French bishops, found the text too juristic, too clerical, and not suited to today's tasks. Some individual concerns were brought forward again: the scarcely toned-down powerlessness of the diocesan bishop in regard to the exempt orders; the necessary adjustment between dioceses of few priests and those of numerous priests; the fluctuation of the population in the "wandering Church." The schema revised in this direction by the commission was once again opened up for debate, from 4 to 6 November, but so many modi were submitted on the first two chapters—852 on Chapter 1, 889 on Chapter 2—that the revised text could not again be presented until the close of this session.

Tensions became even sharper when on 23 September religious freedom and on 25 September the declaration on the Jews came up on the agenda; originally they had been linked, as Chapters 4 and 5, to the schema on ecumenism. Bishop De Smedt of Bruges, the commentator on the first text, could point out that 380 suggestions for change had been assimilated. Proceeding from the natural dignity of humans, the decree protected freedom of conscience in the civil sphere, even if the conscience is in error. The opponents quite rightly felt that this concept broke decisively with the medieval legal order, which required the proscription of heretics by common action of Church and state. In the debate, 25 to 29 September, Cardinal Ruffini posed the question: How can the Catholic Church, which is the true Church and bearer of the truth, abandon the fostering of this faith, wherever possible, even with the help of the state? Toleration—yes; freedom—no! Cardinal Ottaviani raised the question: Will not the concordats concluded by the Holy See, for example, with Italy and Spain, which allow to the Catholic Church a privileged position, come to nothing through this declaration?

The draft found firm defenders above all in the American episcopate, through Cardinals Meyer and Ritter, and also in the Polish through Archbishop Wojtyla of Cracow, eventually Pope John Paul II, who understood its worth vis-à-vis Communist totalitarianism. It was perceived that the motivation and the sphere where religious freedom prevailed must be more keenly grasped in order to meet the objection that truth and error as such—not the people who defend them—are equated. The debate ended without a vote, and the text was turned over to five members of the Theological Commission for appraisal, while the Secretariat for Unity undertook the further revision.

In comparison with the "Declaration on the Jews," submitted in the second session as Chapter 4 of the schema on ecumenism, but not discussed, the text introduced by Cardinal Bea on 25 September was planned with a view to appeasing its Arab opponents[21] In this regard, Islam was expressly mentioned; in the opinion of its champions the text was diluted, because only the Jews now alive, not the people as a historical unit, were absolved from the charge of "deicide," which in the past had been raised by Christian polemicists; twenty-one fathers demanded a return to the earlier wording. Other critics desired the deepening of the accomplishment of the history of salvation (Frings, Lercaro, Heenan, Hengsbach of Essen) and the taking of other monotheistic religions into account (König). The chief difficulty was and remained the political misunderstanding. The Arabic countries interpreted the "Declaration on the Jews" as taking a stand for the State of Israel and exerted strong pressure on the bishops of their countries and by way of diplomacy; Patriarch Maximos IV had the presumption to charge that the authors of the text were "bought." This explains why the secretary-general of the council in a letter of 8 October invited Cardinal Bea to have the text still once more examined by a group composed of three members each from the Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity and the Theological Commission; the effort to insert it into the Constitution on the Church and thereby to take it entirely away from the Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity misfired.

Surprisingly calmly proceeded the debate, from 30 September to 6 October, on the schema on revelation, tabled two years previously, which had received a new text from a subcommittee, on which Philips, [21] Very detailed presentation of the prehistory, including the political factors, by J. Oesterreicher, who was strongly involved in the whole process, in Herder TK II, 404–87. The text submitted in 1964 (op. cit., 437f.) was already the third.

---

Ratzinger, Congar, K. Rahner, and other leading theologians had collaborated. As Bishop Franič, the second commentator, expressed it, it was not in accord with the notion of a minority of the commission, which saw in it a departure from the Tridentine decree on Scripture and tradition. In reality, it constituted its completion, gained from the deepening of the ideas "Scripture," "Tradition," and "Teaching Office," which are intimately linked and can exist only together; the theological discussion on the interpretation of the Tridentine decree was purposely left in suspense. Other disputed points were the inerrancy of Scripture and the historicity of the Gospels. As in the votes on the schema on the Church and in the debate over religious liberty, so too in this on the schema on revelation it was apparent that the great majority of the council concurred with the aims set by Popes John and Paul, and that the group which held stubbornly to the views hitherto represented at Rome was influential, numerous, but weak.

From this procedure of the council's majority resulted the fate of the nine texts which were submitted to the council between 7 October and 20 November. Two of them were sent back to the relevant commissions: on 14 October the schema, consisting of only twelve basic points, on the life and ministry of priests, and on 9 November the schema on the missions, even though on 6 November the Pope had appeared personally in the aula and recommended its adoption. The schema on the lay apostolate, on which Bishop Hengsbach of Essen reported, escaped this fate in the debate of 7 to 13 October, but exception was taken to the fact that it did not draw the necessary conclusions from the doctrine of the People of God; it did not adequately elaborate the proper rights of laity or also their proper responsibility and specific spirituality; for the first time a layman, P. Keegan, spoke on the matter.

The basic principles on the renewal of the life of religious, debated 10 to 12 November, and on Christian education, 17 to 19 November, seemed to many fathers to be too abstract, but capable of being developed. Better received were the twenty-two basic principles on the formation of priests, which entrusted to the episcopal conferences the creation of plans of studies and thereby the accommodation to the regional circumstances; only on the question of what authority Thomas Aquinas had to occupy in the system of teaching philosophy and theology was there a separating of minds.

The text "On the Church in the Modern World," debated from 20 October to 9 November, at first schema 17 in the original sequence in the list of drafts, later schema 13, was drawn up by a working group which had met in February 1964 at Zurich—hence it was dubbed the "Zurich Text." It had been preceded by a "Roman" draft, composed in the spring of 1963, and a "Mechlin" text in French, conceived by Belgian and French theologians[22] in September 1963 at the suggestion of Cardinal Suenens. The Zurich draft, in which the Redemptorist Bernhard Häring had a powerful share, discussed in accord with a theological foundation the ministry of the Church to the world (Chapter 2), poverty, overpopulation, and war (Chapters 3 and 4). In the course of the general debate, opened by the comments of Bishop Guano of Livorno, Cardinal Meyer demanded the deepening of the theological bases; however, the text was accepted by a large majority, 1,576 to 296, as the basis for the special debate. In it Cardinal Lercaro moved a decision on the problem "Church and Cultures," and on 9 November the layman James J. Norris submitted copious material on the questions raised. Taken into account was the fact that this document, appearing for the first time in the history of the councils, had to mature slowly so that it could correspond to the expectation of people. The encyclical Ecclesiam suam of 8 December 1964, which in its third part treated the dialogue of the Church with the world, encouraged further work.

A schema on the sacrament of matrimony, worked out by the Commission for the Discipline of the Sacraments with the aid of members of the Theological Commission and of the Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity, treated in five chapters of the impediments, mixed marriages, matrimonial consent, the form, and matrimonial processes, but at the direction of the Coordinating Commission was reduced to a votum, which limited itself to listing the guidelines for a reform of the law of marriage.[23] Introduced by Archbishop Schneider of Bamberg, it was discussed on 19 and 20 November in the aula, but at the end of the general congregation of 20 November Cardinal Döpfner, as moderator, proposed, with regard to the law on mixed marriages, which in denominationally mixed countries was felt to be a great hindrance to the rapprochement of the denominations, to turn over the votum to the Pope in order to assure as quick a regulation as possible. The Council understood that so difficult a juridical and pastoral problem could hardly benefit in the plenary session, and a fortiori could not be solved, because the circumstances in the various countries were all too different. This expedient was declared for by 1,592 fathers, 427 declaring against it.

---

[22] For the history of the text, C. Moeller in Herder TK III, 242–78, where (p. 251) the letter of the secretary general of the World Council of Churches, Lukas Visher, of 18 April 1963, on "Faith and Order" is mentioned. Somewhat simplified in Hampe III, 15ff.

[23] On the origin of the votum on the Sacrament of Matrimony, B. Häring in Herder TK III, 595; there, pp. 596–606, the text; J. G. Gerhartz, "Die Mischehe, das Konzil und die Mischeheninstruktion," Theol. u. Phil. 41 (1966), 376–400.

Of the nine texts debated in October and November, only one accomplished its purpose after a brief debate, 16 to 20 October—the schema on the Eastern Churches, which was promulgated in the fifth sessio. While the Council, seen from without, moved ahead uninterruptedly, within it the tensions had increased. On 11 October seventeen cardinals from central and western Europe and the United States, by means of a letter to the Pope, thwarted the attempt to send the two controversial declarations on religious liberty and the Jews, by outflanking the council through appeal to an alleged desire of the Pope, to new mixed commissions, from whose planned makeup the aim of the minority to alter the text in its sense was recognizable. The appeal to the Pope was successful, but the opposing faction did not admit defeat.

Chapter 3 of the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church also encountered the stubborn resistance of the most active and influential minority in the Vatican. When on 14 November a thick book with proposals for changes in Chapters 3 to 8 together with the replies of the Theological Commission was handed to the council fathers, it was preceded by a nota explicativa praevia, which was supposed to exclude every encroachment on the doctrine of primacy by the doctrine of the College of Bishops developed in Chapter 3. It had, to be sure, been submitted to the Theological Commission, but, as the secretary general communicated, came from a "higher authority," hence from the Pope personally. It was supposed to reconcile with the text the minority, whose modi that altered the meaning were not accepted by the commission, and assure its acceptance with moral unanimity. Twice, on 16 and 19 November—the latter was the day before the final vote—the secretary general declared that the nota was, it is true, not an element of the text, but the text had to be interpreted in its sense.

The aim underlying the nota was achieved: the "no" votes to Chapter 3 dropped to forty-six on 17 November, including no doubt such of the defenders of collegiality who suspected an injury to or a weakening of this doctrine; in the sessio only five fathers still voted non placet. The Pope had, therefore, achieved his purpose. The question was: Did the nota alter the value of the statement of the text?

One who lays both side by side impartially will answer in the negative. The nota stengthened the adherence to the doctrine of the First Vatican Council on the primacy, but it did not subsequently strike out anything from the direct divine origin of the episcopal office and its function and the responsibility of the College of Bishops for the Universal Church. In any case, the minority abandoned its scruples and gave up its resistance. What was doubtful was less the content than the form in which the nota preceded the conciliar text. But had not the Pope, as head of the council, the right to make his consent dependent on an interpretation determined in advance?

The agitation over the nota had not yet subsided when on "Black Thursday," 19 November, the vote published on the previous day on the Declaration on Religious Freedom was canceled by the ranking member of the presidency, Cardinal Tisserant. This was preceded by a petition to the presidency from 200 Spanish and Italian bishops, which, appealing to ART. 30, par. 2, and ART. 35 of the order of procedure, demanded more time for study of the actually significantly altered draft and the postponement of the vote. If voting took place, there could be scarcely a doubt as to its outcome: the great majority would give the draft the green light, even if it did not fully satisfy the defenders of religious freedom. When shortly after eleven o'clock the vote was to take place, Tisserant, after a conference with other members of the presidency, announced that it was prorogued—and that meant that the declaration could no longer be passed in this session. Never had the aula of Saint Peter's seen such commotion as at this hour: Many council fathers had left their places and were standing together in groups, excitedly discussing. Was the council's freedom endangered? American bishops hurriedly circulated a petition to the Pope, which at once obtained 441 signatures, and later about 1,000; "with all respect, but with the greatest urgency—instanter, instantius, instantissime—we ask that before the end of this session of the council a vote be taken on the Declaration on Religious Liberty; otherwise we lose the confidence of the Christian and the non-Christian world." Bishop De Smedt, who reported on the text, received demonstrative applause. After the close of the general congregation, Cardinals Meyer, Ritter, and Léger went to the Pope, but received only the assurance that the declaration would come as the first point on the program of the fourth session; this assurance was repeated the next day by Cardinal Tisserant.

The stormy general congregation of 19 November produced yet another surprise. The text of the Decree on Ecumenism, formulated by the commission and explained on 5 October by the commentators Martin, Helmsing, Hermaniuk, and Heenan, was, it is true, rejected by only a few fathers but almost two thousand modi were introduced, which had to be sifted and compiled. The fathers waited in vain for the printed definitive text, on which there was supposed to be a vote on 20 November. Then the secretary general announced that it was not yet ready, because some changes had been made; he read these changes, nineteen altogether, with the additions; they went back to a "higher authority." The Pope had sent forty suggestions for changes to the chairman of the Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity, which because of lack of time Cardinal Bea could submit to only a few members from his closest associates, with the result that the nineteen mentioned had been worked into the text. Some were only stylistic, but others changed the sense, for example, that the Churches not in communion with Rome "seek" instead of "find" God in the Bible; however, none could be regarded as a substantial alteration. Again, only the form was strange: that a text produced with great care by a council and its competent organ, in this case the Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity, had at the last moment been altered, not entirely over its head but still not in a form in keeping with the order of procedure. Among the sixty-four fathers who on the next day voted non placet not a few declared their disillusionment in this way; in the sessio of 21 November the "no" votes dropped to eleven.

In the fifth sessio of 21 November 1964, with which the third session ended, three texts could be adopted and promulgated. The constitution Lumen gentium[24] is in two respects the climax and center of the conciliar decrees. Historically considered, it is the climax, for it ended the Church's quest for its self-understanding which had begun at the end of the thirteenth century, had led to the reform councils of the fifteenth century and at Trent to serious collisions, and had not been brought to an end at the First Vatican Council. It is the center of the conciliar decrees, for almost all other decrees of the council must be interpreted in its light. As no other decree, it is "the work of the council itself and of its most active members," wrote Philips. As the Theological Commission had declared on 6 March 1964 with regard to all doctrinal statements of the council, it does not claim infallibility but demands acceptance in faith in accord with the measure of the subject and the form of statement. The definition of the Church as "People of God" broke with the one-sided juridical concept of an institution and the notion which practically identified it with the clergy and forced a passive role on the laity. It ended the confrontation over the relation of the papal primacy to the episcopate in the sense of an organic union of both: the College of Bishops, into which the individual bishop is admitted by sacramental ordination and receives the charisms and full authority to exercise the apostolic office, possesses, by virtue of divine right as successor of "The Twelve," power over and responsibility for the Universal Church, but only in communion with the Pope, who is its member and its head. The successor of Peter regulates the exercise of the full authority given by God by the entrusting of a specific territory to the bishop, which can be refused or taken away. The bishop thus appointed rules the local church with full authority and responsibility, by virtue of potestas propria, ordinaria et immediata. The College of Bishops is a spiritual community (communio), not a college in the sense of Roman Law. It can exercise its authority continually only in union with its head, and here it is left undecided in which form, without possessing the right of corule (ius congubernii), it can be given a share in the government of the Universal Church by the Pope, but equally also whether the Pope is the source of all and every actual power of government in the Church or may intervene only subsidiarily in the interest of Church unity.

---

[24] For the extensive literature on the Constitution on the Church see the bibliography for this chapter (H. Schauf, "Zur Textgeschichte grundlegender Aussagen aus Lumen gentium über das Bischofskollegium," AKR 141 [1972], 5–147).

The diaconate was reinstated as a state of life. All Christians are called to holiness, but the way to it in the religious state, which complies with the evangelical counsels, is different from the way of persons living in the world. The Church feels itself less as "fighting" and still less as "triumphing," but as being on pilgrimage, looking forward impatiently to its eschatological fulfillment. The Mother of the Lord stands also in a unique relationship to the Church by virtue of her singular position in the history of salvation; she is "our Mother," but is not called "Mediatrix of salvation": the chapter on Mariology suited neither the maximalists nor the minimalists.

If the constitution Lumen gentium is by far the most important outcome of the council because it articulates the Church's self-awareness, it is followed at a short interval by the Decree on Ecumenism,[25] which regulated anew the relations with other Christian Churches and ecclesial communities. It proceeds from this, that there can be and is only one Church of Christ, but that in the Churches separated from the Roman Catholic Church, not without fault on both sides, "non sine hominum utriusque partis culpa," "the written Word of God, the life of grace, faith, hope, and charity, and other interior gifts of the Holy Spirit" are operative. The Decree on Ecumenism ended the stressing, necessary in its day at Trent, of denominational opposition by throwing into relief what is common, opening the door to mutual knowledge and understanding, and by the invitation to common prayer evoked the power which can make possible the apparently impossible, the reunion of the Christian Churches. The separating differences in doctrine and piety, more numerous in the Churches of the Protestant Reformation than among the Eastern Churches, are not denied out of a false irenicism but must be discussed in the spirit of love, as occurred in the ongoing dialogue of the observers with the Secretariat for Unity during the council. Persons were thoroughly aware that in this field a greater distance still had to be covered.

---

[25] Literature in the bibliography.

The third decree promulgated in the fifth sessio, the Decree on the Oriental Catholic Churches,[26] declared solemnly in ART. 5: "The Churches of the East, like that of the West, have the full right and duty always to be governed according to their proper principles, which are recommended by their venerable antiquity, correspond better to the customs of their faithful, and appear more adapted to care for the salvation of souls." Orientalium ecclesiarum instituta regulates especially practical questions of ecclesiastical communities—liturgy, administration of the sacraments, here for example the abolition of the obligation of the form in mixed marriages—but it disappointed the representatives of the Eastern Churches in ARTS. 7 to 9 on the patriarchates, the "pivot of the entire Eastern question," according to Abbot Hoeck.

Fourth Session and Closing

On 4 January 1965 the Pope, who at the beginning of December had taken part in the eucharistic congress at Bombay, appointed 14 September as the beginning of the fourth session. Meanwhile, the commissions worked more intensively than ever before on the already discussed eleven texts, five of which were sent to the council fathers at the end of May. If the November Crisis had left the impression that the Pope feared a diminution of the Petrine office, the following statements and measures showed that he still unerringly pursued the line drawn by him at the beginning of his pontificate. In an address to the College of Cardinals on 24 June 1965 he held out the prospect of the reform of the Curia and the revision of the canon law, but also the alteration, turned over to him by the council, of the law on mixed marriages and the study of birth control. In the encyclical Mysterium fidei of 11 September 1965 he repudiated the effort to weaken the dogma of the Eucharistic transubstantiation and stressed on various occasions that the Church has no cause to abandon good and proven traditions. "We have a Pope," was one radio commentator's summary of his impression.

On the day of the opening of the fourth session, 14 September 1965,[27] Paul VI surprised the council by the announcement that he would summon a Synod of Bishops, through which the episcopate could work together for the welfare of the Universal Church. From the motu proprio Apostolica sollicitudo of 15 September it appeared that the majority of the members of the Synod of Bishops was to be elected by the episcopal conferences, whereby a general representation of the bishops, not of the College of Bishops as such, was assured. The Synod of Bishops is convoked, prepared, and guided by the Pope. It is "a permanent synod of bishops for the entire Church, which is directly and immediately subject to Our power," and hence not a "little council" with its own deciding power.

---

[26] Brief introduction by Abbot Johannes Hoeck in Herder TK I, 362f.; also, Hampe II, 637–97. The Pope's address in AAS 56 (1964), 1107–18, and Decreta, 971–91. Retrospect of the entire third session by Hirschmann et al. in Müller III/2, 897–925.

[27] The speech of 14 September 1965 in AAS 57 (1965), 794–805, and Decreta, 992–1011. The motu proprio with a German translation in the pamphlet edited by me: Ordnung der Bischofssynode (Trier 1968), 50–61; there, pp. 18–49, the agenda issued on 8 December 1966.

The fourth session differed from all the earlier ones in this, that the work of the commissions in refining the texts was in the foreground, the general congregations were to a great extent taken up with voting and were several times interrupted by rather long pauses. The council was under the pressure of time, for this session was to be the last. Without a break the still outstanding decrees were brought to a conclusion.

At the beginning of the renewed debate on religious freedom, on 15 September, the commentator, De Smedt, once again made it clear that the text did not equate truth and error and that it did not release the individual from the moral obligation of seeking and embracing the truth but merely contained freedom from religious compulsion in the civil sphere. A newly inserted passage left open the possibility of allowing to the Church a privileged position in states with an overwhelmingly Catholic population and thereby reconciled a part of the Italians, such as Cardinal Urbani of Venice, but not all opponents: In the final vote on 21 September, 224 fathers voted non placet. After repeated clarification of the text on the basis of modi submitted, the number of "no" votes on 19 November even rose to 249. In the preceding debate the Polish Cardinal Wyszyński and the Czech Cardinal Beran, only released in the spring, had indicated the importance of the declaration for the Church behind the Iron Curtain: acts of conscience could be neither commanded nor prevented by a purely human power. The Church claims for itself, as a "spiritual authority established by Christ the Lord," the freedom to proclaim the gospel to all creatures. It renounces the notion that the secular power is justified and obliged to support the Church's saving work by compulsory means; it notes that the modern state is no longer Christian, but neutral; modern society is no longer monistic, but pluralist; but it limits their rights through the natural right of the individual not to be impeded by the civil power in the following of conscience. The burning of a Hus, the principle "Cuius regio, eius et religio" are henceforth not only historically outdated according to the teaching of the Church but are basically repudiated. The impact of this decision explains why the Declaration on Religious Liberty was only ready for publication in the last session.

On the other hand, from the end of September to the end of October the five decrees which were approved and proclaimed in the seventh sessio on 28 October 1965 moved quickly and without great objection across the stage of the council. The Decree on the Pastoral Office of Bishops assumed the doctrine of the episcopal office explained in the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church and was oriented to practice. The curial offices and tribunals are "to be more strongly adapted to the needs of the time, the regions, and the rites," and more foreign bishops, "ex diversis ecclesiae regionibus," are to be brought into them for permanent cooperation. The right was given to the episcopal conferences to issue statutes for themselves and to make legally binding decrees with a two-thirds majority. A redrawing of episcopal sees and ecclesiastical provinces was envisaged. Bishops were authorized to appoint episcopal vicars with material or territorial competence. Fruitful, even if also difficult to realize in large dioceses, was the idea of the presbyterium united with the bishop as father—ART. 28: "unum constituunt presbyterium atque unam familiam cuius pater est episcopus." The final vote on 6 October yielded almost unanimity—2,161 to 14, and only two "no" votes in the sessio. The decree "interlocked more powerfully than any other conciliar document in the juridical order of the Church," says Mörsdorf; it would only achieve its full impact in the course of the reform of canon law.[28]

The schema on the renewal of religious life had, in the debate of the third session, 10 to 12 November 1964, incurred the opposition of several bishops, for example, Cardinals Döpfner and Suenens, but especially of the religious institutes—882 non placet at the close of the general debate—and so in the spring of 1965 it was again revised by three subcommissions with such success that in the final vote on 11 October there were only thirteen negative votes, and in the sessio only four.[29] It proceeded from the ideal of perfection developed in Chapter 6 of the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church; in its practical part it is, like the Tridentine reform decree, a law providing a framework which did not encroach on the differences and the proper life of the orders and other religious communities, but obliged them to sift from the order's tradition what was original and essential, to improve the formation of the young members, to give them the salutary measure of freedom, to understand the, now as earlier, necessary obedience not as renunciation of their own responsibility, to live for God but likewise for people. Of course it happened, as Cardinal Ruffini had already said in the debate on 11 November 1964, that this decree would evoke "extravagant" desires for reform.

---

[28] Introduction and commentary by K. Mörsdorf in Herder TK II, 128–247. There can be no doubt that the priests' councils to be set up bore no analogy to the College of Bishops. Proposals in this direction were made by J. Neumann in Hampe II, 496ff.

[29] The long and complex prehistory of the decree Perfectae caritatis by F. Wulf in Herder TK II, 250ff.; L. Kaufmann in Hampe II, 291–334. On the fundamental element, F. Wulf, "Gebot und Rat," GuL 39 (1966), 321ff.; S. Légasse, L'appel du riche. Contribution à l'étude des fondements scripturaires de l'état religieux (Paris 1966). The passage on secular institutes (ART. 11) was not inserted into the text until the fifth version, but with the remark "Quamvis non sint instituta religiosa."

The text on the formation of priests, expanded again from a principle to a decree, explained by Bishop Carraro of Verona, found so favorable a reception in the third session that only a few controverted points were left. The revision submitted on 11 October was accepted almost unanimously—2,196 to 15.[30] The decree Optatam totius Ecclesiae renovationem designated the family as "a sort of first seminary" for the vocation to the priesthood and left the preparation to the Tridentine seminary, but attached importance to the improvement of biblical and liturgical studies and of the practical pastoral instruction that was neglected in some countries. The natural virtues, sinceritas, urbanitas, modestia, were to be cultivated. The episcopal conferences were instructed to set up programs of study which were adapted to the intellectual and religious level of the country. A debate suggested by Latin American bishops on the law of celibacy was rejected by the Pope as "inopportune" in a letter of 11 October 1965 to Cardinal Tisserant but it invited the council fathers to express their views in writing. Shortly before, the intervention of a Brazilian bishop of Dutch descent on the eliminating of the lack of priests by ordaining laymen who had been married for five years for pastoral work in smaller congregations had been rejected by the moderators.[31]

---

[30] In the very succinct introduction by J. Neuner in Herder TK II, 310ff., it is maintained that the Tridentine decree on seminaries belongs "to the age of the Counter Reformation"; cf., on the contrary, my Geschichte des Konzils von Trient IV/2, 73ff., and the literature cited there on p. 273. The lack of previous seminary training had been deplored in the earlier debate, on 12 November 1964, by Cardinal Colombo of Milan, himself a former seminary Rector: Hampe II, 172f; cf. H. Jedin, "Das Leitbild des Priesters nach dem Tridentinum und dem Vaticanum II," ThGl 59 (1969), 102–24; A. De Bovis, "Nature et mission du presbyterat," Sacerdoce et célibat. Études historiques et théologiques, ed. by J. Coppens (Louvain 1971), 187–224.

[31] The undelivered talk to the council by Bishop Pieter Koop of Lins in Hampe II, 239ff. A glimpse of the postconciliar discussion is provided by the collective work of J. Coppens mentioned in the preceding note.

The Declaration on Christian Education, Gravissimum educationis momentum, was the eighth version of a text elaborated by the Commission for Studies, which after a temporary reduction to seventeen basic principles in March 1964, was again expanded and explained by Bishop Daem of Antwerp and in the debate of the third session, 17 to 19 November, ran into heavy criticism and obtained 419 "no" votes. Thereupon Archbishop Coadjutor Elchinger of Strasbourg had directed attention to the importance of the formation of teachers and pointed out the danger that the state might force its own ideology on the children in its schools. Not only was there a vote on the new version on 13 and 14 October 1965: the final vote turned out to be 1,912 to 183. In twelve principles the declaration developed the right of the individual to education, the right of parents, the desirability of denominational schools and Catholic universities, but it intimated that both, especially the last, urgently needed coordination and consolidation. Of the fact that the great majority of Catholic students attended neutral universities and that many Catholic professors taught at these, the declaration took note only in passing, in ART. 7.[32]

The Declaration on the Church's Attitude toward Non-Christian Religions, frequently called the "Declaration on the Jews" because of its principal item, was not yet able in its new form, in comparison with the earlier diluted form, to satisfy all its opponents. Then the reaction had been so strong that publication had been abandoned. The bishops of Arab countries, such as Jacobite Patriarch Jacob III, intimidated by the threats of the Arab states but supported by members of Coetus Internationalis, continued their resistance, and anti-Semitic pamphlets against the alleged "Jewish-Freemason Conspiracy" were distributed; on the other hand German Catholics in a petition to the Pope had intervened in favor of promulgation.[33] The form now presented for a vote endeavored to remove misunderstandings and also to gain the opponents. Their number remained mostly under 200 in the special votes on 14 and 15 October, but in the vote on the whole rose to 250; in the sessio it dropped to eighty-eight. The disputed expression "deicide" was dropped, but it was stated clearly that the guilt for the passion and death of Jesus must be laid neither on the Jews of today nor "on all Jews living at that time, without distinction." Urged not by political motives but by the love of Christ, the Church "deplores" anti-Semitism and "rejects every discrimination against a person, every deed of violence against him because of his race, his color, his status, or his religion." By means of this closing statement the condemnation of anti-Semitism was placed on a broader basis and made applicable to every racial discrimination. It was to become the maxim of Catholics in the approaching period of racial strife.

---

[32] Literature on the Declaration on Christian Education in Herder TK II, 358f; B. Dezza, "L'educazione cristiana nella Dichiarazione Conciliare," CivCatt 117, 1 (1966), 110–25; M. J. Hurley, Declaration on Christian Education of Vatican Council II (Glen Rock 1966). Both authors took part in the origin of the declaration.

[33] Cf. Herder TK II, 465–70; there, pp. 478ff., Excursus on the statements on Islam, Hinduism, and Buddhism with the citations of the literature. For an understanding of the Declaration on the Jews, A. Bea, Die Kirche und das jüdische Volk (Freiburg 1966).

The far less controverted central part of the declaration applied the basic attitude of the Decree on Ecumenism, with which it had been originally united, to Islam, Hinduism, and Buddhism. Monotheism was recognized as obligatory in Islam, and in a reference to the crusades, in which Muslims had been fought with the sword as "heathens," the wish was expressed that the past be forgotten. In Hinduism the liberating "contemplation of the mystery of God" was positively evaluated; in Buddhism, the effort to become free, by means of asceticism, from this passing world. For all the world religions the principle was valid: "The Catholic Church rejects nothing that is true and holy in these religions"; it is often "the reflection of the ray of that truth which enlightens all people," where the fullness of life is to be found: in Christ. For the confrontation with non-Christian religions the declaration has no less significance than the Decree on Ecumenism for the relations with the separated Churches.

In his homily the Pope, alluding to the five promulgated texts, exclaimed: "The Church lives!" It has not grown old, but young; it does not let itself be sucked into the whirlpool of historical change, but remains constant—"semper eadem est sibique constat"; it speaks, prays, watches, rebuilds itself. The council convoked by Pope John "represents the entire Church," totam repraesentat. At the end the Pope recalled the persecuted Church, whose representatives were concelebrating with him.[34]

After the October meeting the last snags were quickly overcome. The Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation still had to contend with the opposition of a minority, which based itself on Trent. It only crumbled when, at the personal desire of the Pope in a letter of 18 October 1965 to Cardinal Ottaviani, the inerrancy of Holy Scripture was more precisely defined[35] and the relations of Scripture and tradition were newly formulated: "The Church does not derive assurance on all the truths of revelation from Scripture alone"; "tradition" is the living teaching office of the Church, which authoritatively interprets and complements Scripture. This formulation left to the theological schools the liberty of defining more in detail the mutual relations of the two. The doctrine of inspiration—"God speaks through men in a human way"—and the historical character of the Gospels were expressly affirmed. The study of the books of the Bible in the original languages and the ancient translations, as well as of the ancient commentaries and liturgies, and the reading of biblical translations in the vernacular were recommended. In the voting on the individual parts of the constitution on 29 October, only the passage on the relationship of Scripture and tradition got fifty-five non placet; the vote on the whole was 2,081 to 27, and in the sessio the "no" votes dropped to six. "The text joins fidelity to ecclesiastical tradition with the assent to critical scholarship and thereby opens up again to the faith the road to today," said Ratzinger.

---

[34] The Pope's homily in AAS 57 (1965), 899–903, and Decreta, 1037–43.

[35] On the petition, preceding the papal letter, of conservative fathers against the expression veritas salutaris, too greatly restrictive in their view, cf. A. Grillmeier in Herder TK II, 536f.; what is meant is the truth which God might communicate to us; cf. A. Grillmeier, "Die Wahrheit der Heiligen Schrift und ihre Erschließung. Zum dritten Kapitel der Dogmatischen Konstitution Dei Verbum des Vaticanum II," Theol. u. Phil.

After 29 October the general congregations were interrupted for ten days in order to allow time to the commissions for working on the modi. The Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity, explained on 9 November by Bishop Hengsbach of Essen, had assimilated the proposals for change submitted in the voting of 23 to 27 September, as were also those presented personally by the Pope. It received a virtually unanimous approval on 10 November.[36] If Trent had defended the priesthood of ordination, so too in the justification of the lay apostolate the general priesthood of the faithful came into its own. "In the Church there are various ministries but only one mission"; no member of the Church is only passive; all are called to cooperate actively in the building of the Body of the Church as witnesses of faith and love, in the family, in charity, in the missions—everything under the direction of the ecclesiastical hierarchy, as the authority established and ordered by God, but not intended to patronize. The council itself gave an example by the fact that it employed lay persons as periti on the commissions in an increased measure.

A schema De Indulgentiis recognoscendis, drawn up not by a conciliar commission but by the Congregation of Rites, was felt almost by all to be a disaster when it was explained by Grand Penitentiary Cento and 41 (1966), 161–87; G. Caprile, "Tre emendamenti allo Schema sulla Rivelazione," CivCatt 117 (1966), 214–31.

---

[36] On the history of the origin, F. Klostermann in Herder TK II, 587–601, supplemented by the same author's article in Hampe II, 72–87; Müller III/2, 608–74, gives the reports and several interventions during the debate in September 1964, for example, on pp. 628f. that of Auxiliary Bishop Betazzi of Bologna on the spirituality of the laity.

the regent of the Poenitentiaria on 9 November. The text envisaged certain simplifications in the practice of indulgences, for example, that only one plenary indulgence could be gained in one year, the time references in partial indulgences were suppressed, but it did not grasp the theological problem of the indulgence in its depth and was withdrawn on 13 November[37] because of the keen criticism which it encountered from the episcopal conferences which had been questioned about it.

The Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation and the Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity were proclaimed in the eighth sessio on 18 November 1965. In his talk the Pope tried to dissipate the hesitations concerning the now imminent ending of the council's work by reference to the establishing of postconciliar agencies: the consilia for the liturgy, for the revision of canon law, and for the mass media; the already existing Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity would be complemented by one secretariat each for non-Christian religions and for unbelievers; the first meeting of the Synod of Bishops was held out in prospect for 1967. The Pope asked for patience, if the necessary organizational, not structural, changes in the Roman Curia were implemented only slowly; persons wrongly held it to be an "instrumentum veterascens, ineptum, corruptum." By far most important of all was the renewal of Christian life.[38]

Until the close of the council three problem children still had to be examined: The Decree on the Missionary Activity of the Church, the Decree on the Ministry and Life of Priests, and Schema 13.

The general of the Divine Word Missionaries, Johannes Schütte, named by the chairman, Cardinal Agagianian, as vice-chairman of the Commission for the Missions, succeeded, with the assistance of newly added periti—Congar, Ratzinger, Seumois—at a private meeting at Nemi in the Alban Hills in drafting a wholly new schema, which was based on a theological foundation corresponding to modern mission scholarship and, in that respect, from a backward-looking had become a forward-looking document. In the debate, 7 to 12 October, Cardinal Frings had come out for the retaining of the old "classical" idea of the mission, but the Jesuit General Arrupe harshly criticized the practice of the past. There was no dearth of unresolved problems: the relations of the orders, which till now were the chief agents of missionary work, to the native clergy and of both to the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith; financing; competition with non-Catholic missions. When the vote was taken on the refined text, 712 fathers—most all from mission lands—expressed in their modi to Chapter 5 that the missionaries active on the spot should have to collaborate in the decisions of the central offices. Thereupon the contested passage was revised, so that "elected representatives" of the missionary episcopate and of the missionary orders had to be summoned to the Propaganda with a decisive vote, hence not merely as advisers.[39]

---

[37] Hampe I, 436–49; there 445–49 the opinion of the German and the Austrian episcopal conferences.

[38] AAS 57 (1965), 978–84; Decreta, 1044—57. It can hardly be denied that the tone now sounded in regard to the Curia was different from that in September 1963.

In the third session the council had also sent back to the competent commission the schema on the priesthood. At that time there prevailed the impression that priests, compared, for example, with bishops and religious, would be unduly neglected by the contracting of the schema into guiding principles. The commission worked out a new schema, which was submitted at the end of the third session and was again revised, better organized, and stylistically polished at the beginning of 1965 on the basis of 157 suggestions for change, presented in writing. Archbishop Marty of Rheims introduced it on 13 October; on 16 October the council decided to have the proposals for changes presented by Cardinals Döpfner and Léger and other speakers reworked by the commission. The vote by parts on 12 and 13 November, however, produced so large a number of modi—1,331 on celibacy alone—that still another revision became necessary, and on 2 December it was approved by a great majority, 2,243 to 11.[40]

Nevertheless, the decree Presbyterorum ordinis had by no means fulfilled all expectations. With reference to the pertinent parts of the constitutions on the liturgy and on the Church, it treated the mission of the priest, his threefold ministry, the relation of priests to the bishops, to one another, and to the laity. "Every priestly ministry shares in the worldwide mission which Christ entrusted to the Apostles"; the priest should be prepared to work in other dioceses with too few priests. Celibacy is "not demanded by the nature of the priesthood," as the practice of the Eastern Churches proved, but is "in many respects appropriate to the priesthood." The law of celibacy was approved and confirmed. "And so the council admonishes all priests who have taken celibacy upon themselves with confidence in God's grace in a free decision according to the model of Christ, to remain faithful to it generously and with the entire heart and to persevere loyally in this state." (ART. 16).

---

[39] For the origin, Herder TK III, 10–21; J. Glazik entitled his commentary in Hampe III, 543–53: "A Correction, Not a Magna Carta"; O. Stoffel is of a different mind, "Missionsstrukturen im Wandel," NZMW 31 (1975), 259–70: "The mission was pushed from the edge of the Church to the middle." Turning away from the traditional concept of mission, a layman from Togo said: "Mission is everywhere"; Hampe III, 530.

[40] For the history of the origin, J. Lécuyer in Herder TK III, 128–41; the strongly critical commentary on ARTS. 1–6 by F. Wulf, ibid., 141–69; on ARTS. 12–22, ibid., 198–237. Many interventions are given in Documentation Catholique 62 (1965), 2183–2202; 63 (1966), 329–48; J. Colson, Ministre de Jésus Christ ou le sacerdoce de l'Évangile (Paris 1966).

Schema 13 evoked by far the greatest concern. For even the new draft, produced between the third and fourth sessions at Ariccia, Paris, and Louvain,[41] upon which Archbishop Garrone of Toulouse gave the report, ran into varied criticism in the debate from 21 September to 8 October—the fourteenth general congregation—because of the superabundance of general claims which it contained (Elchinger), because of the language, unclear in many passages (Frings), because of its all too optimistic evaluation of the "world" and its confidence of progress (Höffner), but especially because it said only a little on what the Church of today has to give to the world (Bishop Volk of Mainz). Cardinal König and others noted the absence of a confrontation with atheism, especially with atheistic Communism, whose express condemnation was demanded by 450 fathers in a petition to the presidency. A fortiori views were juxtaposed in the concrete problems: total war, atomic weapons, disarmament, refusal of military service, assurance of peace. The council was naturally in no position to give a clear answer to these pressing questions. The appearance of the Pope before the United Nations in New York on 4 October was, it is true, suited to make visible the Church's involvement in today's world; in the structurally conditioned problems of this organization it changed nothing.

In feverish work the commission, which had divided itself into ten subcommissions, strove to incorporate into the text the more than three thousand proposals for changes for the votes on 15 to 17 November. Even the title "Pastoral Constitution" was challenged—541 non placet. The most "no" votes (140) were cast on ARTS. 54 to 56 (marriage, birth control) and the section on war and peace (144). The final vote on 6 December produced, just the same, a respectable majority: 2,111 to 251.

The pastoral constitution Gaudium et spes, the most voluminous text of the council, was placed, as the "heart of the council," at the side of the three other constitutions. It aimed to be "a fundamental new definition of the relation of the Church to the world" and thereby to orient the Church to the world, and that meant to the spirit of the new epoch, from which it had held itself aloof since a century earlier in the Syllabus. This constitution was greeted with enthusiasm, but history has already proved that at that time its significance was greatly overestimated and there was hardly a suspicion of how deeply that "world" which people wanted to win for Christ would penetrate the Church. Only too confident of progress, it remained self-consciously in a static manner of contemplation without being able to give clear answers to such urgent problems as birth control and the prevention of war; entirely inadequate is ART. 58 on the relation of the Church to the cultures. Perhaps a brief "declaration," in which the Church turned ad extra, would have made a deeper impression than this diffuse treatise.

---

[41] The last phase of the history of the origin in Herder TK III, 266–79; there, pp. 266, n. 47, and 268, n. 74, are given the lists of priests and laity who shared in the revision of the text; pp. 273f. give the composition of the ten subcommissions. Commentary by A. Grillmeier in Hampe III, 138–56; the collective work L'Église dans le monde de ce temps (Paris 1967); P. Mikat, "Kirche und Staat in nachkonziliarer Sicht (1967)" in Religionsrechtliche Schriften I (Berlin 1974), 217–35; J. Ratzinger, "Der Weltdienst der Kirche," Internat. Kath. Zeitschrift, 1975, 439–54. The Central Office of Catholic Social Science of Mönchengladbach publishes Kommentare zur Pastoralkonstitution des Zweiten Vatikanischen Konzils, for example, A. Langner, Die politische Gemeinschaft (Cologne 1968).

When the secretary general announced in the general congregation of 6 December that this, the one hundred and sixty-eighth, was the last of this council, stormy applause thundered through the halls of Saint Peter's. The council had done its work. In the ninth sessio on 7 December, in addition to Gaudium et spes, the decrees on the mission and the priesthood and the Declaration on Religious Freedom were approved and proclaimed. Once again the ecumenical orientation of the council was confirmed. In a common declaration the Pope and the ecumenical patriarch canceled the mutual excommunications of 1054. In his homily[42] during the Mass celebrated by twenty-four fathers, the Pope admitted that "not a few questions which were taken up during the council still awaited a satisfactory solution"; nevertheless, it might be said that the Council had corresponded to the goal set by Pope John. The Church had not been concerned to admire itself but to serve people, ut homini serviat.

On the next day, 8 December, the council was declared ended in a closing celebration arranged in the piazza of Saint Peter's. There were messages in French directed to political leaders, scholars and artists, women, the poor and suffering, workers and youth, delivered by representatives of these groups.[43] The Pope had said good-bye to the observers in an hour of devotion which deeply impressed all the participants in the basilica of San Paolo on 4 December.

---

[42] AAS 58 (1966), 51–59, and Decreta, 1061–77. In his radio address at Christmas the Pope again took up this idea: the council was an encounter of the Church with itself and the world.

[43] The messages of 8 December in Decreta, 1084–1100; ibid., 1101f., the Pope's declaration that the council is closed: "concludere decernimus atque statuimus ad omnes iuris effectus."

The Second Vatican Council was a world event. Was it an event of world history? A reply to this question would assume that one could in some way take in its effects at a glance.

Impact

In an interval of only a decade the impact of the Second Vatican Council cannot be decisively determined, but its effects can be observed. It is now established that it penetrated more deeply into the history of the Church than the First Vatican Council; in any event, its effects are comparable to those of Trent.[44] The first historians of Trent, Sarpi and Pallavicino, were not able to give a historical orientation, although they wrote more than half a century after the event: for them the council was still an object of strife, not history. It is tempting to say something similar about the Second Vatican Council. Of course, it can hardly be disputed that it represented a turning point in the history of the Church. Much began to move in it, its internal structure was loosened up, it opened itself up ecumenically and to the world. Was this movement for the business of Jesus Christ on earth gain or loss?

The verdicts differ widely. The original enthusiasm with which the council was greeted yielded to harsh criticism. The critics pointed to the perplexity in the faith which "pluralism" in theology and preaching had caused; to the constantly declining participation of the faithful in Mass; the sharply increasing number of priests and religious who abandoned their vocation; the bewildering number of "councils" which were supposed to promote the "democratization" of the Church; the weakening authority of the Pope and the bishops; the increase of mixed marriages; the "earthly messianism," to use Ratzinger's term, which throws man back to the feasible; to the new sexual morality: the influence of the Church on the world has not increased but dissipated. The fact is incontrovertible.

The "progressives," on the contrary, have to reflect that an inner process of fermentation was necessary in order to realize Pope John's

---

[44] The reserve which I professed immediately after the council I cannot yet even now abandon. The earlier observations: "Tradition und Fortschritt. Einige Erwägungen zum geschichtlichen Ort des Vaticanum II," in Wort und Wahrheit 21 (1966), 731–41; Vaticanum II und Tridentinum. Tradition und Fortschritt in der Kirchengeschichte (Cologne and Opladen 1968), with contributions to the discussion by J. Ratzinger, K. Rahner, et al. On the tenth anniversary of the close of the council Bavarian Radio arranged a broadcast series, which was inaugurated by J. Ratzinger, "Erfolge und Enttäuschungen"; from my own contribution, "Das Vaticanum II und die Konziliengeschichte," printed in Klerusblatt 56 (1976), 53–56, much has made its way into the following presentation. H. Helbling, Dauerhaftes Provisorium. Kirche aus der Sicht eines Weltchristen (Zurich 1976), attempts a balance.

aggiornamento. They do not deny that the new liturgy is experiencing its "childhood illnesses," but claim that, thanks to the vernacular, the faithful participate in it more actively than previously. "Declericalization" and "democratization" are consequences of the doctrine of the People of God: a far-reaching cooperation, even having a voice, by the laity is necessary if the Church is to fulfill its mission in today's world. Finally, the ecumenical stance has reduced denominational strife and brought about the "end of the Counter-Reformation." The positive assessment of the religious and ethical content of the ancient world religions offers to the mission positive starting points, and Europeanism has long been outdated. They rightly affirm that the undoubtedly present phenomena of dissolution are, at least partly, not to be referred to the council but to the upheavals within industrial society and in the Third World, and hence in the long-run have struck root in the turn in world history in which we stand. In an intermediate stage, which is full of uncertainty but also full of honest struggling and full of hope, there are movements and beginnings which promise new possibilities; a search for the mean appears, which gives the lie to the diagnosis of the end of the religious and paves from faith ways of new life, in which the unexhausted fertility of the Church's faith again proves itself, as Ratzinger says.

An accommodation of the opposing views is not yet in sight. It can be found only if one adheres to this: that the council, the highest authority in faith and morals, had set up binding norms, behind which one must not fall back, which one must also not go beyond or even disregard. There is no retreat back behind the council, but even less is this only an initial kindling for a total adaptation of the Church in faith, morals, and structure. Only if one holds fast to the council itself, can the compromise between tradition and progress be found, the identity of the Church in a changing world be preserved.

After the close of the Council of Trent a deputation of cardinals was instituted for the interpretation of the decrees, which later undertook the added task of promoting and supervising their implementation. The Second Vatican Council, differently from Trent, did not enact any decrees directly to be admitted to the canon law; this task was given to the Commission for the Revision of the Code,[45] set up during the council. For the interpretation of the decrees for the period from 3 January 1966 to 11 July 1967 the Coordinating Commission of the council was still competent, but on 11 July 1967 a special commission for interpretation was instituted, the Pontificia Commissio decretis concilii

---

[45] See below, the contribution of G. May (Chapter 5); important contribution by K. Mörsdorf, "Zur Neuordnung der Systematik des CIC," AKR 137 (1968), 3–38.

Vaticani II interpretandis.[46] It does not have the same authority as did in its day the Congregation of the Council, expanded into an office.

The council itself had in several places referred to the still to be issued rules of implementation (directories) and turned over other tasks—celibacy, indulgences, mixed marriages—expecially the reform of the Roman Curia, to the Pope.

For the implementation of the council, on 3 January 1966, to the three postconciliar commissions set up during the council, five others were added, whose chairmen and members were identical with those of the corresponding conciliar commission:[47] (1) for bishops and the government of dioceses; (2) for religious; (3) for the missions; (4) for Christian education; and (5) for the lay apostolate. The Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity and the Secretariats for Non-Christian Religions and for Unbelievers were confirmed.

The reform of the curial offices was begun after the Council of Trent by Pius IV and Pius V but only completed by Sixtus V. After the Second Vatican Council the reconstruction of the Roman Curia, demanded during the debate on the Decree on the Pastoral Office of Bishops and promised by the Pope, had to wait only a year and a half. In the constitution Regimini Ecclesiae universalis of 15 August 1967[48] the work hitherto performed by the Curia received high praise, egregia laude digna. The Secretariat of State obtained the competence to coordinate the work of the congregations. Even the hitherto "Suprema," the Holy Office, was subordinated to it, obtained the name of Congregatio de doctrina fidei, and was instructed to declare the prohibition of books only after hearing the author, audito auctore, and reaching an understanding with the competent ordinary, praemonito ordinario. The former Congregation of the Council received the name of Congregatio pro clericis; the Congregation De Propaganda fide, the name of Pro gentium evangelizatione seu De Propaganda fide. The divisions at first acting as sections of the Congregation of Rites for the liturgy (de cultu) and canonizations (de causis servorum Dei) soon became independent. Entirely new was the Council on the Laity, consilium de laicis. The composition of the congregations was changed by the fact that seven residential bishops were assigned to each as ordinary members.

---

[46] AAS 58 (1966), 37–40; V. Carbone, De commissione decretis Concilii Vaticani II interpretandis (Naples 1969).

[47] The Paulinusverlag at Trier has published since 1967 a Nachkonziliare Dokumentation, 58 issues to 1977; there, as no. 2, the apostolic constitution Paenitemini of 17 December 1966 on the discipline of fasting and penance, ed. by O. Semmelroth (Trier 1967).

[48] AAS 59 (1967), 885–929; ibid., 881–84, the new structure of the congregations. For the reorganization of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith by the motu proprio Integrae servandae of 7 December 1965, cf. AKR 134 (1965), 479ff.

The three tribunals—the Apostolic Signatura, the Rota, and the Sacred Penitentiary—the Apostolic Chancery, and the Apostolic Camera remained in existence, but the entire economic sphere was reorganized by the establishing of a finance ministry, Praefectura rerum oeconomicarum S. Sedis, and of a central administration of property, Administratio Patrimonii S. Sedis, beside which the Prefecture of the Apostolic Palace took its place; also new was the Office of Statistics.

Three years after this reorganization of the Curia came the motu proprio Ingravescentem aetatem, which deprived cardinals after the completing of the eightieth year of age of the right to participate in a papal election,[49] but the right to elect the Pope remained as such in the College of Cardinals.

It far exceeds the possibilities of space here to offer even only a fleeting glance at the activity of the individual curial departments.[50] New is that at their side, not subordinate to them, appeared the Synod of Bishops.[51] So far it has had three regular sessions and one extraordinary session. The theme of the first regular session of 29 September to 28 October 1967, in which 199 synodalists took part, was: principles for the revision of the code; dangerous doctrinal opinions; seminaries; mixed marriages; liturgy. The newly composed profession of faith was published. The extraordinary session of 11 to 27 October 1969 took up the collaboration between the Holy See and the episcopal conferences and of these conferences among themselves. It was significant that at the opening of the Synod of Bishops the Pope referred the episcopal conferences and the summoning of residential bishops to the congregations to the principle of collegiality.

The second regular session of 30 September to 6 November 1971 took up in thirty-seven meetings the problems of the priestly office and of justice in the world. The third session of 27 September to 26 October 1974, in which 207 synodalists participated, dealt with the "evangelization of the world of today." It probably corresponded best to the meaning of the institution in so far as during it a survey was given of the status of the Church in Africa, Latin and North America, and Asia, as well as in the Second World behind the Iron Curtain. Continuity was assured by the Permanent Secretariat under the Pole Rubin, whose competence was significantly expanded in the course of time. There is no doubt that this typical fruit of the Second Vatican Council, a new thing in church history, still needs further development.

---

[49] AAS 62 (1970), 810–13.

[50] For what follows recourse was had to the annual (since 1965) publication L'Attività della S. Sede. Pubblicazione non ufficiale. As example may be mentioned the meeting of experts, summoned by the Congregation of Seminaries and Universities in Rome from 20 to 28 November 1967, which had the duty of submitting proposals for the revision of the constitution Deus scientiarum of 24 May 1931 on the basis of the conciliar decree Optatam. By making use of the proposals then elaborated, the Congregation of Seminaries and Universities on 20 May 1968 published norms for the new form of programs of study (A. Mayer and G. Baldanza, "Il Rinnovamento degli Studi philosofici e teologici nei seminari," La Scuola Cattolica, 1966, Supplemento 2).

[51] Establishing and statute of the Synod of Bishops along with a brief introduction in no. 12 of Nachkonziliare Dokumentation (Trier 1968) mentioned in n. 47.

Pope Paul VI continued the form of apostolic proclamation by means of doctrinal writings, as cultivated by his predecessors. In the encyclical Populorum progressio of 26 March 1967 he took a stand in favor of the Third World;[52] in the Encyclical Humanae vitae of 25 July 1968 he again inculcated Christian principles for the reproduction of human life. He utilized the Holy Year 1975, proclaimed by him, to make stronger the union of the local churches with Rome and to inspire the pilgrims arriving in unexpectedly great numbers. For the more the idea was put across that the Universal Church lives in the member and local churches, the more urgent became their internal and external problems for the Church as a whole; the communio ecclesiarum is more demanding than any legal order. This structure of the Church, which can appeal to Lumen gentium, also sets new tasks for church history. The national and regional episcopal conferences have acquired a previously undreamed of importance.[53] The postconciliar synods organized by them give reason for a variety in ecclesiastical life which on occasion threatens its unity. Guarantor of this unity is the Petrine Office. It would be fatal to aim to prune it back to its functions in the ancient Church, and just as fatal to maintain certain claims raised in the high and late Middle Ages. The world Church of the twentieth century, in which all continents and races are on an equal footing, cannot be governed in a centralized way, as was the Church of the nineteenth century. However, it is just as certain that the centrifugal tendencies, becoming inexorably stronger, can be met only by a strong central power; an honorary precedence is inadequate for this, quite apart from the fact that it withdraws behind the dogma of the primacy. The modern means of news and communication give the Apostolic See the possibility of being abreast of all happenings in the world Church and, where necessary, of intervening in them to preserve the unity of the Church without reestablishing uniformity. The relaxing of centralization is demanded by the mission of the Church in our time; the Petrine Office further preserves the unity.

---

[52] AAS 59, 1 (1967), 257–99; with commentary by O.v. Nell-Breuning in no. 4 of Nachkonziliare Dokumentation (Trier 1967); ibid., as no. 14, an edition of "Humanae vitae" with a "Word of the German Bishops on the Pastoral Situation" (Trier 1968).

[53] For the Federal German Republic, G. May, "Die deutsche Bischofskonferenz nach ihrer Neuordnung," AKR 133 (1969), 405–61; ibid., 3–13.

The Council of Trent would never have been able to exert its impact if it had not been carried by a wave of holiness. The impact of the Second Vatican Council will also depend on whether the Church of the twentieth century renews itself in the spirit of Jesus Christ. "The definitive decision on the historical worth of the Second Vatican Council depends on whether people realize in themselves the drama of the testing of chaff and wheat"; "whether at the end it will be reckoned among the luminous moments of church history depends on the people who transfer it into life," says Ratzinger.

CHAPTER 5

*The Code of Canon Law and the Development of Canon Law to 1974

From the Promulgation of the Code to the Second Vatican Council

THE CODIFICATION OF CANON LAW

The codification of the canon law of the Latin Church is due to the energy and initiative of Pius X. In the motu proprio Arduum sane munus of 19 March 1904 the Pope had made known his intention of assembling in one uniform codification the valid canon law of the Latin Church, which lay scattered in many sources of the law. The task was courageously undertaken and energetically pursued under the direction of Pietro Gasparri. The bishops of the world and consultors from the most important countries took part in the work. In the secret consistory of 4 December 1916 Benedict XV announced the completion of the project. On 27 May 1917 the Pope issued the law in which the Code of Canon Law obtained ratification—the apostolic constitution Providentissima Mater Ecclesia. The Code of Canon Law was promulgated on 28 June 1917 and took effect on 19 May 1918. The intended aim—to unify the fragmented law in the great and important questions of ecclesiastical life—was accomplished. The Code of Canon Law is a codification, complete in itself, of the common law of the Church of the Latin Rite. But it refers to earlier laws which retain their validity because and in so far as it mentions them (Canon 6). The Code of Canon Law is the law book of the Church of the Latin Rite, but to a certain extent it is also valid for the congregations of the Eastern Rites (Canon 1). The codification was stamped by the principles of the greatest possible retention of the traditional and by prudent adaptation. The code thus contains no radical novelties, but only modifications suited to the age. Some archaic elements were dragged along, and certain newer developments, for example, in the sphere of the law of property and benefices, were not considered. The code accepted in the widest scope the proposals made by the fathers of the First Vatican Council and the bishops employed for consultation. It built also, in many ways, on the ideas and guidelines given by Leo XIII. Finally, some elements from the law of concordats entered the code, for example, in regard to the privileges of the clergy. The thinning, reworking, and modernizing of the vast matter of traditional norms represent an important legislative achievement. The code is the climax and conclusion of the development begun in the nineteenth century, which the Church aimed also to make through strict uniform discipline and close union with the Apostolic See into a fit tool of the Christian penetration of the earth. It is an achievement due preeminently to the work of the Catholic Church in Europe. It stands in the tradition of medieval canon law and draws upon the lines begun by Trent.

---

* Georg May

The Code of Canon Law is divided into five books; to it were attached eight older documents which, as regards content, had not been adopted into it. It is introduced by the Professio catholicae fidei. Its principles of classification are not satisfactory in every respect. For example, the law on ecclesiastical offices is dismembered and divided between two different books. The code aimed to be basically only an internal law book of the Church and hence omits from the codification the regulation of the relations of Church and state. It thereby considerably facilitated its implementation. The language of the code is succinct and clear, but it suffers from uncertainty in terminology. In regard to new elements in the content, the following examples are illustrative. The position of the bishops was strengthened. The inclination existing since the Middle Ages to curtail the power of the hierarchical courts between Pope and bishops is expressed in the insignificance of the metropolitans (Canon 274). The bishops are freely named by the Pope (Canon 329, paragraph 2), and in this matter he makes ever more use of the lists submitted by the bishops. For the first time, the office of the bishop's vicar general was regulated by the common law (Canons 366–71). Trent's law on the contracting of marriage was made binding on the whole Church, and the exceptions for Germany and Hungary were abolished (Canon 1094).

The code was accepted by Catholics in general with joy and gratitude; they showed themselves overwhelmingly convinced of the advantage of the reform. The enacting of the code actually strengthened the inner order of the Church. The states accepted the codification at least without delays. The upheavals after 1918 assisted the introduction of the code to a great degree. A considerable part of the Church-state law, which chained and limited the Church, broke apart. Numerous conditions based on concordat, privilege, or indult disappeared as a consequence of the cessation of states or favored subjects. More open regulations were often found in the building and rebuilding. The other religious congregations, apart from some German Protestants, raised hardly any objections to the code.

In an effort to assure the legal unity effected by the codification, Benedict XV on 15 September 1917, through the motu proprio Cum iuris, set up a Commission of Cardinals and gave it the task of authentically interpreting the code and incorporating in it modifications that had become necessary. It fulfilled the first part of its office, but, apart from two exceptions, it did not take up the second. At the same time the Pope decreed that the congregations of the Roman Curia should issue no new decreta without urgent cause, but should limit themselves to instructiones.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE LAW FROM 1918 TO 1958

It soon became clear that it was not to be supposed that scholarship and practice could get along essentially with the code. The law formulated in the code required implementation and completion by further norms. Codification did not halt the development of the law, but fostered it. The law of the code developed further powerfully, especially through the numerous authentic declarations of the Commission for Interpretation, but also through the legislation of the Popes, especially Pius XI and Pius XII and the Congregations of Cardinals. The last mentioned issued their norms under the title of instructiones, decreta, normae, indices, and formulae. The judgments of the Roman Rota,[1] published annually from 1912, and the decisions of the congregations in individual cases likewise contributed to the interpretation and further growth of the law, especially that of marriage. And the letters of admonition and of teaching of the Holy See were also of great significance for the implementation and growth of the law.

The law of the code, so far as this can be observed, on the whole made its way relatively successfully. However, it was not possible to convert all prescriptions of the code into actuality. The code left untouched the treaties made by the Apostolic See with countries and hence to that extent renounced any claim to enforce them (Canon 3). Likewise, acquired rights as well as privileges and indults granted by the Apostolic See remained basically valid (Canon 4). Hence law that was compatible and recognized by the Holy See constituted a limit for the expansion of the new law. In view of the extensive sphere of validity of the code, one must reckon with a still stronger separation between formal and actual validity than with other codifications. New particular law, which supplemented or modified the code, was created especially by concordats. And in the enforcing of the code the bishops displayed an abundant activity at diocesan synods through the adapting and collecting of diocesan law.

---

[1] Sacrae Romanae Rotae Decisiones seu Sententiae I (Rome 1912).

Benedict XV

The remaining years of the pontificate of Benedict XV stood under the standard of the imposing, the constructing, and the maintaining of the situation of legal unity that had been achieved. The manner of appointing to episcopal sees in the United States that had been set by the decree Ratio iuris of the Consistorial Congregation on 25 July 1916 was extended with insignificant changes to a number of other countries.[2] The Pope undertook important changes in the constitution of the missions.[3] In view of certain radical movements in Czechoslovakia and Hungary, he several times declared, most clearly in the letter of 3 January 1920 to the archbishop of Prague, that the Holy See would never grant the abolition or modification of the law of celibacy.[4]

Pius XI

Pius XI did the chief work in legislation for the enforcing of the Code of Canon Law. Nevertheless he permitted no profound changes in the code. The norms issued by him were thoroughly worked out and adjusted to practice. A special characteristic of Pius XI's legislation was the comprehensive establishing of norms for concordats, which will be discussed below.

In 1929 the Pope introduced the codification of the canon law of the Eastern Churches, establishing a Commission of Cardinals under the chairmanship of Pietro Gasparri.[5] To two other commissions, which were set up in 1930, he confided the task of collecting the sources of Eastern canon law and elaborating drafts for the codification. The second commission was changed on 17 July 1935 into the Pontificia

---

[2] Canada (AAS 11 [1919], 124–128); Scotland (AAS 13 [1921], 13–16); Brazil (AAS 13 [1921], 222–25); Mexico (AAS 13 [1921], 379–82); Poland (AAS 13 [1921], 430–32). cf. K. Mörsdorf, Das neue Besetzungsrecht der bischöflichen Stühle unter besonderer Berücksichtigung des Listenverfahrens (=Kölner Rechtswissenschaftliche Abhandlungen no. 6) (Bonn, Cologne and Berlin 1933).

[3] For example AAS 12 (1920), 331–33.

[4] Ibid. 11 (1919), 122f.; 12 (1920), 33–35, 585–88.

[5] Ibid. 21 (1929), 669.

Commissio ad redigendum "Codicem Iuris Canonici orientalis."[6] From the codification of the Eastern canon law it was expected that it would consolidate the bonds among the Eastern Rite congregations on the one hand and that of these with the Latin Church on the other and produce adaptations of law suited to the day.[7] In two decrees some canons of the code were extended also to the Eastern rite communities.[8] The motu proprio Sancta Dei Ecclesia of 25 March 1938 subjected also the Latin rite Catholics living in the Middle East to the Congregation for the Eastern Church.

The delayed arrival of three American cardinals on the occasion of the papal election of 1922 was utilized by Pius XI as an opportunity to modify in the motu proprio Cum proxime of 1 March 1922 the regulation of the conclave by Pius X on 25 December 1904. According to it the legal interval for the beginning of the conclave was lengthened from ten to fifteen days, to which, by decision of the College of Cardinals, three more days at the most might be added. The motu proprio was adopted into the appendix of documents of the code. Many decrees of the Pope affected the organization and the order of the competence and of the procedure of the departments of the Roman Curia. The congregations were strongly meshed in personnel. Through the constitution Quae divinitus of 27 March 1935 the Sacra Poenitentiaria obtained a new organization; on 29 July 1934 the Sacra Romana Rota underwent a reorganization of its constitution and its procedure. In the carrying out of Canon 328 there appeared on 15 August 1934 the constitution Ad incrementum on the prelates of the Roman Curia. For the quinquennial faculties of residential bishops, reintroduced on 17 March 1922,[9] the motu proprio Post Datam of 20 April 1923 created a uniform formula, which was issued by the Consistorial Congregation. For carrying out Canon 296 the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith on 8 December 1929 issued the important instruction Quum huic Sacrae on the relations between missionary bishops and religious superiors. In order to bring the statutes of cathedral and collegiate chapters into conformity with the law of the code, the Congregation of the Council on 25 July 1923 directed the bishops to allow the chapters an interval of six months for the adjustment of their statutes; if nothing should be done during this period, they should themselves carry out the revision. The discipline of the clergy was strictly inculcated or regulated by a considerable number of complexes of norms; in the encyclical Ad

---

[6] Ibid. 27 (1935), 306–8.

[7] Cf. A. Coussa, "De Codificatione canonica orientali," Acta Congressus Iuridici Internationalis IV (Rome 1937), 491–532.

[8] AAS 20 (1928), 195; 26 (1934), 550.

[9] Ochoa, Leges Ecclesiae I, 431–38.

catholici sacerdotii of 20 December 1935 the Pope had called the clergy's attention to the dignity and importance of its mission. The constitution Deus scientiarum Dominus of 24 May 1931, with the ordinationes of the Congregation for Studies of 12 June 1931 on Catholic universities and faculties[10] represented a sort of fundamental law of the Catholic system of higher education. It demanded an increase of ecclesiastical faculties and the raising of the scholarly requirements for promotions as well as the improvement of the teaching profession and the means of instruction. The Congregation of Seminaries and Universities was stripped of the right of promotion granted in Canon 256, par. 1. Under the name "Catholic Action," Pius XI called into being a lay movement united to the apostolate of the hierarchy. On 7 May 1923 appeared the decree of the Congregation of the Sacraments, Catholica doctrina, which in the appended bylaw exhaustively regulated the procedure in the dissolving of marriage ratum sed non consummatum. The instruction of the Congregation of the Sacraments of 27 December 1930 on the ordination scrutinia set up a detailed method for examining candidates for orders in an effort to keep out of the priesthood unsuitable or unworthy persons. The instruction of the Congregation of the Sacraments of 15 August 1936 brought, in 240 articles, detailed norms on the conducting of the annulment of marriages in the diocesan tribunals, which further developed the law of the code.

Pius XII

Pope Pius XII displayed a voluminous legislative activity in all areas. He intervened considerably more deeply into the body of the Code of Canon Law than had his predecessor. Pius XII was himself a learned canonist, who knew the history, system, and spirit of canon law. Together with his delight in responsibility and decisiveness, as well as with his gift for choosing the right collaborators, he was in a sense created to be a legislator. The legislation of Pius XII was throughout determined by the intention of coming to the aid of pastoral necessities. It was dedicated to doing justice to all realities conditioned by time and locally circumscribed. The Pope courageously faced changed conditions and took into account new insights. He carefully put his laws in the right way for legal reality. Modified norms for the Universal Church were often prepared and tested by indults for specific areas. Then they were introduced in gradual steps. The basic features of this legislation were prudent adjustment to new situations, openness to developments, foresight in changes, firmness in the fundamental, and flexibility in questions of procedure. Although the legislation of Pius XII partly involved deeply incisive changes of ecclesiastical discipline, at no time did there exist in clergy or faithful a feeling of insecurity or of helplessness. There never was even the appearance that the Pope was pushed or subject to pressure. At all stages he remained sovereignly the master of the situation.

---

[10] A. Bea, "Die päpstliche Studienreform," StdZ 121 (1931), 401–5.

In the encyclical Mystici Corporis of 29 June 1943 Pius XII treated the fundamental relation of Church and canon law. In a happy synthesis he sketched the correlation and distinction of legal structure and supernatural life in the Church. The encyclical was a landmark for the doctrine of Church membership. On 8 December 1945 he issued the constitution Vacantis Apostolicae Sedis. In content it adhered essentially to the constitution Vacante Sede Apostolica of Pius X of 25 December 1904, but added the modification that in the future for the papal election one further vote beyond the two-thirds majority was required. Above all, Pius XII became the great legislator in the field of the law of the sacraments. In the constitution Episcopalis consecrationis of 30 November 1944 he clarified the role of the two coconsecrators in episcopal ordination; in the constitution Sacramentum Ordinis of 30 November 1947, the matter and form of the ordination of deacon, priest, and bishop. By the decree Spiritus Sancti munera of 14 September 1946 parish priests obtained the authorization to administer the sacrament of confirmation,[11] in the territory of their parish, to the faithful who as a result of a serious illness are in danger of death. The encyclical Mediator Dei of 20 November 1947 is important for the law of the sacrament-sacrifice of the Eucharist and of the liturgy in general. The constitution Christus Dominus and the appended instruction of 6 January 1953 reorganized the precept of the Eucharistic fast and granted to local ordinaries the power to permit the celebration of evening Mass. The motu proprio Sacram Communionem of 19 March 1957 brought further mitigations of the Eucharistic fast and the extension of the faculty to permit evening Mass. Many legislative acts of the Pope and his assisting agencies applied to matrimony. The premarital investigations were minutely regulated in 1941, the order of precedence of the ends of marriage was clarified in 1944, artificial insemination, apart from the permissible adiuvatio naturae, was rejected in 1949 and 1956. Liturgical law was permanently developed by Pius XII. The Solemn Easter Vigil was restored in 1951, the liturgy of Holy Week was reorganized in 1955, the reform of the missal and breviary was taken up in 1955. Church music obtained guidance in the encyclical Musicae sacrae disciplina of 25 December 1955 and in the instruction De

---

[11] The decree was prepared by the indult for South America of 30 April 1929 (AAS 21 [1939], 554–57).

Musica sacrae of 3 September 1958. The constitution Provida Mater Ecclesia of 2 February 1947 is in a sense the founding charter of secular institutes. To the already existing three forms of the state of perfection a fourth was added.[12] The constitution Sponsa Christi of 21 November 1950 and the related instruction Inter praeclara of 23 November 1950 brought about an adaptation of the inclosure of nuns to the times without sacrificing anything essential of the life of virginity and contemplation. The constitution Exsul Familia of 2 August 1952 introduced an exhaustive ordering of the pastoral care of refugees, exiles, and emigrants. Under Pius XII the codification of the canon law of the Eastern Churches reached its maturity. The following parts were promulgated: on 22 January 1949 the law of marriage; on 6 January 1950 the law of trials; on 9 February 1952 the law of religious institutes and of property as well as the stipulating of specified concepts; on 2 June 1957 the constitutional law. That this law of the diversity of the communities of the Eastern rites was adequate in every respect is not claimed. But a certain simplification was necessary. Nevertheless, it is questionable to what extent the codified law has been put into practice.

From the Convocation of the Second Vatican Council

The Second Vatican Council was an event of the greatest significance for canon law. An account of it does not fall within the scope of this contribution. Let merely this be remarked: the greatest part of the declarations and directions of the council was not directly oriented to the individual law in force, but, so far as there was question at all of legally relevant texts, a sort of legislative program or stating of principles, which had in view the ecclesiastical legislators. They were called upon to undertake a modification of canon law in accord with the spirit and the letter of the conciliar texts.

JOHN XXIII

On 25 January 1959 Pope John XXIII announced a revision of the Code of Canon Law. On 28 March 1963 he instituted a Commission for the Reform of the Code. At first the chairman was Cardinal Pietro Ciriaci. In view of the short duration of the pontificate no results could be expected from the work of the commission, especially since all the personnel were monopolized by the preparation and implementation of the council. Under John XXIII the legislation of the Holy See bore thoroughly traditional characteristics. No single decree of the Pope or of the Holy See abandons the line of continuity and of cautious change.

---

[12] Further norms for secular institutes in the motu proprio Primo feliciter of 12 March 1948, decree of 25 March 1947, instruction Cum Sanctissimus of 19 March 1948.

That the genial but indecisive impulses of the Pope had intended extensive changes is at least doubtful, considering his conservative outlook. Nevertheless, this legislation has no uniform character; it lacks planning and a dominating guidance. The Synod of the Diocese of Rome, held by John XXIII from 24 to 31 January 1960, proceeded in expressly traditional paths. It seemed to wish to impose once more the traditional church discipline firmly and sharply. The law, already challenged from 1910 to 1915, of the suburbicarian sees underwent new modifications through the motu proprio Ad Suburbicarias of 10 March 1961, which abolished the cardinals' right of option to the suburbicarian sees, and especially by the motu proprio Suburbicariis sedibus of 11 April 1962. Thereafter the cardinal bishops no longer have any jurisdiction in the see whose title they bear. It is governed rather by a residential bishop. The cardinal deacons, for whom the code already required priestly ordination (Canon 232, par. 1), in the future had to be bishops, in accord with the motu proprio Cum gravissima of 15 April 1962. To this higher valuation of the College of Cardinals scarcely corresponded the increase in the number of cardinals carried out by John XXIII. In the creation of 15 December 1958 the Pope for the first time exceeded the maximum number set by Sixtus V. The motu proprio Summi Pontificis Electio of 5 September 1962 supplemented the constitution Vacantis Apostolicae Sedis and changed the law of the papal election in the sense that he is elected who obtains two-thirds of the valid votes. Only in the event that the number of cardinals present is not divisible by three is a further ballot required. The turning of the Pope to the separated Christians began to appear in law. On 17 July 1961 the graduation of non-Catholics was conceded to ecclesiastical faculties.[13]

PAUL VI

Organs

Naturally, the chief role in the implementation of the Second Vatican Council devolved upon the Holy See. In numerous apostolic constitutions, motu proprio, decrees, instructions, directories, encyclicals, norms, and proclamations an exhaustive material in norms of varied obligatory force was spread through the Church, claiming to serve the carrying out of the Second Vatican Council.[14] The centralized control lies regularly in the Congregations of Cardinals. The Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity and at first the Commission for the Implementation of the Constitution on the Liturgy also had an important share. The episcopal conferences and the Synod of Bishops exercise a powerful influence on the shaping of papal law. By the motu proprio Finis Concilio of 3 January 1966 Paul VI called into being the postconciliar commissions. The authentic interpretation of the conciliar decrees was entrusted to the Central Commission. Its place was taken in 1967 by the Pontificia Commissio decretis Concilii Vaticani II interpretandis.[15] However, this commission interprets not only documents of the council,[16] but also the decrees issued for their execution. But other congregations likewise care for the interpretation of the conciliar decrees and the norms pertaining to them for their sphere.

---

[13] AfkKR 130 (1961), 485f.

[14] The rules for implementation of the decrees Christus Dominus, Presbyterorum ordinis, Perfectae caritatis, and Ad gentes were issued in the form of a skeleton law in the motu proprio Ecclesiae Sanctae of 6 August 1966.

The legislative acts of the Holy See in turn call forth numerous rules of implementation from episcopal conferences and from bishops. In several countries diocesan synods or synods of a new sort were held for the enforcement of the council. As the first, the Catholic Church in the Netherlands organized a so-called Pastoral Church at Noordwijkerhout from 1966 to 1970.[17] The bishops of the country, priests, and laity took part in it, and non-Catholic observers played an important role. The legal nature of the meeting remained undefined. The binding force of the decrees passed by it must not have gone beyond the character of recommendations. This new type of synod aspired to show, as the first after the close of the Second Vatican Council, how to realize and concretize the decrees and initiatives of the council in a particular Church. Its chief goal, however, was probably the creating of a changed awareness among the Dutch Catholics. Voluminous texts were enacted in six sessions, and their range extended from the concepts of authority to the Jewish question. However, they are very frequently conceptually ambiguous and theologically inadequate as well as to a great extent determined by the ideology of democracy and of hostility to canon law.

---

[15] AAS 59 (1967), 1003.

[16] For example, ibid. 60 (1968), 360–63.

[17] B. Cardinal Alfrink, Kirche im Umbruch (Munich 1968); J. C. Hampe, "Das niederländische Pastoralkonzil," StdZ 181 (1968), 177–95; E. Kleine, Autorität im Kreuzfeurer (Essen 1968); idem, Welt zwischen Hunger und Heil (Munich 1968); idem, Primat des Gewissens (Munich 1969); idem, Glaube im Umbruch (Munich 1970); idem, Es geht um mehr als Zölibat (Munich 1970); idem, Ökumene auf dem Prüfstand (Munich 1971); J. Strauss, ed., Ökumenisches Modell Holland (= Forum-Reihe 13) (Göttingen and Zürich 1969); J. Lortz, Holland in Not (Luxemburg 1970); J. Kerkhofs, "Das niederländische Pastoralkonzil als Modell einer demokratischen Kirchenversammlung," Concilium 7 (1971), 212–15; M. Schmaus, L. Scheffczyk, J. Giers, eds., Exempel Holland. Theologische Analyse und Kritik des Niederländischen Pastoralkonzils (Berlin 1972).

Opposed to individual positive regulations was an abundance of misleading and erroneous assertions. At the synod the spirit of a radical reformism was predominant, and neither the common law of the Church nor the binding teaching of the Church was a barrier against it. Experiments were unscrupulously advocated, regardless of the possible consequences. Many novelties were introduced without regard to the Universal Church. Decisive statements of faith were obfuscated or disregarded. A binding profession of faith seemed not to exist for the synod's majority. The concept of God and revelation were reinterpreted. Holy Scripture was in many passages improperly interpreted. The idea of the Church was completely deformed. Heretics and unbelievers also have a place in the "Church" described by the Pastoral Council. The sacramental and hierarchical structure of the Church was denied. The primacy was leveled, the ecclesiastical teaching office eliminated, jurisdiction reduced. The Church was sociologized and humanized. Unequivocal moral norms disappeared. Pope Paul VI in his letter of 24 December 1969[18] to Cardinal Alfrink displayed anxiety over the direction taken by the pastoral council. The bishops, however, who took part in it were in general silent in regard to the absurd statements that were contrary to the faith. Nevertheless, the episcopate wanted to avoid a break with the Pope. The Dutch Pastoral Council was at the same time the expression and cause of the crisis in which the Catholic Church in the Netherlands finds itself. As far as putting the Second Vatican Council into practice it accomplished hardly anything. In Germany, following individual diocesan synods—Hildesheim, Meissen[19]—the so-called Common Synod of the bishoprics in the Federal Republic of Germany[20] and then the so-called Pastoral Synod of the [19] F. J. Wothe, Kirche in der Synode. Zwischenbilanz der Hildesheimer Diözesansynode (Hildesheim 1968); G. May, "Bermerkungen zu dem Rätesystem in der Diözese Meissen nach den Dekreten I und II der Diözesansynode des Jahres 1969," TThZ 80 (1971), 308–15.

---

[18] AAS 62 (1970), 66–69.

[20] Statute of 11 November 1969 in AfkKR 138 (1969), 554–56; decree of the Congregation for Bishops of 14 February 1970 for confirmation of the statute of the Common Synod of the Dioceses in the Federal Republic of Germany, ibid., 139 (1970), 150f.; pastoral letter of 16 February 1970, ibid. 139 (1970), 177–82; promulgation of the German Episcopal Conference of 22 September 1970 relating to the agenda of the Common Synod of the Dioceses in the Federal Republic of Germany, ibid. 139 (1970), 526–38. Since 1970 there has appeared the periodical Synode. Amtliche Mitteilungen der Gemeinsamen Synode der Bistümer in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland; cf. M. Plate, Das deutsche Konzil. Die Würzburger Synode. Bericht und Deutung (Freiburg, Basel and Vienna 1975); Gemeinsame Synode der Bistümer in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland. Beschlüsse der Vollversammlung. Offizielle Gesamtausgabe I (Freiburg, Basel and Vienna 1976).

German Democratic Republic[21] were convoked. They met in several sessions from 1971 or 1973 respectively to 1975. The first meeting of the Common Synod suffered from serious structural defects.[22] Its statutes overlooked the fact, first, that the episcopal conference possessed no general competence to legislate for all ecclesiastical matters, but only for those concerning which such competence was given it by the Apostolic See. In the area of local ecclesiastical legislation, for which the episcopal conference had no competence, the synod was instructed to have the individual residential bishops adopt the synodal material as their own. No however great majority of the members of the episcopal conference could oblige them to this. The synod was erroneously conceived. The roles within the commission were not properly distributed. The synod gave priests and lay persons a share in legislation and hence obscured the fact that legislation in the Church pertains only to the bishops by right and that priests and lay persons are restricted to advising. More satisfactory was the structure of the Pastoral Synod of the jurisdictional area of the German Democratic Republic. In it the members of the Conference of Ordinaries did not partake in the voting, according to the statute. In this way the fundamental distinction between shepherds and subjects, as well as that between legislating and advising, persisted.

The Common Synod issued numerous documents on the share of the laity in preaching, on the duties and goals of religious instruction, on the administering and receiving of the sacraments, on the importance and form of the liturgy, on the aims of youth work, on the obligation of the Church vis-à-vis foreign workers, on the Church's duties in the sphere of education, on the position of religious communities in the Church, on structures and services of pastoral care, on the protection of the personal rights of the individual within the Church, and on the coresponsibility of all the faithful for the Church's mission. In the main, they have declamatory value, but to a degree they penetrate deep into the structure of the congregations.

In Austria most bishoprics held diocesan synods. The Holy See granted the admission of lay persons under the proviso that the priests had at least an absolute majority on the commissions and in the plenary assembly.[23] All dioceses of the country met in the "Austrian Synodal Proceeding," which, despite extensive borrowing from the statute and routine of the German synod, did not constitute a synod.[24] The decrees of the meeting represented only recommendations to the episcopal conference. In Switzerland meetings of diocesan synods alternated with those of the Swiss Plenary Assembly.[25]

---

[21] Statute of spring 1972 in AfkKR 141 (1972), 538–43; order of election of 1 September 1972 in Kirchliches Amtsblatt für die Bistümer und die erzbischöflichen bzw. bischöflichen Kommissariate im Gebiet der DDR. Ausgabe des Bistums Meissen 21 (1972), 33–35.

[22] W. Aymans, "Synode 1972. Strukturprobleme eines Regionalkonzils," AfkKR 138 (1969), 363–88; idem, "Ab Apostolica Sede recognitum. Erwägungen zu der päpstlichen Bestätigung des Statutes für die 'Gemeinsame Synode der Bistümer in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland,'" ibid. 139 (1970), 405–27; idem, "Synodalstatut—Kritik einer Verteidigung," ibid. 140 (1971), 136–46.

General Character

The task of implementing the Second Vatican Council was given to Paul VI, the episcopal conferences, and the individual bishops. However, several obstacles presented themselves to the converting of the directions and efforts of the council into practicable norms. First, many statements of the council were not clear as a consequence of the "pastoral" style and hence were controverted. On the other hand, the development in the Church had already actually gone on ahead of the council in many respects. Finally, a uniform desire, such as is indispensable for a harmonious legislation, was usually absent. The Church was in a leadership crisis, which adversely affected legislation to a serious degree.[26] And so the development of the law since the Second Vatican Council is basically different from the earlier. The traditional reserve and discretion of the changes were abandoned. Incisive, even radical changes took place rapidly and without preparation, often in homely dress. The haste with which norms were produced in the postconciliar period was favorable to neither their quality nor their content. Contradictions in one and the same law, to the law of a higher legislator, or in laws rapidly succeeding one another were not rare. Mistakes and omissions made improvements necessary. Changes in the law increased so that a growing insecurity seized upon members of the Church. Legal material grew enormously and even for the expert was not always easy to master. The voluminous production of norms was, to be sure, not only an effect of the Second Vatican Council but also a symptom of critical phenomena appearing in the Church in almost all spheres and in most countries. The trend of the legislation was regularly to adaptation and relief, adaptation not so much to changed circumstances, whose form was not subject to the power of the Church, but rather to a changed mentality, for example, to the ideology of equality and the wave of democratization, and relief not from burdens which could no longer be borne, but from obligations whose fulfilling demanded moral effort and strength of self-control, for example, in regard to the Eucharistic fast or the carrying out of the obligation of attending Mass on holy days. The trust of the legislator in the strength of men's self-determination had grown, and greater responsibility was laid on the individual. Ecclesiastical standardization withdrew from some subjects; it became grandiose. Lower courts were empowered to a great extent to deal with business hitherto reserved to higher. Full authority was ever more generously imparted to bishops and pastors, and even to chaplains. In increasing measure power of jurisdiction was turned over to lay persons.[27] Legislation was not rarely determined by external motives, not those inherent in the matter, especially with the aim of letting powerful groups do their will. In an effort to relieve the pressure on the bishops, made aware of their importance at the council, Paul VI, long before the issuing of the Decree on Bishops, granted them new faculties in the motu proprio Pastorale munus of 30 November 1963.[28] The standardization of the valid dispensations from the precept of the Eucharistic fast was made known orally by the secretary general of the Second Vatican Council on 21 November 1964.[29] In not a few cases modifications of the law were regularly extorted. Proceeding from the statements of specific theologians, certain circles of clerics and lay persons introduced practices and texts desired by them and placed the bishops before faits accomplis. This procedure was practiced especially in the sphere of liturgy. The bishops, sometimes after trivial resistance, gave in, and the arbitrarily introduced methods of acting and texts were made law or permitted by the Holy See to become law. A further characteristic of this legislation was the intention of meeting the wishes or the pressure of non-Catholics. The ecumenism proclaimed by the council had turned out to be a fertile motive of many alterations of law, for example, in regard to mixed marriages, communio in sacris, and the reception of the sacraments. The connivance with Protestantism in the area of liturgy and sacramental law, whereby the innermost sphere of ecclesiastical life was affected, became serious. The claim for many postconciliar documents of compliance with the directions of the council could not be verified after exact examination, because either the programmatic declarations of the council were observed too imprecisely or the postconciliar norms did not remain within the clearly discernible will of the council.[30] Thus, for example, as regards the system of government by councils, which was set up in the German dioceses, it was demonstrated from many sides that it was in opposition to the conciliar directives.[31]

---

[23] Leben und Wirken der Kirche von Wien. Handbuch der Synode 1969–1971 (Vienna 1972); Im Dienst an den Menschen. St. Pöltner Diözesansynode 1972 (St. Pölten, n.d.); AfkKR 138 (1969), 172f.

[24] "Statut des Österreichischen Synodalen Vorgangs," ÖAfkR 24 (1973), 249–52.

[25] "Rahmenstatut für Diözesanssynoden," ÖAfKR 23 (1972), 112–15: J. Amstutz, "Zu den ecclesiogischen Grundlagen der Synode 72," Schweizerische Kirchenzeitung 12 (1971), 181f.; W. Künzle, J. Meili, J. Gähwiler, Was Kann die Synode? Ein theologischer Bericht (Olten and Freiburg i. Breisgau 1972); J. G. Fuchs, "Neuere Entwicklungen des Katholischen Kirchenrechts auf Schweizer Boden," ÖAfKR 23 (1972), 163–94; I. Fürer, "De synodis dioecesanis in Helvetia," Periodica 62 (1973), 143–48; Liebe-Sexualität-Ehe. Die Synode Zum Thema. Zusammengestellt und Kommentiert von H. Camenzind-Weber (Zurich, Einsiedeln and Cologne 1975).

[26] H. Heimerl, "Einige formale Probleme des poskonziliaren allgemeinen Rechtes," ÖAfKR 24 (1973), 139–59; G. May, "Bemerkungen zu der kirchlichen Gesetzgebung nach dem Zweiten Vatikanischen Konzil unter besonderer Berücksichtigung von Liturgie und Kirchenmusik," H. Lonnendonker, ed., In Caritate et Veritate. Festschrift für Johannes Overath (Saarbrücken 1973), 67–99; C. G. Fürst, "Die kirchliche Gesetzgebung seit 1958 oder Zur kunst der Gesetzgebung," H. Heinemann, H. Herrmann, P. Mikat, eds., Diaconia et Ius. Festgabe für Heinrich Flatten zum 65. Geburtstag, dargebracht von seinen Freuden und Schulern (Munich, Paderborn and Vienna 1973), 287–301.

---

[27] For example, motu proprio Causas matrimoniales of 28 March 1971, V, par. 1, AAS 63 (1971), 441–46, here 443.

[28] K. Mörsdorf, "Neue Vollmachten und Privilegien der Bischöfe," AfkKR 133 (1964), 82–101.

[29] AfkKR 133 (1964), 428.

The particular synods sought to introduce into the life of the Church by way of legislation in the local churches all the matters which had no prospect of being taken up at the Second Vatican Council. The following examples may be cited. Confirmation should be administered to a greater degree by nonbishops. The penitential devotion should acquire a sacramental character. Remarried divorced persons should be admitted to receive Communion. The matrimonial impediment of disparity of cult and the obligation to the canonical form in contracting marriage should be abolished. The participation of Catholics in the Protestant Lord's Supper should be made possible. Also demanded were the admission of married men to the priesthood, the reinstatement of married priests in the priestly ministry, and the investigation of the possibility of granting priestly ordination to women. In the question of contraception there even appeared in the synodal statements a deviation from the Church's binding moral teaching. In the light of these aberrations and numerous other serious flaws, the verdict on the synods in the German-speaking lands can only be that they increased the perplexity in the Church. The critical and most urgent task of confirming the faith and intensifying devotion was not even approached by them, let alone implemented. Many decrees of the synods did not promote the carrying out of the council but worked against it or disregarded it. To the extent that they aimed to implement the council, they partly skipped over the middle portion of the still existing regulations for total church implementation. In any event the synodal assemblies encroached upon the law of the revised code. In the question of lay preaching the offense against the common law was later censured by the Holy See.[32] But this was precisely the matter which, after the Holy See had given in, became the first to be put in force.[33] Presumably the intention was to present a fait accompli which the universal legislator could not disregard. The chief significance of the synods lies in the fact that they acted as opinion-forming agents, and indeed in the demolition of dogmatic, moral, and legal ties. Practice already closely followed the perspectives which appeared at the synods, regardless of contrary law. The so-called pastoral character of many documents, which claimed to be practicable norms, frequently obscured their normative value and thereby paved the way for a dangerous legal uncertainty. Many of the vota issued at the synods just mentioned were useless for the further developments of ecclesiastical law because they either were too vague or bypassed reality.

---

[30] For example, M. Pesendorfer, "Zur Ausführungsgesetzgebung der Österreichischen Bischofskonferenz zum MP 'Matrimonia mixta,' " ÖAfKR 23 (1972), 16–33; R. Potz, "Pastoralrat und Domkapitel. Überlegungen zur Stellung bischöflicher Beratungsorgane," ibid., 69–96; G. Luf, "Allgemeiner Gesetzeszweck und Iusta Causa Dispensationis (Anmerkungen zu einem aktuellen Problem)," ibid., 97–106.

[31] K. Mörsdorf, "Die andere Hierarchie. Eine kritische Untersuchung zur Einsetzung von Laienräten in den Diöcezen der Bundesrepublik Deutschland," AFkKR 138 (1969), 461–509; G. May, "Das Verhältnis von Pfarrgemeinderat und Pfarrer nach gemeinem Recht und nach Mainzer Diözesanrecht," H. Heinemann, H. Herrmann, P. Mikat, eds., Diaconia et Ius. Festgabe für Heinrich Flatten zum 65. Geburtstag (Munich, Paderborn, and Vienna 1973), 202–25; H. Socha, "Mitverantwortung gleich Mitentscheidung?" AfkKR 142 (1973), 16–70.

Of the greatest significance for the development of canon law, then, was the raising of the episcopal conferences to a real hierarchical tribunal between the individual bishop and the Apostolic See by the Second Vatican Council. Their legislative competence was constantly growing. In this way the process of centralizing and standardizing the law by the Holy See, to be observed in the nineteenth century and the first half of the twentieth, was halted and gave place to a countermovement. The particularizing of the law increased. Peculiarities of national Churches gained greater weight, in fact were to a degree consciously promoted. The inserting of ever broader circles of persons into the process of legislation showed the enactment of norms and well-nigh leveled every legislative project. The actual incompetence of most members of synods of the new type for the treating of the questions posed is notorious. The assignment of competence and the precedence of the norms were especially not often observed by the particular legislators. The synods mentioned considered themselves competent for almost all areas of church life and interfered illicitly in the sphere of the Universal Church.

---

[32] Deutsche Tagepost no. 3, of 5–6 January 1973, 1f.; Klerusblatt 53 (1973), 5–7, 288. First came the decree of the German Episcopal Conference of 18 November 1970 on the permission for lay preaching, in AfkKR 139 (1970), 578f.

[33] Decree on the sharing of the laity in preaching of 4 January 1973, Amtsblatt für das Erzbistum München und Freising no. 162, 1973, 282–92.

Individual Legislative Actions

The Second Vatican Council was under the aegis of a revalorization of the episcopal office. The lever for this undertaking was the principle of collegiality. According to it, the holders of the highest power in the Universal Church are not only the Pope but also the College of Bishops acting in agreement with the Pope. The episcopate logically claimed to share in the rule of the entire Church even outside the general councils. The Pope had regard for this desire in a twofold respect. First, he announced to the surprised fathers at the opening of the fourth session of the Second Vatican Council on 14 September 1965 the establishing of a Synod of Bishops. On the next day the motu proprio Apostolica sollicitudo[34] was published in the council aula. The Synod of Bishops is a central ecclesiastical institution, which represents the episcopate of the world. In accord with its nature, it is a permanent institution, but meets only on special invitation. The Synod of Bishops has fundamentally only an advisory function, but can, if the Pope allows, also issue decrees; its decrees are subject to papal confirmation. It should foster the union and cooperation between Pope and bishops, put information at disposal, bring about uniformity in questions of doctrine and in procedure within the Church as well as advise in regard to the subjects which from time to time are to be placed on the agenda. Convocation, approval of elected members, drawing up of the list of tractanda, and issuance of the agenda, as well as the chairmanship, belong to the Pope. Representatives of the episcopal conferences constitute the greatest part of the members. In addition, there are the Eastern patriarchs, religious, heads of the departments of the Roman Curia, and bishops, clerics, or religious nominated by the Pope for this case. Then the motu proprio Pro comperto sane of 6 August 1967 prescribed the admittance of seven residential bishops as full members into each of the congregations of the Roman Curia. They took part in their plenary sessions. Together with the motu proprio De Episcoporum muneribus,[35] issued on 15 June 1966 to implement the decree Christus Dominus on the pastoral duty of bishops, which gave bishops the faculty basically to dispense in individual cases from all general laws of the Church, as well as with the abolition of the fundamental irremovability of pastors by the motu proprio Ecclesiae Sanctae (no. 20), the aims of the bishops for the mentioned changes seemed to have been satisfied.

---

[34] AAS 57 (1966), 775–80. Also, Paul VI's Regolamento for the Synod of Bishops, 8 December 1966, in AAS 59 (1967), 91–103; announcement of the Council for the Public Affairs of the Church of 8 August 1969 on the revision of the order for the Synod of Bishops, in AAS 61 (1969), 525–39; announcement of the Council for the Public Affairs of the Church of 20 August 1971 on changes in the order for the Synod of Bishops, in AAS 63 (1971), 702–4; cf. K. Mörsdorf, "Synodus Episcoporum," AfkKR 135 (1966), 131–36.

In connection with the stressing of the collegiality of the bishops was the diminution of privileges of the College of Cardinals. The dignity of cardinal-protector of monastic congregations was abolished as early as 28 April 1964.[36] In order to take into account the special position and the sensibilities of the Eastern patriarchs, Paul VI in the motu proprio Ad Purpuratorum Patrum of 11 February 1965 decreed that at their admission into the College of Cardinals these should be assigned to the Ordo episcopalis. The motu proprio Sacro Cardinalium consilio of 26 February 1965 allowed the election of the dean and subdean of the Sacred College only from among the suburbicarian bishops. The motu proprio Ingravescentem aetatem of 21 November 1970 dealt a severe blow to the Sacred College. It decreed that cardinals who had completed their eightieth year without more ado lost their curial offices as well as the right to elect the Pope.[37]

The Pope began the reform of the Roman Curia, desired by the council, with the Holy Office. He sought to counter the attacks on this congregation, which were made to some extent even in the conciliar aula, first with the change of name and of sphere of competence, prescribed in the motu proprio Integrae servandae of 7 December 1965, as well as the reorganization of the procedure of the department, also held out in prospect in the same document. Further steps followed. On 14 June and 15 November 1966 respectively, the Index librorum prohibitorum and the prohibition of books by law as prescribed in Canon 1399 were declared abolished.[38] A little later a Commission of Theologians from the various countries was set up beside the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith.[39] On 15 August 1967 the constitution Regimini Ecclesiae Universae effected the reorganization of the Roman Curia demanded by the council. According to it, the Curia remains the representative and assisting agency of the Pope and is in no relationship of subordination to the episcopate, as some bishops desired. In the structure and activity of the Curia, however, a series of changes is found. Henceforth the Pope is no longer the prefect of some congregations; he is no longer also in them, but only above them. The position of the cardinal secretary of state was strengthened, and a better communication and coordination of the individual congregations was provided for. The Secretariat of State had to assure the close union of the offices of the Roman Curia with the Pope and among themselves. The cardinals who presided over the departments of the Curia could be summoned by the cardinal secretary of state to a common meeting. A number of offices were newly instituted or confirmed respectively, especially the Secretariat for non-Catholic Christians, non-Christian religions, and unbelievers, as well as an Office of Statistics. The Dataria was abolished. The "Council for the Public Affairs of the Church" is competent for relations between the Church and state governments. All members of the congregations are for the future appointed for only five years, and after the lapse of this period must be again appointed, which, of course, hardly works to the benefit of willingness to accept responsibility and independence of judgment. The members of the Curia are selected from the various peoples, in each case in accord with knowledge and pastoral experience. Contact with the bishops should be maintained and their views taken into consideration. A detailed regolamento regulates the routine of the Curia. But the organization of the Roman Curia created by the constitution Regimini Ecclesiae soon underwent new changes. By the constitution Sacra Rituum Congregatio of 8 May 1969 the Congregation of Rites was divided and a new Congregation for Divine Worship was established. The constitution Constans nobis studium of 11 July 1975 abolished it again and joined it with the Congregation of the Sacraments as the new "Congregation for the Sacraments and Divine Worship." The motu proprio Quo aptius of 27 February 1973 put an end to the Apostolic Chancery and transferred its duties to the Secretariat of State. The instruction of the cardinal secretary of state of 4 February 1974 on the obligation of secrecy in regard to the proceedings of the Holy See, which arose from an actual incident, made known that the critical procedures in the Church did not stop at the Roman Curia.

---

[35] Also the motu proprio Episcopalis potestatis of 2 May 1967 on the extension of faculties for the Eastern rite bishops to dispense from the general law of the Church, AAS 59 (1967), 385–90; cf. J. Lederer, "Die Neuordnung des Dispensrechtes," AfkKR 135 (1966), 415–43.

[36] AfkKR 134 (1965), 499.

[37] W. M. Plöchl, "Der alte Kardinal und das Recht," U. Mosiek and H. Zapp, eds., Ius et Salus Animarum. Festschrift für Bernhard Panzram (Sammlung Rombach n.s. 15) (Freiburg 1972), 159–70.

[38] G. May "Die Aufhebung der kirchlichen Bücherverbote," K. Siepen, J. Weitzel, P. Wirth eds., Ecclesia et Ius. Festgabe für Audomar Scheuermann zum 60. Geburtstag (Munich, Paderborn and Vienna 1968), 547–71.

---

[39] Preliminary statutes of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith of 12 July 1969 for the Theological Commission, in AAS 61 (1969), 540f.

The motu proprio Sollicitudo omnium Ecclesiarum of 24 June 1969 again defined the duties of papal envoys.[40] The law produced a stronger differentiation of the Holy See's diplomatic representations and made provision for extraordinary circumstances in nations. The duty of legates to promote the union of the bishops with the Pope was put at the head of their obligations. On 25 March 1972 the Council for the Public Affairs of the Church issued a directive for the determining and naming of candidates for the episcopal office in the Latin Church.[41]

In taking up relatively vague statements of the Second Vatican Council a comprehensive apparatus of councils on all levels of ecclesiastical activity, from the parish to the episcopal conference, was constructed, above all in the German-speaking countries. These bodies moved beside, and in the parochial sphere partly over, the ordained shepherds. No longer the cathedral chapter, but the Priests' Council is, according to a declaration of the Congregation for the clergy, the bishop's senate for the future.[42] Many decrees aimed to promote the renewal of religious institutes or sought to master the critical conditions in them.[43] Comprehensive complexes of norms were issued for the implementation of the Second Vatican Council's Constitution on the Liturgy, beginning with the motu proprio Sacram Liturgiam of 25 January 1964 through the instructions of 26 September 1964, 23 November 1965, 4 May 1967, 25 May 1967, 29 May 1969, and 5 September 1970, and numerous decrees and norms, up to the Encyclical on the Eucharistic Prayers of 27 April 1973, without there being an end to this production of norms in prospect. New texts were published for the Mass, new ordines for the administration of the sacraments. The constitution Missale Romanum of 3 April 1969 promulgated the changed Roman Mass book. From 1965 the fulfilling of the Sunday obligation of attending Mass was already granted for the preceding evening. Concelebration and Communion sub utraque became more and more widespread.[44] The instruction from the Congregation of the Sacraments, Immensae caritatis of 29 January 1973, granted the faculty of permitting lay persons to administer Communion, increased the number of cases in which Communion could be received twice on the same day, and further modified the Eucharistic fast. Under specified conditions, according to the instruction of the Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity of 1 June 1972, non-Catholic Christians can be permitted to receive Communion in the Catholic Church. The motu proprio Firma in traditione of 13 June 1974 brought a new regulation of the system of Mass stipends. The motu proprio Sacrum Diaconatus Ordinem of 18 June 1967 created the canonical basis for the reintroduction of the permanent diaconate in the Latin Church. Because it was intended to ordain married men of mature age as deacons, there resulted the first breakthrough in the law of celibacy. The minor orders and the subdiaconate were abolished by the motu proprio Ministeria quaedam of 15 August 1972. Their place was taken by the ministries of reader and acolyte, which could also be bestowed on laymen who had no intention of entering the ecclesiastical state. The motu proprio Ad pascendum of 15 August 1972 joined entry into the clerical state with the reception of the Order of Deacon. On 17 February 1966 appeared the constitution Paenitemini. The penitential discipline, especially fasting, was considerably mitigated by it. A decree of the Congregation for Divine Worship of 2 December 1973 prescribed a new ordo of penance. The constitution Sacram Unctionem Infirmorum of 30 November 1973 regulated the Sacrament of the Anointing of Sick anew. The law on mixed marriage had already been mitigated in the instruction Matrimonii sacramentum of 18 March 1966. The decree Crescens matrimoniorum of 22 February 1967 eliminated the sanction of invalidity for the nonobservance of the obligatory form in the contracting of marriage between Catholics and Eastern non-Catholics. The motu proprio Matrimonia mixta of 31 March 1970 was a new retreat before Protestant pressures and for the first time in the history of papal regulation of mixed marriages abandoned the assuring of the Catholic upbringing of the children in mixed marriages. In issuing this law, the Pope was standing, as was rightly remarked, under "progress compulsion."[45] The instruction of the Holy Office of 5 July 1963 basically allowed cremation to Catholics. The motu proprio Pastoralis migratorum cura of 15 August 1969 reorganized the pastoral care of emigrants.

---

[40] W. M. Plöchl, "Das neue päpstliche Gesandtschaftsrecht," ÖAfKR 21 (1970), 115–29.

[41] T. G. Barberena, "Neuvas normas sobre nombramientos de obispos [texto y comentario]," Revista española de Derecho Canónico 28 (1972), 657–82.

[42] H. Müller, "Der Priesterrat als Senat des Bischofs," ÖAfKR 24 (1973), 4–17.

[43] For example, apostolic admonition Evangelica testificatio of 29 June 1971; decrees of 4 June and 8 December 1970, 2 February 1972; declaration of 4 June 1970.

[44] AAS 57 (1965), 410–12; 64 (1972), 561–63.

Numerous rules of procedure were revised or issued anew. The motu proprio Sanctitas clarior of 19 March 1969 rearranged the process of beatification and canonization. In view of the more and more public celibacy crisis Paul VI reasserted the celibacy of priests in the encyclical Sacerdotalis Caelibatus of 24 June 1967.[46] The growing number of laicizations of priests induced the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith on 13 January 1971 to issue new norms for the implementing of the procedure of reducing men in major orders to the lay state.[47] In implementing the motu proprio Integrae servandae the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith on 15 January 1971 issued an order for the procedure in the examination of doctrinal opinions. The motu proprio Causas matrimoniales of 28 March 1971 provided norms for the expediting of marriage cases in the Latin Church; the motu proprio Cum matrimonialium of 8 September 1973, in the Eastern Churches. The instruction of the Congregation of the Sacraments of 7 March 1972 improved the rules of processes for establishing the nonconsummation of marriage. The decree of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith of 19 March 1975 reorganized the previous censorship of books. Henceforth only editions and translations of Holy Scripture, liturgical books and their translations, catechisms and theology texts are subject to it. Nevertheless, it was urgently recommended to diocesan clerics and members of the state of perfection to obtain the permission of their local ordinary or higher superior respectively for books which are related to religion and moral teaching.

---

[45] K. Mörsdorf, "Matrimonia mixta," AfkKR 139 (1970), 349–404.

[46] AAS 59 (1967), 657–97. Cf. also Paul VI's letters to Cardinal Secretary of State Villot of 2 February 1970 on celibacy with regard to the discussion in the Netherlands, in AAS 62 (1970), 98–103.

More and more often was the instituting of an ecclesiastical jurisdiction over acts of administration requested. The Holy See sought to take this concern into account in a twofold way. In the process of reform of the Curia the tasks of an ecclesiastical law court for administration were assigned to the Church's supreme tribunal, the Apostolic Signatura. They are cared for by the newly formed Second Section. Recourse can be had to this if the contested administrative act was issued by a department of the Roman Curia and a law was transgressed by it. The Apostolic Signatura grants no legal protection against measures of lower ecclesiastical organs. Two drafts were elaborated in 1970 and 1972 for the establishing of a court for administrative acts on the other ecclesiastical levels. While the first draft envisaged three types of legal devices against burdensome acts of administration—recourse to the hierarchical superior, recourse to the court of administration, complaint to the regular court—the second draft proceeded from the possibility of complaint before the regular court. The promulgation of a corresponding motu proprio is still to come.[48]

---

[47] AAS 63 (1971), 303–8. Also, the declaration of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith of 26 June 1972 to interpret the decree on the implementation of the procedure for reduction to the lay state, in AAS 64 (1972), 641–43; cf. F. Romita, "La perdita dello stato clericale," Monitor Ecclesiasticus 97 (1972), 128–36.

[48] Normae Speciales in Supremo Tribunali Signaturae Apostolicae ad experimentum servandae post Constitutionem Apostolicam Pauli PP. VI Regimini Ecclesiae Universae (Vatican City 1968); R. A. Strigl, "Kritische Analyse der in Jahre 1968 zur Erprobung ergangenen

On 1 October 1975 Paul VI published the apostolic constitution Romano Pontifici Eligendo, the new regulation of the papal election. On 5 December 1973 the Pope had posed the question of whether it was not fitting to expand the group of electors for the choosing of the Pope and to add to the College of Cardinals the patriarchs of the Eastern Churches and the members of the Council of the General Secretariat of the Synod of Bishops. Nevertheless, the above-mentioned constitution, for the sake of the freedom and independence of the proceedings, retained the election of the Pope by the cardinals, but including only a maximum of 120 (no. 33). Likewise, the conclave and the three forms of election procedure were retained. Difficulties in achieving the prescribed majority of two-thirds plus one, which are to be anticipated in view of the increasing pluralism in the Church, permit the cardinals, under specified presuppositions, to be satisfied with an absolute majority plus one or with a final ballot between the two candidates with the most votes (no. 76). With his acceptance of the election, the one chosen, if he has already received episcopal ordination, is immediately bishop of the Church of Rome and at the same time Pope and head of the College of Bishops with complete and supreme power over the Universal Church (no. 88).

Revision of the Code and of the Canon Law of the Eastern Church

The revision of the Code of Canon Law could be seriously taken up only after the close of the Council. On 20 November 1965 the Pontificia Commissio Codici Iuris Canonici recognoscendo began its work.[49] It worked in constant contact with the Synod of Bishops, the episcopal conferences, and the individual bishops. Since 1967 its president has been the secretary general of the Second Vatican Council, Pericle

---

Verfahrensordnung für die Apostolische Signature," Ius Populi Dei. Festschrift R. Bidagor III (Rome 1972), 79–111; G. Lobina, "Rassegna di giurisprudenza della Sectio Altera del Supremo Tribunale della Segnatura Apostolica (1968–1973)," Monitor Ecclesiasticus 98 (1973), 293–323; Communicationes 2 (1970), 191–94; 4 (1972), 35–38; 5 (1973), 235–43; 6 (1974), 32–33; P. Wirth, "Gerichtlicher Schutz gegenüber der kirchlichen Verwaltung. Modell eines kirchlichen Verwaltungsgerichts," AfkKR 140 (1971), 29–73; I. Gordon, "De iustitia administrativa ecclesiastica tum transacto tempore tum hodierno," Periodica 61 (1972), 251–378; M. Kaiser, "Einführung einer Verwaltungsgerichtsbarkeit in der katholischen Kirche?" Essener Gespräche zum Thema Staat und Kirche 7 (Munich 1972), 92–111; P. Moneta, Il controllo giurisdizionale sugli atti dell'autorità amministrativa nell'ordinamento canonico (Milan 1973); G. Lobina, Elementi di procedura amministrativa canonica (Rome 1973); J. A. Souto, "Algunas cuestiones básicas en torno a una posible ley de procedimiento administrativo," Ius Canonicum 14 (1974), 14–23; H. Schmitz, "Kirchliche Verwaltungsgerichtsbarkeit. Bericht zum Stand der gesetzgeberischen Arbeiten," TThZ 84 (1975), 174–80.

[49] Communicationes 1 (1969), 35–54.

Felici. In 1974 the commission was enlarged to fifty cardinals from twenty-five nations. Ten, later thirteen subcommissions of consultors prepare the drafts of the revised code, which are then submitted to the commission, and this in turn sends them to the bishops. Following the revision of the drafts in accord with the bishops' remarks, the individual partial codifications are presumably to be promulgated by the Pope ad experimentum. Since 1969 the periodical Communicationes has reported the aims and progress of the work. The progress of the project is slow; lacking is an energetic, uniform will. The new law book is supposed to be in keeping with the intellectual outlook of the Second Vatican Council and oriented more strongly than the code to pastoral requirements, but to retain its legal character and not be a sort of rule of faith or morals. In jurisdiction and administration the subjective rights of physical and juridicial persons are to obtain an effective protection. Sanctions are reduced to a minimum. The principle of subsidiarity is to be utilized to a greater degree. The new code should be restricted to the codification of canon law indispensible and feasible for all parts of the Church. It is the duty of the regional legislative tribunals to create norms for the respective territories. The position of the bishops is to be further strengthened. A common legal status is to be granted to all Christians, on which then are based the rights and obligations which are united with specific ecclesiastical offices and functions. The strict territorial principle of ecclesiastical organization should be modified. In the law relating to the sacraments and to penalties a better coordination of forum externum and forum internum should be undertaken. The Synod of Bishops, meeting from 30 September to 29 October 1967, expressed itself in favor of the ten principles of renewal of the canon law which Cardinal Felici submitted.[50]

The current drafts for individual books of the revised code make it obvious that the revision will be, not a new edition of the Code of Canon Law, but a new law book. The changed canon law will presumably carry to a considerable extent the marks which were presented above in their general characterization. For the canonical changes of the postconciliar period are ordinarily adopted into the revised code little or not at all modified. Tense expectations which were set for the new law must be disappointed. For example, the draft of the penal law, submitted in 1973, suffers from many, partly serious defects. The schema aims to abbreviate the penal law, to unify it, and to avoid the confusion of the external and the internal fora. Baptized non-Catholics are basically excepted from ecclesiastical penal sanctions. However, the practicability of the penal law which the schema envisages is doubtful, among other reasons because of the excessive extension of the competence of particular law and of the enormous number of mere authorizations of penalties. As in the code, the penal criminal law is again mixed with the law of disciplinary penalties. In addition to the technical, the draft also displays serious theological flaws. For example, the suggestion in Canon 16, par. 1, b, that excommunication not prevent the reception of the Sacrament of Penance destroys the ecclesiological connection of excommunication and the Sacrament of Penance and suffers from an inner contradiction that excommunication and reconciliation with the Church cannot coexist.

---

[50] "Principia quae Codicis Iuris Canonici recognitionem dirigant," Communicationes 1 (1969), 77–85 (=X. Ochoa, Leges Ecclesiae post Codicem iuris canonici editae III (Rome 1972), no. 3601, col. 5253–57; ibid., 86–100 (of 187 present, 57 placet, 130 placet iuxta modum, but in individual points always a two-thirds majority); AfkKR 136 (1967), 595f.; R. Laurentin, Le premier Synode. Histoire et bilan (Paris 1968), 74–86; R. Rouquette, Une nouvelle chrétienté. Le premier synode épiscopal (Paris 1968), 89–107; F. X. Murphy, G. MacEoin, Synode '67 Aufbruch nach dem Konzil. Eine Chronik (Paderborn 1969), 64–91.

The draft of the new ecclesiastical law of marriage, sent to the bishops in 1975, must, on the contrary, despite certain weaknesses, rather measure up to the claims which must be set for a codification of this material that is theologically and canonically unobjectionable. It leaves the structure of the matrimonial law of the code untouched and in general proceeds cautiously with the integration of the law's development since 1918. The legislative competence of the episcopal conferences and the faculties of the bishops are extended, of course, to a tolerable degree. The notion and precedence of the "ends of marriage" are, however, abandoned to the detriment of the matter. The impediments to contracting marriage are strictly limited. The will to marry is again defined, the defects in knowledge are thoroughly discussed, the idea of cunning deception is reintroduced. The ability to contract marriage is treated on a grand scale. The circle of persons bound to the canonical form is drawn considerably more narrow than before. Catholics who have separated themselves formally or publicly from the Church are no longer to be bound to the canonical form of marriage (Canon 319, par. 1).

Since the death of Pius XII and in consequence of the development then getting under way the codification of the Eastern Canon Law came to a standstill. The opposition of certain hierarchs to some tendencies of the codification, the decay of discipline in the Church, the widespread hostility to law, and the effects of the Second Vatican Council were not favorable to the continuation of the codification. Account had to be taken of the new trends coming to light. And so on 10 June 1972 Paul VI set up a new Commission for the Revision of the Eastern Canon Law—Pontificia Commissio Codici Iuris Canonici Orientalis recognoscendo—with Cardinal Joseph Parecattil, archbishop of Ernakulam, India, for the Syro-Malabar Christians, at its head.[51] It had to revise the parts of the Eastern Canon Law that were already in force as well as those not yet published. On 18 March 1974 the Pope set two goals for the commission: to bring the Eastern Canon Law into harmony with the decrees of the Second Vatican Council and to preserve fidelity to the tradition of the Eastern Churches.[52] The commission publishes Nuntia as its organ of communication.

From the Second Vatican Council the project of a constitutional law of the Church, a Lex Ecclesiae Fundamentalis, was championed by bishops and theologians. On 20 November 1965 Paul VI referred to it in an inquiry.[53] Now, from the very beginning the Church has had a constitution in the material sense, the norms of which are scattered through the various sources of law, especially the code. A constitution in the formal sense, that is, a constitutional law, would have to assemble the norms essential and characteristic for the fundamental legal organization of the Church and prescribe the degree and limits of the legislation of each particular church. Such a constitutional law, in view of the increasing particularization of canon law, is an imperative necessity to guarantee the integration of the parts into the whole, especially to facilitate the verification of particular legislation for its compatibility with the law of the Universal Church. In 1971 the frequently improved draft of a Lex Ecclesiae Fundamentalis was officially submitted by the Commission for the Revision of the Code to the bishops. Of 1,306 bishops who gave an opinion on it, 593 replied placet, 462 placet iuxta modum, and 251 non placet.[54] The draft fulfilled the demands to remain within the spirit and letter of the Second Vatican Council, to unite theology and law, and to speak in a pastoral manner. In the ninety-five canons formulations in more than three hundred passages were adopted from the texts of the Second Vatican Council. And for the first time the draft codified basic laws of Catholics. Nevertheless, it found criticism chiefly from three areas. Some approved it basically, but wanted to see it improved in content and in legal techniques. The difficulty of examining theological statements as to their legal power to bind, or respectively, to convert them into norms, explains the variety of the proposals for correction made by members of this group. Others assented, in itself, to the notion of a Lex Ecclesiae Fundamentalis, but repudiated the submitted draft as impracticable. They saw in it an obstacle for developments that were under way in the Church, especially the ecumencial strivings. A third group came out against any codification of the constitutional law of the Church. Their criticism was aimed, to a considerable degree, not only against the draft, but against the hierarchical, in fact the legal structure of the Church in general. As a matter of fact, the draft of the Lex Ecclesiae Fundamentalis stands clearly in ecclesiastical tradition and checks all promiscuity and arbitrariness. If the one Church of Christ is the Roman Catholic Church (Canon 2, par. 1), then there is no possibility of labeling non-Catholic ecclesial communities unequivocally as Churches. If the Pope possesses the supreme and immediate power over the Universal Church (Canon 34, par. 1), then it is inadmissible to lower his position to that of a secretary general. If the bishop is the sole legislator in his diocese (Canon 81, par. 2), then synodal committees of priests and laity cannot issue norms. If every believer in Christ had a right to this, that the liturgy be celebrated according to the prescriptions of his rite (Canon 15), then the foundation is removed from under liturgical experimentation and manipulation. Although the arguments of the opponents of the Lex Ecclesiae Fundamentalis are frequently at variance with one another, Paul VI showed himself to be impressed by the resistance. He had the draft withdrawn and turned over to the commission for revision.

---

[51] AfkKR 141 (1972), 238.
[52] Communicationes 6 (1974), 14–19.
[53] AAS 57 (1965), 985.
[54] AfkKR 142 (1973), 217.

The revised form of the Lex Ecclesiae Fundamentalis will presumably, in conformity with the wishes of many bishops, contain hardly any basically theological statements. The juristic character of the law should stand out more prominently, especially its binding effect in relation to the total subordinate legislation. The enumeration of the basic rights of the faithful should become more complete. The ecclesiastical organs of the Universal Church and of the particular Churches, hence also the councils, should be mentioned.

The manuscript of this chapter was ready at the end of 1974. The subsequent development could be added only to a slight extent.

CHAPTER 6

The Holy See's Policy of Concordats from 1918 to 1974[*]

Era of Concordats under Pius XI and Pius XII

TO THE BEGINNING OF THE SECOND WORLD WAR

Point of Departure, Motives, and General Character

The First World War ended with a profound convulsion of the structure of states and peoples. The peace treaties in the years from 1918 produced no secure peace among nations, because too little justice and wisdom were inherent in them. The drawing of boundaries frequently did not agree with the ethnographical realities. Minorities were further suppressed. In the interior of many countries fermentation and unrest became chronic. In most states of Europe which began as parliamentary democracies after the First World War authoritarian regimes soon came to power. The attitude toward the Church was generally in danger in the former because of instability, in the latter because of caprice. The Church was ordinarily in a difficult position and was left to the good will of the civil partner. The constitutions of almost all countries contained a guarantee of freedom of denomination and of the practice of religion. But the text of the constitution did not ordinarily indicate as a matter of course how the relations of Church and state appeared in practice. Too much depended on its interpretation and application, on the ecclesiastical personnel, and especially on the religious feeling of the people and the spiritual power of the Church in the country in question. The legal ordering of the relations of Church and state is only one facet of the reality of this relationship. It made models and standards obligatory, according to which the mutual outlook of Church and state was to be fashioned, and only to the extent that this occurred was the relation of Church and state a legal relationship. The situation of Church-state policies must not be regarded as the legal Church-state situation. The constitution ordinarily permitted different forms of the relations of Church and state within a specific framework. Thus the constitutionally legal security of religious freedom was in many countries in sharp contrast to the legal reality. In some countries it was not taken for granted even as a private legal freedom. In so far as it was a matter of states governed by law, the Church had no interest in the surrender of a moderate involvement in the state because this assured it of favorable possibilities of acting in society. The quality of a corporation of public law seemed to the Church as the relatively best suited manner of fulfilling its mission in the sphere of state law. A number of countries decided for the constitutionally legal separation of Church and state. However, the implementation of this was subject to the greatest differences. The concept "separation of Church and state" is ambiguous and hence impracticable in a country without an interpretive addition to the description of the relation in the sphere of canon law. Separation can be recommended in order to free the Church from the pressure of the state, but also in order to weaken it as the agent of religion. Separation which a state ruled by law undertakes seeks, of course, to end the relations to religious societies as far as possible but does not forbid their effectiveness; it does not even exclude the formal legal recognition of one or several Churches as well as the making of treaties with them.

---

[*] Georg May

The separation legislation of many countries, it is true, consciously or unconsciously took as model the French law of 9 December 1905,[1] which was not, of course, motivated by benevolence toward the Catholic Church. On the other hand, a system of union of Church and state can be a heavy burden for a Church, compromise it, even cripple it. Even a concordat, which in itself serves the adjustment between ecclesiastical and secular interests as well as the production or promotion of a harmonious cooperation of Church and state, must operate not without conditions in favor of the Church's life. It depends too much on the manifold organizational powers and power factors within a country whether a legal relationship between Church and state brings benefit or injury to religion. The Code of Canon Law basically does not treat the relations of Church and state and touches on them only occasionally in consequence of objective connections. Law agreeable to states, even that which contradicted the Code of Canon Law, was to be maintained (Canon 3). Relations in the religiously neutral countries, for example, in regard to marriage, were taken into account to a certain extent.

The reorganization of ecclesiastical relations was an imperative necessity in many countries after the First World War. The map of Europe had been, especially in the east and southeast, profoundly altered. From the bankruptcy of tsarist Russia and of the Dual Monarchy of Austria-Hungary had arisen a large number of new states. In other countries territorial changes and alterations of state forms took place. Inflation had serious financial restratifications as a consequence. The Apostolic See sought to control the circumstances especially through the establishing of diplomatic relations with the states and the conclusion of agreements with them. In the address in the consistory of 21 November 1921[2] Pope Benedict XV (1914–22) declared that many older concordats had lost their force and practicability because of the political changes of the last years. A concordat had to be regarded as null when the legal personality of a state was no longer identical with the partner which had concluded it with the Holy See. But, he said, the Church was ready to enter into negotiations with the governments, of course without prejudice to its dignity and liberty. In this manner the Pope indicated his readiness to conclude new concordats which would take account of altered circumstances. As a matter of fact, Benedict XV's talk released a wave of concordats and other treaties, so that it is correct to speak of an Era of Concordats between the two world wars and beyond. In concluding concordats the Holy See principally aimed to assure the freedom of religious life and of the Church in general by legally binding the state. It was also concerned that the state recognize the position of the Church and its organization. The law of the code had to be circulated and implemented. This was not possible without a tolerant attitude on the part of states. Likewise, a satisfactory arrangement of res mixtae, such as schools, religious instruction, marriage, the system of associations and institutes, as well as property could be realized only in harmony with the state. Of primary importance to the Holy See in this regard was the assuring of the religious instruction of children, especially through the guarantee of the erecting of Catholic schools. Then the ecclesiastical circumscription and organization had to be adapted to the changed political and legal circumstances. The drawing of boundaries in the peace treaties had, moreover, created numerous new problems of minorities, which included for the Church in these countries the danger of serious conflicts with the nationalistic-minded popular majorities that dominated the state. Hence, not a few concordats of the postwar period saw to the religious protection of these minorities. The Holy See regularly tried to translate the attempts and desires of governments relating to stipulations in individual points in negotiations for a concordat as comprehensive as possible. Even if the arrangement worked out was frequently not satisfactory or the content of a treaty was meagre, the mere fact that it had achieved the concluding of an agreement with a state seemed to the Holy See to be a gain. For in fact in not a few countries there was a fundamental antipathy to any making of a treaty with the Church. Under favorable circumstances there could be further building on the position reached.

---

[1] Giacometti, Quellen, 272–86.

[2] AAS 13 (1921), 521f.

On the other hand, new states endeavored to consolidate and exalt their newly won existence by means of treaties with the oldest sovereign of Europe. The esteem for the Holy See was not only not affected since the loss of the Papal State but had even increased because of the effectiveness of important Popes. Also, the Holy See wanted to help strengthen the new states with its means and hoped thereby to serve the cause of peace. The liturgical prayer for the country, for example, corroborated the union of Church and state and testified to the Church's concern for its welfare. Further, the states were interested in a visible and enduring organization of the Catholic Church in their territory, in the coinciding of the ecclesiastical circumscriptions with the national boundaries, in the appointing of loyal bishops, and in the formation of a clergy reliable in regard to the nation. The new states especially placed great value on this, that no territories or monasteries in their country should be or remain subject to foreign bishops or superiors. The Code of Canon Law, as a clearly arranged, precise source of the law of the Church, made it easy for the states to take part in the concluding of treaties with the Church. They knew to what they were obliging themselves, and the interpretation and implementation of the concordat norms were considerably facilitated.

Concordats are systems of mutual concessions by Church and state. In the majority of cases the Church is the receiving party to a greater extent than the state. Hence, after the First World War the nations whose principle of separation proceeded from an ideology hostile to the Church generally avoided the concluding of concordats. They were ordinarily made by states which conceded to the Church a position in public law.

The norms contained in the concordats are, each looked at separately, particular canon law, but, seen in context, they constitute, because of their repetition, the substratum of a common law, of the ius concordatarium on specific subjects. The law of concordats between the two world wars was relatively homogeneous; the legal forms and legal institutions utilized by it displayed an extensive agreement. This similarity was derived from two roots. First, in the negotiations the Church proceeded from canon law, which had fortunately just been codified, and so it constantly had basically the same point of departure. Then the effect of precedence was greatly developed in the concluding of concordats. Usually, previous concordats served to a greater or lesser degree as models for later ones.

In individual cases the Church aspired to assure, by means of concordats, a minimum of those guarantees and prerogatives which belonged to it by canon law. And so, treaties frequently repeated principles and assurances which were already expressed in the constitution of the country in question. The Church set critical importance on independence from the state in the filling of its offices. Numerous concordats logically stipulated the free nomination of the bishops by the Pope (Canon 329, par. 2). The government of the state concerned was ordinarily permitted the right, partly in place of an earlier right of nomination, to make known misgivings of a general political nature—the so-called political proviso—before the appointment of residential bishops and of coadjutor bishops with the right of succession. Then, the concordats of Pius XI as a rule contained regulations on appointments to canonries and parishes, schools and theological faculties, the supervision by the bishops of the religious and moral instruction of youth, and the liberties and legal rights of religious institutes. Teaching in the name of the Church was made dependent on the possession of the missio canonica.[3] A special legal protection was assured to clerics in the exercise of their office. Pastoral viewpoints induced the Holy See in some cases to agree to the prohibition of partisan political activities by clerics. The right of minorities to religious instruction in their vernacular was assured.[4] In many concordats the legal competence of ecclesiastical legal persons to acquire, possess, and administer property was recognized. In some cases concordats referred to individual canons of the code or other ecclesiastical norms explicity named. In the main, however, reference was made to the prescriptions of the code or of ecclesiastical law or ecclesiastical principles in general, for example, in the sense that questions pertaining to ecclesiastical persons or things and not expressly treated in the concordat should be regulated according to canon law. Finally, the rule was often adopted into the treaties that both parties, in the event of differences of interpretation, will effect an amicable solution in a common agreement. In this way, repudiation and break were made difficult and at the same time the door to new negotiations was kept open.

---

[3] H. Flatten, "Missio canonica," T. Filthaut, J. A. Jungmann, eds., Verkündigung und Glaube. Festgabe für Franz X. Arnold (Freiburg i. Br. 1958), 123–41.

One can say that after the First World War the concordat was found in an increasing measure to be the suitable form for ordering the relations of Church and state. The territorial episcopate was regularly consulted by the Holy See in the negotiations, and its ideas and wishes were as far as possible taken into consideration. Elected representatives of the episcopate played a direct role in the negotiations. The Holy See regularly aspired to have the ratification of completed concordats take place in the Vatican.

In retrospect it must be admitted that the concordats achieved their goal only inadequately. The circumstances and the development were not to a great extent favorable to their existence and their implementation. Most were ruined by the Second World War and its sequel. In concluding them, the Holy See in general showed itself to be well informed about the situation in the individual countries. However, occasionally it seemed to have overestimated the power of the forces prepared for cooperation. Nevertheless, the concordat policy was right and necessary. By it the Holy See went on record that in its relations with nations it did not champion the view of all or nothing but in recognizing realities was ready for compromise solutions. The concluding of a treaty as such testified before the whole world to the claim and the right of the Holy See to represent the Catholic Church uppermost and definitively. The concordats also strengthened the self-awareness of the Catholics, who saw themselves cared for and protected by the supreme head of the Church and for the first time mentioned by the government of the nation. They set up signs which could not be obliterated; they created an incontestable legal basis for the Church and in many cases prevented worse. The separation legislation of states and the concordat policy of the Holy See overcame, from different points of departure, the system of state Churches and of state supremacy over the Church and provided the Church with the autonomy for the regulating of which the Code of Canon Law stood, seen in its entirety, as one excellent instrument at its disposal.

---

[4] T. Grentrup, Religion und Muttersprache (Münster 1932), 458–524; W. Hasselblatt, "Reichskonkordat und Minderheitenschutz," Nation und Staat 6 (1932–33), 690–95.

Individual Concordats

WITH THE NEW STATES. A majority of the new nations in the east and the southeast of Europe were ready for agreements with the Apostolic See for reasons of foreign and domestic policy. Nevertheless, there were also usually obstacles to the concluding of treaties, namely laicism, exaggerated nationalism, and the negative attitude of non-Catholic religious groups, especially the Orthodox. On 30 May 1922 Pius XI concluded a concordat with predominantly non-Catholic Latvia,[5] at first for three years but with the implied prolongation from year to year on a six-months' notice. An exempt archbishopric was established at Riga. An oath of loyalty, to be made on entering office, was prescribed for the archbishop, a stipulation that was to be repeated in the following concordats.

In Poland, where the territorial boundaries were disputed until the end of 1924, the constitutional mandate to regulate the future relations of Church and state in a concordat with the Holy See could not be carried out until 10 February 1925.[6] The Polish concordat reorganized the Church in this country—five provinces of the Latin Rite with twenty-one sees, one province of the Byzantine Rite, and one archdiocese of the Armenian Rite—and especially arranged questions of the filling of offices, of religious instruction, and of Church property. In regard to Poland the Holy See showed especially generous willingness to cooperate. ARTICLE 19, Section 2, page 2 of the concordat excluded from the office of pastor all clerics whose activity jeopardized the safety of the state. Thereby an at the time unrivaled right in the nomination of pastors was conceded to the Polish government.[7]

---

[5] A. Van Hove, "Le Concordat entre le Saint-Siège et le gouvernement de Lettonie (3. novembre 1922)," NRTh 50 (1923), 132–43; Al Giannini, "Il Concordato con la Lettonia," L'Europa Orientale 5 (1925), 653–58.

[6] A. Süsterhenn, Das polnische Konkordat vom 10. Februar 1925 (Cologne 1928); F. Grübel, Die Rechtslage der römisch-katholischen Kirche in Polen nach dem Konkordat vom 10. Februar 1925 (Leipzig 1930); H. Bednorz, Le Concordat de Pologne de 1925. Nomination aux Sièges Épiscopaux et aux Paroisses. Commentaire avec comparaison aux autres Concordats d'apres-guerre (Paris 1938); R. Sobański, "Das erste polnische Plenarkonzil—seine Bedeutung für den Integrationsprozess der Bevölkerung Polens zwischen den beiden Weltkriegen," ÖAfKR 26 (1975), 143–58.

On 10 May 1927 a concordat with Rumania was concluded,[8] which was not ratified until 1929 because of the opposition of Orthodox circles. The Catholic Church in the nation was to be organized in one province each for the Greek and the Latin Rites, with four suffragan sees each, as well as a spiritual head for the Armenians. As in Poland, here too the state laid special importance on the national reliability of the pastors (ART. XII, par. 2). The two contracting parties reserved to themselves, by way of exception, the right to repudiate the concordat after a preliminary notification of six months (ART. XXIII, Section 2). On 27 September 1927 Lithuania made a treaty with the Holy See.[9] It gave the Church extensive rights in the school system, entrusted to ecclesiastics the direction of the register of births, deaths, and burials, and gave civil effects to the canonical form of marriage. The pastoral care of the faithful in their vernacular was assured. But there was constant friction over the interpretation of the concordat.

The government of Czechoslovakia usually showed itself to be unfriendly toward the Catholic Church and pursued a policy of petty annoyances against it. The Hus Celebration of 1925 almost led to the breaking off of diplomatic relations. On 2 February 1928 a meagre modus vivendi was arrived at.[10] It was concerned with the circumscription of dioceses and the naming of bishops. The agreement eliminated a group of points of difference and envisaged negotiations for the future. The carrying out of the regulations of the modus vivendi encountered considerable difficulties. Not until seven years after after its signing did the government fulfill the chief condition whereby the Holy See had made the defining of dioceses (ART. 1) dependent on the restoration of the church property in Slovakia. Nothing further could be achieved before the collapse of the state in 1938–39.

---

[7] Cf. R. Jacuzio, "Il diritto di opposizione riservato al governo nella nomina dei parrocci," Il Diritto concordatario 2 (1937), 56–58.

[8] I. Mateiu, Valoarea Concordatului incheiat cu Vaticanul (Sibiu 1929); L. Honoré, "Une Église servante de l'État. L'Église orthodoxe roumaine," NRTh 56 (1929), 56–66; N.N., "De concordato inter Sanctam Sedem et Rumaniam," Appollinaris 3 (1930), 581–600.

[9] L. Maser, Das Konkordat zwischen dem Apostolischen Stuhle und der Republik Litauen vom 27. September 1927 in rechtsvergleichender Betrachtung (Lippstadt 1931); A. Ottaviani, "Concordatum Lithuanicum" Apollinaris 1 (1928), 53–64, 140–49.

[10] I. Pasquazi, "Modus vivendi inter Sanctam Sedem et Rempublicam Cechoslovachiae," Apollinaris 1 (1928), 149–55; N.N., "Der 'Modus vivendi' in der Tschechoslowakei," Ecclesiastica 13 (1933), 353–56; F. Kop, Modus vivendi. Nýnější stav jeho provedeni (Prague 1937); E. Hoyer, "Das Schicksal des tschechoslowakischen Modus vivendi," M. Grabmann, K. Hofmann, eds., Festschrift Eduard Eichmann zum 70. Geburtstag (Paderborn 1940), 373–400; D. Faltin, "La crisi della Chiesa in Ceco-Slovacchia e il Modus vivendi del 1927. L'opera del Card. Pietro Ciriaci," Divinitas 9 (1965), 600–605.

On the other hand, the concordat of 5 June 1933 with Austria[11] involved a comprehensive regulation. ARTICLE 30, Section 3 of the federal constitution raised specific articles of the concordat to constituent parts of the constitution and thereby gave them a constitutional character. It partly corresponded to the concordat concluded soon after with the Third Reich. The concordat promised the erecting of the bisphopric of Innsbruck-Feldkirch and of the prelacy nullius of Burgenland (ART. III, Par. 2) and endeavored, through prudent fostering and the promise of financial support for free Catholic schools, to create the presuppositions for the development of public Catholic schools (ART. III, Pars. 3–4). However, the government lacked the majority and the power to implement the stipulations agreed to. Above all, the subordination of marriages contracted in Church to the canon law (ART. VII) evoked the united bitter resistance of liberalism, Marxism, and National Socialism.

Tedious negotiations led in 1935 to the concluding of a comprehensive concordat with Yugoslavia.[12] But the resistance of the Orthodox Serbs[13] was so strong that it caused the fall of the government after the chamber had accepted it, because it agreed not to bring it before the Senate. In it were the important stipulations that, when the concordat became effective, contrary norms of the Kingdom of Yugoslavia should become null (ART. XXXV) and that subjects not treated in the concordat should be handled in accord with the pertinent canon law (ART. XXXVII, Sec. 1).

WITH THE "SEPARATION COUNTRIES" OF EUROPE. The ideology of separation was usually a preserve of the political left. As a consequence of it there ordinarily occurred in the "separation countries" of Europe an agreement with the Holy See only if governments of a different political orientation came to power in them. In regard to France, from the beginning of the pontificate of Benedict XV the Holy See pursued a policy of yielding and of concession, which in a certain respect prevailed over the separation regime. The Law of Separation had also proved to be impracticable. From the end of the First World War the élan of laicism diminished. From the resumption of diplomatic relations in 1920 the Holy See inquired of the French government before the appointing of a bishop whether there were any political objections to the candidate.[14] In the corresponding declarations of the French Council of State of 13 December 1923 and Pius XI's encyclical Maximam gravissimamque of 18 January 1924 on diocesan associations[15] could be seen a tacit agreement on the thorny problem of the administration of church property. The Council of State declared on 3 February 1925 that the French government and the Holy See were in agreement on maintaining the concordat of 1801 in Alsace and Lorraine.[16] In 1926 were concluded two accords with France,[17] insignificant in content but important for the atmosphere. In them were determined the liturgical privileges which belonged to the representatives of France in the countries where France still occupied the religious protectorate or in which this had been recently abolished.

---

[11] A. Van Hove, "Le concordat entre le Saint-Siége et l'Autriche," NRTh 61 (1934), 785–803, 897–913; R. Köstler, "Das neue österreichische Konkordat," Zeitschrift für öffentliches Recht 15 (1935), 1–33; idem, Das österreichische Konkordats-Eherecht (Vienna 1937); G. Stutzinger, Das österreichische Konkordat vom 5. Juni 1933 (Cologne 1936); J. Hollnsteiner, Das österreichische Konkordat in seiner kirchen-und staatsrechtlichen Bedeutung unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der eherechtlichen Bestimmungen, 2d ed. (Leipzig and Vienna 1937); E. K. Winter, Christentum und Zivilisation (Vienna 1956), 370–402.

[12] J. Massarette, "Um das Konkordat in Jugoslawien," ThprQS 90 (1937), 733–35; A. Giannini, "Un concordato mancato (Il Concordato Jugoslavo del 1935)," L'Europa Orientale 22 (1942), 245–69.

[13] Serbia had concluded a concordat with the Holy See on 24 June 1914, but because of the war it was not implemented.

In Portugal, which had again established diplomatic relations with the Apostolic See in 1918, there began under the dictatorship of Carmona a rapprochement of Church and state. The decree of 18 July 1926 annulled some of the most odious provisions of the Law of Separation of 1911. The constitution of 19 March 1933 was strongly influenced by Catholic ideology. In one and the same article it proclaimed the Catholic religion as the religion of the state, the principle of religious liberty, the principle of separation, and the maintaining of diplomatic relations with the Holy See (ART. 46). Thus no serious obstacle prevented the concluding of treaties with the Holy See. The accord of [14] Cf. the aide-mémoire of Cardinal Secretary of State Gasparri of May 1921 in Revue des Sciences religieuses 4 (1924), 248f.

---

[15] Giacometti, Quellen, 383–86.

[16] A. Erler, "Das Napoleonische Konkordat im Elsass und in Lothringen," AfkKR 122 (1947), 236–78; R. Metz, "Un cas intéressant d'application du droit concordataire: La nomination d'un coadjuteur avec droit de succession à l'évêché de Strasbourg," L'Année Canonique 6 (1959), 179–86; idem, "Les incidences concordataires de la démission de l'Évêque de Strasbourg," Revue de droit canonique 17 (1967), 273–97; idem, "Les nominations épiscopales en France et plus spécialement dans les diocèses concordataires de Strasbourg et de Metz," ibid. 18 (1968), 97–121.

[17] C. Crispolti, "Gli accordi franco-vaticani sugli onori liturgici in Oriente," Rassegna Italiana 19 (1927), 226–30.

15 April 1928[18] reorganized the hierarchy in Portuguese India and solved the question of the patronate that as of 11 April 1929 regulated the situation in the diocese of Meliapôr.

Ever since its unification, Italy had more and more became a nation with a hostile separation of Church and state: state schools without religious instruction, abolition of theological faculties at the state universities, compulsory civil marriage. However, after the end of the First World War a slow rapprochement between the nation and the Holy See made progress. In January 1919 a Catholic party was formed with the toleration of the Holy See; in this way the principle of the "Non expedit" was canceled. In the encyclical Pacem Dei munus on 23 May 1920 Benedict XV abandoned the prohibition, applying to Catholic heads of states, of making an official visit to the Quirinal. The Fascist regime recommended itself to the Church through many laws and measures that were friendly to the Church in relation to school and marriage, clergy, and ecclesiastical property. Thus was the way opened for a comprehensive clearing out of the matter of conflict between Church and state. In 1929 occurred the solution of the Roman Question in the Lateran Treaties. On 11 February 1929 three agreements were signed: the political treaty, the financial settlement (as Appendix IV of the political treaty), and the concordat.[19] On 27 May [18] A. Correja de Silva, "Concordatum Lusitanicum," Apollinaris 1 (1928), 280–95; E. Hocedez, "Convention entre le S. Siège et la République du Portugal," NRTh 55 (1928), 519–25.

---

[19] L. Laghi, G. Andreucci, Il trattato lateranense. Commentato (Florence 1929); N.N., "De Concordato inter S. Sedem et Italiam," Apollinaris 2 (1929), 458–94; H. Ferrand, "La question Romaine et les Accords de Latran," Revue Apologétique, 48 (1929), 569–91; A. Hagen, Die Rechtsstellung des Heiligen Stuhles nach den Lateranverträgen (Stuttgart 1930); K. Strupp, "Die Regelung der römischen Frage durch die Lateranverträge vom 1. Februar 1929," Zeitschrift für Völkerrecht 15 (1930), 531–622; Z. Giacometti, "Zur Lösung der römischen Frage," Zeitschrift für die gesamte Staatswissenschaft 90 (1931), 8–50; A. Giannini, Il cammino della Conciliazione (Milan 1946); W. von Bergen, Der Einfluss der Lateranverträge auf die staatliche Gesetzgebung Italians mit besonderer Berücksichtigung des Eherechts (Düsseldorf 1954); A. C. Jemolo, Chiesa e Stato in Italia dal Risorgimento ad oggi (Turin 1955); G. Migliori, Codice concordatario, 3d ed. (Milan 1959); F. Pacelli, Diario della Conciliazione con verbali e appendice documenti (Vatican City 1959); U. Del Giudice, I Patti Lateranensi (Rome 1960); F. M. Marchesi, Il concordato italiano dell' 11 febbraio 1929 (Naples 1960); A. Martini, Studi sulla Questione Romana e la Conciliazione (Rome 1963); R. Motsch, Die Konkordatsehe in Italien (Frankfurt and Berlin 1965); W. Gamber, "Die Konkordatsehe in Italien," K. Siepen, J. Weitzel, P. Wirth, eds., Ecclesia et Ius. Festgabe für Audomar Scheuermann zum 60. Geburtstag dargebracht von seinen Freunden und Schülern (Munich, Paderborn and Vienna 1968), 393–404; P. Ciprotti, Atti della Commissione mista dei delegati della Santa Sede e del Governo Italiano per predisporre l'esecuzione del Concordato (11 aprile–25 novembre 1929) e altri documenti connessi (Milan 1968); G. Salvemini, Stato e Chiesa in Italia (Milan 1969).

1929 they were transformed into internal state law. In the political treaty the Italian state recognized the Catholic religion as the "sole religion of the state" (ART. 1). Likewise, the sovereignty of the Holy See was confirmed (ART. 2) and a territory of its own, Vatican City, was guaranteed (ART. 3). The neutrality of Vatican City was established (ART. 24). The person of the Pope is sacred and inviolable (ART. 8). The Holy See's active and passive diplomatic right was acknowledged (ART. 12). The Holy see declared the Roman Question definitively and irrevocably settled and recognized the Kingdom of Italy with Rome as capital (ART. 26). In the financial settlement the payment of compensation for the losses which had befallen the Pope through the events of 1870 was agreed to. The concordat complemented the treaty and brought a detailed regulation of affairs touching Church and state (45 articles). The state guaranteed to the Catholic Church its special position in Italy and the rights pertaining to this. To the Church was assured the free exercise of spiritual power, of public worship, and of jurisdiction in ecclesiastical affairs. The sacred character of Rome was acknowledged and protected (ART. 1, Sec. 1). The freedom of the filling of episcopal sees and of other offices was restored (ARTS. 19, 24, 25). No cleric could acquire or retain a post or an office in the Italian state or in a public institution or corporation dependent on it without the approval of the local ordinary. Apostate priests or those under censure must under no circumstances be employed in education or in an office or post in which they came directly into contact with the public (ART. 5). The civil effects were recognized in the sacrament of matrimony, which was regulated by the canon law. Cases of invalid marriages and the dispensation from nonconsummated marriages continued to be reserved to ecclesiastical courts and officials. Only the procedure in the separation from bed and board was conducted by the civil courts (ART. 34). Instruction in the Catholic religion was designated as the "basis and crown" of public instruction and was now envisaged also for the universities (ART. 36). The state promised a change in its legislation in order to bring it into harmony with the Lateran Treaties (ART. 29). For its part, the Church made considerable concessions. A revision of the boundaries of dioceses and their decrease in number were envisaged (ARTS. 16 and 17). In connection with the appointment of bishops the government had the right to adduce political memories (ART. 19). In the naming of pastors its right to express reservations was allowed. Especially far-reaching appeared the power likewise conceded to it, in relation to the emergence of reasons which made it seem harmful for a pastor to continue in his position, to inform the local ordinary, who had to take appropriate measures in accord with the government within three months (ART. 21). Partisan political activity was forbidden to all ecclesiastics (ART. 43 Sec. 7). The Holy See obliged itself to a condonation in regard to all possessors of church property (ART. 28). Noteworthy is the concession that the state, in the case of unfit administration of property, may proceed, in agreement with the ecclesiastical authority, to the sequestration of the temporalities of the benefice (ART. 26, Sec. 2).

The Lateran Treaties ended the decades-long opposition of the Church to a united Italy and were for both parties an honorable peace treaty. They satisfied the national will of the people and assured the Church's possibility of effectiveness. The treaties produced a solution which, as is said in the preamble of the treaty, corresponded to the justice and dignity of both sides. They were in general balanced, took account of the Catholic tradition of the people without violating the rights of the state or of other religious communities, and fulfilled the political claims without treading too near the freedom of the Church. The Holy See sought not a restoration but a new start. In it it saw the guarantee of permanence. It accommodated itself in the renunciation of the Papal State, which was overdue, and set resolutely about carrying out its universal mission from the area of a diminutive state. This was the only remaining possibility of assuring, at least in normal circumstances, the independence required for the fulfilling of its task. Of course, in the sequel there were some collisions between Church and state, which usually had their cause in the interference and usurpation of the Fascist regime. Nevertheless, Mussolini did not permit a prolonged conflict to occur, but strove constantly for an adjustment acceptable to both sides.

WITH THE LATIN AMERICAN STATES. The economic and social grievances as well as the unstable political conditions in most countries made Latin America for a considerable time the object of special concern of the Holy See. The ordinarily traditionally Catholic people often could not assert themselves against the Freemasonic oligarchies that were hostile to the Church. Thus is explained the surprising fact that relatively rarely did the conclusion of satisfactory agreements of the Holy See with Latin American nations succeed, which would either have established a system of concordats or have continued the concordats made in the past century.[20] Only Colombia was an exception: with it, between 1918 and 1928, several treaties, the most important being the mission accord of 5 May 1928, were concluded. Only the agreement of 1928 put an end to the uninterrupted Kulturkampf in Guatemala. Likewise in 1928 there came about an agreement with Peru over the naming of the bishops.[21] With Ecuador, following the decrees of the 1920s, hostile to the Church, a modus vivendi was achieved on 24 July 1937.[22] The government guaranteed freedom of instruction. State and Church joined to evangelize the Indians and to encourage them in every respect. Any political activity was forbidden to the clergy. (See also Chapter 24.)

---

[20] F. B. Pike, The Conflict between Church and State in Latin America (New York 1964); J. L. Mecham, Church and State in Latin America. A History of Politico-Ecclesiastical Relations, rev. ed. (Chapel Hill 1966); C. H. Hillekamps, "Staat und Kirche in Südamerika," Hochland 58 (1966), 409–19.

GERMANY. The German Reich had to pay for the First World War with serious territorial losses. Through the Treaty of Versailles the Catholic Church in Germany lost the bishoprics of Strasbourg and Metz, the greatest part of Gnesen-Posen and Kulm, and a considerable part of Breslau. In the Free City of Danzig, separated from Germany, an Apostolic Administration was created in 1922, an exempt see in 1925. The German Reich changed from constitutional monarchy to parliamentary democracy. On 11 August 1919 the constitution decided upon by the National Assembly at Weimar went into force. In contrast to the situation in the German Empire of 1871 it established the competence of the state as a whole for the regulation of the relations of Church and state and of Church and school (ART. 10, nos. 1 and 2). The basic legislation of the Reich on Church and school assured to the Church for all of Germany a specific degree of freedom and potential efficacy. The ecclesio-political system of the Weimar Republic was that of an organizational separation with mutual cooperation of Church and state. The foundation of the position of religious society in the Weimar constitution was religious freedom (ARTS. 135, 136, 137, 140, 141). ARTICLE 137, Secs. 1 and 7, contains the idea of separation; ART. 138, Sec. 1, is in accord with it. ARTICLE 137, Sec. 1, declares that no "state Church" exists. Thereby the Protestant territorial church system was once and for all abolished, but at the same time the fundamental secularism, neutrality, and equality of the state were expressed. The Weimar Republic looked at the principle of separation as an institutional guarantee for the protection of the state from the power of the Church and of the Church from interference by the state and saw in it the means of restoring a liberal arrangement of the compromise. Nevertheless, the Churches continued to be corporations of public law, and this status could be bestowed on other religious congregations (ART. 137, Sec. 5). In this way the importance of Churches and religious groups for the life of the people was recognized and the ability was granted them to be bearers of public competencies and rights. The granting of the right of self-determination to religious societies (ART. 137, Sec. 3) protected the liberty of the whole of ecclesiastical activity in the world, to the extent that it was regarded by the Church as necessary for "its affairs." ARTICLE 137, Sec. 3, assured to religious groups a sphere of freedom within which they could establish an independent legal power, for example, ecclesiastical power, and by means of them an independent legal order. With the system of the relations of state and Church created by the Weimar constitution the state's sovereignty over the Churches was no longer compatible, but of course it was still practiced by the government and administration of some states. The public denominational school, which was regarded by the German Catholics as a vital question, was basically guaranteed (ART. 146). Religious instruction continued in all public schools, except the nondenominational, to be a regular subject (ART. 149).

---

[21] F. B. Pike, "Church and State in Peru and Chile since 1840: A study in contrasts," American Historical Review, 73 (1967), 30–50.

[22] J. I. Larrea, La Iglesia y el Estado en el Ecuador (Seville 1954).

The ecclesiastical articles of the Weimar Constitution were the best that could be obtained in view of the political power situation. However, during the entire epoch of the Weimar Republic the reciprocal alienation of Church and state could not be overcome. Still, in 1920 an embassy of the German Reich was established at the Holy See in place of the previous Prussian legation. The German Catholics set great hopes on it. The legal binding force of the concordats and conventions with the Holy See surviving from the nineteenth century had become uncertain. The territorial alterations following the peace treaty necessitated an adaptation of diocesan boundaries. For these reasons, in order to exhaust the possibilities supplied by the Weimar Constitution and convert them into concrete assurances, in regard to which the concern for the Catholic denominational school was predominant, the Church endeavored to conclude a concordat with the Reich. The Weimar Republic was also basically interested in this. The Reich sought from the Holy See moral and political support against the front of the victorious powers. From time to time in 1921 the Reich government promised itself from a concordat a stabilizing influence on the German boundaries, threatened by desires for annexation in the east and desires for separation in the west. But the party constellation in the Reichstag did not go beyond drafts of a concordat. The liberal and Protestant forces, like the elements in the Social Democratic Party that were hostile to the Church, refused the conclusion of a treaty. In particular, the hurdle of the Reich School Law, that was first to be enacted, could not be overcome.

However, in view of this situation, the Holy See did not give up. Instead, it utilized the tension between the Reich and the states, produced by the federalist construction of the state, to pursue a multitrack concordat policy. The extensive independence of the states in cultural policy even gave to concordats with the states a precedence over a concordat with the Reich. From the standpoint of the Church as well as of the state Bavaria was especially suited to be the pacemaker for such agreements. The Holy See wanted to come to an accommodation with Bavaria first, because here it could most easily expect a relatively favorable concordat, which should then serve as model for the other German states. The Free State of Bavaria saw in the conclusion of a concordat a means of stressing emphatically its threatened political independence. On 24 March 1924 the concordat with Bavaria, advantageous to the Church, was concluded.[23] However, particularly because of the state's concessions in the school question it had a chilling effect on public opinion.

A concordat with Prussia of 14 June 1929[24] was, as far as concerns the meagre content, a casualty because in it there was no agreement on school, marriage, and religious institutes. Indicative of the atmosphere heated up by the Protestant side is the fact that in the negotiations and the wording of the text the term "concordatum" was purposely avoided. Nevertheless, the Prussian concordat was of importance as a political event.

---

[23] C. Mirbt, "Das bayerische Konkordat vom 29. März 1924," Neue Kirchliche Zeitschrift 36 (1925), 371–411; F. X. Kiefl, Kritische Randglossen zum Bayerischen Konkordat unter dem Gesichtspunkt der modernen Kulturideale und der Trennung von Staat und Kirche (Regensburg 1926); I. A. Brein, "Der publizistische Kampf um das bayerische Konkordat vom 29. März 1924 und die Verträge mit den evangelischen Kirchen," HJ 46 (1927), 547–54; A. Greiger, Bekenntnisschule und Religionsunterricht nach dem Bayerischen Konkordat (Coburg 1928); H. Zenglein, Religionsunterricht und Religionslehrer nach dem Bayerischen Konkordat 1924 (Hassfurt am Main 1928); C. Schwarzmeier, "Das Bayerische Konkordat vom 29.3 1924 und der CIC" (Diss. Würzburg 1929); H. Rust, Die Rechtsnatur von Konkordaten und Kirchenverträgen unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der bayerischen Verträge vom 1924 (Munich 1964).

[24] O. Zschucke, "Der Vertrag zwischen dem Freistaate Preussen und dem Heiligen Stuhle," Deutsche Juristen-Zeitung 34 (1929), 1097–1100; J. V. Bredt, "Das preussische Konkordat," Preussiche Jahrbücher 217 (1929), 137–50; J. Danziger, Beiträge zum preussischen Konkordat vom Jahre 1929 (Breslau 1930); R. Leiber, "Das Preussische Konkordat," StdZ 118 (1930), 17–31; A. Perugini, "Inter Sanctam Sedem et Borussiae Rempublicam sollemnis Conventio seu Concordatum," Apollinaris 5 (1932), 38–53; E. Wende, C. H. Becker, Mensch und und Politiker (Stuttgart 1959), 268–92; R. Morsey, "Zur Geschichte des Preussischen Konkordats und der Errichtung des Bistums Berlin," Wichmann-Jahrbuch für Kirchengeschichte im Bistum Berlin 19/20 (1965–66), 64–89; D. Golombek, Die politische Vorgeschichte des Preussenkonkordats (1929) (=Veröffentlichungen der Kommission für Zeitgeschichte bei der Katholischen Akademie in Bayern, series B, vol. 4) (Mainz 1970).

In 1932 two treaties were made with the Free State of Anhalt,[25] and a concordat was concluded with Baden on 12 October 1932.[26] Although in Baden everything except a maximum program for the Church could be negotiated, the concordat obtained only a perceptibly weak parliamentary majority.

The other German states did not make concordats with the Holy See. In them the relations of state and Church were regulated according to legal decisions, for example, in Württemberg by the comprehensive law of 3 March 1924.

The three state concordats sought especially to create a new order in their territories, which were affected by the alteration of boundaries, of the form of government and of the constitution, as well as by the codification of canon law. They guaranteed the claims of the Church going back to older legal titles—endowment of sees, establishing of new sees and parishes—and the interests of the state in specific presuppositions for ecclesiastical officeholders—state citizenship, triennium—as well as the appointment to episcopal sees and cathedral chapters. Except for Bavaria, the cathedral chapters' right to elect the bishops was maintained in the German states, but was limited to a proposal of three names by the Holy See. The cooperation of the Church in the appointing of professors on Catholic theological faculties of the state universities and of posts for the teaching of religion was minutely regulated. Only the Bavarian concordat contained greater concessions to the Church in the guarantee of denominational public schools and teacher training (ARTS. 5 and 6) as well as in the awarding of the right to religious orders, eventually as publicly recognized, to maintain private schools (ART. 9). Contrary to the wishes of the Church, no settlement of the school question was included in the concordats with Baden and Prussia, but just the same in an appendix or, respectively, an exchange of letters pertaining to the work of the treaty, the observance and implementation of the stipulations of the constitution of the Reich relevant to the school and religious instruction were promised. In Prussia, in addition to that of Cologne, the provinces of Paderborn and Breslau (Wroclaw) were created, and the sees of Aachen and Berlin and the prelacy nullius of Schneidemühl were newly established. The concordats with Bavaria, Prussia, and Baden followed, as regards content, similarly shaped treaties with the Protestant Churches. Concordats and ecclesiastical treaties assured the public status of the Churches by contract, thereby set them off from the group of other religious congregations of public law, and laid the foundation for a relationship of coordination of Church and state. Thus there appeared in Germany a new type of relation of Church and state, that of the "autonomous separate Church guaranteed by treaty or concordat," to quote Ulrich Stutz.

---

[25] N. Hilling, "Die beiden Vereinbarungen zwischen dem Heiligen Stuhl und dem Freistaat Anhalt vom 4. Januar 1932," AfkKR 115 (1935), 457–63.

[26] A. Van Hove, "Le Concordat entre le Saint-Siège et l'État libre de Baden," NRTh 60 (1933), 769–82; E. Föhr. Das Konkordat zwischen dem Heiligen Stuhle und dem Freistaate Baden vom 12. Oktober 1932 (Freiburg i. Br. 1933); E. Will, das Konkordat zwischen dem Heiligen Stuhl und dem Freistaat Baden vom 12. Oktober 1932 (Freiburg i. Br. 1953); E. Föhr, Geschichte des Badischen Konkordats (Freiburg i. Br. 1958); G. May, "Mit Katholiken zu besetzende Professuren für Philosophie und Geschichte an der Universität Freiburg nach dem Badischen Konkordat vom 12. Oktober 1932," U. Mosiek, H. Zapp, eds., Ius et Salus Animarum. Festschrift für Bernhard Panzram (Freiburg 1972), 341–70.

A new phase of ecclesiastical policies began when on 30 January 1933 Adolf Hitler became chancellor of the Reich. In his government's statement of 23 March 1933 he labeled the two denominations as "most weighty factors for the preservation of our nationhood" and bound himself to respect the treaties concluded with them and not to attack their rights. Most especially he promised that he intended to "allow and assure" to the Christian denominations "the influence pertaining to them" in school and education. Hitler at once made known his intention of reaching an agreement with the Catholic Church. With recourse to the preliminary work since 1920 and 1921, the concordat with the Reich was signed in Vatican City on 20 July 1933.[27] On 10

---

[27] A. Roth, Das Reichskonkordat vom 20.7.1933 (Munich 1933); A. Van Hove, "Le Concordat entre le Saint-Siège et le Reich allemand," NRTh 61 (1934), 158–85; R. Oeschey, "Das Reichskonkordat vom 20. Juli 1933." Bayerische Gemeinde- und Verwaltungszeitung 44 (1934), 526–32; R. Buttman, "Das Konkordat des Deutschen Reichs mit der römisch-katholischen Kirche vom 20. Juli 1933," H. Frank, ed., Nationalsozialistisches Handbuch für Recht und Gesetzgebung, 2d ed. (Munich 1935), 407–24; J. Schmitt, "Ablösung der Staatsleistungen an die Kirchen unter Berücksichtigung der Weimarer Verfassung, des Reichskonkordats und der drei Länderkonkordate," AfkKR 115 (1935), 3–52, 341–88; G. Ohlemüller, Reichskonkordat zwischen Deutschland und dem Vatikan vom 20. Juli 1933. Urkunden und geschichtliche Bemerkungen, 2d ed. (Berlin, 1937); K Krüger, Kommentar zum Reichskonkordat (Berlin 1938); H. G. Germann, Fünf Jahre Reichskonkordat mit der römischen Kirche (Berlin, n.d.); W. Weber, "Das Nihil obstat," Zeitschrift für die gesamte Staatswissenchaft 99 (1939), 193–244; W. Hausmann, "Reichskonkordat und Weimarer Verfassung," Nationalsozialistische Monatshefte 10 (1939), 145–49; M. Maccarrone, Il nazionalsocialismo e la Santa Sede (Rome 1947); G. Schreiber, "Deutsche Kirchenpolitik nach dem ersten Weltkrieg," HJ 70 (1951), 296–333; F. von Papen, Der Wahrheit eine Gasse (Munich 1952), 313–18; E. H. Fischer, "Die politische Klausel des Reichkonkordates und ihre

September 1933 the documents of ratification were exchanged. By the law of 12 September 1933 the Reich's minister of the interior was empowered to issue legal and administrative regulations required for the implementation of the concordat. They were never issued.

The concordat with the Reich let those with Bavaria, Prussia, and Baden continue and complemented them, but in addition it applied also to those German states in which there was previously no agreement (Art. 2). And so certain assurances were given by the Reich to those Catholics who were in a hopeless minority position. The assurances of the Weimar Constitution for the freedom of denomination and worship, as for the autonomy of the Churches, were now established by treaty (Art. 1). The exercise of the spiritual functions of priests was placed under special protection (Arts. 5 and 6). Pastoral care in public institutions was assured (Art. 28). Catholic societies were protected in a defined framework (Art. 31). The German episcopate was named in Art. 31, Sec. 3, as a partner of a definitive agreement with the government of the Reich. In this manner was taken a route heavy with consequences for the future. Nevertheless, the opportunity was neglected of making the principles of interpretation agreed to between the German bishops and the government concerning this article an integral item of the treaty in an incontrovertible manner. The decisive concessions of the state lie in Arts. 21 to 25, in which the Church's demands in regard to religious instruction and denominational and private schools were essentially met.[28] Religious instruction was to be a rechtliche Tragweite," ThQ 134 (1954), 352–76; W. Groppe, Das Reichskonkordat vom 20. Juli 1933. Eine Studie zur staats- und völkerrechtlichen Bedeutung dieses Vertrages für die Bundesrepublik Deutschland (Cologne 1956); H. J. Becker, Zur Rechtsproblematik des Reichskonkordats, 2d ed. (Munich 1956); E. Deuerlein, Das Reichskonkordat (Düsseldorf 1956); F. Schuller, "Das grundsätzliche Verhältnis von Staat und Kirche nach dem Reichskonkordat vom 20.7.1933," AfkKR 128 (1957–58), 13–79, 346–404; R. Morsey, "Zur Vorgeschichte des Reichskonkordats aus den Jahren 1920 und 1921," ZSavRG, Kan. Abt. 44 (1958), 237–67; idem, ed., "L. Kaas, F. von Papen, Briefe zum Reichskonkordat," StdZ 167 (1960–61), 11–30; A. Kupper, ed., Staatliche Akten über die Reichskonkordatsverhandlungen (=Veröffentlichungen der Kommission für Zeitgeschichte bei der Katholischen Akademie in Bayern, series A, vol. 2) (Mainz 1969); L. Volk, ed., Kirchliche Akten über die Reichskonkordatsverhandlungen 1933 (=Veröffentlichungen der Kommission für Zeitgeschichte bei der Katholischen Akadamie in Bayern, series A, vol. 11) (Mainz 1969); idem, Das Reichskonkordat vom 20. Juli 1933. Von den Ansätzen in der Weimarer Republik bis zur Ratifizierung am 10. September 1933 (=Veröffentlichungen der Kommission für Zeitgeschichte bei der Katholischen Akademie in Bayern, series B, vol. 5) (Mainz 1972).

---

[28] E. Dackweiler, "Reichskonkordat und katholische Schule," Juristische Wochenschrift 62 (1933), 2487–90; Meyer-Lülmann, "Reichskonkordat und Schule," Der Gemeindetag 27 (1933), 446–48; Schulte, "Die Schulartikel des Reichskonkordats," Reichs- regular subject of instruction in the public schools, including the professional schools (ART. 21). The maintenance and establishment of Catholic denominational schools was assured under certain conditions (ART. 23). Equality of rights was promised to the private schools of the orders (ART. 25). The Holy See for its part held out the prospect, "on the ground of the special circumstances existing in Germany" and in view of the guarantees contained in the concordat with the Reich, of issuing decrees which forbade clerics and religious from participating in party politics (ART. 32). The "Depoliticization Article" was the conditio sine qua non of the government for the conclusion of the concordat. Hitler's goal was the depoliticization of the clergy in order thereby to destroy political Catholicism. It coincided with the intention of the Holy See to keep pastors out of political party involvement for pastoral reasons. Matters of ecclesiastical competence which were not dealt with in the treaty were regulated "for the ecclesiastical sphere" in accord with the prevailing canon law (ART. 33, Sec.1). In regard to the law of marriage, the German government was not ready to make any concession (ART. 26).

On the whole, with the concordat with the Reich there came into being a moderate and durable system of accommodation and cooperation between Church and state. In its essential prescriptions it was modeled on the democratic state constitution of the Weimar Republic. Only a few regulations resulted from the development toward the totalitarian one-party system, in which the German Reich found itself (ARTS. 16, 31, 32). The Holy See strove to bring the concordat with the Reich as close as possible to the most recent ecclesiastical treaties—with Italy and Austria—and thereby to achieve a type of concordat that was uniform in its fundamental lines. The drawback of the German concordat lay in the fact that it was perhaps not honestly meant by the leading statesman and in any event was not taken seriously. The treaty, just like the state concordats, was from the beginning and to an increasing degree circumvented, reinterpreted, violated, and broken.[29] verwaltungsblatt und Preussisches Verwaltungsblatt 54 (1933), 821–24; J. Schröteler, "Das katholische Schulideal und die Bestimmungen des Reichskonkordats," StdZ 126 (1934), 145–54; F. Pitzer, Die Bekenntnisschule des Reichskonkordats. Eine rechtsgeschichtliche Studie und zugleich ein Beitrag zum Schulrecht (Cologne and Berlin 1967).

---

[29] E. Rosa, "'Condizione concordataria' o persecuzione in Germania?" CivCatt 89 (1938), IV, 305–18; W. Weber, "Das Reichskonkordat in der deutschen Rechtsentwicklung" Zeitschrift der Akademie für Deutsches Recht 5 (1938), 532–36; R. Jestaedt, "Das Reichskonkordat vom 20. Juli 1933 in der nationalsozialistischen Staats- und Verwaltungspraxis unter besonderer Berücksichtigung des Artikels 1," AfkKR 124 (1949–50), 335–430; W. Corsten, ed., Kölner Aktenstücke zur Lage der katholischen Kirche in Deutschland 1933–1945 (Cologne 1949); W. Conrad, Der Kampf um die

The rights which were guaranteed to the Church by constitution and concordat were extensively undermined; in this matter the procedure was rather by way of decree and administrative practice than by means of legislation. The freedom of the Church's activity was severely impaired. The aim was a state corresponding to the National Socialist ideology. If at this time matters did not go so far as an annulment of the concordat, at times pushed by the minister for the churches, Hanns Kerrl, and to a full separation of Church and state, still the reasons were suited for the regime effectively to be able to effect a supervision of the Church under the existing system, and it meant to take still more certain domestic and foreign policy motives into consideration.

Things moved forward with similar, partly far worse measures of persecution in the occupied and annexed territories. In the part of Poland occupied by Germany, the so-called Government General, there occurred a furious persecution of the Church, which decimated the clergy. The Polish concordat, the Austrian concordat, the modus vivendi with Czechoslovakia, and the Napoleonic concordat in Alsace-Lorraine were considered abolished. In regard to Austria, the government of the Reich adopted the view that the Austrian concordat had been ended by the annexation of Austria to the German Reich, because the country had perished as an independent state and had lost its position as a subject of international law. In Austria there now prevailed "a situation without concordat."[30] In the Wartheland District the Church was treated as a private association. An extension of the concordat with the Reich to the newly acquired territories was rejected.

The Holy See tried to influence the Nazi regime by the diplomatic route, but, when the exchange of notes remained without effect, turned to publicity. In the encyclical Mit brennender Sorge of 4 March 1937 Pius

---

Kanzeln (Berlin 1957); A Kupper, "Zur Geschichte des Reichskonkordats," StdZ 163 (1958–59), 278–302, 354–75; D. Albrecht, ed. Der Notenwechsel zwischen dem Heiligen Stuhl und der Deutschen Reichsregierung, 2 vols. (=Veröffentlichungen der Kommission für Zeitgeschichte bei der Katholischen Akademie in Bayern, series A, vols. 1 and 10) (Mainz 1965–69); B. Schneider with P. Blet and A. Martini, eds., Die Briefe Pius' XII. an die deutschen Bischöfe 1939–1944 (=Veröffentlichungen . . . der Katholischen Akademie in Bayern, series A, vol. 4) (Mainz 1966); B. Stasiewski, ed., Akten deutscher Bischöfe über die Lage der Kirche 1933–1945 I: 1933–1934 (=Veröffentlichungen . . der Katholischen Akademie in Bayern, series A, vol. 5) (Mainz 1968); F. Pauly, "Zur Kirchenpolitik des Gauleiters J. Bürckel im Saargebiet (März–August 1935)," Rheinische Vierteljahrsblätter 35 (1971), 414–53.

[30] K. Scholder, "Österreichisches Konkordat und nationalsozialistische Kirchenpolitik 1938/39," ZevKR 20 (1975), 230–43.

XI stigmatized the interference and usurpations by the state.[31] Despite the just described hostile measures, the concordats were not entirely useless. Their existence acted, in some respects, as a restraint on the pressures, preserved for the Church one or another position for the proclamation of the Gospel, even though curtailed, and even exercised a certain influence in the concentration camps. The binding of the state to the concordats made, on the one hand, its measures of oppression visible even on the plane of international law and induced it to certain considerations, and on the other hand offered the Holy See the basis for interventions. The fact that the Holy See had, by the concluding of the concordat, recognized the Nazi government as a treaty partner could no longer be annulled. By concluding the concordat the government of the Reich had acknowledged the competence of the Holy See over the Catholic Church in Germany as legitimate in an agreement of international law. Every violation of the concordat injured the credibility of the Nazi regime.

During the Second World War

The approaching Second World War naturally interrupted the conclusion of concordats with the warring nations. Only with countries which lay on the lee side of world politics or could keep themselves aloof from the power struggle were a few treaties made.

In Salazar's Portugal the Church was cautiously encouraged. On 7 May 1940 the country concluded with the Holy See a significant concordat and a mission treaty,[32] which Salazar termed a "concordat of the separation of state and Church." The concordat extended the existing system of the demarcation and collaboration of Church and state in free agreement and mutual respect. The legal personality of the Catholic Church was recognized, the maintenance of diplomatic relations was agreed (Article I). A series of guarantees assured the activity and the property of the Church (Arts. II–VII). Clerics enjoyed special protection and certain immunities (Arts. XI–XV). Religious instruction was an obligatory subject in the country's public schools, and their entire teaching had to be oriented to the principles of the Christian faith (ART. XXI). Private schools could be erected by the Church (ART. XX). The law of marriage was governed by the principle of optional civil marriage (ARTS. XXII–XXV). The state supported the missions in the overseas territories (ARTS. XXVII–XXVIII). The mission treaty envisaged the admittance of foreign missionaries to Portuguese colonies (ART. 2). Mission societies were supported by the government (ARTS. 9–14). The free operation of the missions was assured (ART. 15). With these two agreements, peace and cooperation between Church and state in Portugal and its overseas possessions seemed assured for a long time. The effects of the Second World War could not be foreseen at the time of their signing. The conclusion of the concordat of 1940 led to the revision of the present ART. 45 of the constitution on 11 June 1951.

---

[31] S. Hirt, ed., Mit brennender Sorge. Das päpstliche Rundschreiben gegen den Nationalsozialismus und seine Folgen in Deutschland (Freiburg i. Br. 1946); R. Leiber, "'Mit brennender Sorge'. März 1937 bis März 1962," StdZ 169 (1961–62), 417–26.

[32] A. Perugini, "De novis Conventionibus Lusitanis," Apollinaris 13 (1940), 205–17; P. Aguirre, "Ecclesia et Status in Lusitania secundum recens concordatum" Periodica 29 (1940), 289–302; A. Giannini, "Il concordato Portoghese," Rivista di Studi Politici Internazionali 10 (1943), 3–28; L. Scheucher, "Die Glaubens- und Gewissensfreiheit in Portugal," ÖAfKR 7 (1956), 211–31; B. J. Wenzel, Portugal und der Heilige Stuhl (Lisbon 1958); T. Kreppel, Die Trennung von Staat und Kirche in Portugal. Das Konkordat zwischen Portugal und dem Heiligen Stuhl als Beispiel einer neuen Ordnung von Kirche und Staat (Frankfurt 1962); L. Renard, Salazar. Kirche und Staat in Portugal (Essen 1968).

In the 1930s the Church experienced difficult times in Spain. The republican constitution of 9 December 1931 adopted a hostile attitude toward religion and Church. In the following years there erupted a full-scale war against the church. In 1933 the Spanish government declared it regarded the concordat of 1851 as ended. Parts of the army rose against maladministration and terror, and for several years a bitter civil war raged. Chief of State Franco sought to restore the Catholic character of the nation.[33] Laws and measures hostile to the Church were annulled. On 7 June 1941 the Spanish government concluded with the Holy See an agreement on the exercise of the privilege of nomination in the appointment to episcopal sees.[34] According to it, the apostolic nuncio, after an understanding with the government, draws up a list of six qualified persons and transmits it to the Holy See. This submits to the government a proposal of three names, with regard for the list but without being restricted to it. From this the chief of state names a candidate, so far as he raises no objections of a general political nature. A concordat was envisaged.

A treaty going into the greatest detail on questions of church property came into existence with Haiti on 25 January 1940. The Holy See concluded an agreement with Colombia on 22 April 1942.[35] The greatest part consisted of the regulation of questions of marriage law

---

[33] J. Soto de Gangoiti, Relaciones de la Iglesia Católica y el Estado Español (Madrid 1940); idem, La Santa Sede y la Iglesia Católica en España (Madrid 1942).

[34] R. S. de Lamadrid, "El convenio entre el Gobierno espãnol y la Santa Sede," Boletín de la Universidad de Granada 13 (1941), 371–85; A. Giannini, "La convenzione tra la S. Sede e la Spagna per la provvista delle diocesi," Il Diritto Ecclesiastico 53 (1942), 137–45.

[35] J. A. Eguren, Derecho concordatario colombiano (Bogotá 1960).

(ARTS. 4–10), which were largely in accord with canon law. The civil registrar of marriages was present at the church wedding, without his presence being an indispensable condition for the recognition of the civil effects. The government's right of proposal in the naming of the bishops was replaced by the right to express reservations "of a political nature" (ART. 1). Thereby the traditional patronate was done away with.

IN THE POSTWAR PERIOD

The effects of the Second World War were much more comprehensive and profound than those of the First World War. The map of Europe was again considerably altered. In Asia and Africa the colonial epoch ended. Within many states there proceeded considerable changes, which also concerned religious law. The close union between Church and state was dissolved or at least loosened in many countries. The number of countries with a system of union of Church and state progressively declined. This was especially the case with nations having a predominantly Christian population. The order established by concordat in Eastern Europe completely broke up. The Church's concordat policy entered a new phase.[36]

Fate of Concordats in Socialist Countries

For religion and the Church the most fateful effect of the Second World War was the advance of the Soviet Union dominated by the Bolshevik Party, the strongest military power of Eurasia, as far as the Elbe, and the establishing of a Communist regime in China, the most populous nation on earth. For Communism religion is a scientifically untenable prejudice. The ecclesiastical policy of the socialist states is in accord with this notion. It has the chief goal of hastening the death of religion, viewed as inevitable, by restricting or neutralizing the Church's possibilities for influence. In the final analysis the socialist regimes aimed to exclude the Church little by little as guardian of religious faith but also as guarantor of civil liberty. The state bureaucracy moved openly or secretly into the service of the antireligious and antiecclesiastical strivings of the Communist Party. It made use of two means: tempting offers on the one hand, obstacles, prohibitions, force, and terror on the other. A falling off of the supression or persecution always sprang only from tactical viewpoints and was caused by pressure from without or unrest within. The difference between constitutional law and constitutional reality is nowhere greater than in socialist lands. It is not the constitution that is inviolable but the historical process of development. The constitution describes only the state of development of the revolution achieved at the time of its adoption. Basic rights in our sense are impossible systems in Soviet ideology.

---

[36] J. Salomon, "La politique concordataire des États depius la fin de la deuxième guerre mondiale," Revue Générale de Droit International Public 59 (1955), 570–623.

There were differences in the manner and rapidity of the advance among the individual socialist countries. In general it is to be noted that the area of freedom left to the Church is the greater, the nearer the states in question are to the free West. Relatively the greatest degree of freedom of movement is possessed—or assumed—by the Catholic Church in Poland[37] and is permitted to the Orthodox Church in Rumania[38] and Bulgaria.[39] Hopeless, on the other hand, is the situation in Czechoslovakia.[40] The "Marxist Josephinism" of this country allows the Church only a narrow living space and trivial freedom of organization. Not much more favorable is the situation in Hungary.[41] The model for the socialist countries even in ecclesiastical policy is basically the Soviet Union. Since 1918 the hostile separation of the Church from the state and of the school from the Church has existed there.[42] The Church's sphere of activity is limited to worship. Correspondingly, the constitutions of the so-called People's Democracies of Rumania, Bulgaria, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Albania, and Yugoslavia carried out the separation of Church and state. It happened regularly in conscious opposition to the still considerably popular ecclesiastical situation of religion in these nations. The principle of freedom of religion and conscience, proclaimed with the separation of Church and state, nowhere benefited the Catholic Church. It was often more severely persecuted than all other religious communities. The Church lost its status in public law and as far as possible was completely excluded from public life. Everywhere there was an effort to restrict it to undertaking cult functions and to prevent every other influence on people, especially on youth. At the same time the Church was to a very great degree subjected to control. In all Socialist states there are offices for ecclesiastical affairs, which to an enormous extent interfere in the filling of ecclesiastical offices, supervise the formation of the clergy, and determine the number and capacity of the places of this formation. Where several religious groups face one another, the government tries to play them off against one another, but in every case the chief opponent is seen in the Catholic Church. In the individual Church it strives to provoke various groups against one another, in this way to introduce schism into the Church, and thus to maintain its influence over it the more effectively.

---

[37] K. Weber, Der moderne Staat und die katholische Kirche. Laizistische Tendenzen im staatlichen Leben der Dritten Französischen Republik, des Dritten Reiches und der Volksrepublik Polen (Essen 1967).

[38] G. Rosu, M. Vasiliu, G. Crisan, "Church and State in Romania," V. Gsovski ed., Church and State behind the Iron Curtain (New York 1955), 253–99; F. Popan, Č. Draskovic, Orthodoxie in Rumänien und Jugoslawien (Vienna 1960); G. Podskalsky, "Kirche und Staat in Rumänien," StdZ 185 (1970), 198–207.

[39] G. Podskalsky, "Kirche und Staat in Bulgarien," StdZ 189 (1972), 112–24.

[40] F. Cavalli, Governo Comunista e chiesa cattolica in Cecoslovacchia (Rome 1950); L. Němec, Episcopal and Vatican Reactions to the Persecution of the Catholic Church in Czechoslovakia (Washington 1953); idem, Church and State in Czechoslovakia (New York 1955); V. Chalupa, Situation of the Catholic Church in Czechoslovakia (Chicago 1960); E. Schmied, "Die rechtliche Stellung der Kirche in der Tschechoslowakei," Jahrbuch für Ostrecht 1 (1960), 129–36; K. Rabl, "Die tschechoslowakische Verfassungsurkunde vom. 11. Juli 1960 in Theorie und Praxis," Jahrbuch des öffentlichen Rechts, n.s. 12 (1963), 353–416.

[41] A. Bedö, H. Kálnoky, L. LeNard, G. Torzsay-Biber, "Church and State in Hungary," V. Gsovski, ed., Church and State behind the Iron Curtain (New York 1955), 69–157; L. Mezöfy, "Staat und Kirche in Ungarn," Jahrbuch für Ostrecht 3 (1962), 249–71; A. Emmerich, J. Morel, Bilanz des ungarischen Katholizismus (Munich 1969).

[42] E. Jacobi, "Staat und Kirche in der Sowjetunion," Wissenschaftliche Zeitschrift der Karl-Marx-Universität Leipzig. Gesellschafts- und sprachwissenschaftliche Reihe 4 (1954–55), 325–344; W. de Vries, Kirche und Staat in der Sowjetunion (Munich 1959); J. Chrysostomus, "Kirche und Staat in Sowjetrussland. Das Schicksal des Moskauer Patriarchates von 1917–1960." Jahrbücher für Geschichte Osteuropas, n.s. 11 (1963), 13–16; G. Schweigl, Il nuovo Statuto della Chiesa russa e l'art. 124 della Costituzione sovietica (Rome 1965); G. Zananiri, Le Saint Siège et Moscou (Paris 1967); D. Konstantinow, Die Kirche in der Sowjetunion nach dem Krieg, Entfaltung und Rückschläge (Munich and Salzburg 1973).

The union of the bishops with the Holy See was either thwarted or subject to control, diplomatic relations were severed, and concordats were repudiated, that with Lithuania on 1 July 1940, with Poland on 12 September 1945, with Rumania on 17 July 1948. Without any official repudiation, Czechoslovakia disregarded the modus vivendi and in 1950 broke off diplomatic relations with the Holy See, as did Yugoslavia in 1952. So long as religion was not yet extirpated, Communism tried to make use of its adherents, especially of its clergy and its institutions for its own ends. For the sake of this advantage it was even ready to aid the Churches to a certain extent. Although the socialist states almost everywhere have the means of power to carry through almost any desired measure against the Church, they were anxious for the assent, even if extorted, of the Church to their regulations. The Communists know that the most secure route to a gaining of the Catholics of a country is through Rome. Furthermore, they anticipate from the concluding of a concordat that they can win the sympathy of some Catholic circles outside the country. In case they have no success in reaching an agreement with the Holy See, they turn to the bishops. If these refuse, they approach the priests. Thus are explained not only the repeated attempts to come to an understanding with the Holy See, but also the series of agreements with the episcopate in the 1950s. The governments of Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia sent out feelers in the direction of a concordat in 1949 and 1952 respectively. The Holy See rejected them in the case of Czechoslovakia because it regarded any agreement as hopeless, considering the situation, but it showed itself accommodating toward Yugoslavia. However, the contacts did not lead to the signing of a treaty, because Yugoslavia was not prepared to acquiesce in the Church's minimum demands. The Polish government was unwilling to apply to the Holy See. It expected the attainment of its goals from negotiations with the nation's episcopate. On 14 April 1950 and 8 December 1956 it made an agreement with the Polish bishops.[43] These treaties were not concordats but administrative agreements on the plane of domestic public law. Their content differed greatly from that of the concordats which were concluded before the appearance of socialism. In them the state endeavored to put the Church at the service of its political and economic aims. The bishop manifested a broad accommodation in order to promote the desired relaxation of tensions. But the government did not adhere to even trivial promises. Especially in the school system all concessions promised or made were again revoked. The agreements reached in Hungary, Rumania, and Czechoslovakia were considerably more unfavorable to the Church than the Polish. In Hungary the episcopate made great concessions in the agreement of 30 August 1950. It bound itself to support the policies of the government, which promised to supply subsidies to the Church for a period of eighteen years. The signing of the agreement could not prevent the further disorganization of ecclesiastical life. In Rumania an assembly of progressive clerics signed the agreement of 15 March 1951 submitted by the government. In Czechoslovakia a part of the clergy accepted the law of 14 October 1949, which unilaterally regulated the situation of the Church.

Concordats with Free Countries

The situation of the Holy See with regard to the free nations was, in general, not unfavorable after the Second World War. In the postwar period the Holy See entered into diplomatic relations with a considerable number of states, especially in Africa and Asia. On the other hand, it did not succeed in inaugurating with them an era of concordats like that after the First World War. In many countries material reconstruction following the devastation of the war occupied the foreground. In the new states of Africa and Asia Catholics were ordinarily too weak to be able to effect the conclusion of an agreement with the Holy See, apart from the inner chaos and necessities of existence of many of these areas. The raw nationalism and the sensitive self-esteem of the young African states opposed the solving of occurring questions between Church and state by means of agreements and insisted on their unilateral regulation by law. Most states exercised strict control over the external affairs of the Church. The state reserved to itself the ultimate competence for decision in mixed matters. The majority of these countries have hitherto not developed their own legal system regulating Church-state relations. The relations of the religious groups to the state were still based extensively on improvisation. The instability and uncertainty of the political situation recommended to both parties, Church and state, that they avoid the conclusion of treaties, whose binding force confronted the often abrupt changes and hence could evoke tensions and conflicts. It was enough to assume diplomatic relations whereby occurring questions could be solved quickly and without complication. In other countries the traditional reasons that did not permit a concordat with the Holy See persisted. Thus, for example, the Brazilian constitutional documents of 18 September 1946 (ARTICLE 31, no. 3) and of 24 January 1967 (ART. 9, no. 2), like that of 16 July 1934 (ART. 17, no. 3), contained the stipulation that no agreement with a church or worship group could be concluded. Certain trends in France for again achieving the state of a concordat with the Holy See were unable to materialize to the extent of concrete political treatment. Still, where concordats were concluded, they displayed a stronger individualism than those earlier entered into.

---

[43] L. Pérez Mier, "El acuerdo entre el episcopado polaco y el gobierno de Varsovia," Revista Española de Derecho Canónico 6 (1951), 185–255; Ost-Probleme 9 (1957), 237; K. Hartmann, "Über die Verständigung zwischen Kirche und Staat in Polen," Aussenpolitik 8 (1957), 571–82.

The Catholic nations of southern Europe—Italy, Spain, and Portugal—had, after bitter struggles, restored the traditional close union between Church and state. In Italy the Lateran Treaties held good after the war's end. They survived the overthrow of Fascism and of the Kingdom and were confirmed by ARTICLE 7 of the republican constitution of 27 December 1947.[44] They thereby obtained a direct constitutional guarantee. The Holy See entered into an accord with Portugal on 18 July 1950 in regard to the filling of episcopal sees in Portuguese India.[45] In it the government renounced the privilege of presentation belonging to the president and freed the Holy See from the obligation of appointing bishops of Portuguese nationality for specified sees. Here was introduced a development which was continued by the Second Vatican Council.

---

[44] S. Lener, "I patti lateranensi e la nuova Italia," CivCatt 101 (1950), II, 609–21; idem, "I precedenti legislativi e storici dell' articolo 7 della costituzione," ibid. III, 248–60; G. B. Arista, La Costituzione Italiana, 3d ed. (Rome 1963), 61ff., 348ff.

[45] J. Damizia, "Annotationes ad conventionem inter S. Sedem et Rempublicam Lusitaniam," Apollinaris 23 (1950), 261–63; J. M. Lourenço, "Portugal e a Santa Sé," Revista Española de Derecho Canónico 6 (1951), 171–83; A. da Silva Rego, Le patronage portugais de l'Orient (Lisbon 1957); B. J. Wenzel, Portugal und der Heilige Stuhl. Das portugiesische Konkordats- und Missionsrecht. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der Missions- und Völkerrechtswissenschaft (Lisbon 1958).

The development in Spain tended toward a climax in the matter of concordats. The constitutional law of 17 July 1945 placed the profession and practice of the Catholic religion as the religion of the state under official protection (ARTICLE 6, Section 1). The private practice of worship was permitted to non-Catholic religious groups (ART. 6, Sec. 2). With this arrangement Spain returned to unity of nation and religion, which was in accord with its tradition. In Spain the Catholic religion is a part of the culture. The activity of the Protestant religious groups was logically usually opposed to both. And so the government regarded itself as justified in hindering any agitation by them. Thereby the road was staked out for the contemplated concordat. The accord of 16 July 1946 regulated the filling of nonconsistorial benefices.[46] According to it, half the dignitaries of the chapters, after nomination by the chief of state, were filled from a list of three names presented by the appropriate bishop. Before the appointing of pastors the government had the right to raise objections of a general political nature. On 5 August 1950 a convention on the pastoral care of the military was signed.[47] But these and other smaller treaties were only the introduction to the great concordat of 27 August 1953.[48] It was the climax of Pius XII's concordat policy. According to the concordat, the Catholic religion remained "the sole religion of the Spanish nation," with all the rights pertaining to it in keeping with divine and canon law (ARTICLE I). The prescriptions of the agreement of 7 June 1941 continued in force for the naming of residential and coadjutor bishops (ART. VII). The immune legal status of the clergy was recognized with certain modifications (ART. XVI). The state obliged itself to important financial donations to the Church (ART. XIX). Marriage contracted in accord with the prescriptions of canon law had full validity in the civil sphere (ART. XXIII). Questions of nullity and separation were the responsibility of ecclesiastical courts (ART. XXIV). In all schools the instruction was to be given in harmony with Catholic doctrine (ART. XXVI). Catholic religious instruction was an obligatory subject in the schools of every rank (ART. XXVII). In the agencies for the formation of public opinion room was assured to the Church for the presentation and defense of religious truth (ART. XXIX). The freedom of ecclesiastical universities and academies as well as the possibility of erecting schools of every kind were guaranteed (ARTS. XXX and XXXI).

---

[46] L. Pérez Mier, "El Convenio español para la provisión de beneficios no consistoriales," Revista Española de Derecho Canónico 1 (1946), 729–75.

[47] M. García Castro, "El Convenio entre la Santa Sede y el Estado español sobre la jurisdicción castrense y asistencia religiosa a las fuerzas armadas," Revista Española de Derecho Canónico 5 (1950), 1107–71; 6 (1951), 265–301, 701–71.

[48] A. Giannini, "Il Concordato con la Spagna," Il Diritto Ecclesiastico 64 (1953), 417–49; P. Mikat, "Das spanische Konkordat," Kirche in der Welt 6 (1953), 323–28; S. Pappalardo, "Inter Sanctam Sedem et Hispaniam sollemnes conventiones. Adnotationes," Monitor Ecclesiasticus 79 (1954), 247–88; M. Useros Carretero, "A propósito de la neutralidad confesional del Estado y el Concordato español," Revista Española de Derecho Canónico 9 (1954), 225–39; E. F. Regatillo, "Il valore del nuovo Concordato spagnuolo per la vita religiosa della Spagna," CivCatt 106 (1955), II, 378–92; III, 265–76, 499–507; R. Bidagor, "Das Konkordat zwischen dem Heiligen Stuhl und Spanien," ÖAfKR 6 (1955), 3–13, 173–88; 7 (1956), 5–17; I. Martín Martínez Concordato de 1953 entre España y la Santa Sede (Madrid 1961); E. F. Regatillo, El Concordato español de 1953 (Santander 1961); S. Alvárez-Menéndez, "El Concordato Español de 1953," Angelicum 41 (1964), 63–86; L. Gutiérrez Martín, El privilegio de nombramiento de obispos en España (Rome 1967); J. Pérez Alhama, La Iglesia y el Estado español (Madrid 1967).

By means of the concordat the Church in Spain obtained a position of imposing compactness. The Spanish concordat once again took into account the Catholic tradition of the Spanish people and created a system of the relations of Church and state in a Catholic country that must be termed, theoretically, almost ideal. A more far-reaching favoring of the Catholic Church and a more intensive collaboration of the state with it was scarcely conceivable. Nevertheless, in Spain one can speak of a system of state Church only with restrictions. For the concordat did indeed proclaim the Catholic religion as the religion of the state, but not a state Church. Even more, the free exercise of its sovereignty was expressly guaranteed to the Catholic Church (ART. II). Its independence in Spain is incomparably greater than that of Protestantism in the Scandinavian countries. In addition, the concordat did not essentially impair the individual's freedom of denomination. The concordat did not represent a capitulation of the state to the Church but the attempt, undertaken in the interests of both parties, to realize the closest possible union between Church and state. The Spanish system of the relations of Church and state, as constructed by the concordat, was based on the principle that the Catholic religion, as the sole true one, alone possessed an objective right to existence and social liberty and that consequently the adherents of the other religions had only a claim to the protection of their erroneous conscience. On the other hand, the propagation of error implied a danger for the faith of the Catholics and for public morality and hence was to be thwarted. The state has the duty of protecting and supporting the Catholic Church as guardian and proclaimer of the truth. The concordat strove to create for the Church the legal and economic presuppositions necessary or useful for the exercise of its mission. The example of the Islamic states with their system of unity was as effective in the conclusion of the concordat as was the memory of the civil war, which, in view of the reign of terror in the republican part of Spain and the atrocities of the Republicans against the Church, had here and there assumed the character of a crusade. The de-Catholicizing of the country, which the republican regime had sought, ranked as treason to the national tradition.

For the conclusion of the concordat some deliberations were decisive, which proved later to be miscalculations. The two contracting parties were not, it is true, mistaken as to the religious situation among the Spanish people. They knew of the spread of socialist, Communist, and anarchist ideologies, they knew the religious lethargy and antipathy of broad groups. They did not fail to see that in Spain there was a considerable number of persons who were or wanted to be at the same time Catholic and anticlerical, and that the liberalism disseminated especially at the universities was not pleased with a powerful position for the Church. If they nevertheless could not be deterred from allowing the Catholic religion and Church so outstanding a position, then this happened because they had confidence in the power of the Church to bring its mission convincingly and enticingly to development if only the external presuppositions for this were created for it. But they did not foresee that a decade would suffice to weaken the Church critically, and, in fact, from within, not from without. They counted on the stability of the Church and its stabilizing function for society and state. They did not suspect that this stability was based to a considerable extent on factors which could be swept away with a change of pontificate. The contracting parties also probably underestimated the publicity strength of Protestantism, which, despite numerically insignificant circumstances, was employed to the fullest extent, the mood of so-called world publicity, which was decisively determined by Protestantism, and the inclination of many states with a Protestant majority, especially the United States, to intervene on behalf of their coreligionists in Catholic lands. The concordat became the occasion for isolating Spain economically, culturally, and politically. The untiring attacks of world Protestantism against the concordat could not be without effect in the long run. They could not but gradually undermine also the power of resistance of some politicans and bishops, for whom the defense of the concordat was an obligatory responsibility. Finally, it appeared that the hope linked with the conclusion of the Spanish concordat that it could serve as model for the other Catholic countries was unfulfilled. With one exception, now to be mentioned, it remained a unique case.

With the Latin American states, to which Pius XII constantly brought his increasing care, the conclusion of treaties occurred in three cases. On 29 January 1953 a mission agreement was signed with Colombia. The government granted to the mission protection and support, among other reasons for the formation of a native clergy (ARTICLE 7). On 16 June 1954 the Dominican Republic signed with the Holy See a comprehensive concordat, which borrowed extensively from that with Spain.[49] The Catholic religion remains the religion of the state (ART. I). The patronate was abandoned (ART. V). The activity of foreign clerics and religious in the country is assured (ART. X). Until the present (1974) this was supposed to be the ultimate treaty, basically regulating all questions of common interest. On 21 January 1958 there followed, in accord with ART. XVII of the concordat, an agreement on the pastoral care of the military. With Bolivia a mission agreement[50] was reached on 4 December 1957, a treaty on the pastoral care of the military[51] on 29 November 1958. On the missionaries was laid, besides the work of evangelizing, also care for the promotion of the temporal welfare of the natives (ART. VII). In the agreements with the Dominican Republic (ART. XIX) and with Bolivia of 4 December 1957 (ART. XIV) the Church's charitable activity was taken into consideration, which was something new. In Peru the mandate of the constitution of 9 April 1933 and that of 5 September 1940 did not permit the conclusion of a concordat with the Holy See (ART. 234). Finally, a long cherished desire of Pius XII was fulfilled in Germany. The successor states of Prussia in the Federal Republic proceeded after the war, even if partly after long hesitation, on the basis of the continuing validity of the Prussian concordat. Likewise, Bavaria and Baden-Württemberg adhered to the continuing validity of the respective concordats.[52] To supplement the Prussian concordat, the state of [49] J. Damizia, "Annotationes ad sollemnes Conventiones inter S. Sedem et Rempublicam Dominicanam," Apollinaris 27 (1954), 243–76; A. Giannini, "Il concordato Dominicano," Il Diritto Ecclesiastico 65 (1954), 288–98; P. Mikat, "Zur neuesten Konkordatspraxis des Heiligen Stuhles. Das Konkordat zwischen dem Heiligen Stuhl und der Dominikanischen Repbulik," Die Kirche in der Welt 8 (1955), 177–82.

---

[50] J. Damizia, "Annotationes ad conventionem inter Apostolicam Sedem et Bolivianam Rempublicam," Apollinaris 31 (1958), 220–27; F. Cavalli, "La recente convenzione missionaria tra la Santa Sede e la Bolivia," CivCatt 109 (1958), I, 502–16.

[51] A. Pugliese, "Adnotationes," Apollinaris 34 (1961), 309–12.

[52] ARTICLE 182 of the Bavarian constitution of 2 December 1946 declares that the treaties of 24 January 1925 with the Christian Churches remain in force. ART. 35, Sec. 2, of the constitution of the Saarland of 15 December 1947 recognizes the legally Nordrhein-Westfalen and the Holy See made a treaty for the erection of the see of Essen[53] on 19 December 1956. In this way, the care of souls in the Ruhr district was united and uniformly directed.

The Agreements under John XXIII and Paul VI

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL FOR THE LEGAL RELATIONSHIP OF CHURCH AND STATE

The death of Pius XII meant the end of an epoch in the government and politics of the Church. The most momentous happening in the pontificate of John XXIII was without any doubt the convocation of a General Council. The Second Vatican Council had a heavy impact, not only on the relations of Church and state in general but on the policy of the Holy See especially.[54] Here let reference be made to only three existing treaties and agreements with the Churches. ARTICLE 23 of the constitution of North Rhine-Westphalia of 28 June 1950 recognizes as a valid the treaties with the Churches which were concluded in the former Free State of Prussia. ARTICLE 8 of the constitution of Baden-Württemberg of 11 November 1953 declares that rights and duties from the treaties with the Churches remain intact(cf. A. Erler, "Die Konkordatslage in Deutschland," Süddeutsche Juristen-Zeitung 1 [1946], 197–200; M. Gebhart, Die Rechtslage des Reichskonkordates und der Länderkonkordate nach 1945 (Diss. Munich 1951); O. Born, Das Problem der Weitergeltung des Reichskonkordats und der Länderkonkordate nach dem Zusammenbruch des Reiches im Jahre 1945 (Diss. Münster 1953); G. Ostermann, Die Fortgeltung des Badischen Konkordates von 1932 (Cologne 1962); A. Herzig, Die Systematik und Problematik des konkordatären Rechts in Nordrhein-Westfalen (Cologne 1965); K. Orywall, Die Geltung der neueren Konkordate und Kirchenverträge im Saarland (Cologne 1969).

---

[53] E. Hegel, Kirchliche Vergangenheit im Bistum Essen (Essen 1960), 275–95; W. Haugg, Staat und Kirche in Nordrhein-Westfalen (Berlin, Neuwied and Darmstadt 1960); P. Mikat, Das Verhältnis von Kirche und Staat im Lande Nordrhein-Westfalen in Geschichte und Gegenwart (=Veröffentlichungen der Arbeitsgemeinschaft für Forschung des Landes Nordrhein-Westfalen 129) (Cologne and Opladen 1966); J. Bauer, Das Verhältnis von Staat und Kirche im Land Nordrhein-Westfalen (Münster 1968).

[54] A. Schwan, Katholische Kirche und pluralistische Politik. Politische Implikationen des II. Vatikanischen Konzils (=Recht und Staat in Geschichte und Gegewart 330) (Tübingen 1966); P. Mikat, "Kirche und Staat in nachkonziliarer Sicht," K. Aland, W. Scheenmelcer, eds., Kirche und Staat. Festschrift für Bischof D. Hermann Kunst D.D. zum 60. Geburtstag am 21 Januar 1967 (Berlin 1967), 105–25; H. Barion, " 'Weltgeschichtliche Machtform?' Eine Studie zur Politischen Theologie des II. Vatikanischen Konzils," H. Barrion, E. W. Böchenförde, E. Forsthoff, W. Weber, eds., Epirrhosis. Festgabe für Carl Schmitt I (Berlin 1968), 13–59; D. Grimm, "Die Staatslehre der katholischen Kirche nach dem zweiten Vatikanischen Knozil," Civitas. Jahrbuch für Sozialwissenschaften 8 (1969), 11–30; P. Mikat, "Nachkonziliare Überlegungen zum gewandelten Verhältnis von Staat und Kirche," Militärseelsorge 14 (1972), 206–27; J. Wössner, ed., Religion im Umbruch. Soziologische Beiträge zur Situation von Religion und Kirche in der gegenwärtigen Gesellschaft (Stuttgart 1972).

decisive statements of the council. The declaration Dignitatis humanae on religious liberty demanded the freedom of religion of the individual and of groups in the state without regard to the question of truth. According to it, religious freedom is a basic human right, derived from human dignity, the striving proper to human nature for a knowledge of the truth, the different task of Church and state, as well as the goal of the state to serve the common good. The legal order must make this human right a civil right (ARTICLES 2 and 3). Hence, fundamentally the state must guarantee free possibility of activity to all religions. The only restriction on this liberty is the endangering of public order—"iustae exigentiae ordinis publici": ART. 4; "iustus ordo publicus": ART. 2; also ART. 7. The declaration takes note of the system of a state religion only as a fact based on special circumstances, without recommending it. In case it is introduced, the right of all citizens and groups to religious liberty must be recognized and preserved (ART. 6). Thus the ideal of the Catholic state seemed to have been abolished. True, in ART. 1 of the cited declaration occurs the clausula salvatoria: that the traditional doctrine on the moral obligation of persons and of groups vis-à-vis the true religion and the One Church of Christ remains unaffected. But this abstract allusion to a doctrine which is itself not expounded cannot prevail against the concrete statements of the articles mentioned. They became of great importance for the relationship of legal proximity of Church and state existing in some countries.

The pastoral constitution Gaudium et spes on the Church in today's world stressed that the Church is tied to no political system but is basically prepared for cooperation with each one. While it makes use of the temporal to the extent that its mission requires, it does not place its hope on privileges offered to it by the state authority. It would even renounce the exercise of certain legitimately acquired rights if it is established that their use jeopardizes the credibility of its witness or changed conditions of life demand another arrangement (ART. 76). These statements, which are in themselves self-evident, corresponded to a widespread mentality which saw in the depriving of the Church of earthly assurances and temporal means an opportunity for the better propagation of the faith. They supplied the signal for a movement under way in many countries, which anticipated from the sacrifice of legal positions a deepening and greater effectiveness of the Church's ministry.

The decree Christus Dominus on the pastoral office of bishops finally expressed the wish that in the future no more rights or privileges be conceded to heads of state to select, appoint, suggest, or designate bishops. Heads of state were asked to renounce, in agreement with the Holy See, these rights, just mentioned, which they possessed at present by virtue of a treaty or through custom (ART. 20). With this invitation was continued a development which had begun long before the council,[55] but which had been sensationally infringed in Spain because of the special circumstances.

As important as the above mentioned and other pertinent expressions and directions of the Second Vatican Council were for the relations of Church and state, all the more must one not overlook, for the understanding of the changes which have taken place in this area since the council, the development which proceeded in the Catholic Church itself from about the beginning of the 1960s. For the unity, the vitality, and the missionary élan of the Church determined its radiation to society and thereby regularly decided its influence on the state and its work. Particularly in the democratic state is the Church left to influence its members in the state to grant it freedom to move and support, which it needs for a wholesome activity. The importance of the Church in the pluralistic democratic state depends to a decisive degree on the spiritual substance, the inner strength, and the credibility which it is able to display and radiate. But the just mentioned qualities of the Catholic Church are in a state of constant and rapid retreat. The faith, the foundation of the Church and of all its activity, has been attacked and questioned for years from its own ranks. As a consequence countless Catholics are insecure, devoid of a vital conviction of the faith, and unfitted for an effective witness to the faith. The authority of Pope and bishops is gravely weakened. The clergy is to a great extent disoriented and divided. Discipline in the Church has seriously declined. Ecclesiastical laws are unashamedly transgressed and liquidated as a result of mounting disobedience. In extensive Catholic circles this worldliness and antihierarchical sentiment are widespread. In the name of pluralism the most contrary views on almost all subjects establish themselves in the Church. The holders of the teaching office contradict one another in important points. Many theologians ignore the Church's authentic doctrine. The release of diversity of opinion among Catholics by the Second Vatican Council—ART. 43 of the pastoral constitution Gaudium et spes—scarcely permitted any further unity of public activity of Catholics and also raised questions about the capability of function of ecclesiastical authority in the realm of politics. Subjects in which the Church appeared united grew steadily fewer. A gathering of the strengths of the Church became ever more difficult. In consequence of the enervation and disunity within the Church the influence of Catholics on society noticeably and constantly declined. The evidences of decay within make the Church an even weaker pole in the partnership relations with the state. They make it easy for forces which abhor the Church to ignore it or to play off hierarchy and theologians against one another. On the other hand, the well-intentioned governments show their concern whether the Church is able henceforth to measure up to its task in the forming of morals and in the education of persons. Following the example of other Christian religious groups, especially of German Protestantism and Russian Orthodoxy, in the most recent period certain elements of the hierarchy have taken part in politics, often with notable partiality. Among the members of the Church appear fanatical associations which attack the intimacy with the "authoritarian" or "capitalistic" state, but at the same time advocate the surrender of the Church to the socialist state, unite with socialist and Communist cadres, and support real or alleged freedom movements in European and non-European countries. Some groups in a sectarian spiritualism question all connections between Church and state and demand the repudiation of valid concordats. The political disunity of Catholics increases, and this condemns the Catholics in lands where they represent a minority to a status of no influence. Christian politicans to a great extent no longer have clear directions of the Church at their disposal. All in all, it must be noted that the strength of the Catholic Church has strongly declined in the last few years. The phenomena described are suited to jeopardize from within the current legal positions of the Church. A Church which no longer corresponds to the claims which are made on it and to the promises which proceeded from it loses in the eyes of citizens who measure by democratic rules the justification of occupying an outstanding position in the structure of society.

---

[55] ARTICLE 1 of the concordat with Colombia of 22 April 1942; ART. I of the accord with Portugal of 18 July 1950; ART. V of the concordat with the Dominican Republic of 16 June 1954.

It has been correctly stated by Hans Maier "that in a democracy every right becomes obsolete if it is not maintained and renewed by vital political forces." Where the spiritual power of Christians yields, experience teaches that sooner or later constitutional guarantees for the Church break up. The Church is an essentially public power with demands on the state that cannot be renounced. But the more the strength of the faith and the moral level in the Church decline, the more the number of practicing Catholics drops, so much the less understanding do its "privileges" find in the sphere of public law. The state will be equally prepared for treaties in the long run only with a society which fulfills a significant function in the life of the people. Hence, for the concluding of concordats there are no favorable assumptions now and for an unforeseeable future. In this regard the situation in the free nations and the socialist states is not very different. Concordats are basically agreements made to last between Church and state. The present is not favorable to this permanence. Most free countries show in increasing measure critical phenomena, experience a continuing rapid change of law and partly even of institutions, and look insecurely to the future. Considering this instability there exists for the civil partner an understandable aversion to tie itself down for a somewhat long time or soon to consider new negotiations. In case of real necessity to reach an agreement, people are usually content with individual understandings, which contain a minimum of regulating content. In place of concordats there are new possibilities of collaboration of Church and state, for example, through permanent contacts or those agreed to as occasion suggests. The striving for an institutionalization of the relations of state and Church yields to a certain extent to the contentment with a functional relation. In place of the assignment and definition of rights and competencies there comes to a great extent the cooperation agreed to for a short to moderately long period. The socialist states do not necessarily intend to have a comprehensive agreement with a structure condemned to extinction, as in their view the Church is. What they are in any event prepared for is the contractual regulating of particular questions, from which they promise themselves a tactical advantage. The hopes of a gradual dying out of hostility to religion in the socialist countries have so far not been realized. Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn says, "The furious hostility against religion is what is most permanent in Marxism." To be sure, now as earlier, the Holy See ordinarily puts the greatest value on the realization of accords with the states and in this connection displays its proved flexibility. It even concludes agreements with states that are atheistic or non-Christian and is ready to enter into accords of slight range of content. The pluralistic structure of the constitutional democracies is recognized without reservation. Nevertheless, there exists, at least in parts of the Church, a widespread weariness of concordats. The enhanced self-confidence of the bishops finds expression in the demand raised in some circles that, in the future, in place of concordats should come easily repudiated particular accords, which are negotiated by the bishops and, if need be, submitted to the Holy See for confirmation.

THE INDIVIDUAL AGREEMENTS

The "Protocols" with Socialist States

Since John XXIII Vatican diplomacy has sought to prepare an accommodation with the socialist states, especially those of Eastern Europe, at the cost of heavy sacrifices and considerable advance concessions.[56] Talks were agreed upon by means of preliminary contacts on the occasion of international meetings, and it was anticipated that they would result in the contractual solution of this or that question of the Church's life. On the other side, with the Second Vatican Council and Montini's election as Pope, the socialist governments sought contact with the Holy See in order thereby to gain influence over the Church and the more easily to tie the Catholics in their sphere of power to their course. On 15 September 1964 there first came into existence a "protocol" between a socialist state, Hungary, and the Holy See.[57] In it the political condition and the oath of loyalty of the bishops were granted to the government. In 1968 it was complemented by a second agreement. On 25 June 1966 there followed a "protocol" with Yugoslavia.[58] In it the government acknowledged the competence of the Holy See to exercise its jurisdiction over the Catholic Church in Yugoslavia in spiritual, ecclesiastical, and religious questions, without prejudice to the internal order of the nation. The Holy See guaranteed the restricting of the activity of clerics to the religious ecclesiastical sphere and disapproved every type of political violence. The secular side intended by these stipulations to keep the Croatian clergy apart from the national aspirations of the people and to gain the Holy See as a confederate against the protesting Croats. Also in the "protocol" the exchange of an envoy to the Holy See and of an apostolic delegate—not of a nuncio—in Yugoslavia was agreed upon; but, going beyond Canon 267, par. 2, to the delegate pertained the duty of fostering contact with the government. However, in 1970 Yugoslavia resumed diplomatic relations with the Holy See. These "protocols" represent agreements at the lowest stage of diplomatic activity and of minimum content. They were the first fumbling steps on an uncertain road. The situation of the Church within the country scarcely improved in Hungary by the signing, and in Yugoslavia only insignificantly, and the alleviations obtained are constantly threatened by a change of course.

---

[56] N.N., "Konkordatsexperimente im Ostblock," Ost-Probleme 17 (1965), 194–200; G. Simon, Die katholische Kirche und der kommunistische Staat in Osteuropa (=Berichte des Bundesinstituts für ostwissenschaftliche und internationale Studien 31/1971) (Cologne 1971); H. Stehle, Die Ostpolitik des Vatikans 1917–1975 (Munich 1975).

[57] M. Csizmás, "Staat und Kirche in Ungarn seit 1945," Ungarn zehn Jahre danach. 1956-1966. Ein wissenschaftliches Sammelwerk, ed. by W. Frauendienst on the orders of the Deutsch-Ungarischer Kulturkreis (Mainz 1966), 285–322; S. Orbán, "Das Abkommen zwischen Staat und Kirche in der Volksrepublik Ungarn," Jahrbuch für Geschichte der UdSSR und der volksdemokratischen Länder Europas 9 (1966), 27–54.

[58] Illyricus, "Erstmals Zeit zum Atemholen. Die Entspannung zwischen Kirche und Staat in Jugoslawien," Wort und Wahrheit 20 (1965), 132–37; L'Attività della Santa Sede nel 1966 (Vatican City 1967), 1272–74; Kirche und Staat in Bulgarien und Jugoslawien. Gesetze und Verordnungen in deutscher Übersetzung. Unter Mitwirkung mehrerer Fachgenossen, ed. by R. Stupperich (=Schriftenreihe des Studienauschusses der EKU für Fragen der Orthodoxen Kirche 3) (Witten 1971).

The Holy See's contacts with other socialist nations have not yet advanced to the signing of "protocols." In Poland the government is keenly interested in an arrangement with the Holy See, whereby it expects to play down the irksome primate, Cardinal Wyszyński, and to be able to bring him to submission.[59] Nevertheless, the Polish bishops want no arrangement with the government purchased by precipitate concessions. Without the concluding of a treaty but in accord with the state, Paul VI in the apostolic constitution Episcoporum Poloniae of 28 June 1972 organized the Catholic Church in the area beyond the Oder-Neisse line. Four dioceses—Opole, Govzow-Wielkopolski, Szczecin-Kamien, and Koszalin-Kolobrzeg—were erected, the see of Ermland was incorporated into the ecclesiastical province of Warsaw, and that of Gdansk into the province of Gniezno. On the basis of prolonged and often interrupted negotiations, four new bishops were ordained in Prague at the end of February 1973. A written agreement was not published. In May 1973 the Holy See declined when the government of Czechoslovakia offered new talks, because they appeared to be without prospects. The predominant power of the socialist nations, the Soviet Union, now as earlier, rejected institutional relations with the Holy See because it wants to conduct its religious policy according to its own discretion.

The "Modus vivendi" with Tunisia

On 27 June 1964 there came into being for the first time a treaty between the Holy See and a country where Islam is the state religion (ART. 1 of the constitution of 25 July 1957), the "Modus vivendi" with Tunisia.[60] The treaty aims to guarantee to Catholics the practice of their faith. However, the public performance of the liturgy and preaching in public are not allowed. The Church is subjected to a strict police regime. Whether the treaty, with its humiliating conditions—suppression of the archbishopric of Carthage—and the great sacrifices which the Catholic Church accepted in it, can be of future significance for similar agreements with other Afro-Asian states is unclear.

---

[59] K. Hartmann, "Staat und Kirche nach dem Machtwechsel in Polen," Osteuropa 22 (1972), 119–29; S. Lammich, "Die Rechtsstellung der römisch-katholischen Kirche in der Volksrepublik Polen," ÖAfKR 23 (1972), 3–15.

[60] S. Sanz Villalba, "El 'modus vivendi' entre la Santa Sede y la República de Túnez," Revista Española de Derecho Canónico 20 (1965), 49–56; F. Romita, "Adnotazioni," Monitor Ecclesiasticus 90 (1965), 15–32.

The Changes in Concordats in States Giving Preferential Status to the Catholic Church

The unity of the state-Church system is today more or less shaken or jeopardized everywhere in Europe. Secularism and pluralism undermined the foundations on which state religions and state churches rested. The number of countries with coordination and separation systems is increasing. The existence of a state Church now ordinarily presupposes a religiously homogeneous population with a pervasively positive attitude to religion and Church. Today this assumption is no longer present for any Church of the so-called Western World. Its members are, in a considerable number, no longer rooted in it by virtue of conviction. As a result of serious opposing views in theology and faith, its theologians and clergy are no longer united. The religious foundation of the state-Church system is, it is true, broader and more stable in the Catholic countries of southern Europe than in the Protestant nations of Scandinavia,[61] but it displays dangerous cracks and is constantly further undermined by the development of the Church since the council. It is unlikely that this system can still be maintained in the long run by constitutional legal means. Violent changes through rapidly erupting passions are not to be excluded in some countries.

Paul VI's policy seeks a loosening of the bonds which exist, especially in the Iberian Peninsula, between Church and state, and the sacrifice of those privileges of the Church which find growing criticism. It agrees with the urging, lasting for years, of the majority of the Spanish bishops for a revision of the concordat. The state has reluctantly yielded to the desire and entered into negotiations with the Holy See. The revision of the concordat should assure "independence of each other, mutual respect, and the necessary cooperation." In particular, the Church should renounce its right of nomination in the appointment of bishops. in the Council of State, and in the Council of the Kingdom, as well as the privileged position of the clergy in penal law; the government should renounce its right of nomination in the appointment of bishops. The Spanish government yielded quickly to what is regarded as an expression of the will of the Second Vatican Council. On 10 January 1967 ART. 6, Sec. 2, of the Charter of the Spaniards was changed and the principle of religious liberty was proclaimed in a word-for-word borrowing from the declaration Dignitatis humanae. On 26 June 1967 the law on religious liberty was adopted. On 28 July 1976, after the death of General Franco, there was signed a treaty in which Spain renounced the right of presentation of the chief of state (or king) in the filling of bishoprics, and the Holy See renounced the criminal-law privilege of the clergy (ART. XVI of the concordat of 1953). The negotiations for the revision of the concordat were quickly continued.

---

[61] E. Berggrav, "Norwegen: Krise zwischen Kirche und Staat," Frankfurter Heft 9 (1954), 695–98; P. O. Ahrén, "Staat und Kirche in Schweden," ZevKR 10 (1963), 22–45; L. St. Hunter, ed., Scandinavian Churches (London 1965); G. Garonson, "Reform des Staatskirchenrechts in Schweden," ZevKR 15 (1970), 60–76; G. Weitling, "Kirche und Volk in Dänemark. Kirchliche Gesetzgebung und kirchliches Leben in Dänemark im 19. und 20. Jahrhundert," ÖAfKR 22 (1971), 85–109.

A development similar to that in Spain proceeded in Portugal. The law on religious liberty of 21 August 1971 and ART. 45 of the constitution revised on 23 August 1971 conceded legal equality to all religious groups. The concordat and the missionary agreement were discussed. The toppling of the authoritarian state in 1974 introduced a development which certainly intended to weaken the position of the Catholic Church. In the agreement of 15 February 1975 the Holy See, by changing ART. XXIV of the concordat of 7 May 1940, sacrificed the principle of the civil indissolubility of marriages contracted in church.

In Italy negotiations on the revision of some articles of the concordat have long been under way.[62] Without consultation with the Holy See, contrary to ART. 34 of the concordat, civil divorce was introduced in 1970. The popular referendum against it produced a serious defeat for the Catholics. At the end of 1976 the Italian government and the Holy See agreed on a document which aimed to adapt the concordat to Italian constitutional reality and the spirit of the Second Vatican Council. The Catholic religion was thereafter no longer to be the religion of the state. The restrictive stipulations against apostate priests were to be dropped. The obligations which encumbered the state because of Rome's sacred character were to be abolished.

In Ireland (Eire), whose relations with the Church posed no problem and needed no guarantee by concordat, the deletion of the so-called Church Clause from the Irish constitution (ART. 44), which granted to the Catholic Church a special status as "Custodian of the Faith which the majority of the population professed," was decided by popular vote in 1972.

---

[62] P. Ciprotti, "Divorzio e art. 34 del Concordato italiano," Apollinaris 40 (1967), 483–88; C. Rousseau, "Italie et Saint-Siège. Problème de la révision du concordat du 11 Février 1929," Revue Générale de droit International Public 39 (1968), 451–53; S. Lener, "Sulla revisione del Concordato," CivCatt 120 (1969), II, 432–46; III, 9–21; IV, 214–17.

Latest Concordats and Agreements with Free Countries

In the most recent period the Holy See has also signed treaties with many states. However, most of them deal only with particular questions, and not one provides a comprehensive regulation of the total complex of subjects affecting Church and state. In many agreements existing treaties were altered or expanded, in which case the adjustment meant in most cases a diminution of the Church's legal position, which had been gained through previous concordats. In some agreements references to the Second Vatican Council appear. In place of institutional guarantees there are in increasing measure guarantees of religious liberty for individuals and groups. One of the most difficult questions which confronted, now as previously, the nations of central and Western Europe in connection with the ordering of the relations of Church and state is usually the regulation of the school system, in particular the assurance of the establishment of free, nonstate, private schools. The council saw as the optimal type of school—in the declaration Gravissimum educationis on Christian education, ART. 9—the free Catholic school, endowed with public legal position and supported by public means. Accordingly, the Holy See strove to have the justification of the Church's maintaining its own schools and the financing of them by the state assured by treaty.

The Austrian concordat of 5 June 1933, whose further validity had at first been challenged,[63] especially by the Socialists, was continued by a series of treaties, of which especially noteworthy are those which led to the erecting of the two new dioceses of Burgenland in 1960 and Feldkirch in 1964 and gave the ecclesiastical school system financial security in 1962 and 1972.[64] In the treaty of 5 April 1962 Spain

[63] F. Jachym, Kirche und Staat in Österreich, 3d ed. (Vienna 1955); D. Mayer-Maly, "Zur Frage der Gültigkeit des Konkordates vom 5. Juni 1933," ÖAfKR 7 (1956), 198–211; L. Leitmaier, "Das verweigerte Konkordat. Staat und Kirche im neuem Österreich," Wort und Wahrheit 11 (1956), 169–71; J. Schmidt, Entwicklung der katholischen Schule in Österreich (Vienna 1958); B. Primetshofer, Ehe und Konkordat. Die Grundlinien des österreichischen Konkordats-Eherechtes 1934 und das geltende österreichische Eherecht (Vienna 1960); I. Gampl, "Oberster Gerichtshof-Konkordat 1933-Katholikengesetz," ÖAfKR 15 (1964), 126–30; A. Kostelecky, "Die Anerkennung des österreichischen Konkordates vom 5. Juni 1933 und die Verträge der Republik Österreich mit dem Heiligen Stuhl von 1960 und 1962," A. Burghardt, K. Lugmayer, E. Machek, G. Müller, H. Schmitz, eds., Im Dienste der Sozialreform. Festschrift für Karl Kummer (Vienna 1965), 431–41; I. Gampl, Österreichisches Staatskirchenrecht (=Rechts- und Staatswissenschaften 23) (Vienna and New York 1971).

[64] S. Sanz Villalba, "Las convenciones entre Austria y la Santa Sede del año 1960," Revista Española de Derecho Canónico 16 (1961), 531–39; J. Damizia, "Convenzione fra la expressed a generous recognition of nontheological studies at ecclesiastical universities.[65] On 26 November 1960[66] the Holy See concluded with Paraguay a convention on the establishment of a military vicariate. The convention with Venezuela of 6 March 1964[67] moved generally in traditional paths. But, as earlier in the concordats with Latvia (ART. XII) and the Dominican Republic (ART. X), so also in this agreement attention was given to the activity of foreign priests and lay persons in the care of souls and in social services (ART. XIII). The patronate for the naming of bishops (ART. VI) and for the filling of capitular and parochial benefices (ARTS. VIII–X) was abolished, but in regard to the bishops, in contrast to other countries, the state's right of veto in the procedure was confirmed in accord with the political proviso. The "protocol" with Haiti of 15 August 1966 confirmed, after preliminary conflicts, the intention of the government especially to protect the Catholic Church in accord with ART. 1 of the concordat of 1860 and to guarantee its free exercise of its pastoral care in conformity with the concordat, canon law, and the Second Vatican Council. Similarly, the treaty with Argentina of 10 October 1966[68] referred in the preamble to the principles of the Second Vatican Council. It gave the Church freedom to alter the diocesan organization in the country (ART. II) and abolished the state's right of nomination to episcopal sees (ART. III). The agreement of 24 July 1968 with Switzerland led to the long desired establishment of the see of Lugano for the canton of Ticino.[69]

A new concordat with Colombia was concluded on 12 July 1973 and ratified on 2 July 1975. This is a typical postconciliar concordat with a Catholic country. In it the humane and social aspect of the Church's

---

Santa Sede e la Repubblica Austriaca al fine di regolare questioni attinenti l'ordinamento scolastico," Apollinaris 35 (1962), 76–115.

[65] J. Maldonado y Fernández del Torco, "El convenio de 5 de abril de 1962 sobre el reconocimiento, a efectos civiles, de los estudios de ciencias no eclesiásticas realizados en España en Universidades de la Iglesia," Revista Española de Derecho Canónico 18 (1963), 137–98; A. de Fuenmayor, El Convenio entre la Santa Sede y España sobre Universidades de Estudios civiles (Pamplona 1966).

[66] A. Pugliese, "Adnotationes," Monitor Ecclesiasticus 87 (1962), 385–401.

[67] S. Sanz Villalba, "Adnotationes," Monitor Ecclesiasticus 90 (1965), 361–76; M. Torres Ellul, "El Convenio entre la Santa Sede y la República Venezolana," Revista Española de Derecho Canónico 21 (1966), 485–555.

[68] R. De Lafuente, "El acuerdo entre la Santa Sede y la República Argentina," Revista Española de Derecho Canónico 23 (1967), 111–25.

[69] H. Kehrli, Interkantonales Konkordatsrecht (Bern 1968); A.W. Ziegler, "Kirche und Staat in der Schweiz," MThZ 19 (1969), 269–87; E. Kussbach, "Die Errichtung eines selbständigen Bistums Lugano. Übereinkommen zwischen dem schweizerischen Bundesrat und dem Heiligen Stuhl vom 24. Juli 1968," ÖAfKR 21 (1970), 96–114.

activity comes strongly to the fore. The ministry of the Church to the human person is expressly mentioned (ART. V). The Catholic religion is recognized only as the "basic element of the common good and of the total development of the nation," and the Church's freedom is assured in the framework of the religious freedom of the other denominations (ART. I). The independence of Church and state is strongly emphasized (ARTS. II and III). The ministry of the Church and its cooperation with the state in the area of the educational and social systems is especially stressed (ARTS. V and VI). The canonically contracted marriage remains basically subject to the Church alone, except for separation from bed and board (ARTS. VII–IX). The Church's activity in instruction and education is regulated in detail (ARTS. X–XIII). The naming of the bishops is done freely by the Pope, but in this matter there is conceded to the president of the republic a right to express reservations "of civil or political character" (ART. XIV). The immunity of clerics and religious is retained in modern form (ARTS. XVIII–XX). The Church's property is protected with noteworthy adaptations to today's circumstances (ARTS. XXIII–XXVI).

With regard to comparative law the state-Church law of the Federal Republic of Germany occupies a special place.[70] The Second World War ended with the occupation of the country by the victorious Allies. The Western occupation powers in general assured the Churches freedom of action. Immediately after the ending of the war, which the Churches had survived as intact organizations, these were sought and recognized as guarantors of a civil law order. Their position in public life seemed to be consolidated and to prepare for a new alliance of Church and state. The Churches were first restored to their former rights, but in some states with marked restrictions, particularly in the school system. In the positive law of the state Church the experiences of the period of Nazi domination were expressed in only a relatively modest measure. A fundamental new ecclesio-political orientation was either prevented or made difficult both in the Federal Republic and also in many federal states because of the resistance of the socialists and liberals. In the federation, just as in the states, a beginning was made basically with the state-Church law of the Weimar Constitution, which was modified only in details. Even the capability for compromise of the Weimar solution of the relations of state and Church proved to be realistic and lasting. The Basic Law for the German Federal Republic of 23 May 1949 adopted word for word ARTS. 136–39 and 141 of the Weimar Constitution and in ART. 4 guaranteed freedom of denomination and of worship and in ART. 7 religious instruction. The constitutions of the states proceeded in a similar fashion. In this matter, in each state according to the partisan political composition of the state conventions that drew up the constitutions, certain changes and supplements were included. On the whole the states with a predominantly Catholic population granted the Church a more favorable position than did those with a Protestant majority population. Thus, for example, according to the constitution of the state of Rhineland-Palatinate of 18 May 1947 the Churches are recognized institutions for the preservation and consolidation of the religious and moral bases of human life (ART. 41, Sec. 1). The constitution of the state of Baden-Württemberg of 11 November 1953 makes a similar statement (ART. 4, Sec. 2). On the other hand the constitution of the state of Hesse of 1 December 1946 envisages a clear delimitation between Church and state (ART. 50) as well as the elimination of actions by the state by means of legislation (ART. 52). In contradistinction to the Weimar constitution, the federation no longer has any principle of legislative competence in ecclesio-political questions. However, it retains a series of legislative competencies, because the constitutional legal bases of the relations of Church and state are, now as before, federal law (ART. 140 GG). In view of this legal situation it was principally the business of the states to take the initiative in the construction and completion of the arrangement between Church and state.

---

[70] H. Quaritsch, H. Weber, eds., Staat und Kirchen in der Bunderepublik. Staatskirchenrechtliche Aufsätze 1950–1967 (Bad Homburg v.d. H., Berlin, and Zurich 1967); J. Listl, Das Grundrecht der Religionsfreiheit in der Rechtsprechung der Gerichte der Bundesrepublik Deutschland (=Staatskirchenrechtliche Abhandlungen I) (Berlin 1971); E. L. Solte, Theologie an der Universität. Staats- und kirchenrechtliche Probleme der theologischen Fakultät (=Jus Ecclesiasticum, 13) (Munich 1971); J. Jurina, Der Rechtsstatus der Kirchen und Religionsgemeinschaften im Bereich ihrer eigenen Angelegenheiten (=Schriften zum öffentlichen Recht 180) (Berlin 1972); U. Scheuner, Schriften zum Staatskirchenrecht, ed. by J. Listl (Berlin 1973); P. Mikat, Religionsrechtliche Schriften. Abhandlungen zum Staatskirchenrecht und Eherecht, ed. by J. List, 2 vols. (Berlin 1974); E. Friesenhahn, U. Scheuner, J. Listl, eds., Handbuch des Staatskirchenrechts der Bundesrepublik Deutschland, 2 vols. (Berlin 1974–75); E. G. Mahrenholz, "Kirchen als Korporationen," ZevKR 20 (1975), 43–76.

If there can be no question of a fundamentally new order of the relations of state and Church, there can still be the question of a new manner of interpretation of the traditional formulas. As a consequence of the different legal constitutional framework of the Weimar Constitution, the stipulations on religious groups have experienced a change of meaning. This can be briefly summarized in the two poles: end of the state-Church sovereignty and recognition of a full public status of the Churches. The ecclesiastical treaties with the Protestant state Churches in Lower Saxony (1955), Schleswig-Holstein (1957), and Hesse (1960) accepted, recognized, and legally concretized the new interpretation of the relations between Church and state in legal theory. The claim and the task of the Churches are positively evaluated by the state and regarded as basically worthy of assistance. The coresponsibility of the Churches for the shaping of public order, even for the fate of state and society, is accepted. The achievements of the Churches for the maintenance of the moral foundations of human life, their struggle for freedom and human dignity, as well as their stabilizing function have led to the recognition of their qualification basically to take a stand on all questions of the life of the people. The assertion of overly positive rights antecedent to the state in the Basic Law forbids state interference in ecclesiastical affairs, just as it even seemed possible according to the Weimar Constitution, and gives the Church an independence such as, with this clarity, the Weimar Constitution did not. The state's traditional powers of supervision and collaboration are almost entirely abolished or placed on a contractual basis. But the state does no longer wish regularly to drop mere ties, but rather to free the Church for the carrying out of its tasks. Its position in public law is confirmed by treaty.

The relationship between Church and state existing since 1945 is, according to the prevailing view, that of coordination. Church and state face each other as independent partners in their own right, which, because of their common responsibility, regulate in fundamental harmony questions affecting each other. True, the state is not obliged by a treaty with the Church to arrange common matters. But the treaty is the adequate means in a constitutional system that expresses the independence of the Church and the secular nature of the state. Besides, the modern socially active state has created or reemphasized many relationships with the Church. Hence the number of treaties concluded with the Churches in the years since the end of the war is very high. Most of the agreements were made between the federal states on the one hand and the Protestant state Churches or the Holy See respectively, or the bishops of a state, on the other, and relatively few by the federation with the groups of Churches. In regard to the treaties, the two groups of fundamental agreements determining status and regulating individual questions must be distinguished. The number of administrative agreements with bishops is considerable, for example, for regulating the appointment of teachers of religion or of questions of property. For the first time in the history of German ecclesiastical law, after the Second World War the initiative for treaties between Church and state in the various federal states proceeded from German Protestantism. In double contrast to the practice in the period of the Weimar Republic, the treaties with the Protestant Churches were, first, not mere equalizing complements of Catholic concordats, but independent agreements developed from Protestant ideas and exigencies, and, second, they were not followed by any, or by any adequate, agreements with the Catholic Church that took into account principles of parity. All the more noteworthy is the fact that in some of these treaties, likewise for the first time in the history of German ecclesiastical law, there appear express provisos of parity, which guarantee to Protestantism equal treatment with the Catholic Church.[71]

The Catholic Church was at first hindered in the conclusion of new agreements because of its clinging to the concordat with the Reich, whose existence with legal effect and whose continued validity were challenged by leftist groups, and especially by its insistence on the school articles, which were annoying to some state partners.[72] In several federal states there were long-lasting conflicts over the school regulations. The state of Lower Saxony enacted a school law which, in the Church's view and that of the federal government, was in opposition to ART. 23 of the concordat with the Reich. The conflict was brought before the Federal Constitutional Court by the federal government. This was supposed to decide the question whether the state of Lower Saxony was obliged, vis-à-vis the federation, to observe the stipulations of the concordat with the Reich in fashioning its school law. In its verdict of 26 March 1957[73] the Federal Constitutional Court accepted both the legally effective existence and the continued validity of the concordat with the Reich, but denied the authority of the federation to hold the states to the observance of those obligations of it whose object, according to the Basic Law, falls under the exclusive competence of the states. This unfortunate and contradictory decision granted to the states, with regard to their exclusive legislative competence in questions of the educational system, the legal constitutional freedom arbitrarily to exempt themselves from international law ties. By it the concordat with the Reich was annulled in essential parts. Nevertheless, the Lower Saxon school controversy became the occasion to seek a contractual solution of the open questions and to restore, to a certain extent, the equality in Lower Saxony, which was no longer protected by the Loccum Treaty of 19 March 1955, very favorable to the Protestant state Church. After prolonged discussions, which were accompanied by a passionate anti-Catholic campaign in the state, there occurred on 1 July 1965 the conclusion of the first and only concordat with a state of the German Federal Republic, Lower Saxony.[74] It continued the Prussian concordat of 1929, but went considerably beyond it in topics and statements. The treaty eliminated the splintering of the state-Church law in the state and ended the conflict between Church and state over the organization of the school system. The state guaranteed under certain conditions the maintaining and erecting of public Catholic denominational schools. The Church recognized the nondenominational school as the regular school, the denominational school as a school by request (ART. 6). In the matter of a substantial altering of the structure of the public school system, the opening of discussions in the spirit of the treaty was envisaged (ART. 19, Sec. 2).[75] The encouragement of Catholic adult education by the state was promised (ART. 9). The interests of the Church in broadcasting were taken into consideration (ART. 10). With these two regulations the attempt was made to introduce newer developments into the usual matter of concordats. The agreement went beyond the traditional friendship clauses to establish "continuing contact" on all questions of the mutual relationship (ART. 19, Sec. 1).

---

[71] Final protocol in ART. 23 of the Hesse treaty with the Church, final protocol to ART. 28 of the Rhineland-Palatinate treaty with the Church, ART. VI of the Hesse treaty with the Catholic bishoprics, ART. 14 of the supplementary treaty to the Lower Saxon treaty with the Church.

[72] K. O. Hütter, Bindung der Länder an die Schulbestimmungen des Reichskonkordats von 1933. Rechtsnachfolge oder Funktionsnachfolge (Münster 1964); F. Müller, "Landesverfassung und Reichskonkordat. Fragen der Schulform in Baden-Württemberg," Baden-Württembergisches Verwaltungsblatt 10 (1965), 177–81; P. Feuchte, P. Dallinger, "Christliche Schule im neutralen Staat," Die Öffentliche Verwaltung 20 (1967), 361–74; F. Müller, Schulgesetzgebung und Reichskonkordat (Freiburg, Basel and Vienna 1966); F. Pitzer, Die Bekenntnisschule des Reichskonkordats (Cologne and Berlin 1967); W. Weber "Die Reichweite der Bekenntnisschulgarantie in Artikel 23 des Reichskonkordats," H. Brunotte, K. Müller, R. Smend, eds., Festschrift für Erich Ruppel zum 65. Geburtstag am 25. Januar 1968 (Hanover, Berlin and Hamburg 1968), 354–74.

[73] Der Konkordatsprozess, ed. by F. Giese and F. A. Frhr, v. der Heydte, 4 vols. (Munich 1957–59); C. J. Hering, H. Lentz, eds., Entscheidungen in Kirchensachen seit 1946 IV (Berlin 1966), 46–94.

The Lower Saxon concordat did not give rise to other similar treaties. Other states, like Hesse and Rhineland-Palatinate, were prepared only to conclude agreements with the bishops of the state. Today there is no favorable set of circumstances in the Federal Republic for the signing of concordats. The erecting of new theological faculties at Bochum, Regensburg, Augsburg, and Passau or, respectively, of technical disciplines at Osnabrück and professional chairs at Saarbrücken at the state universities, as well as the extensive elimination of the denominational character of the public elementary schools and of teacher education made necessary a number of treaties of individual federal states—Bavaria, Rhineland-Palatinate, North Rhine-Westphalia, Saarland, Lower Saxony—with the Holy See. The tendency to push the denominational schools and teacher education conformable to the creed to the private level is unmistakable. Articles 23 and 24 of the concordat with the Reich became entirely obsolete through this development. Still, some states have been found ready for extensive support of Catholic private schools. The treaty with Bavaria of 4 September 1974 confirmed the possibility, already agreed to on 7 October 1968, of forming in the public elementary schools, under certain conditions, classes and instruction groups for pupils of the Catholic faith; in these the instruction and training would be governed by the special principles of the Catholic denomination (ART. 6, pars. 2 and 3). The state of Bavaria bound itself to grant financial and personnel assistance to the schools of Catholics "in the framework of the general encouragement of private schools" (ART. 8, par. 1). To the private Catholic elementary and special schools was promised, with certain restrictions, the repayment of the necessary expenditure and building costs (ART. 8, pars. 2 and 3). The accord of 15 May 1973 with Rhineland-Palatinate also assured the establishment and financing of Catholic private schools. The treaty contains generous promises of state contributions for the expenditures for building projects of Catholic schools (ART. 7) and for the assignment of state teachers to Catholic private schools (ART. 10). Essentially similar is the agreement reached on 21 February 1975 between the Holy See and the Saarland on the same subjects.

---

[74] J. Niemeyer, "Kirche und Staat nach dem Konkordat in Niedersachsen," Ordo Socialis 13 (1965), 205–18; E. G. Mahrenholz, "Das Niedersächsische Konkordat und der Ergänzungsvertrag zum Loccumer Kirchenvertrag," ZevKR 12 (1966–67, 217–82; E. Ruppel, "Konkordat und Ergänzungsvertrag zum Evangelischen Kirchenvertrag in Niedersachsen," Deutsches Verwaltungsblatt 81 (1966), 207–12; D. Scheven, "Das Niedersächsische Konkordat," Juristenzeitung 20 (1966), 341–47; H. J. Toews, Die Schulbestimmungen des Niedersächsischen Konkordats (Göttingen 1967).

[75] As early as 21 May 1973 adjustments of various rules to changed circumstances became necessary (AAS 65 [1973], 643–46). The exchange of notes between the Holy See and the state of Lower Saxony of 22 December 1972 envisages the total elimination of the state denominational school system.

In the most recent period a new phase of the relations of Church and state in the Federal Republic seems to be under way. The Church fell into strong dependence on the movements in society. The changed public attitude reacts upon the interpretation of the norms, but now in a sense increasingly more unfavorable to the Churches. The interpretation of the rules of the ecclesiastical law is, to a great degree, dependent on the political and ideological tendencies in public life prevailing at the moment and occasionally rapidly changing. For example, since the close of the Second Vatican Council the public position, as well as the political, social, and cultural influence of the Churches in the Federal Republic, are in increasing measure questioned by teachers, party politicians, and certain organizations. The process of secularization moves after the trauma of the lost war and the "shock of the first postwar period," as Siegfried Grundmann expresses it, with new intensity.[76] An influential movement sees the Churches to an increasing degree in relation to other social forces and includes them in the associations and interest groups. This view does not let the nature of the Churches be given adequate recognition any more. The institutional relations between Church and state become weaker, they are abandoned in favor of a stronger social orientation of the two powers. The Church must engage in the process of forming the state's will less as an institution than through the presence of its faithful in society. In the administration of justice there partly exists the tendency to overstress the negative side of religious freedom, that is, less to protect liberty in the practice of religion and rather much more to assure the right of dissidents to the nonexercise of religious acts. In the course of this development religious practice is threatened with being restricted to the church building and the family sphere. The verdicts of the Bremen Supreme Court of 23 October 1965[77] and of the Supreme Court of Hesse of 27 October 1965[78] on questions of religious instruction and of prayer in school point in this direction.

Quite differently from the situation with the Western occupation zones, or the German Federal Republic, proceeded the development of the relations of Church and state in the Soviet occupation zone, or the German Democratic Republic.[79] At first the Soviet occupying power refrained from interference in the inner ecclesiastical sphere. The constitution of the German Democratic Republic of 7 October 1949 in ARTS. 41–49 adopted in great part formulas of ARTS. 135–41 of the Weimar Constitution. But these regulations were essentially modified by the intensified principle of the separation of Church and state. The constitution guaranteed religious freedom (ART. 41) and guaranteed to religious groups the character of corporations of public law with the traditional right to raise money (ART. 43, Secs. 3 and 4). Religious instruction might be given by them in school buildings (ARTS. 40 and 44). But the educational system was subject exclusively to the control of the state (ARTS. 34–40). More unfavorable than the constitutional law was the constitutional reality. By means of laws and directives, as well as through administrative measures, the Church's sphere of action was ever more strictly limited and the de-Christianization of the people was pressed as planned. A relatively more trustworthy expression of the present status of the relations of Church and state is the constitution of the German Democratic Republic of 6 April 1968. It guarantees liberty of conscience and of belief and equality of rights of all citizens without regard to religious denomination (ART. 20, Sec. 1), as well as freedom of denomination and of the practice of religion (ART. 39, Sec. 1). The arranging of the affairs of the Churches and religious groups and the exercise of their activity are subject to the reservation of the constitution and of the law (ART. 39, Sec. 2). The independence of the Churches in the arrangement and administration of their affairs is no longer guaranteed. There is no longer any constitutional protection against interference in their inner sphere. There is no more word of any rights of the Churches. Ecclesiastical activity is handed over to the arbitrarily manipulable "legal decisions" of the German Democratic Republic. Churches and religious groups are, according to the 1968 constitution, no longer corporations of public law. Hence, from now on they move only in the area of private law and have lost the capacity to employ any disciplinary power. In the other fields of law also, for example, in penal law, the prerogatives accruing to the Church from its public position are eliminated. A guar-

---

[76] S. Grundmann, "Laizistische Tendenzen im deutschen Staatskirchenrecht?" Festschrift Kunst, 126–33; J. Listl, "Staat und Kirche in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland. Wandlungen und neuere Entwicklungstendenzen im Staatskirchenrecht," StdZ 191 (1973), 291–308; I. Gampl, C. Link, Deutsches und österreichisches Staatskirchenrecht in der Diskussion (=Rechts- und Staatswissenschaftliche Veröffentlichungen der Görres-Gesellschaft, m.s. 10) (Paderborn 1973); H. Maier, "Die Kirchen in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland," Internationale katholische Zeitschrift 'Communio' 2 (1973), 547–58; 3 (1974), 63–74; P. Rath, ed., Trennung von Staat und Kirche? Dokumente und Argumente (=rororo aktuell) (Reinbek bei Hamburg 1974). E. G. Mahrenholz (Die Kirchen in der Gesellschaft der Bundesrepublik, 2d ed. [Hanover 1972], 132) terms religious instruction a "foreign body" in the constitutional structure of the Basic Law.

[77] C. J. Hering, H. Lentz, eds., Entscheidungen in Kirchensachen seit 1946 VII (Berlin 1970, 260–75).

[78] Ibid., 275–99.

[79] E. Jacobi, "Staat und Kirche nach der Verfassung der Deutschen Demokratischen Republik," ZevKR 1 (1951), 113–35; W. Meinecke, Die Kirche in der volksdemokratischen Ordnung der Deutschen Demokratischen Republik (Berlin 1952); U. Krüger, "Das Prinzip der Trennung von Staat und Kirche in Deutschland," Festschrift für Erwin Jacobi (Berlin 1975), 260–86; W. Meinecke, Die Kirche in der volksdemokratischen Ordnung der Deutschen Demokratischen Republik (Berlin 1962); C. Meyer, Das Verhältnis zwischen Staatsgewalt und Kirche im Lichte der Glaubens- und Gewissensfreiheit in der sowjetischen

Besatzungszone Deutschland (Mainz 1964); H. Bayl, "Zum Verhältnis von Staat und Kirche in der Deutschen Demokratischen Republik," Wissenschaftliche Zeitschrift der Universität Rostock. Gesellschafts- und sprachwissenschaftliche Reihe 15 (1966), 315–23; H. Johnsen, "Staat und Kirche in der DDR," Im Lichte der Reformation. Jahrbuch des Evangelischen Bundes 10 (1967), 51–70; K. Richter, "Katholische Kirche in der DDR. Wandel kirchlicher Strukturen unter den Bedingungen einer sozialistischen Gesellschaft," Jahrbuch für christliche Sozialwissenschaften 13 (1972), 215–45; S. Mampal, Die sozialistische Verfassung der Deutschen Demokratischen Republik. Text und Kommentar (Frankfurt 1972).

antee of religious instruction is absent, just as is the assurance of pastoral care in public institutions. No constitutional guarantee of ecclesiastical property exists any longer. The right of the Church to raise money has come to nothing. The public achievements are no longer mentioned. The 1968 constitution of the German Democratic Republic does, however, mention, as the sole constitution of a socialist country, the agreements as means for regulating the relations of state and Church (ART. 39, Sec. 2). It thereby makes known that it is aware of the independence of the Churches. Apparently, the leadership of the German Democratic Republic has grasped that treaties can be a useful means of socialist ecclesiastical policy. The German Democratic Republic especially has some desires relating to the Catholic Church, the fulfilling of which can be obtained only from the Holy See, for example, a new arrangement of diocesan boundaries. First contacts with the Holy See have been made. However, a concordat with substantive guarantees of the Church's activity is presumably not sought by the German Democratic Republic. It treats as nonexistent the concordats with Prussia and with the Reich. The appointment of apostolic administrators in the German Democratic Republic on 23 July 1973 took place without a treaty.

SECTION TWO

The Diversity of the Inner Life of the Universal Church

CHAPTER 7

*Society and State as a Problem for the Church

The period since the outbreak of the First World War (1914–18), the start of which is marked within the Church by the change in the See of Peter from Pius X (1903–14)[1] to Benedict XV (1914–22),[2] presents itself as an epoch of socio-political crises and a global inability to establish peace. During the very war itself the Bolshevik Revolution—the "October Revolution" of 1917—under Lenin was victorious in Russia. Five years later Mussolini inaugurated the Fascist era in Italy with his "March on Rome" of 28 October 1922. On 30 January 1933 there followed the subjection of Germany to the dictatorship of National Socialism through Hitler's so-called "seizure of power."

The three revolutionary movements with more or less monistic ideologies[3] ended politically in totalitarian dictatorships of nationalistic style, but with claims beyond their own national frontiers—Bolshevism: "Socialist World Revolution"; Fascism: "Mare Nostro," with claims of hegemony around the Mediterranean; National Socialism: "Living Space for the German People" in the east. In this way, as also by means of the continuing nationalism of the nontotalitarian states, all good starts for a global understanding of peoples—the League of Nations—or at least for a European understanding between the former opponents in the war—Briand/Stresemann—were finally condemned to failure. The world economic crisis of 1930 led with its army of millions of unemployed to a complete disorganization of world commerce and to serious social upheavals in the industrial nations, which finally helped to smooth Hitler's route to power in Germany. The world economic crisis marks the end of the era of liberal economics and the beginning of a national state policy of controlling and standardizing. The hectic fever with which the individual nations reacted to the severe depression by ever new restrictive measures consolidated the crisis. "The cyclical crisis produced a structural crisis of the world economy. The crisis in the system became a crisis of the system."[4] The crisis led to the injury especially of the small and middle independent livelihoods, to a further concentration in the economy—financial capitalism—and thereby to a serious derangement of the world political and inner social equilibrium.

---

* Wilhelm Weber

[1] AAS 36–41 (1903–8); AAS (Rome 1909ff.); Acta Pii X, 5 vols. (Rome 1905–14).

[2] AAS 6–14 (1914–22); Actes de Benoît (Latin and French), 3 vols. (Paris 1924–26).

[3] Bolshevism: Class ideology on an economic basis; Fascism: "La Nazione" as ideological basis; National Socialism: "Blood-and-Soil" ideology, emotional racism.

After the Second World War (1939–45) thinking in terms of political blocs (NATO, the Warsaw Pact), problems of conventional and nuclear rearmament, of the Cold War, and locally restricted warlike confrontations were increasingly prominent, partly in connection with the West-East conflict (Korea and Vietnam), partly in connection with the elimination of the former European colonial rule (Algeria and Angola), partly from very dissimilar motives (Hungarian revolt, suppression of the reform socialism of Prague, the Middle East conflict). Alongside the West-East conflict the North-South problem emerged more clearly, namely, the tensions from the imbalance between the developed industrial nations of the northern hemisphere—"First" and "Second World"—and the populous but economically undeveloped and hence poor and partly hungry countries of the so-called "Third World."

However, the picture would be incorrect if note were not taken also of positive starts and developments, even if not all or only few were actually developed. To be named here would be the above-mentioned idea of Europe,[5] the activity of the International Worker's Organization (ILO) at Geneva, which was founded in 1919 and since then has displayed a comprehensive and beneficial activity,[6] the development of labor and social law, especially in Germany in the period between the wars, the beginnings of a new international order of law and peace, such as the establishing of the [4] Cf. on this A. Predöhl, Das Ende der Weltwirtschaftskrise: Eine Einführung in die Probleme der Weltwirtschaft, rde vol. 161 (Hamburg 1962), here 9.

---

[5] On 4 September 1929 A. Briand submitted the plan, then rejected by England, of the "United States of Europe" (customs and economic union). Count Coudenhove-Kalergi had prepared the way, as regards propaganda, with his Pan-European movement.

[6] Pius XII had called attention, with praise, to the activity of the ILO in an address to the members of the Executive Council of the International Labor Exchange on 19 November 1954 (AAS 46 [1954], 714–18; UG, 6040–48. In his encyclical Mater et Magistra John XXIII expressed his high esteem (103), and Paul VI paid a visit to the organization on the occasion of his visit to the World Council of Churches at Geneva in 1969 and delivered a much noted address (cf. HK 23 [1969], 7, 301f.).

United Nations with its subsidiary and/or successor organizations—UNESCO, FAO, UNICEF, etc.—toward and after the end of the Second World War, the "Declaration of the Rights of Man" by the United Nations of 10 December 1948, and the founding of the European Community, to name only a few of the most important happenings.

The newer Catholic social doctrine, called into being since Leo XIII (1878–1903),[7] experienced in the period after the two world wars, especially since the encyclical Quadragesimo anno of 1931, a vast further development and acquired the contour of a "system," if one understands by a social doctrinal system logically arranged and coherent propositions on the structural principles underlying society. Simultaneously there grew also reflexively the Church's self-consciousness of possessing its own social teaching and of having to present it as obligatory. In his encyclical Mater et Magistra of 1961, John XXIII thus expressed this self-awareness: "We especially point to the fact that the social teaching of the Catholic Church is an integrating component of the Christian doctrine of mankind."[8] "For this reason it is especially important that Our children not only know the principles of the social doctrine but also be formed according to them."[9]

The most important questions and problems with which the social message of the Church had to do were proposed to it through the development indicated earlier in outline. They constitute the "life-centered problems" of the most recent phase in the development of Catholic social teaching.

Thus Pius XI (1922–39)[10] had to deal with the totalitarian ideologies and dictatorship movements of Socialism/Communism, of Fascism, and of National Socialism. To each of the three he devoted a special encyclical.[11] In the world economic crisis, which announced the breakdown and end of the era of liberal economics with the social ills appearing in its wake, appeared the second great social encyclical in the strict sense, Quadragesimo Anno, which, as a follow-up of the encyclical Rerum novarum of 1891, which dealt almost exclusively with the classic social question of the nineteenth century, namely, with the labor problem, had as its subject the disorganization of society.[12] The experiences with the totalitarian dictatorships, especially with National Socialism, made Pius XII (1939–58)[13] the herald of the rights of the human person. Under him there emerged in a stupendous abundance of proclamations of the most varied sort (although he did not compose a social encyclical of his own in the strict sense), the ever clearer outlines of what can be termed Christian "personalism" and "solidarity." Thus is explained his almost obstinate insistence on the principle of subsidiarity. To Pius XII we owe remarkable and penetrating ideas on the problem of democracy, of toleration, and of public opinion. In his range of ideas, that of the underdeveloped countries appears early on. The universal or world common welfare led him to make the notion of a family of mankind again and again the subject of doctrinal expressions and proclaim the vision of a "world state" on the basis of federation. The era of John XXIII (1958–63)[14] was marked by two important social encyclicals which in their statements on the one hand continued the tradition of the Church's social teaching and on the other hand gave important impulses to the following council. Mater et Magistra has already been mentioned. The encyclical Pacem in terris of 1963[15] was experienced in both the West and East as a sensation. It constituted, as has rightly been said, the Pope's last will. In both encyclicals he extensively synchronized the social thought of the Church with the exigencies or, as John XXIII especially liked to express it, with the "signs of the time," or, as the same Pope demanded in his opening address to the Second Vatican Council on 11 October 1962, brought the Church an essential step nearer to aggiornamento. He sought to secure for the striving of mankind for justice and peace, by employing its own manner of speaking, the most profound and ultimate impulses from the Christian view of mankind and of society.

---

[7] AAS 11–35 (1878–1903); Leonis XIII. Pont. Max. Acta, 23 vols. with index (Rome 1881–1905; reprint, Graz 1971).

[8] John XXIII, encyclical Mater et Magistra, of 15 May 1961, 222.

[9] Ibid., 227.

[10] AAS, 14–31 (1922–39).

[11] Encyclical Non abbiamo bisogno (against Italian Fascism) of 29 June 1931: AAS 23 (1931), 285–312; encyclical Divini Redemptoris (against atheistic Communism) of 19 March 1937: AAS 29 (1937), 65–106; encyclical Mit brennender Sorge (against National Socialism) of 14 March 1937: AAS 29 (1937), 145–67.

The Social Claim to Educate and Its Bases: Natural Law and Revelation ("Question of Competence")

In Rerum novarum Leo XIII had already laid claim to the social doctrine to teach. "With full confidence We approach this task and in the awareness that the word belongs to Us" (13). Pius XI energetically repeated this claim in Quadragesimo anno and at the same time made it more precise against possible misinterpretations. "The deposit of truth entrusted to Us by God and the holy duty committed to Us by God to proclaim the moral law in its entire compass, to declare, and, whether or not he desires it, to press for its observance subject on this side both the social and the economic sphere without reservation to Our supreme judgment" (41).

---

[12] The heading of the encyclical of 15 May 1931 reads: "On the social order, its restoration, and its perfection according to the plan of salvation of the Gospel."

[13] AAS 31–50 (1939–58).

[14] AAS 50–55 (1958–63).

[15] The encyclical appeared under the date of 11 April 1963, Maundy Thursday, and bears the heading: "On peace among all peoples in truth, justice, love, and freedom."

Three considerations simultaneously justify and limit the Church's claim: (1) Society and economics cannot be considered apart from the moral law; (2) under this exclusive respect—"not in questions of a technical sort for which [the Church] neither disposes of the suitable means nor has received a mission, but in everything which is related to the moral law" (41)—a sovereign authority belongs to the Church or, respectively, the ecclesiastical teaching office; (3) this has nothing to do with unjust claims to power, as they are often imputed to the Church.[16]

Pius XII not only frequently confirmed this claim of his predecessors,[17] but regarded as a legitimation of the Church's claim the ontological fact of the "intrinsic involvement," as G. Gundlach calls it, of the Church with society and expressed this state of affairs in the controversial formula of the Church as the "vital principle of human society."[18] John XXIII unmistakably made the same claim when he had his first social encyclical begin, almost as with a roll of drums, with the words: "Mother and teacher of peoples is the Catholic Church" (Mater et Magistra, 1).

Pius XII, with appeal to Leo XIII, characterized as the "undeniable sphere of the Church" the judgement on those principles "of the eternally valid order . . . which God, the Creator and Redeemer, has made known through natural law and revelation." His essential statement in this question is: "Rightly: for the principles of natural law and the truths of revelation both have, as two in no way opposite but parallel water courses, their common source in God" (UG, 498).

---

[16] Already in his first encyclical, Ubi arcano of 23 December 1922 (AAS 14 [1922], 673–700) the Pope had solemnly asserted: "The Church would regard it as an encroachment for it to intervene without cause in earthly matters." Quoting himself, the Pope resumed this central statement in 41 of Quadragesimo anno. Literature on the Church's claim to a social doctrine: O. von Nell-Breuning, S. J., Die soziale Enzyklika (Cologne 1932, reprint 1950), 59f.; G. Gundlach, S. J., Die Kirche zur heutigen Wirtschafts- und Gesellschaftsnot. Erläuterung des Rundschreibens Papst Pius' XI. "Quadragesimo Anno" (2d ed., Berlin, 1949), 17f.

[17] Especially clearly in his radio message on Pentecost, 1 June 1941: AAS 33(1941), 195–205; UG, 493–522. The address occurred on the Golden Jubilee celebration of Rerum novarum.

[18] Pius XII made his own this word, coined by G. Gundlach, S. J., first in his address of 20 February 1946 to the College of Cardinals (UG, 4106), later twice more, both times in radio messages to German Katholikentage (Bochum, 4 September 1949: UG, 611; Berlin, 17 August 1958: UG, 4520).

The idea of natural law, undoubtedly dominant in the newer Catholic social doctrine since Leo XIII, experienced under Pius XII an important further development. The "authenticity of natural law," still always a problem in a developed dynamic society, was appealed to by Pius XI in connection with the right of property, which, as "history shows," "is not immutable" (Quadragesimo anno, 49). But while in tradition an authenticity or "mutability" of natural law was derived rather ab extra, that is, from the changes of external circumstances or conditions (circumstantiae), for Pius XII there ensues from the study of the history of the development of law the fact that, under special conditions, specific rights can change ab intra, from their content. Of course, there is an unchangeable nucleus in natural law.

Pius XII developed this idea in greater detail in one of his most noted addresses, which he gave on 13 October 1955 to the Centro Italiano per la Riconciliazione Internazionale.[19] Because the matter is sufficiently important, the decisive sentences are repeated here verbatim: "The study of history and of legal development from remote times teaches that, on the one hand, a change in economic and social (and often also in political) situations demands new forms of those postulates of natural law to which the systems hitherto prevailing can no longer do justice; but, on the other hand, that in connection with these changes the fundamental demands of nature always recur and pass themselves on, with greater or less urgency, from one generation to the others."[20]

In his address of 7 September 1955 to the participants of the Tenth International Congress of Historians[21] Pius XII had already formulated for the Church the claim, as "historical power," as "living organism," regularly to intervene in the sphere of public life "in order to assure the correct balance between duties and obligations on the one side and rights and freedoms on the other."[22]

Also with Pius XII we still find the problem, drawn along from tradition, especially by Leo XIII, of defining the relations of natural law, truth, and the discovery of truth. True, there is expounded by him in connection with the discussion of democracy the essential function of public opinion for a democratic commonwealth. In the complete absence of public opinion must be seen "a lack, a weakness, a sickness of social life."[23] But the truth, also the true perception of the norms of natural law as possessed "objective" truth, is claimed for the Church and the teaching office in such a manner that all other tribunals, even public opinion, must stand almost rather as hearers, as receivers of the second rank.

---

[19] AAS 47 (1955), 764–75; UG, 6275–99. The address was concerned with the problem of "coexistence and common life of peoples in truth and love."

[20] UG, 6286.

[21] AAS 47 (1955), 672–82; UG, 5893–5914. The close succession in time of this and the address mentioned in n. 19 shows how Pius XII moved the problem of the historicity of law precisely to that moment.

[22] UG, 5901.

In this context one can now—in contrast to almost all other statements in which there is incorrectly mention of a "turn" in thought—ascertain in John XXIII a genuine breakthrough to new shores. If he speaks of truth or of the rights bestowed by God on mankind in its very nature, then he presupposes the entire traditional theology of these rights, in regard to which, however, Leo XIII, Pius XI, and also to a great extent even Pius XII had basically come to a standstill. But this did not satisfy John XXIII. To him it was not a question, in an encyclical, moreover, that was oriented to the whole pluralistic world, only of the absolute, eternal, changeless truth, which, furthermore, is not capable of being imposed by the teaching office in an ideologically dismembered world. For him the truth was concretized, knowledge of truth grows in the "veracity" of mutual human relationships. Supported on the hope of rational understanding and love among people,[24] the optimistic Pope believed in the realization of veracity in human relationships as the basis of the feasibility of every knowledge of truth. Truth is no longer a merely possessed, guarded, and authoritatively interpreted objective Depositum; truth occurs rather in the freedom of mankind as a social process of truth finding. Here is present a gifted understanding of the so powerfully fatigued formula of the identity of "theory and practice."

Because of the importance of the matter, the central statements of the Pope will again be presented here verbatim: The "happening of truth" lives by this, "that people mutually exchange their perceptions in the bright light of truth, that they are put in the position of making use of their rights and fulfilling their duties, that they are incited to strive for spiritual goods, that from every honorable thing they . . . gain an occasion for common honest joy, that they seek in tireless desire to share among themselves and receive from one another the best they have. These values affect and control everything that is related to scholarship, economics, social institutions, development and organization of the state, legislation, and finally to all other things that constitute externally human coexistence and develop in constant progress."[25] In order that truth "may function" in this way, the right to free expression of opinion and to information in conformity with truth must be respected: "From nature people have . . . the right . . . to seek the truth freely and to express their opinion while respecting the moral order and the common good, to disseminate it, and to exercise any profession; finally, to be informed of public events in accord with the truth."[26] "The truth further commands that a person let himself be guided in the use of the manifold possibilities which were created by the progress of modern means of publication and by which the mutual understanding of peoples is promoted by the highest objectivity."[27]

---

[23] Address to the participants in the International Catholic Press Congress of 17 February 1950 in AAS 42 (1950), 251–57; UG, 2132–53; here, 2134.

[24] Corresponding to the axiom frequently quoted by Thomas Aquinas: "Homo homini naturaliter amicus"; cf. Contra Gentiles, 3, 117; 4, 54, and elsewhere.

In these sentences can rightly be seen the fundamental ethical justification of democracy and at the same time of an ethics of public communication in accord with the times. In the climate of the encyclical Pacem in terris, Paul VI was then able during the council in his own first encyclical Ecclesiam suam of 6 August 1964 to proclaim the dialogue with the world in keeping with the new model of ecclesiastical communications,[28] and the Second Vatican Council was able to acknowledge what in the understanding of the truth the Church owes to the world and its striving for truth. "The experience of the historical past, the progress of scholarship, the riches which lie in the various forms of human culture, through which human nature comes ever more clearly to manifestation and new ways to the truth are opened redound also to the Church's good."[29]

Social Principles: Personality, Subsidiarity, Solidarity, Common Good, Universal Common Good

At the beginning of his encyclical on peace John XXIII puts the central principle of all human social organization: "At the basis of any human coexistence that should be well ordered and fruitful must lie the principle that every human being is by essence a person" (Pacem in terris, 9). "If we consider the dignity of the human person according to revealed truths, we must value it even much more highly" (Pacem in terris, 10).

---

[25] Encyclical Pacem in terris, 38.

[26] Ibid., 12.

[27] Ibid., 90; cf. on this especially G. Deussen, Ethik der Massenkommunikation bei Papst Paul VI. (Abhandlungen. zur Sozialethik 5), ed. by W. Weber and A. Rauscher (Paderborn 1973), 66f. and passim; cf. on the whole matter also E. W. Böckenförde, Kirchlicher Auftrag und politische Entscheidung (Rombach Academy paperback 55) (Freiburg i. Br. 1973), especially 81ff.

[28] Encyclical Ecclesiam suam, AAS 56 (1964), 609–59.

[29] Pastoral constitution Gaudium et Spes, 44, 2.

1. Pius XI and especially Pius XII had already established the social doctrine of the Church definitively and unmistakably as "personalism." Everything social is related to the person and must promote its perfection. In other words, society has no end in itself, it is no domineering superego but has a ministerial character. The state has to promote the security of the person by guaranteeing the rights of the person as rights implanted in its nature by God. However, at times other social conditions require other emphases. Thus Leo XIII had primarily to defend the existing social order in its basic structure—state, state authority, private property—against anarchist and Marxist strivings, while the experiences with totalitarian states or movements—persecution of Catholics in Russia, Mexico, Spain, Fascism, National Socialism—caused Pius XI to speak again and again for the protection of human freedom and dignity and for the defense of the rights of the Church. But then Pius XII became especially the herald of human liberty and of the dignity of the human person.

To avert from the start any charge of individualism, Pius XII stressed that human rights are not by chance proclaimed as inviolable and inalienable against the state, but that they belong precisely to the "most precious in the common good" (UG, 213),[30] for which the state has to stand up. And so "they can never be sacrificed to the common good, precisely because they are essential ingredients of it" (UG, 213).[31] This truth is so central for Pius XII that he emphatically exclaimed: "This is the Catholic world view!" (UG, 213).

To become politically effective, the rights of the person need a foundation in postive law, a demand which Pius XII had made and which was taken over verbatim by John XXIII from his predecessor.[32] "To the human person also belongs the legal protection of its rights, which must be effective and impartial in harmony with the true norms of justice, as Our predecessor of happy memory, Pius XII, admonishes: 'From the divinely established legal order results the inalienable right of the human being to legal security and with it to a tangible legal sphere, which is protected against every attack of caprice' " (Pacem in terris, 27).[33]

---

[30] Address to the participants of the International Congress for Humanistic Studies of 25 September 1949 in AAS 41 (1949), 555–56; UG, 356–61. Here the Pope expressed himself on the natural law as the basis of the Church's social doctrine.

[31] Message to the Katholikentag in Berlin of 10 August 1952 in AAS 44 (1952), 723–27; UG, 203–18.

[32] On the list of basic or human rights, which John XXIII, in comparison with his predecessor, greatly expanded, cf. Pacem in terris, 11–27.

2. All other principles of Catholic social doctrine, especially the principle of "Catholic" subsidiarity that has entered into general linguistic use, follow from the principle of the person with logical cogency. Already long evident in accord with its esential content in its beginnings,[34] in Leo XIII especially established in connection with the preeminence of the family over the state—cf. Rerum novarum, 10: "Since domestic common life, according to both the notion and the reality, is earlier than the civic community, so too its rights and duties have precedence, because they are closer to nature"; cf. also Rerum novarum, 38, in relation to free social unions and their relation to the state—it finds its classic definition in Quadragesimo anno: "Just as whatever the individual man can accomplish on his own initiative and with his own abilities must not be taken from him and allotted to the activity of society, so it is contrary to justice to claim for the wider and higher community whatever the smaller and subordinate communities can achieve and lead to a good end; at the same time it is entirely injurious and confuses the entire social order. Every activity of society is subsidiary in conformity to its nature and concept; it should support the members of the body social but must never destroy or absorb them . . . . The better the hierarchical order of the various socializations is maintained through strict observance of the principle of subsidiarity, the more social authority and social effectiveness stand out and the better and more fortunately is the state administered" (Quadragesimo anno, 79–80).

The principle of subsidiarity finds its justification as much in the liberty of the person as also in the structure of the smaller life groups, whose rights to life must not be curtailed by encroachments of more extensive social organizations ("statism"). On the one hand it protects the identity and privacy of the person and of the intermediate groups and institutions between the individual and the state—"defensive" function—and on the other hand it demands, according to the original meaning of the word, "help (subsidium) from above to below," if the individual or the smaller life groups, for example, the family, fail in their task of educating, with or without guilt—"responsible" function. It goes without saying that Pius XII as a determined defender of the rights of mankind especially stressed the "defensive" function of the principle of subsidiarity. Other situations demand other accentuations of the principle.

---

[33] The quotation from Pius XII is taken from the Christmas message of 24 December 1942 in AAS 35 (1943), 9–24; UG, 219–71; here, 261.

[34] Cf. J. Höffner, Christliche Gesellschaftslehre (5th ed., Kevelaer 1968), 50.

Pius XI characterized the principle as "gravissimum illud principium" (Quadragesimo anno, 79), which, with regard to the importance of the principles of solidarity and of the common good, must probably not be translated as "sovereign principle" but rather as "extremely significant principle." Pius XII calls the principle a "principle constantly defended by the social doctrine of the Church,"[35] and emphasized its validity "even for the life of the Church, without prejudice to its hierarchical structure."[36]

With John XXIII we find the principle of subsidiarity frequently referred to in Mater et Magistra directly (53) and indirectly (for example, 165), less in its defensive function than in its positive function of the support of society in regard to the weaker. In Pacem in terris the Pope also directly considers the principle (140). Here he especially stresses the right of the smaller life groups, of the corps intermédiaires within the political community (cf. Pacem in terris, 24).

3. In the human person identity—singularity, individuality—and being part of society—socialization, mutual dependence, and need for society as a reference point—are intertwined. Person is "identity in the rational subject." From this state of being flows the principle of solidarity, by which all individualism and all collectivism is rejected. On the basis of these considerations the personalism of Catholic social doctrine is presented under the aspect of "solidarism."[37] This name not only aims to express an ethical attitude of solidarity but to express a state of being, namely, the fact that all people in their respective social relations—individuals among themselves, in the union of the family, in the intermediate groups, in the state, in the community of nations—stand in an ontological union and reciprocal obligation to one another. This union demands social and legal organization in the sense of the principle of subsidiarity, by which the uniting of the two principles takes place. The Popes have not employed the concept of solidarism, but have argued, especially Pius XII, essentially in the sense of solidarism. More frequently, on the contrary, is the "principle of

---

[35] Letter to the directors of the Twenty-Fourth Social Week of France of 18 July 1947 on basic questions of the economic order in UG, 3250–57; here 3255.

[36] Address to the College of Cardinals of 20 February 1946 in AAS 38 (1946), 141–51; UG, 4086–4111; here 4094.

[37] The principle of solidarity was scientifically justified and presented especially by H. Pesch (d. 1926), G. Gundlach (d. 1963), and O. von Nell-Breuning, who also gave its social-science system the name of "Solidarism," which, however, was unable to impose itself.

fraternal solidarity" affirmed, both as an ontological as well as an ethical principle of action.[38]

4. The service function of society and of the state lies in promoting the common good. This does not consist, as corresponding to the individualistic concept, in the sum total of individual goods but has its own quality. It also does not oppose the just claims and expectations of individuals, but, as Pius XII said, the rights of the person pertain to the "most precious in the common good" (UG, 359).[39] But it is the task of the state to reduce the often egoistic claims to one measure to be expected of and tolerable to all. To this extent the idea and realization of the common good stand against the pure standpoint of interest and power.

There have been controversies as to whether the common good is to be defined in the sense of bona communia, hence primarily in regard to content, or whether rather it aims at the making possible of bene vivere in communitate, that is, at the organizational side of society. The question is not only of academic interest, since in a pluralistic society a consensus as to the content of the common good, apart perhaps from the minima moralia, may be difficult to reach and besides in an ideologically colored dictatorship the content of the common good can be decreed in a totalitarian fashion—common good=good of the German people=good of the Aryan race. Both Pius XII and John XXIII stressed the primarily organizational function of the common good. This appears clearly from the descriptive definition which John XXIII gives in Mater et Magistra. According to the "correct notion of the common good," this embraces "the aggregate of those social presuppositions which make possible or easier to people the full development of their values" (Mater et Magistra, 65). From this definition it follows that the content or "values" do not belong primarily to the common good, that this rather presupposes them and should make possible and promote their development. Exactly in this sense had G. Gundlach, the adviser of Pius XII of long standing, already interpreted the common good in his commentary on Pius XII's Christmas address of 24 December 1942,[40] when, characterizing the common good as "organizing element," he declared it to be impossible "that the organizing element as such determines that which is to be organized, which ideally presupposes it, namely, the inner structure of social life with the objective 'common goods' (the person with the cultural and religious values)."[41]

---

[38] As regards the matter, the principle of solidarity occupies much space in the first encyclical of Pius XII, Summi Pontificatus of 20 October 1939 (AAS 31 [1939], 413–53; UG, 1–92; here, especially 25–37; cf. also UG, 3293–94 from the Christmas message of 24 December 1952 in AAS 45 [1953], 33–46; see also Pacem in terris, 114, 117ff.).

[39] See n. 30.

[40] In Periodica 32 (1943), 79–96 and 216–24. Here according to G. Gundlach, S. J. Die Ordnung der menschlichen Gesellschaft I (Cologne 1964) 108–27.

Thus the circle again ends with the individual, whose development ultimately serves the common good. Thus the common good is the correct organizing principle—in the sense of becoming—or, respectively, as the correct organization—in the sense of being—of society, a view which is possible only with regard to society's subsidiary and solidarist character. Thereby all principles of the Catholic social doctrine culminate in the common good.

5. There is no encyclical in which the common good is so often and in such diverse connections appreciated and stipulated for a wholesome common life as in Mater et Magistra.[42] However, after it had been regarded in the past predominantly under the aspect of the national state—the state as primary guarantor of the common good—after the early peace efforts of Benedict XV and Pius XI, under the growing impression of the "unification of the world," the threat of a nuclear catastrophe, and the problem of underdeveloped countries, the idea of a world common good more and more gained ground. Pius XII saw in the relations to the other states an integrating part of the internal common good. "Serve," he said to journalists, "it [your people and state], however, in the conviction that its good relations to other nations, the understanding of their peculiarity, and the respect for their rights belong equally to the bonum commune of your own people and more effectively prepare for and consolidate peace as many another means."[43] Finally, John XXIII speaks clearly of the "universal common good" (Pacem in terris, 132ff.), from which he deduces the necessity of a world state with "universal political power" (Pacem in terris, 137). But even on this high plane the human person must remain the ultimate goal of all social life. "Just as the common good of individual states cannot be defined without regard to the human person, so also not the universal common good of all nations together" (Pacem in terris, 139). Thereby, once again the personalist character of Catholic social doctrine is proclaimed in unmistakable clarity.

---

[41] Ibid., 114.

[42] Cf. E. Welty, Die Sozialenzyklika Papst Johannes' XXIII. "Mater et Magistra," mit einem ausführlichen Kommentar sowie einer Einführung in die Soziallehre der Päpste (Herderbücherei 110) (Freiburg i. Br. 1961), 74f., especially also the index: keywords "Gemeinwohl" and "Gemeinwohlgerechtigkeit," 215.

[43] Address to the members of the Union of the Foreign Press in Rome of 12 May 1953 in AAS 45 (1953), 399–402; UG, 2119–31; here, 2129.

State and State Power—Democracy

The most important theological principles concerning state, state power, and common good as the goal of the state had been elaborated in a long tradition to the end of the pontificate of Leo XIII in their basic features. To these belong especially the tracing back of state and state power to God as the Creator of socially oriented humanity and the binding of state power in regard to the maintenance of the common good to the natural law as expression of the Lex aeterna. Questions about the best form of state and government could play a subordinate role in a simple theoretical structural grid that confined itself more to principle.

The Popes since Benedict XV could assume all this as known in essentials and as the certain doctrine of the Church. A brief recapitulation in the appropriate context was sufficient. But meanwhile the new and pressing questions had to do with a detailed specialization of the tasks of the state in view of the totalitarian developments since the First World War, a nuanced justification of state power under the presuppositions of a modern democracy, the question of the functional conditions of democracy in general, and finally the problem of moral norms in a pluralistic democratic society. Thus were the essential themes of the Church's political doctrine designated in the first half of the twentieth century.

1. As regards the end of the state, it was defined by all Popes since Pius XI unambiguously in the light of the social principles further developed above. Especially in connection with the totalitarian movements Pius XI underlined the instrumental character of the state as well as of society in general in relation to the human person. This is nothing else than "a natural means which one can and should use to achieve his goal; for human society exists for people and not vice versa."[44] Pius XII more precisely stated the task of the state in enjoining on it the protection of the rights of the human person (UG, 3455).[45] In this sense the state is primarily a state of law for the guaranteeing of the areas of personal freedom of the citizens. It is at the same time a welfare state, without, however, having to be a state affording total relief; for law and justice oblige it to undertake all political and socio-political measures only with consideration of private initiative, that is, in accord with the principle of subsidiarity. Pius XII warned against the relief state ("Etat-Providence"), "which should grant to each of its citizens for all the vicissitudes of life claims to achievements that are ultimately unrealizable" (UG, 3270).[46] Pius XII also regarded the state only as a means—it is "subordinate to the person and has the sense of a means" (UG, 3763)—and rejected all state planning (UG, 6120).[47] But these considerations in no way exclude the acknowledgment of the necessity of a state authority capable of functioning and equipped with power. In an address to a group of the Youth Union of the Christian Democratic Union of West Berlin on 28 May 1957 Pius XII characterized this acknowledgment precisely as an expression of a "Christian" concept of politics. "The state is not an ultimate, and there is no state omnipotence, but only a state power, and 'Christian politics' has a strong feeling for it. For without power the state cannot accomplish its goal of assuring and promoting the common good by means of a legal and social order adhered to by all" (UG, 6250).[48]

---

[44] Thus Pius XI in his encyclical Divini Redemptoris of 19 March 1937 against atheistic Communism.

[45] Address to the public administration scholars on the meaning and limits of state interference of 5 August 1950 in UG, 3450–57.

John XXIII, who, as noted earlier, stressed the principle of subsidiarity more from its "positive" side—"help from above to below"—expressly says that the state must intervene in the economy "today to a more comprehensive degree than before" (Mater et Magistra, 103), that it "more and more penetrates areas which pertain to the most personal concerns of mankind and" are "therefore of the greatest importance" (Mater et Magistra, 60). But at the same time the limits of its competence are imposed on the state. They lie, to give a few examples, in the common good (Mater et Magistra, 65, 147, 151), in the fundamental rights of the person and the autonomy of the free social groups (Mater et Magistra, 52, 65), in the principle of subsidiarity—or, respectively, in its "defensive" function (Mater et Magistra, 53, 117, 152)—in the God-given arrangement and obligation of values (Mater et Magistra, 205ff.). In order that the state may remain a state of law under modern conditions, which is expressly to be emphasized, John XXIII regards the separation of powers—"that threefold classification of offices"—as "appropriate to human nature" (Pacem in terris, 68). This is the first time that the separation of powers was expressly mentioned in papal social teaching.

2. As regards the legitimization of the concrete agents of state power at a given time, over and above the theological and natural law derivation of the state's authority in general, Leo XIII in his encyclical Diuturnum illud[49] strongly repudiated the liberal thesis that "all power

---

[46] Address to the participants in the International Congress for Social Science of 2 June 1950 in AAS 42 (1950), 485–88; UG, 3258–72.

[47] Address to the Italian Society for Water Supply on the superiority and tasks of private initiative in the life of society of 13 April 1956 in UG, 6118–24.

[48] AAS 49 (1957), 287f.; UG, 6249–52.

[49] Of 29 June 1881 in ASS 14 (1881f.), 3–14.

proceeds from the people." What Leo intended to strike at is clear, namely, the "Contract Thesis," according to which—without any reference to God as the Creator of mankind and its society—the autonomous individuals creatively produce the state, as though in a quasi-contract (Rousseau's contrat social), and hence naturally possess also the absolute right in relation to the appointment of the holder of state power.

Since the republican problem was now in hand because of his Ralliément policy, Leo XIII sought to aid himself with the construction in order that the people of the state might indeed have the possibility of "designating"—the "Designation Theory"—the actual holders of state power but not of appointing and commissioning them—the "Delegation Theory"—in order that the real investiture might follow, as it were, rather from God as Creator of the state. In this way the possibility of a compromise between the republican type of state on the one hand and the connection of state power to its divine origin on the other hand seemed to be maintained. Despite this compromise, whose difficult theological background considerations could not, of course, be comprehended by the theologically less trained wider public, there remained until today a strong mistrust of Leo XIII's attitude to the republic and to democracy. In this context the old Scholastic doctrine, of Thomas Aquinas in its beginnings and fully developed by Francisco Suárez, of the sovereignty of the people unified in the state would have offered itself spontaneously. Pius XII mentions the doctrine, though only en passant, when he speaks of the "thesis which outstanding Christian thinkers at all times have championed," the "principal thesis of democracy," that "the original agent of the political power coming from God [is] the people, not the 'mass' " (UG, 2715).[50]

3. This raises the question of democracy in the Church's social doctrine. As late as the time of John XXIII the basic principle was repeated that it cannot "be decided once and for all which type of state is the more suitable or which is the most appropriate manner in which the state power fulfills its task" (Pacem in terris, 67); for the "necessities of life of any sound community" "are fulfilled or at least can be fulfilled under the same conditions as in other [than democratic] types of government conformable to law" (UG, 2713).[51] Apart from this traditional principle,[52] Pius XII testified to a clear sympathy for peoples

---

[50] Address to the Sacred Roman Rota of 2 October 1945 on the difference between the ecclesiastical and the civil jurisdiction in AAS 37 (1945), 256–62; UG, 2702–24.

[51] Ibid.

[52] That tradition in general can also become a fetter was expressed by the Anglican D. L. Munby in an article on Gaudium et Spes, in which he sees in it a "restriction" of the who require "a system of government that is more in harmony with the dignity and liberty of the citizens" (UG, 3469).[53]

For Pius XII it especially mattered to ask which assumptions must be realized for the functioning of democracy. He saw before him the empty appearance of a purely formal democracy, which "serves only as a disguise for something wholly undemocratic" (UG, 3482). It must be noted that Pius XII stressed this in the radio address for the last Christmas of the war in 1944, hence on the eve of the foreseeable end of two dictatorships—Fascism and National Socialism—and of the possibility thereby being sketched of a democratic state constitution for the nations concerned after the war's end. The state, including the democratic, "does not mechanically contain and unite in itself a formless aggregation of individuals in a defined territory, it is and must be an organized and organizing unity of an actual people" (UG, 3475). This was said against the individualistic notion of democracy, according to which faceless abstract individuals join together politically. Pius calls it more often "mass" in contrast to "people." For him the state citizen as a person is always personne située, that is, a person to be seen in different social contexts.

Pius XII thereby recalls the fact especially annoying today that people are unequal for the most diverse reasons. But this in no way injures "the civic equality of rights"; it gives to each, "vis-à-vis the state,

---

Church's social doctrine "that continuity must be maintained, and hence new insights must be expressed in terms of old ideas. Some of them make themselves all too painfully noticeable in the text [of Gaudium et Spes]" ("Das Wirtschaftsleben im Urteil des Konzils und des Weltkirchenrates," Oeconomia Humana. Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft auf dem II. Vatikanischen Konzil [Cologne 1968], 461).

[53] Christmas message of 24 December 1944 in AAS, 37 (1945), 10–23; UG, 3467–3510. Here there is question of the most important address of Pius XII and probably in general of the Popes of modern times on the problem of "true democracy." The concept "democracy" was not always unambiguous in the Church's terminology. In the nineteenth century by "Christian democracy" was meant especially the rising social reform movement among Catholics of Western and Central European countries, which, however, was understood primarily as a "social" movement and did not necessarily coincide with the striving for "political democracy." After Leo XIII this linguistic use ceased and at the latest since Pius XII there has been understood by it, when there is talk of democracy, a political idea in the strict sense and not a general social concept. The demand for "democratization of all spheres of life," the slogan "democracy as life-style," often used as political war cries, have found no entry into the language of the Church and of Catholic social teaching. Catholic social doctrine sees the justified concern which is concealed behind these formulas, without conforming to their exaggerations, in the better application of its social principles—the principle of subsidiarity—and, more recent in terminology, in the realization of more "participation," "taking part" by all people in the process of the political, social, economic, and even ecclesiastical life, adequately, better, and objectively considered.

the right . . . to lead his own personal life in honor" (UG, 3478). In other words, the freedom of the person gives him the right to be "different" while maintaining intact the civic political equality of rights. That the continuation of such tension between the poles of freedom and equality needs, of course, the "genuine spirit of community and fraternity" (ibid) Pius knows and he thereby makes known that he does not overlook one of the three ideals of democracy which has meanwhile fallen into oblivion, namely the "principle of fraternity." The Christmas address of 1944 is thus a real comprehensive hermeneutic interpretation of the ideals of "Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity" (cf. especially UG, 3478).

4. Leo XIII and Pius XI had already deduced, arguing from the fact that people are by nature unequal, that the state must be an organic functional structure in which a large plurality of various groups and institutions in their own right seek to realize the common good by means of the enclosing function of the state. Neither an antagonistic class society nor a faceless, classless society corresponds to this "organic" concept. In this context must be viewed the Pope's insistence on family and private property as areas of freedom of the person within the state, and also on the much abused "corporate order," which is better designated as "meritocracy." Pius XI contrasted the idea of the meritocracy to the economic social chaos into which liberalism had plunged society.[54] Since G. Gundlach had evidently already decisively assisted in preparing the idea for Quadragesimo anno[55] and strongly favored it until his death in 1963, it becomes clear why Pius XII also came back to it so frequently, while in Mater et Magistra John XXIII no longer spoke of it directly. However, he considered the plural diversity of social life and political compromise among groups as very necessary. But his allusion to the "present day" (Mater et Magistra, 66) should probably mean that there can be no permanently obligatory ideal solution. John thereby abandons the concrete model but not the fundamental idea of the "corporate order" when he demands that the social systems lead their own life and be able "really to develop by virtue of their own right" (Mater et Magistra, 65).

5. Only in outline can still other important presuppositions for the progress of democracy from the view of papal social teaching be

---

[54] Pius XI developed the idea in Quadragesimo anno, 81–87, immediately after the classic definition of the principle of subsidiarity (79–80), which, moreover, in this formulation goes back to G. Gundlach, S.J., since he saw in it an especially important case of applying the principle. Later he came back to it once more in Divini Redemptoris.

[55] Cf. also O. von Nell-Breuning, S.J., "Der Königswinterer Kreis und sein Anteil an Quadragesimo anno," J. Broermann, P. Herder-Dorneich eds., Soziale Verantwortung. Festschrift für Goetz Briefs zum 80. Geburtstag (Berlin 1968), 571–85, especially 579ff.

mentioned: Democracy cannot rely exclusively on legal assurances, otherwise it is condemned to fall. It depends "on the moral character of the citizens" (UG, 4393).[56] From this it also follows—Pius XII thus addresses the problem of an élite for democracy—that precisely in a democracy high moral demands must be made on the holders of state power. Of course, those people "whose spiritual and moral predisposition is sufficiently sound and fruitful [will find] in themselves the spokesmen and overseers of democracy . . . men who personally live from those predispositions and understand how to transform themselves in fact" (UG, 3486).[57] Also important is the political education of the citizens, not only the instruction on the manner of operation of democratic institutions but especially the introduction "to the protection of their true interests and especially of their conscience" (UG, 1779).[58] Pius XII very urgently admonishes Christians to exercise the right to vote and elect, the neglect of which means a danger for democracy (UG, 4305).[59] Not least is it required that the Christian in a democracy make himself available for the construction of an enduring order of law and peace both within and without (UG, 180).[60]

6. As regards the relations of Church and state, Benedict XV in his address on the occasion of the secret consistory of 21 November 1921[61] had proclaimed the inalienable right of the Church to freedom from all state interference. Pius XI demanded, vis-à-vis the totalitarian states, the right of the citizens to free exercise of their faith[62] and the right of the Church to proclaim its message and to form consciences.[63] Pius XII spoke of a "legitimate laicism of the state" (UG, 4555),[64] which was always a principle of the Church. Nevertheless between Church and state there must not prevail a cool and separating atmosphere. A "complete" separation of the two cannot be approved (UG, 3985).[65] In other respects Pius XII does not tire of presenting the [56] Christmas address of 23 December 1956 on the Christian image of mankind in AAS 49 (1957), 5–22; UG, 4377–4420.

---

[57] See n. 53.

[58] Address to the teachers and students of the Italian public normal schools of 19 March 1953 in AAS 45 (1953), 230–38; UG, 1771–91.

[59] Letter to the chairmen of the Forty-First Social Week of France of 14 July 1954 in Osservatore Romano of 21 July 1954; UG, 4296–4312.

[60] Letter to the Catholic Youth of Germany of 23 May 1952 in AAS 44 (1952), 527–31; UG, 168–82.

[61] Allocution In hac quidem of 21 November 1921 in AAS 13 (1921), 421–524.

[62] Encyclical Mit brennender Sorge; M, 311.

[63] Encyclical Ubi Arcano; M, 1130.

[64] Address to the Picene (=the Marches) People's Group of 23 March 1958 in AAS 50 (1958), 216–20; UG, 4545–55.

[65] Address to the Sacred Roman Rota of 29 October 1947 in AAS 39 (1947), 493–98; UG, 2744–58.

fortunate impact of the Church on the state (for example, UG, 4103f, 3450f.).[66]

The Church and the Social Errors of the Age

SOCIALISM–COMMUNISM

In the nineteenth century socialism became the chief adversary of the Church and of social Catholicism in the social sphere. While Leo XIII had had to deal essentially with a complete Marxist ideology,[67] which moreover had not yet acquired any political relevance of great importance, Pius XI could attest for socialism a development which he concisely sketched as follows: "If in Leo's time socialism was chiefly at least a homogeneous structure with a definitely complete doctrinal system, today it has developed in two sharply opposed and violently contending main trends, without, of course, having forsaken the anti-Christian basis common to all socialism."[68] Pius XI spoke of "socialism become Communism" and of the "more moderate direction which today the designation 'socialism' still retains."[69]

---

[66] Address to the College of Cardinals of 20 February 1946 in AAS 38 (1946), 141–51; UG, 4086–4111. Address to the public administration scholars of 5 August 1950 in UG, 3450–457.

[67] Cf. the encyclical Quod Apostolici muneris of 28 December 1878 in AAS 11 (1878), 369–76; M, 139–67; also the encyclical Rerum novarum of 15 May 1891 in AAS 23 (1890 seqq.), 641–70; M, 510–71, especially 514–17.

[68] Quadragesimo anno, 111.

[69] Ibid., 112f. "Socialism" (Communism) appears from the nineteenth century both as an idea and also in the form of political movements. The developments and increasing differentiations in the ideological sphere make it extraordinarily and in a growing degree difficult for the teaching authority of the Church to take a position on the "socialism" syndrome. While even under Pius XI the pretty thick category: Communism—"moderate" socialism (=revisionism, liberal-democratic socialism) could to a degree uncover the ideological and political reality, this is no longer sufficient for the period after the Second World War and especially since the 1960s, after Soviet Communism and Maoism became the great antagonists in world politics and Neo-Marxist currents spread into the public discussion and especially into the academic sphere. Precisely these latter obtained through the elaboration of the "Paris Manuscripts" of the young Marx from 1844—only rediscovered in 1932, in connection with the resistance to the Fascist and Nazi dictatorships that were then being established, indirectly by way of the United States since the 1960s—the greatest importance also in Europe. On this to the present there is no precise stand taken by the Church's teaching office, at most the warnings issued by Pope Paul VI because of the invasion of Neo-Marxism into various modern theologies—"Theology of Liberation," "Theology of Revolution," "Christians for Socialism," and the like—in his apostolic letter Octogesima adveniens of 14 May 1971 to Cardinal Maurice Roy against an all too thoughtless adoption "of Socialist tendencies and their various developments" by Christians (Octogesima adveniens, 31; cf. also the following numbers of the letter).

In Quadragesimo anno the Pope did not employ many words in the criticism of Communism, probably because among Christians and Catholics doubts in regard to it are scarcely possible. What especially characterizes Communism in the Pope's view is, first, the open and ruthless force with which it seeks its goal, then its hostility to God and Church. However, what concerned the Pope was the warning against the heedlessness of those "who, regardless of the danger threatening from this side, look on calmly as the exertions of a violent and bloody revolution are borne into the whole world" (Quadragesimo anno, 112). Just as he did to the two other totalitarian ideologies of his day, Fascism and National Socialism, Pius XI also devoted to "atheistic Communism" a special encyclical, which appeared on 19 March 1937 and began with the words Divini Redemptoris.[70] In it the Pope provided evidence that the Marxist doctrine at the basis of Communism experienced an expressly atheistic interpretation in dialectical materialism. In this way mankind was robbed of its freedom, the spiritual foundation of its human way of life and its dignity.

Pius XII also adhered clearly and unambiguously to his predecessor's express condemnation of the social system and the ideology of Communism. By means of decrees of the Holy Office of 1 July 1949 and 28 July 1950 not only membership in the Communist Party but even its promotion was threatened with excommunication.[71] The Pope could not conceive of the hope of "peaceful coexistence" with the Communist systems as a compromise but only as "coexistence in truth."[72] Blows against the rights of the Church, for the most part connected with persecution and imprisonment of leading bishops, were answered by the Pope with the excommunication of those responsible, as in the cases of the Yugoslav Archbishop Stepinac on 14 October 1946, the Hungarian Cardinal Mindszenty on 28 December 1948 and on 12 February 1949, of the Czech Cardinal Beran on 17 March 1951, and of the Polish Cardinal Wyszyński on 30 September 1953.

John XXIII put the accents differently. Not only that in the spring of 1963 he received in audience the son-in-law of the then first secretary of the Central Committee of the Communist party, Nikita Khruschev, and that he sent Cardinal König of Vienna and an official of the Secretariat of State to Budapest and thereby took the first steps in the direction of a new Vatican "Eastern Policy"; in doctrinal evaluation he also sought cautious nuances. In his encyclical Pacem in terris he believed he could distinguish between the ideology of Marxism-socialism on the one hand and certain humane concerns on the other. He wrote: [It is] "entirely appropriate to distinguish specific movements which deal with economic, social, cultural questions or policy from false philosophical doctrinal views on the nature, origin, and end of the world and of mankind, even if these movements originated in such doctrinal views and are stirred up by them.[73]

---

[70] AAS 29 (1937), 65–105; M, 168–247.

[71] Decree of the Holy Office on membership in the Communist Party of 1 July 1949 in AAS 41 (1949), 334; Decree of the Holy Office on membership in Communist Youth Organizations of 28 July 1950 in AAS 42 (1950), 533; cf. other pertinent documents in HK 13 (1958 seqq.), 2, 69.

[72] Christmas message of 24 December 1954 in AAS 47 (1955), 15–28; UG, 6307–39.

The years of the "Dialogue between Christianity and Marxism" starting after John XXIII, the breaches in the dike, which occurred in various parts of the world in the form of a "Theology of Revolution," "Liberation Theology" on a Marxist basis, led Paul VI, in order to round out the picture, to warn of a confusion of Christianity and Marxism. And so he wrote in his apostolic letter Octogesima adveniens of 17 May 1971—the eightieth anniversary of Rerum novarum—: "If in Marxism as it is concretely lived these different facets and questions can be distinguished which present themselves positively for the reflection and action of Christians, it would be foolish and dangerous to reach the point where one forgets the inner bond which basically joins them together, that one adopts the elements of the Marxist analysis without recognizing its relations with the ideology and participates in the class struggle and appropriates its Marxist interpretation while neglecting to perceive the type of totalitarian and brutal society to which this method of proceeding leads."[74]

Quite different and more difficult for the discussion within the Church was the prolonged confrontation with what Pius XI in Quadragesimo anno had termed the "moderate trend" in socialism. Again and again the discussion was enkindled by two central statements of the Pope: "Socialism, no matter whether as doctrine, as historical phenomenon, or as movement, . . . is always irreconcilable with the doctrine of the Catholic Church—for then it would have to cease to be socialism: the opposition between Socialist and Christian notions of society is irreconcilable."[75] "If socialism, like any error, also contains something right, which the Popes have never denied, still at its foundation lies a concept of society which is proper to it but stands in opposition to the authentic Christian concept. Religious socialism and Christian socialism are contradictions in themselves; it is impossible to be simultaneously a good Catholic and a real Socialist."[76]

---

[73] Pacem in terris, 159; especially this passage was at that time applauded by Communist states. The Polish Communists had a larger than life-size statue erected to the "Pope of the peace encyclical" on the Oder at Wroclaw near the church of "Mary of the Sand," which can still be seen there.

[74] Apostolic letter Octogesima adveniens of 14 May 1971; AAS 63 (1971), 401–41.

[75] Quadragesimo anno, 117.

That the discussion, especially in Germany, did not get more strongly under way until after 1945 and then especially since the "Godesberg Program" of the Social Democratic Party of Germany is explained, first, by the fact that during the period of National Socialism public discussion was not possible, and, second, by the fact that the Social Democratic Party, in its effort to change from a class party to a popular party with its program of 1959, especially had to assure the Catholic part of the population that the socialism which Pius XI had meant in Quadragesimo anno had nothing in common with the Social Democratic Party after the Second World War.

The just quoted verdict of Pius XI against socialism appeared with the claim of being able to say with certainty what socialism really is. According to Pius XI the special ideological nucleus of socialism, which makes it what it is, is not Marxism or class conflict, but, as it is put tersely in the just quoted passage from Quadragesimo anno, "a concept of society . . . which is proper to it but stands in opposition to the authentic Christian concept." The unmistakably proper basic axioms as regards the Christian notion of society are according to Quadragesimo anno, 118f.: the human being was created by God as a person with his social nature, in his own image; also the necessary social authority is based ultimately in God, the Creator of mankind and final end of all things. Also, the commentary of the encyclical: "Of all this, socialism knows nothing; completely unfamiliar and indifferent to it is this exalted definition of both mankind and society; it sees in society solely a useful institution."[77]

The claim to know what socialism is and to repudiate it as such was accordingly based by Pius XI on the incontestable fact that socialism was indebted to an ideological liberalism which withdrew mankind and its sociability from its origin and reference to God and thereby drove it to a road which the Christian could no longer accept. O. von Nell-Breuning expressed it thus: "With good reason socialism is called 'the natural child of liberalism'" or, respectively, "proletarian liberalism."[78]

Pius XII said nothing on the theme of "moderate" or "liberal" socialism which went beyond Pius XI. In regard to him it can be admitted that from his viewpoint he had to add nothing essential to the verdict of Quadragesimo anno.

In the years around the death of Pius XII (1958–59) falls a period of heightened discussions of the relations of Christianity and socialism, especially of the Catholic Church and liberal socialism. The meeting of the Catholic Academy in Bavaria on "Christianity and Democratic Socialism" in January 1958 became a much noticed event in the political life of the Federal Republic of Germany: at it for the first time representatives of the Social Democratic Party and of German social Catholicism met to undertake the effort to demolish the traditional oppositions which were not for the last time still determined by the verdict of Quadragesimo anno. The leader on the Catholic side at this meeting was the adviser of Pius XII, the German Jesuit Gustav Gundlach, lecturer at the Gregoriana in Rome. He obtained such great attention because, to the general amazement, he came to terms in much greater detail with the rationalism in socialism, and even in liberal socialism, than with Marxism, so that, as the Süddeutsche Zeitung then reported dumbfoundedly, he "scarcely mentioned Marx's name, but instead all the more took offense at the liberal element in social democracy."[79]

---

[76] Ibid., 120.

[77] Ibid., 118.

[78] Cf. K. Forster, ed., Christentum und demokratischer Sozialismus (Munich 1958).

But in this way the chief item of criticism was identical with what Quadragesimo Anno had also criticized, and the burden of proof that this criticism was wrong lay with the Social Democrats and those Catholics who exerted themselves to build bridges.

In two documents addressed to the German Catholics[80] an attempt was made to effect for the socialism of the Godesberg Program a Catholic approval and a revision of the harsh "no" of the encyclical Quadragesimo anno. Naturally, the manner of argumentation was criticized. All unsuitable passages were omitted as clearly disturbing, especially the central text in 118 on the picture of mankind, on the humanum as the normative force of all politics.

The leading Catholic social theologians of the day, G. Gundlach and O. von Nell-Breuning, were in agreement in their estimation of the Godesberg Program. The latter stressed the fundamental differentiation from the Christian beginning when in 1960 he unmistakably declared in the first of the two above mentioned brochures of the Social Democratic Party:[81] "Much, it may be said, very much is common, but still not everything. . . . It is especially to be asked—and here our 'but' is inserted. . . . May one, while reading the encyclical, end with [79] Süddeutsche Zeitung of 13 January 1958. On the meeting of the Catholic Academy in Bavaria and its background, cf. for details J. Schwarte, Gustav Gundlach, S.J. (1892–1963). Massgeblicher Repräsentant der katholischen Soziallehre während der Pontifikate Pius' XI. und Pius' XII (Diss. Münster 1974; abbreviated printed ed. Münster 1975).

---

[80] Der Katholik und die SPD (Bonn 1959); Katholik und Godesberger Programm. Zur Situation nach Mater et Magistra (Bonn 1962).

[81] O. von Nell-Breuning, S.J., "Der Katholik und die SPD," Echo der Zeit, no. 7 of 14 February 1960, 1f.

Number 120 and pass over the subsequent paragraphs as not present?" (Numbers 118 and 119 on the Christian view of mankind had also been disregarded.) "Nevertheless," continues von Nell-Breuning, "the title to Numbers 121–22, 'Cultural Socialism,' should catch the eye . . . and the concluding words of 122: 'At the beginning of this cultural socialism stands cultural liberalism; at its end stands cultural Bolshevism.' " Accordingly the answer to the quest for a Catholic approval can logically only fail: "But in the cultural area—and ultimately society and economy are cultural affairs—liberal democratic socialism must first rid itself of its liberal [liberalistic] legacy." A "new edition will then be able to bring that decisively important element which not by chance is apparently lacking in the present one, but in accord with the situation of affairs must unfortunately be lacking." However, the document of 1962 did not bring, in this regard, the "decisively important element," namely, the renunciation of the "liberalistic legacy," and so up to the present for many it is not clear that the "no" of Quadragesimo anno to ideological socialism could be overcome in the form of cultural socialism.

Also the encyclical Mater et Magistra of 1961 brought no essentially new aspects for the further discussion and hence no alleviation for the discussion. At first John XXIII adopted the repudiating attitude of Quadragesimo anno to the "more moderate," revisionist socialism (Mater et Magistra, 34). Later he spoke of "ideologies" which aim to eliminate inner social and international tensions with inadequate means and on false routes, because they possess no correct picture of mankind.[82] And so the discussion of the Church and liberal socialism remained for the future on the agenda beyond John XXIII and the council.

FASCISM–NATIONAL SOCIALISM

Whereas Communism and socialism not only still exist but have experienced a powerful expansion in the whole world and have penetrated with their ideology even into theology and partly into the Church, Italian Fascism and National Socialism, with which Pius XI had to deal, did not survive the end of the Second World War.

Italian Fascism[83] under the leadership of the "Duce" Mussolini never assumed so rigid and ideologically monistic a position as did its counterpart in Germany and its opponent in Russia. Nevertheless, one can designate as its ideological nucleus, under the influence of Hegel and of his Fascist interpreter, Giovanni Gentile (d. 1944), who was minister of education from 1922 to 1925 and in 1923 was responsible for the Fascist reform of education, the Hegelian doctrine of the total state. "La nazione" became the key idea. This involved internally a strong, antiliberal, collectivist policy, and externally imperial claims around the Mediterranean—"Mare nostro": annexation of Libya and Ethiopia and occupation of Albania and Greece during the Second World War. The "Dottrina del Fascismo" culminated in the profession of a national imperialism.[84]

---

[82] Cf. on this: Die Sozialenzyklika Papst Johannes' XXIII. Mater et Magistra, ed. by E. Welty, 144 (Komm. zu MM, 110) and 190f. (Komm. zu MM, 213).

[83] Cf. E. Nolte, Die faschistischen Bewegungen (dtv-Weltgeschichte des 20. Jahrhunderts) (Munich 1973). In contrast to National Socialism, "Fascism" in the period after the Second World War, especially in the socialist camp, had moved beyond its concrete historical form of Italian Fascism to become a generic and systematic concept with a glittering content. It corresponded, according to Karl D. Bracher, to the need to find a counter-idea to Communism, socialism, and democracy. However, an even

The preindividualistic, preliberal, and pre-Fascist values of the family, the people, and the Church, or religion, respectively, worked to consolidate the national idea in the interior sphere. And so Fascism's attitude toward the Church was at first entirely friendly, and Mussolini esteemed it as especially a national cultural agent. And so, following two and one-half years of discussions there occurred the solution of the so-called "Roman Question" and a concordat in the Lateran Treaties of 11 February 1929. The Catholic religion was confirmed as the religion of the Italian state. Nevertheless, there ensued strong tensions, because the total "ethical state" claimed for itself exclusively all rights in the area of education and of youth work and hence curtailed the Church's influence. Only a few months after the conclusion of the Lateran Treaties Pius XI, in a letter of 30 May 1929 to Cardinal Secretary of State Gasparri, attacked the totalitarian interpretation of the treaties by the Fascist state. In the winter of 1930 began Fascism's struggle against "Catholic Action" and in March 1931 open war broke out over the more important role is played by "the growing rejection of the Western liberal theory of totalitarianism in so far as this is based on the comparability of the dictatorships of the right and the left, especially of Fascism, National Socialism, Stalinism, and recently also Maoism; its scheme of the confrontation of democracy and dictatorship is, really simplifying it, suspect as an invention of the Cold War and should be supplanted by the of course no less pithy opposition of Socialism-Fascism" (Karl D. Bracher, "Der Faschismus," Meyers Enzyklopädisches Lexikon 8 [Bibliographisches Institut Mannheim, Vienna and Zürich 1973], 547–51; cf. also Dieter Albrecht, "Zum Begriff des Totalitarismus," Geschichte in Wissenschaft und Unterricht 26 [Stuttgart 1975], 135–41). On this idea of Fascism, constructed for propaganda purposes especially by the East, there is no direct position of the teaching authority. Indirect criticism is contained in the critical position on the violations of human rights or totalitarian social forms.

---

[84] Cf. "Faschismus," Staatslexikon, 3, 6th ed. (1959), 223–31; also, "Faschismus," LThK 4, 2d ed. (1960), 29–31.

autonomy of the Catholic youth organizations. This produced the encyclical Non abbiamo bisogno of 29 June 1931,[85] in which the Pope spelled out his fiery protest against the limiting of ecclesiastical activities in public life and against the unilateral interpretation of the Lateran Treaties. The reaction on the part of Fascism was marked by deep emotions against the Church.[86] After the dust which had been raised by the encyclical had settled, there came about on 2 September 1931 an agreement whereby the Catholic youth organizations were restricted to religious and educational tasks.

In Quadragesimo anno[87] Pius XI attacked Fascist corporatism, the politically monopolistic compulsory organization of employers and employees.

A still more dangerous opponent of the Church sprang up in Germany with the seizure of power by National Socialism in 1933.[88] In contradistinction to Italian Fascism, which essentially disavowed a political theology of its own, National Socialism understood itself as a doctrine of salvation of racist and nationalist style, which raised a total claim to the soul of the German person.

Although in the effort soon to realize a first very important foreign policy success Hitler was able to reach a concordat with the Holy See on 20 July 1933, confrontations were not slow in coming. In addition to the malicious struggle against the Christian faith with all the means of propaganda and of administration, there was especially the "neo-pagan" doctrine, there were the scientifically totally unqualified expositions of revealed religion and its origins in the Old Testament—Cardinal Faulhaber of Munich-Freising: Judentum-Christentum-Germanentum—

---

[85] AAS 23 (1931), 285–312; M, 248–98.

[86] In the Gazzetta, the official organ of the Fascist Party of Calabria and Sicily, one could read on 12 July 1931 the sentence: "Se il Duce ci ordinasse di fucilare tutti i vescovi non esisteremmo un istante." On the entire matter, cf. also the introduction to Non abbiamo bisogno in I. Giordani, ed., Le encicliche sociali dei Pape da Pio XI a Pio XII, 3d ed. (1948), 421–24.

[87] The Pope sees the essential difference from the "corporate order" favored by him in the statism of the Fascist solution (cf. Quadragesimo anno, 91–95). The Pope shares the "apprehension" of those who think that "the state puts itself in the place of free self-activity," the new corporative constitution has "an extremely bureaucratic and political emphasis" (ibid., 95).

[88] B. Stasiewski, Akten deutscher Bischöfe über die Lage der Kirche 1933–1945 1: 1933–1934 (Mainz 1968), 2: 1934–1935 (Mainz 1976), 3: 1935–1936 (Mainz 1978); H. Boberach, Berichte des SD und der Gestapo über Kirchen und Kirchenvolk in Deutschland 1934–1944 (Mainz 1971); "Nationalsozialismus," Staatslexikon 5, 6th ed. (1960), 905–23; "Nationalsozialismus," LThK 7, 2d ed. (1962), 802–5; "Katholische Kirche und Nationalsozialismus," Staatslexikon 10, 6th ed. (1970): cf. especially the collaborative volume, D. Albrecht, ed., Katholische Kirche im Dritten Reich (Mainz 1976), with bibliography and a voluminous report on the research.

which provoked the Church to resistance. On 14 March 1937, five days before the encyclical Divini Redemptoris against atheistic Communism—a timely coincidence in which can be seen a clever, tactical move—the Pope published in German the encyclical Mit brennender Sorge,[89] in whose first, ecclesio-political part he protested against the "treaty reinterpretation, treaty evasion, treaty undermining, and treaty violation" in relation to the concordat, while in the second, religious part he expressly took to task the teachings of National Socialism: racial delusion, myth of "blood and soil," the principle that "that is right which benefits the [German] people," the effort to create a German national Church not bound to Rome. A quite mild protest by the German ambassador at the Holy See, Diego von Bergen, was rejected by the cardinal secretary of state.

With the encyclical Mit brennender Sorge, Pius XI thought he had taken only a first step in the confrontation with racism. Racism appeared to him as an especially virulent ideology against the religiously based unity of the human species. Thus it was made known through a sensational publication from the pen of Thomas Breslin in The National Catholic Reporter of 15 December 1972 and 19 January 1973 to a wide public that Pius XI had on 22 June 1938 commissioned an encyclical, the outline of which was supplied by the American Jesuit John LaFarge and by Gustav Gundlach under the title "Societatis Unio."[90] Because of the change in the See of Peter in March 1939 this encyclical was never published.

In his address to the College of Cardinals of 2 June 1945[91] Pius XII dealt in detail with National Socialism and its consequences for the future. His repeatedly presented appeals toward the end of the war not to impose the war released by Fascism and National Socialism and the crimes perpetrated by them as a moral burden on entire peoples—the "collective guilt thesis"—[92] attracted notice. He thereby already led across to the theme of the understanding of peoples after the war.

---

[89] AAS 29 (1937), 145–67; M, 299–315.

[90] On the background which induced Pius XI to publish a special encyclical against racism and on the preliminaries to a draft, cf. the detailed presentation in J. Schwarte, op. cit., 72–100; there see also a detailed indication of the content of the draft of the encyclical from the pen of G. Gundlach. S.J., 88–94.

[91] AAS 37 (1945), 159–68; UG, 3531–48.

[92] Thus in the address to the College of Cardinals on the Pope's nameday, 2 June 1944 in AAS 36 (1944), 166–75; UG, 4236–65; here, 4258; also in the Christmas message of 24 December 1944 in AAS 37 (1945), 10–23; UG, 3467–3510, here 3500.

Understanding of Peoples: "World State"

In his exertions for peace after the outbreak of the First World War, Benedict XV had again and again referred to the moral force of law vis-à-vis the power of weapons. He was especially concerned further to develop international law on the basis of moral norms and also to inculcate international institutional provisions for a lasting order of peace.[93]

Although the pontificate of Pius XI was not troubled by a world war, still the Pope suffered severely from the consequences of the First World War and the preparedness for war, by no means eliminated from the world but on the contrary renewing itself, with the prospect of an even more terrible war. For this reason he based both his election motto "Pax Christi in Regno Christi" and his first encyclical Ubi arcano of 23 December 1922[94] entirely on the idea of peace and of the understanding of nations. The Pope complained that there was "no human tribunal which could oblige all nations to an international law code in accord with the time."[95] The Pope discreetly offered the aid of the Church, which could be understood entirely in the sense of an arbitration function.[96]

After all the efforts to arrive at an understanding by means of the League of Nations and the Pan-European movement had foundered, after a catastrophic Second World War had afflicted humanity in extensive parts of the world, the Popes of the war and postwar periods saw one of their chief tasks in taking a stand with their means and possibilities for the understanding of peoples. Pius XII considered it as the "special mission" of his pontificate "to contribute in patient and almost grinding activity to leading humanity back to the paths of peace."[97] The Pope demanded an organization of the community of nations with the character of a federation. Into this community must be inserted the sovereign rights of the individual nations "in the framework of international law."[98] Hence, to be repudiated is a principle of the national state which "consists [in] the confusing of national life with nationalistic policy"; for "the national life [is] something nonpolitical,

---

[93] Cf. his admonition to peace "Dès le début" of 1 August 1917 in AAS 9 (1917), 417–20; M, 1083–93.

[94] AAS 14 (1922), 673–700; M, 1094–1160.

[95] M, 1132.

[96] M, 1133. It is noteworthy that Pius XI had no relations with the League of Nations, which had met at Geneva since 1920 at the suggestion of President Wilson.

[97] Christmas message of 24 December 1955 in AAS 48 (1956), 26–41; UG, 6340–74.

[98] Address to the Association of Catholic Jurists of Italy of 6 December 1953 in AAS 45 (1953), 794–802; UG, 3963–86, here 3967.

. . . which only then [became] the principle of the dissolution of the community of nations when people began to exploit it as a means to political ends."[99]

The community of nations presupposes another concept of sovereignty than that of nationalism. The individual state is no longer "sovereign" in the sense of absolute absence of restraints.[100] It is subordinate to international law but not to the extent that it thereby completely loses its independence. Pius XII emphasized that even international law is subject to natural law. Corresponding to his ontological, natural law beginning, questions of national statehood, of sovereignty and its limits, of international association, are not left to the good pleasure of peoples but are determined by the "nature of the thing" in the historical context of the moment. Hence, agreements among states, though belonging formally to positive law, oblige by virtue of natural law if "they contain nothing which would be contrary to sound morality."[101] Pius XII regarded the present organization of nations, the United Nations, in its early stage as not yet ideal, since it had come into being on a "war solidarity" rather than on a true solidarity.[102] However, he said it was an expression of the wish of peoples for a more jointly responsible cooperation, it is a possibility "of speaking to the world conscience from an elevated spot."[103]

Pius XII followed with special sympathy the efforts for unification in Europe, in fact he saw in the unification of Europe "one of the concrete demands of the hour, one of the means of assuring peace to the entire world."[104] He spoke of the "risk" of Europe and stressed that it "is a question of a necessary risk, of a risk, however, which is in accord with current possibilities, of a reasonable risk."[105] As early as 1940 the Pope had seen in a new, united Europe a model for the unity of the family of nations, the possible "start of a new world epoch."[106]

---

[99] Christmas message of 24 December 1954 in AAS 47 (1955), 15–28; UG, 6307–39, here 6326.

[100] As in n. 98 in UG, 3967.

[101] Address to the "Centro Italiano di Studi per la Riconciliazione Internazionale" of 13 October 1955 in AAS 47 (1955), 764–75; UG, 6275–99, here 6287.

[102] Christmas address to the College of Cardinals of 24 December 1948 in AAS 41 (1949), 5–15; UG, 4133–57, here 4150.

[103] Address of 28 October 1947 to the ambassador of El Salvador in AAS 39 (1947), 491–93.

[104] Christmas message of 23 December 1956 in AAS 49 (1957), 5–22; UG, 4377–4420, here 4411.

[105] Christmas message of 23 December 1953 in AAS 46 (1954), 5–16; UG, 654–78, here 674.

[106] Christmas address to the College of Cardinals of 24 December 1940 in AAS 33 (1941), 5–14; UG, 3567–93, here 3582.

If Pius XII had already again and again implored solidarity for a beneficial international order of peace, John XXIII energetically carried this idea further, especially in his encyclical Pacem in terris. "Since the reciprocal relations of states should be regulated in conformity with truth and justice, they must be especially promoted by energetic solidarity. . . . With reference to this, we must keep before our eyes that the state's power was instituted, by its very nature, not to force people into the limits of the existing political community, but especially to look out for the common welfare of the state, which can certainly not be separated from that of the entire human family" (Pacem in terris, 98).

The Pope was convinced that "considering the present state of human society, both the political organization as also the influence of which the individual state power disposes in relation to all other nations of the world [are] to be regarded as inadequate to foster the common good of all peoples" (Pacem in terris, 135). From this "there follows conclusively for the sake of the moral order that a universal political power must be instituted" (Pacem in terris, 137), in other words, that mankind must come to a sort of world state. But the Pope knew that such a general political power, which should lead to a "universal common good" must "be based on the agreement of all peoples and not be imposed by force" (Pacem in terris, 138). And for such a "world state" the principle of subsidiarity must hold good, by which "those relationships are regulated which exist between the authority of the universal political power and the state power of individual nations" (Pacem in terris, 140).

The Pope regarded as important steps, even if not without criticism, the founding of the United Nations and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 10 December 1948 (Pacem in terris, 142f.). In an effort to manifest the Holy See's active interest in an international order of peace, even on the institutional side, he maintained representatives, usually through so-called permanent observers, at many international organizations, including the United Nations and UNESCO, to which, during his time as nuncio at Paris, John XXIII had been assigned as the first permanent observer.

The problem of the underdeveloped countries, which came more clearly in view under Pius XII, experienced under John XXIII a special attention in his two social encyclicals, Mater et Magistra and Pacem in terris. Finally, Paul VI expressed the thorny problem in the concise formula: "Development, the new name for peace."[107]

---

[107] Encyclical Populorum progressio of 26 March 1967. Heading to 76ff.

CHAPTER 8

*Main Lines of the Development of Theology between the First World War and the Second Vatican Council

The Departure from Neo-Scholasticism in Systematic Theology

TEMPORAL AND INTELLECTUAL PRESUPPOSITIONS

The end of the First World War did not produce for Catholic theology that epochal radical change that occurred on the Protestant side, especially in Germany, and became visible as a radical turning from liberal to dialectical theology,[1] from cultural Protestantism to neoorthodoxy.[2] In accord with the stronger forces of continuity in Catholicism, which had grown further through the defense against Modernism, here the further development took place not in dialectical leaps but in a continuous development and in positive progress. Hence at the beginning of this period the effects of the First Vatican Council and the not always positive result of the Modernist controversy became still more clearly discernible. As regards the negative consequences of the suppression of Modernism for Catholic theology, the verdict of R. Aubert must be noted, that "the total balance . . . was less negative than has often been claimed." This applies especially to German theology, which around the turn of the century, it is true, discussed problems raised with the so-called Reform Catholicism,[3] but was not seized by the highest waves of this crisis. The position and the general assessment of this theology, represented especially by the university faculties, in the awareness of the age can be characterized by the fact, episodic to be sure, but still not entirely untypical, that in connection with an inquiry internally organized at some universities in regard to the elimination or retention of the theological faculties the overwhelming majority of professors of the profane disciplines expressed themselves for retention.[4]

---

* Leo Scheffczyk

[1] Technically and biographically this change can be especially clearly grasped in the correspondence of K. Barth and A. von Harnack: "Karl Barth. Ein Briefwechsel mit Adolf von Harnack," Theologische Fragen und Antworten, 3 vols. (Zollikon 1957).

[2] On this cf. the instructive presentation of W. Trillhaas, "Die evangelische Theologie im 20. Jahrhundert," Bilanz der Theologie II, 88–123, especially 101ff.

[3] On the evaluation of this movement, the title of which is not entirely precise, cf., among other works, Y. Congar, Vraie et fausse réforme dans l'église (Paris 1950); A. Hagen, Der Reformkatholizismus in der Diözese Rottenburg (Stuttgart 1962); A. Kolping, Katholische Theologie, 46f.

[4] Transmitted in K. Eschweiler, Die zwei Wege der neueren Theologie (Augsburg 1926), 9.

Of course, this vote was and is not actually to be evaluated as a judgment on the distinguished state of Catholic theology, especially not in respect to all its disciplines. For Germany the cheerful promise of J. I. Döllinger (d. 1890) at the Munich Assembly of Scholars in 1863, according to which the homeland of Catholic theology would lie here for the future,[5] was not fulfilled, especially not for systematic theology (dogmatic theology), which advanced further in the paths of a not excessive but still moderate Neo-Scholasticism. On this road it at first admitted neither the stimulation coming from M. J. Scheeben, the "most precious flower of Neo-Scholasticism," according to K. Eschweiler, for the intellectual deepening and organized grasping of the rational Neo-Scholastic system nor even the fruitful knowledge, coming from France, of Neo-Thomism, which, with P. Rousselot (d. 1915) and J. Maréchal (d. 1944), tried to establish a synthesis between genuine Thomism and modern philosophy. In this it was followed by systematic theology in the Romance countries, which, in keeping with its self-evaluation of a didactically moderate "school theology," assumed a superiority only in individual cases over the traditional Neo-Scholastic statement of problems and its answers.[6]

The melting down of this hardness and a revival occurred through forces and impulses which lay outside the narrow bounds of systematic theological specialists and was rooted in the area of the general awareness of the age like a new philosophical thought. The temper of Catholic life and the consciousness of the faith in the period after the First World War made it possible to admit these tendencies and to integrate them in a manner which gave to Catholicism not only inner drive but also a certain radiation to the surrounding world. While a not unimportant basic tendency drew from the political and cultural crisis situation on the basis of a biologically determinist thought the conclusion concerning the "Decline of the West,"[7] in the Catholic sphere, especially in Germany, there was awake the conviction of the capability of regeneration on the part of the Church and the culture from the forces of the spirit, which of course was the spirit of traditional Christian humanist culture and of the Catholic faith. At that time there appeared simultaneously the programmatic formulations of The Awakening of the Church in Souls by Romano Guardini in 1921 and of the establishing of a "New West," the title of a periodical of Catholic intellectuals that appeared between 1926 and 1930. The concerns expressed in them were further accentuated in the generally prevalent notions of the "living," the "organic" and "authentic," the "emotional," and of "history," of "personality," and of "appreciation of value." Acting as catalyst was the "German Rembrandt," Julius Langbehn (d. 1907), rediscovered by the converted painter and writer, B. Momme Nissen, O.P. (d. 1943). Langbehn grasped Catholicism as "spirit of the whole" and taught this understanding, but on the other hand he abetted nationalistic thought also.

---

[5] Cf. also L. Scheffczyk, Theologie im Aufbruch und Widerstreit. Die deutsche katholische Theologie im 19. Jahrhundert (Bremen 1965), 276; G. Denzler, "Ignaz von Döllingers Vermächtnis an seine Hörer," MThZ 21 (1970), 93–101.

[6] As such prominent particular achievements which Neo-Scholastic systematic theology deepened in individual problems with a return to patristics and in intellectual independence may be mentioned, among others: M. de la Taille, S. J., Mysterium Fidei (1921); E. Masure, Le sacrifice du chef (1932); A. Vonier, A Key to the Doctrine of the Eucharist (1925).

[7] O. Spengler, Der Untergang des Abendlandes, 2 vols., 30th ed. (Munich 1922).

These ideas proceeding from a new temper of life were taken up by corresponding "life movements" and reflected in diverse ways, such as the youth movement, going back to the period before the First World War, the rising liturgical movement, and also the Bible movement, which, of course, because of its being restricted to smaller groups cannot be equated with the first two movements mentioned. The idealistic ardor which belonged to these movements, supported especially by lay persons, and which of course became only to a degree useful to the "hierarchical apostolate of the Church" in the Catholic Action of Pius XI, was certainly not free from restorative tendencies, and therefore today occasionally the pejorative designation of "Neo-Romantic" is given to it. But the label is correct neither in its historical parallelism nor in relation to the objective content, because, despite certain common traits in style and content, for example, in the rediscovery of the Middle Ages,[8] what is distinctive dominates, especially in the rejection of subjectivism and irrationalism.

This can clarify a view of the philosophical undercurrents on which these movements were based and which, indirectly by way of a prescientific discussion,[9] also influenced the new starts in Catholic theology. It was a partly surprising, but partly obvious turn on account of the paradoxes of Kantianism as well as of Neo-Kantianism, which occurred after the First World War and was denoted by the catchword or slogan of the "resurrection of metaphysics."[10] In accord with its objective content, however, it was a question here, not of a mechanical renewal of Aristotelianism or of Wolffianism as of the less vital Neo-Thomism in Germany, in contrast to the France of A. G. Sertillanges, É. Gilson, and J. Maritain, and despite Pius XI's encyclical Studiorum ducem of 1923 on the sixth centenary of the canonization of Thomas Aquinas, but of an investigation of being that had become more critical, which was influenced both by the new unspeculative ontology of N. Hartmann (d. 1950) and by the doctrine of reality of H. Driesch (d. 1943), but especially received stimulation from the "view of reality" of the phenomenology of E. Husserl and M. Scheler and its philosophy of value, represented by J. Hessen and D. von Hildebrand. Thereby attention was also powerfully directed to the other basic current of Western Christian intellectualism, namely, to the Augustinian-Franciscan thought in philosophy and theology. This new doctrine of knowledge and being, which did not understand metaphysics as a search for an abstract posterior world and ventured upon the new draft of a "Christian philosophy"[11] as embodiment of a philosophia perennis, itself remained open to the philosophy of life of W. Dilthey (d. 1911),[12] even if it repudiated the elements of historicist relativism present in it.

---

[8] A work characteristic of this "rediscovery" from the non-Catholic area, which, however, found a loud echo in the likewise very vital Catholic academic movement, was P. L. Landsberg, Die Welt des Mittelalters und wir, 3d ed. (Bonn 1925).

[9] For these motives from the "prescientific" sphere, which finally communicated themselves also to theology, the works of the universally oriented R. Guardini (d. 1968) were representative.

[10] Cf. also P. Wust (Leipzig 1920). Also influential was H. Heimsoeth, Die sechs grossen Themen der abendländischen Metaphysik (Berlin 1922).

However, the most persistent influence in the 1920s and 1930s on the consciousness of the faith that was rearticulating itself was exercised by the philosophy of life and phenomenology, the latter not without the mediating role of the gifted M. Scheler (d. 1928), whose lot in life, of course, reflected the imbalances, tensions, and situation of the groping attempts in the Catholic intellectual life of the time. Only in regard to the rising existentialism of M. Heidegger and the Philosophy of Existence of K. Jaspers was the reaction generally negative,[13] despite the mediating efforts from France of Gabriel Marcel, but this was partly based on the obscurity and individuality of this thought and its language, with which, as P. Wust attests,[14] even the professional philosophers had their difficulties.

---

[11] As a work characteristic of this aim may be mentioned A. Dempf, Christliche Philosophie. Der Mensch zwischen Gott und der Welt (Bonn 1938).

[12] Cf. for the acceptance of W. Dilthey: J. Höfer, Vom Leben zur Wahrheit. Katholische Besinnung am Lebenswerk W. Diltheys (Freiburg 1936).

[13] Cf., for example, the view, characteristic of the time, of M. Pfliegler, Vor der Entscheidung. Überlegungen zur seelischen Bedrohtheit der heutigen Menschen (Salzburg and Leipzig 1937); Heilige Bildung. Gedanken über Wesen und Weg christlicher Vollendung (Salzburg 1933); Die pädagogische Situation. Gedanken zur gegenwärtigen Lage religiöser Erziehung (Innsbruck 1932).

[14] Cf. also the extract from a letter of 1929 in F. Heinemann, Existenzphilosophie lebendig oder tot? (Stuttgart 1954), 88.

THE TURNING OF DOGMA FROM "REASON" TO "LIVING"

The turning of the dogmatic method of reflection to the "living" and to "religious value," also partly inspired by the suggestions of the philosophy of religion, for example, by Das Heilige (1917) of R. Otto, at first made its appearance only sparingly. But the formulations, appearing in various forms, of the theme "Dogma and Life,"[15] the efforts to disclose the life value of dogma—and even if at first it was only in corollaries at the end of the positive presentation[16]—the connection between theology and spirituality in the works of Columba Marmion (d. 1923)[17] and A. Gardeil, O.P.,[18] created an atmosphere which could not entirely refuse to have anything to do with Scholastic dogma for long, although the texts and manuals that had meanwhile become standardized were still kept in Neo-Scholastic strictness. Of course, this experienced a pleasing relaxation through the admission of newer problems in Pohle-Gierens (9th ed. [1936], 10th ed. by J. Gummersbach, S.J.) and through the regard for the history of dogma in F. Diekamp (7th ed. [1934], 11th ed. by K. Jüssen).

It was only consistent and a proof of the accuracy of the systematic work when thereupon the question of method and the problem of the way of systematic theology was again taken up by it. The most basic and stimulating effort in this regard, that of K. Eschweiler (d. 1936) in the German area, determined the point of departure of theological thought, following M. J. Scheeben and against G. Hermes, not from a neutral reason but from faith and the reasonableness inherent in it,[19] which was to be developed by theology in accord with the method of intellectual scientific knowledge. In this way theology was, on the one hand, anchored in the supernatural basic faith essential to it, but, on the other hand, it was confirmed as a theoretical science. Hence a special significance belonged to the last named factor, because at about the same time other theological basic concepts came under discussion: the affective-charismatic concept of T. Soiron, O.F.M., based on the Franciscan tradition,[20] the mystical devotional type of A. Stolz, O.S.B. (d. 1942), derived from patristics,[21] which was inspired by the studies on the spiritual life, cultivated especially in France by H. Bremond, R. Garrigou-Lagrange, and the periodical La vie spirituelle, and a "kerygmatic" type which appeared under the name of "Proclamation Theology."

---

[15] Thus the representative book of E. Krebs, Dogma und Leben, 2 vols. (Paderborn 1921–25 and later); A. Rademacher, Religion und Leben. Ein Beitrag zur Lösung des christlichen Kulturproblems, 2d ed (Freiburg 1929); after the Second World War, among others: J. Ranft, Vom Dogma und vom lebendigen Geist (Würzburg 1949); B. Poschmann, Die katholische Frömmigkeit (Würzburg 1949).

[16] Thus in the dogmatic theology, already determined by biblical and historical thought, of B. Bartmann, Grundriss der Dogmatik, 2 vols., 2d ed. (Freiburg 1931).

[17] Cf., among other works, Christ in His Mysteries (Maredsous 1919; English: St. Louis 1939).

[18] Here must be mentioned especially the work significant also for the question of theological method: La structure de l'âme et l'expérience mystique, 2 vols. (Paris 1927).

[19] K. Eschweiler, op. cit., 24 and passim. K. Adam, Glaube und Glaubenswissenschaft im Katholizismus, 3d ed. (Rottenburg 1920 1923), points in a similar direction. For a critical evaluation cf. A. Kolping, op. cit., 102f.

The theology of a living proclamation, intended especially by the Innsbruck theologians, J. A. Jungmann,[22] F. Dander, F. Lakner, H. Rahner, and others, was supposed to present its own way and field of work in addition to the theoretical essential dogma and direct revealed truths directly to the listener in the language of kerygma. Although this attempt cannot simply be designated as "stillborn"[23] because of the further operation of its intention, yet it could not be realized in method and would also have been a disadvantage for the still sought unity of theology.

Previously the aim of approximating dogmatic theology to the modern temper of life and of making it fruitful for the living faith had been realized in a more convincing way by Karl Adam (d. 1966) in his Das Wesen des Katholizismus (1924; 12th ed. [1949]), which, taking as a basis the phenomenological view of essence, the psychology of religion, and the scriptural concept of the Body of Christ, revealed a mystical understanding of the essence of Catholic Christianity and of the Church. Here the theme of the Church, especially questioned in those years, which had hitherto had a place only in apologetics, was made a subject of dogma and thereafter more richly developed from the dogmatic viewpoint.

This occurred emphatically in the Dogmatik of M. Schmaus (1938, 6th ed. [1964]), in which the religious and existential, as well as the scientific motives of the period before the beginning of the Second World War, received an authentic summary. Taking up the affirmative of the kerygmatic concern of an easing of the tension between scientific faith and living faith, but without sacrificing the scientific way of knowledge, the attempt was here undertaken to derive dogma from the sources of Scripture and genuine patristic tradition, both of which came up for detailed discussion and were no longer presented only in dicta probantia, and to disclose it to the understanding of an age which was influenced by Nietzsche's philosophy of life and by Heidegger's and Jasper's philosophy of existence that was gaining influence.[24]

---

[20] Cf. T. Soiron, Heilige Theologie (Regensburg 1935).

[21] A. Stolz, Manuale theologiae dogmaticae, 6 fasc. (Freiburg 1939–43).

[22] Of initial efficacy was especially J. A. Jungmann, Frohbotschaft und unsere Glaubensverkündigung (Regensburg 1936). For the criticism, cf., among others, E. Kappler, Die Verkündigungstheologie (Fribourg 1949), and A. Kolping, op cit., 163ff.

[23] Thus R. Aubert, "Katholische Theologie im 20. Jahrhundert," Bilanz der Theologie II, 37.

To be sure, the unique character and importance of this work, which was also the first to make use, for scriptural argumentation, of Kittel's Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament, otherwise still held in suspicion in Catholic theology, can only be fully understood if the developments that had in the meantime taken place in historical as well as biblical theology are assessed and the fact of the opening up of dogma with respect to the influences from both areas. For historical theology this influencing goes without saying, since the representatives of the system almost without exception had gone through the school of historical theological investigation, which was then concentrated especially on the Middle Ages, with C. Bäumker, M. Grabmann, A. Landgraf, É. Gilson, M. de Wulf, J. de Ghellinck, J. Koch, B. Geyer (d. 1974), and others. Retrospectively it may also be established that these entirely solid investigations really required the chief energies of the theologians active in systematic theology, so that, apart from the exceptions mentioned, a stronger actualization of the Catholic world of faith and of dogma lying in the sphere of the possible did not occur. In this regard it was due to a preference for detailed research and to the deemphasis on summary presentations of theology and of the history of dogma that the knowledge from history was not used to its full extent for the historical understanding of dogma. A really historical understanding of dogma, as developed, of course with a one-sided aim, on the Protestant side by the triple constellation Harnack-Loofs-Seeberg, had not yet started in the Catholic theology of the 1930s. Nevertheless, the beginnings in this direction, which were made as early as the First World War with J. Tixeron[25] and were carried further in a continuing succession, must not be overlooked.

---

[24] Supported by similar aims was the work of the Dutchman, A. Janssens, Leerboeken der dogmatica en der apologetica (Antwerp 1925ff.); but also D. Feuling, Katholische Glaubenslehre (Salzburg 1937), and the "dogma for the laity" newly appearing in this day, as in the works of J. P. Junglas (1936) and L. von Rudloff, O.S.B. (1934, 5th ed. 1949).

[25] Histoire des Dogmes (Paris 1912–14, 11th ed. 1930). On the rise and development of the Catholic history of dogma cf. J. Beumer, "Theologie und Dogmengeschichte," Bilanz der Theologie III, 471–503; likewise the introduction of M. Schmaus to the new complete sketch undertaken after World War II: Handbuch der Dogmengeschichte, ed. by M. Schmaus, J. R. Geiselmann, H. Rahner, IV, 3: B. Poschmann, Busse und Letzte Ölung (Freiburg 1950), V–XI.

Historical awareness, becoming stronger, and interest in the development of dogma are especially attested by the then notable effort of the Spaniard, F. Marín-Sola, O.P. (d. 1932), concerning the homogeneous development of dogma,[26] in which, to be sure, it was not the history of dogma as such that was pursued but instead a fully worthwhile theory of the development of dogma was demonstrated with the aid of historical facts that were not always interpreted in a manner free of doubt.[27] Questions in the history of dogma were to experience a further stimulus on the eve of the definition of Mary's Assumption in 1950, when it was shown that the problem of the relation of revelation and history still needed some intellectual work within Catholic theology.[28]

On one point the fecundity of the encounter of historical research and interest in systematic theology appeared clearly in the period before the First World War, and also afterwards, namely, in the mysterium theory conceived by Odo Casel, O.S.B. (d. 1948), which pushed the theme of sacramental theology, then as highly regarded as the theme of the Church, into the foreground in an original way and gave occasion to a discussion of considerable intensity. The Maria Laach Benedictine, proceeding from the history of religion and literature, who felt obliged to the liturgical movement and its progress toward the originality and authenticity of liturgical life, interpreted the sacramental acts of the Church, especially the Eucharist, no longer in the sense of the Scholastic theory of effectus, according to which the believer received only effects from the saving deeds.[29] Instead, the saving act should make itself present, according to the new interpretation, which, however, sought support in Greek patristics, as such and in its being, of course in mysterio, that is, under the veil of symbols. Although this theory did not establish itself in its entirety because of the historical as well as the objective problems inherent in it, nevertheless it certainly contributed to the deepening of the Catholic understanding of the sacraments.[30] This contribution, still critically evaluated by Pius XII,[31] but, on the contrary, regarded benevolently in its main features by the Second Vatican Council,[32] also offered certain points of departure for the ecumenical dialogue, which was at that time accepted only with hesitation by systematic Catholic theology.[33]

---

[26] L'évolution homogène du Dogma catholique, 2 vols., 2d ed. (Fribourg 1924).

[27] Critical evaluation in H. Hammans, Die neueren Erklärungen der Dogmenentwicklung (Essen 1965), 147ff.

[28] On the development of Mariology cf. H. M. Köster, "Die Mariologie im 20. Jahrhundert," Bilanz der Theologie III, 126–47.

[29] Cf. the pertinent publications on the theme: "Die Messe als heilige Mysterienhandlung," Bened. Monatsschrift 5 (1923), 20–28, 97–104, 155–61; Zur Idee der liturgischen Mysterienfeier (Freiburg 1923).

[30] T. Filthaut, Die Kontroverse über die Mysterienlehre (Warendorf 1947) tells about the controversy down to 1947; cf. also B. Neunheuser, "Eucharistie in Mittelalter und Neuzeit," Handbuch der Dogmengeschichte IV/4b (Freiburg 1963), 64(literature), and A. Kolping, o. cit., 138f.

[31] Encyclical Mediator Dei of 1947 (DS, 3855).

In spite of this not lifeless or even stagnating condition of dogmatic theology before and immediately after the First World War, in contrast to modern pluralism it still supplied the image of inner compactness, which results not least from its unquestioned anchoring in the faith and from its positively understood ecclesiastical essence. In comparison, the new starts may be regarded as less radical and relatively trivial, and the connection with tradition may be found fault with. Nevertheless, it must be considered that especially the German theology and Church could oppose the dangers of Nazism in this basic outlook, which was also true of the especially threatened faculties of the Catholic universities. The picture supplied by the Protestant faculties was, with a few exceptions, much less favorable in this matter.

Many of these positive developments toward a more vital grasp of dogma and its interpretation in regard to salvation were, especially in Germany, interrupted or ended by the catastrophe of the Second World War. A new beginning took place especially in France, where the characteristic spirituality and the speculative strength had already been concerned with questions of the basic position of systematic theology and in this connection had come to a criticism of the scientific deductive theology of the past.[34] These tendencies took shape in the works of a group of theologians, to which belonged, among others, H. Bouillard, H. de Lubac, J. Daniélou, and Y. Congar, all lumped together under the pretty colorless designation of the "Nouvelle Théologie." What was characteristic of these efforts did not appear prominently under this label, namely, the attempt to orient theology again more definitely to the biblical-patristic tradition, but in the horizon of modern thought and its desiderata. Thus the origin of this trend of theological interest was connected not coincidentally with the appearance of a new edition of the Church Fathers, Sources chrétiennes, which intended to make fruitful for modern thought the ancient wealth of the tradition of the faith and thereby, contrary to the narrowly oriented Scholastic theology, to emphasize again Augustinian theology and the Greek universalism of salvation of Origen, using the paradigmatic guiding principle of H. Bouillard: "A theology which would not be timely would be a false theology." The means employed in this regard of a spiritual exegesis, a personalist concept of the truth of faith and its "historical" interpretation, and an option for a certain diversity in theology must have seemed dangerous to the representatives of a strictly oriented Thomistic theology of essence.[35] In their not always entirely objective criticism they dealt more with the ever present possibilities for false conclusions, for example, a making of grace immanent, a raising of dogma to evolution, a relativism of the knowledge of truth, than with really present failings and distortions. Hence the suspicion of a resurgence of Modernism was unjustified. Nevertheless, Pius XII was induced in the encyclical Humani generis of 1950, without mentioning this theological trend,[36] to point to the mistaken tendencies which were found not so much in the original initiators of this movement as in some of its one-sided interpreters. The encyclical neither intended nor produced a limiting of theological research or a stagnation of theological development. But it exposed a process of theological ferment, which, because of the concentration of dogmatic theology on Mariology in the years before and after the definition of Mary's Assumption in 1950,[37] had not yet entered the general awareness. This process was marked by a deeper reflection of systematic theology on the authenticity of mankind, the Church, and theology,[38] on the related problems of hermeneutics,[39] on the doctrine of evolution[40] just brought to light by Teilhard de Chardin (d. 1955) and his writings, hitherto known only fragmentarily, as well as on the urgency of ecumenical efforts[41] and the problems of the concern with a secularized world at the "end of the new age."[42] The results of the posing of these critical questions were entirely positive in the material as well as in the formal: historical thought dared to draw near to outlines of salvation history and history of theology;[43] the long treated theme of the Church, which had been discussed in the encyclical Mystici Corporis especially under the mystical-organological and hierarchical aspect, was expanded into the dimension of the communitarian, in which also the lay element played a stronger role;[44] in Christology, which was stimulated and enriched by the confrontation with Déodat de Basly's (d. 1937) doctrine oriented in Scotism, the interest in the manhood and the humanity, the psychologia, of Christ was prominent.[45] A special significance, which until the present has experienced no diminution, was gained by the theme of the relations of "nature and grace,"[46] again brought into discussion by H. de Lubac; in its solution the concept of the unity of creation and redemption, of the worldly and the Christian, of the immanence and the transcendence of the divine, must be distinguished.

---

[32] Sacrosanctum Concilium, no. 104.

[33] Ecumenical theology also developed in this period, at first only in particular initiatives—A. Rademacher, P. Simon, R. Grosche, O. Karrer, H. Urs von Balthasar—and outside systematic theology—M. Laros, M. J. Metzger.

[34] Thus already in M. D. Chenu, Une école de théologie (Le Saulchoir 1937), and L. Charlier, Essai sur le problème théologique (Thuilles 1938). Both works were put on the Index on 6 February 1942.

---

[35] Then came sharp objections from Thomistic thinkers, such as R. Garrigou-Lagrange, "La nouvelle théologie où va-t-elle?" Angelicum 23 (1946), 126–45, 24 (1947), 5–19, and M. Labourdelle, "La théologie et ses sources," RThom 46 (1946), 353–371, 47 (1947), 5–19.

[36] The Pope used the very expression in an address to the General Congregation of the Jesuits of September 1946.

[37] For this development cf. the explanations of H. M. Köster, "Die Mariologie im 20. Jahrhundert," Bilanz der Theologie III, 132.

[38] Dutch theologians now took part in this discussion to a greater extent, including E. Schillebeeckx in Theologisch Woordenbock I (1952); cf. also Gesammelte Schriften I (Mainz 1965); P. Schoonenberg, "Theologie in Selbstbesinnung," Annalen van het Thiymgenootschapp 44 (1956), 225ff.

[39] Cf. also the cooperative volume, Fragen der Theologie, ed. by J. Feiner, J. Trütsch, F. Böckle (Zurich and Cologne 1957).

[40] One of the first opinions in the German area is in T. Deman, "Französische Bemühungen um eine Erneuerung der Theologie," ThRev 46 (1950), 61ff.

All these profound problems of systematic theology were discussed with a sharpened consciousness and answered throughout in the sense less of "supranaturalistic" and "extrinsic" ideas and models. Hence it probably did not entirely do the situation justice when, around the mid-1950s, it was said that "the dogma of today [is] very orthodox but not very alive."[47] But perhaps at the basis of this verdict lay the right instinct that a thorough basic concept and a comprehensive systematic overview were missing from the deepened posing of questions and intellectual efforts. And so K. Rahner outlined at this time the new program of a dogmatic theology of salvation history,[48] the implementation of which, of course, was taken up only later.[49] But as regards this theology's claim to orthodoxy, it hit upon a positive state of affairs in so far as theology after the Second World War, despite the totally different kinds of beginnings and trends of interest, still worked from a strongly developed awareness of the obligation to the common tradition and its inalienable content. This appeared especially clearly in connection with the confrontation and adaptation of the program of demythologizing developed by R. Bultmann, which especially affected Christology. The reply, given to this program, for example, by J. R. Geiselmann in his book on Christ,[50] was established by a profoundly biblical as well as by a hermeneutically acute historical thought, which, however, was not subject to a philosophical option of "authenticity," in which the objective salvation history was condensed with its alleged meaning to the punctum mathematicum of the existential faith decision and of the subjectivistic pro me. Here "authenticity" was understood not without the reality of real history and its transmission in the tradition of the Church. Characteristically, in theology on the eve of the Second Vatican Council the theme "Scripture and Tradition"[51] was again taken up and, with the abandonment of the unorganic "Two-Sources Theory," led towards a unified concept, which was thus adopted by the council.[52] Only in this state of affairs can it be considered that the council was determined by the spirit and content of the theology preceding it. Therefore, in relation to the dogmatic motive, the question "Who determined the theology of the council?" can be answered by a competent representative of the theology following the First World War: "An intensive work . . . for a good thirty years."[53] But it may also be added that in dogma the council neither would nor could go beyond the results of this work.

---

[41] H. Urs von Balthasar, K. Barth (Cologne 1950); H. Fries, Bultmann, Barth und die katholische Theologie (Stuttgart 1950); O. Karrer, Um die Einheit der Christen. Die Petrusfrage (Frankfurt 1953).

[42] Thus the stimulating book of R. Guardini (Basel 1950).

[43] Important contributions to this were made by, among others, J. Pieper, Über das Ende der Zeit (Munich 1950); H. Urs von Balthasar, Theologie der Geschichte, 3d ed. (Einsiedeln 1959); H. Rahner, "Grundzüge katholischer Geschichtstheologie," StdZ 140 (1947), 408–27; H. de Lubac, Histoire et Esprit. L'Intelligence de l'écriture d'après Origène (Paris 1950); J. Daniélou, Das Geheimnis vom Kommen des Herrn (Frankfurt 1951).

[44] Among others, by H. de Lubac, Katholizismus als Gemeinschaft (Einsiedeln and Cologne 1943); Betrachtung über die Kirche (Graz 1954). Previously, in Germany M. D. Koster, Ekklesiologie im Werden (Paderborn 1940), had indicated the necessarily appearing anterior placement of the "People of God," of the salvation collectivity, before the individualistic salvation personalism.

[45] This appears clearly in the cooperative work of A. Grillmeier and H. Bacht, eds., Das Konzil von Chalkedon, 3 vols. (Würzburg 1951–54); cf. here especially J. Ternus, "Das Seelen- und Bewusstseinsleben Jesu. Problemgeschichtlich-systematische Untersuchung," III, 81–237.

[46] H. de Lubac, Surnatural. Études historiques (Paris 1946), and "Le mystère du surnatural," RSR 37 (1949), 80–121.

---

[47] K. Rahner, Über den Versuch eines Aufrisses der Dogmatik: Schriften zur Theologie I (Einsiedeln 1954), 22.

[48] Ibid., 29–47.

[49] Mysterium Salutis. Die Grundlagen heilsgeschichtlicher Dogmatik, ed. by J. Feiner and M. Löhrer, I (Einsiedeln, Zurich and Cologne 1965).

[50] Jesus der Christus (Stuttgart 1951).

[51] Cf. the cooperative work with the report of the first meeting of the working community of Catholic dogmatic and fundamental theologians in 1956 at Königstein: Die mündliche Überlieferung, ed. by M. Schmaus (Munich 1957).

[52] Dei Verbum, no. 9.

[53] Y. Congar, Situation und Aufgabe der Theologie heute (Paderborn 1971), 31.

The "Theological" Deepening of Moral Theology

The intellectual movements appearing after the First World War changed also the figure of moral theology, even if the development here proceeded only slowly, which had its reason in the fact that the appearing Catholic moral teaching, especially exposed to modern philosophical ethics and to pugnacious cultural Protestantism, had more strongly to guard against attacks which were forcing it to tenacity and determined it to a certain integralist attitude.[54] Characteristic of the situation at the beginning of the century were the attacks of the Marburg Protestant systematizer, W. Herrmann (d. 1922), R. Bultmann's teacher, against the inflexible Catholic precept morality, which allegedly stifled the moral sentiment, and the Catholic reply from the pen of the Lucerne theologian A. Meyenberg (d. 1934), entitled Die katholische Moral als Angeklagte ("Catholic Morality as the Accused").[55] Thus it goes without saying that the presentations of moral theology partly assumed an apologetic character and in spite of their solidity and intellectual clarity—as seen for example in J. Mausbach's repeatedly published Die katholische Moraltheologie und ihre Gegner ("Catholic Morality and Its Opponents")[56]—were unable to achieve a positive adjustment to the spirit of the age. Still, at this time individual representatives of this field took the podium to promote a new orientation of their science with a disregard for its legalistic and casuistic traits. In favor of the still present awareness of the unity of ethical and dogmatic theology was especially the proposal of A. Müller, who, followed M. J. Scheeben's idea of grace, pleaded for a "theological morality" which should be based on the mystery of the faith and on the reality of grace.[57] J. Mausbach, in an opinion significant for the history of the time, sought to reduce,[58] around the turn of the century, the tensions arising in regard to the reform of moral theology: in it was even sounded the demand that "the moral norm must accommodate [itself] in accord with nature to the essential changes which the development of humanity and of nature brings." Of course, this should take place only with the means supplied by Thomistic philosophy and the philosophia perennis. Nevertheless, the Catholic Moral Theology[59] conceived by him was a progressive step in the sense that it did not develop a pure teaching of precepts but a doctrine of virtue which was directed to the loftiest principle of the honor of God and to the principle of the perfection of being. True, the speculative orientation and penetration also sought stronger support in biblical doctrine, without, however, more deeply fathoming this, in accord with the contemporary situation of the use of the Bible in systematic theology.

---

[54] Cf. J. Ziegler, "Moraltheologie im 20. Jahrhundert," Bilanz der Theologie III, 316–60, especially 319ff.; E. Hirschbach, Die Entwicklung der Moraltheologie im deutschen Sprachgebiet seit der Jahrhundertwende (Klosterneuburg 1959); P. Hadrossek, Die Bedeutung des Systemgedankens für die Moraltheologie in Deutschland seit der Thomasrenaissance (Munich 1950).

[55] Lucerne 1901.

[56] Cologne 1901, 5th ed. 1921.

[57] A. Müller, "Ist die katholische Moral reformbedürftig? Katholik (1901), II, 346ff., 402ff.

[58] The most recent suggestions for reform of moral theology and criticism of them in ThRev 1 (1902), 1–8, 41–46.

There also came to light in O. Schilling, professor at Tübingen, and his Moraltheologie,[60] not without influence from the Tübingen tradition, the endeavor to develop moral theology from a supernatural beginning, which he found in the principle of caritas. However, in regard to content he remained extensively indebted to Thomas Aquinas and Alphonsus Liguori. On the other hand, the strong regard for the socioethical aspect presented something relatively new.

The fact is that these new starts from the German sphere, in which as early as the nineteenth century a relatively unique "German type" of presenting moral theology had been developed by J. M. Sailer and J. B. Hirscher, were at first not further elaborated, and dominance lay in the still existing preponderance of the "Roman type" of moral theology, which in the manuals and texts of H. Noldin,[61] B. Merkelbach,[62] D. M. Prümmer,[63] and others asserted its influence in the direction of a doctrine of duties, often oriented to the Decalogue, with a strongly juridical and casuistic element. Since these works were widespread in the French area, despite the different method of Saint-Sulpice,[64] directed more to practical use in pastoral care, and in the Anglo-Saxon linguistic sphere, the renewal trends could be established only with difficulty. The additional pragmatic viewpoint in this sphere was especially extremely prominent in the moral manual of T. Slater (d. 1928), who declared in the introduction: "Manuals of moral theology are technical works . . . just as the texts of the lawyer and the physician . . . . They deal with what is duty under penalty of sin. They are books of moral pathology."[65]

---

[59] Münster 1915–1918, 3 vols., and later.

[60] Münster 1922, 2d ed. 1949.

[61] Summa theologiae moralis, 3 vols. (Innsbruck 1901–02, 30th ed. 1952).

[62] Summa theologiae moralis ad mentem D. Thomae et ad normam iuris novi, 3 vols. (Paris 1930–33, 10th ed. 1959).

[63] Manuale Theologiae moralis secundum principia S. Thomae, 3 vols. (Freiburg 1915, 15th ed. 1961).

[64] Cf. J. Ziegler, op. cit., 325.

[65] Ibid., 325.

In view of such lack of appreciation, of course not too generalizing, of the deeper concern of moral theology, it goes without saying that in the 1930s the call for a new basis of the "theological character" of moral theology became ever stronger. The affirmative answer which now soon came to it was inspired by the spirit of the newly appearing biblical thought, which at that time created in moral theology an even more vigorous expression than in contemporary dogmatic theology. This changed attitude underwent an imposing formation in the five-volume Handbuch der Katholischen Sittenlehre of F. Tillman, which had its center in the "idea of the imitation of Christ" (Vol. III)[66] and its "realization" (Vol. IV).[67] By means of an extensive abandonment of casuistic and practical applications, which Tillmann assigned as legitimate functions to the texts of casuistic moral theology, there succeeded here a new type of supernatural foundation of Christian morality on the ethos of love and its being made concrete in the Sermon on the Mount. Not an excessive natural-material morality, but a supernatural motivation of Christian life on the person and work of Jesus stood here in the center of ethics, which thus advanced from the position of a morality of commands and prohibitions to one of a direction inspiring and forming life. Even if Tillmann did not succeed, in a more flat view and estimation of the evidence of Scripture, in taking soundings of the full depths and problems of the testimony of Scripture, still the theological fecundity of this effort cannot be doubted. Despite occasional criticism, such as that of O. Schilling, this draft was considerably acknowledged as a directional work, which, "as no other . . . contributed to extricating Catholic moral theology as a science from a centuries-old rigidity."[68] The basing of moral theology on a biblical-theological foundation was also decisive for other efforts around this time, such as for F. Jürgensmeier[69] and E. Mersch,[70] who oriented the Christian ethos on the concept of the "Mystical Body." The theological deepening and intensification of the Christian ethos, which was achieved here through the tying of moral theology to exegesis, to ascetical,[71] and to dogmatic theology,[72] and which continued long after in the striving for a rightly understood "dogmatic moral theology," to use a phrase of R. Egenter, was characteristically no hindrance to a widening of moral theology and its extension into the areas of the humanities. Tillmann's work had also laid the ground for this extension corresponding to the relation of moral theology to life and had supplied further stimulation; for here not only "the philosophical foundation of Catholic moral teaching"[73] was offered, but the "psychological bases"[74] were reflected and the "sociological bases" were considered.[75] In T. Müncker's moral-psychological contribution the results of psychoanalysis, hitherto still suspect in Catholic circles, were also included. The stronger relationship thereby reached with the "bordering questions," as W. Schöllgen puts it, and with the humanities was further developed after the Second World War by French, Dutch, and German theologians—M. Oraison, A. Snoeck, W. Heinen, R. Egenter—and promoted in newly appearing periodicals (Arzt und Christ [1954]).[76] In addition, the orientation, always to be made more profound, to revelation was not forgotten and, among other things, was fostered by the original attempt of J. Stelzenberger (d. 1972) to develop moral theology, with reference to J. B. Hirscher, as "the moral doctrine of the Kingship of God."[77] Noteworthy, however, was the continuing impact of Mausbach's more speculatively interested sketch, which G. Ermecke completed in a new edition as a "Christological synthesis."[78] A certain definitive bringing together of the various basic concepts was accomplished by B. Häring in his work, Das Gesetz Christi,[79] which succeeded in uniting the three normative principles—imitation of Christ, caritas, rule of God—in an excellent manner. Meanwhile, interest in the working out of the history of moral theology and its problems was reawakened and documented in publications rich in content.[80]

---

[66] Düsseldorf 1934, 4th ed. 1953.

[67] Düsseldorf 1935f., 4th ed. 1950–53.

[68] Thus the verdict in Hochland (1934); cf. also A. Kolping, op. cit., 175.

[69] Der mystische Leib Christi als Grundprinzip der Aszetik, 2d ed. (Paderborn 1933).

[70] Morale et corps mystique (Paris 1937).

[71] Cf. on this theme R. Egenter, "Über das Verhältnis von Moraltheologie und Aszetik," Theologie in Geschichte und Gegenwart, Festschrift für M. Schmaus, ed. by J. Auer and H. Volk (Munich 1957), 21–42.

[72] Among others, P. Delhaye reflected on this in "Dogme et morale. Autonomie et assistance mutuelle," AnGr 68 (1954), 27–40.

In view of the thoroughly positive state which moral theology achieved, by overcoming considerable resistance and a still thoroughly disunited situation in the 1930s, it may seem astonishing that in the 1950s there also was heard talk of the "crisis of moral theology," which threatened to jeopardize again the firm position that had been obtained. J. Leclerc especially reproached the current moral doctrine and instruction with a lack of dynamism and enthusiastic force, too little regard for philosophy, failure to consider the world situation of Christianity, and no understanding of progress.[81] Here was evident something of that artificially nourished disquiet which, with the demand for a "complete transformation" of moral theology and a new beginning at zero, served an organic progress less. It thus happened that moral theology in the years before the Second Vatican Council became more eager for discussion and more stimulated by the resumption of the question of the principle of morality, by the questionable experiments of an existential and situation ethics,[82] against which the teaching authority had taken a stand in 1952 and 1956, but not unconditionally more fruitful. The council itself had not accepted such experimenting considerations, but had regard for the fundamental results of modern moral theology, as, for example, in relation to religious freedom, the relative autonomy of secular matters, the importance of service to the world, the organic articulation of the ends of marriage and a personal notion of marriage, which, however, partly in the question of methods of birth regulation did not disavow tradition and gave no room to subjectivism.[83] [73] T. Steinbüchel, Vol. I (1938, 4th ed. 1951).

---

[74] T. Müncker, Vol. II (1934, 4th ed. 1953). Earlier L. Ruland, Handbuch der praktischen Seelsorge, 5 vols. (Münster 1930–40), had considered the practical importance of psychology and medicine in a new sort of intensity.

[75] W. Schöllgen, Vol. V (1953).

[76] Cf. also A. Niedermeyer, Pastoralmedizinische Propädeutik. Einführung in die geistigen Grundlagen der Pastoral-Medizin und Pastoral-Hygiene (Salzburg and Leipzig 1935).

[77] Paderborn 1953, 2d ed. 1965.

[78] Münster, 9th ed. 1953.

[79] Freiburg 1954.

[80] As examples may be mentioned O. Lottin, Problèmes de Psychologie et de Moral au XII^e et XIII^e siècles I–V (Louvain and Gembloux 1942–59), and the series edited by M. Müller, Studien zur Geschichte der katholischen Moraltheologie (Regensburg 1954–61).

In the total view of the process of development of moral theology in the period after the First World War the fact of the dissociation and autonomy of two new partial disciplines from the whole body must not remain unnoticed: the science of caritas, which of course grew out of practical theology, and that of Christian social doctrine and sociology. Above all, in the wake of the pioneering social encyclicals since Leo XIII, Christian social doctrine has won an increasing importance, which is borne by a work of research now lasting more than one generation.[84] Of course, considering the youthful status of this science and also the involvement of natural and supernatural rules in it, it cannot cause surprise that the questions of the proper subject and the function of Christian social teaching are still under discussion. The ideas are still confronted by a preeminently philosophical discipline, which makes use of faith only as a clarifying auxiliary function, and a properly theological discipline, which proceeds from faith. And so "the dialogue on how the dignity of mankind, social justice, and ecclesiastical ministry sub luce Evangelii maintain and receive their claim, is certainly not at an end."[85]

---

[81] J. Leclercq, Christliche Moral in der Krise der Zeit (Einsiedeln 1954).

[82] The critical confrontation was made by, among others, D. von Hildebrand, Wahre Sittlichkeit und Situationsethik (Düsseldorf 1957).

[83] Cf. the pastoral constitution Gaudium et spes, especially no. 50.

[84] Information on the state of the research in R. Henning, "Christliche Gesellschaftslehre," Bilanz der Theologie III, 361–70.

FROM "APOLOGETICS" TO "FUNDAMENTAL THEOLOGY"

The modern striving for a deeper accessibility of the living, organic, and personal in the faith as well as in the understanding of the Church led also in the traditional apologetics to new accentuations, which ensued especially from the discussion of the different ways and methods of this relatively young theological discipline. A. Gardeil (d. 1931) declared that it was a "badly defined doctrine [whose] subject and method [presented] a problem for theologians."[86]

The development of this branch of theology in the twentieth century may best be understood if it is seen under the aspect of the religio-existential as well as of the theoretical scientific search for the more exact definition of the specific subject of this discipline and its total presentation.

While the impulses for the founding of Fundamental Theology came especially from Germany in the nineteenth century, with J. S. von Drey in 1853, the new orientation in the twentieth century was first suggested by French theologians, who sought to put the "proof of the credibility of Christianity" proper to this field on a new basis with reference to the increasingly more comprehensive modern experience of life. The traditional, purely objective, and "externally" arguing demonstratio christiana and catholica could no longer satisfy a foundation of faith that took into account the totality of the modern social, moral, and philosophical question.

Already at the end of the nineteenth century attempts were made to establish the so-called "Apologetics of Immanence" by F. Brunetière, L. Ollé-Laprune, and G. P. Fonsegrive, but M. Blondel (d. 1949) first enabled it to achieve a real breakthrough. Without wishing to deny the merits and importance of classical apologetics, Blondel aimed to deepen the inadequacy of a purely rational and positivist argumentation by attending to the subjectivity and transcendentality of human fulfillment (L'action [1893]).[87] This incentive to an "inner" apologetic involving subjective factors led, despite a first considerably disavowing attitude, to a spread of the scope of apologetics, to which A. Gardeil attributed, in addition to the strongly scientific proof of the credibility of the faith, a subjective practical foundation of faith. In addition, Gardeil called for an "apologetic theology," which should be developed as a self-reflection of supernatural theology on its epistemological bases. If the concept, which was again discussed also in Germany in a somewhat modified form in the 1950s, ultimately did not establish itself, still it consolidated the rising tendencies to the integration of "external" and "internal" apologetics and promoted the unity of rational credibility and the awaking of the inner willingness to believe. Later in Germany A. Lang especially followed this aim.[88] With the last mentioned element the importance of the supernatural, grace-filled motivation of faith moved to the foreground, as, parallel to the total concept of theology recommended in Germany by K. Eschweiler, the effort became noticeable to develop fundamental theology, or apologetics, also from a standpoint inside the faith, which of course brought it close to dogma and to a degree threatened to jeopardize its autonomy. Even authors coming from the older rational objectivating school concept, such as R. Garrigou-Lagrange[89] and J. Brinktrine,[90] felt an obligation to this tendency. But in them the separation between the supernatural motive of faith and natural credibility was so sharply marked that the strict demonstrability of natural credibility, and thereby of the rational scientific character of apologetics, was maintained, but an underground dualism continued.

---

[85] Ibid., 369.

[86] Cf. for what follows J. Schmitz, "Die Fundamentaltheologie im 20. Jahrhundert," Bilanz der Theologie II, 197–245, especially 200.

[87] A thorough assessment of Blondel's concern and its relevance to fundamental theology is offered by A. Kolping, Fundamentaltheologie I (Münster 1967), 60ff.

M. Masure, building on the thought of R. Rousselot (d. 1915), opposed to this option, somewhat objectivistic and inclined to disintegration, an "inductive procedure," in which the external signs of credibility were to be opened up as a result of their invisible importance and their supernatural value.[91] In this regard the moral disposition of the subject and the influence of grace are appraised with full importance for the origin of the assent to faith, which in this "Apologetics of the Sign" was also made powerfully dependent on the community of faith, as well as of believers, that is, on a social character.

These "stimuli" to the development of an "integral apologetics" and its orientation to the personal reality of mankind by B. Welte enjoyed in Germany general assent and only occasionally encountered criticism.[92] Nevertheless in the textbook literature of T. Specht, H. Dieckmann, J.

---

[88] Fundamentaltheologie, 2 vols. (Munich 1954).

[89] De revelatione ab Ecclesia proposita (Rome 1918, 5th ed. 1950).

[90] Fundamentaltheologie. Offenbarung und Kirche, 2 vols. (Paderborn 1938, 2d ed. 1947–49).

[91] La grande route apologétique (Paris 1939).

[92] Thus in E. Seiterich, Wege der Glaubensbegründung nach der sogenannten Immanenzapologetik (Freiburg 1938).

Brunsmann, and H. Straubinger the old outlines retained the upper hand; they were more obliged to the "Romance form" of apologetics, as opposed to the "German form," which also had regard for the philosophy of religion. Thus at first the new impulses made an impact rather in individual presentations, which appealed, among other things, to the act of faith and the miracle, both of which were more strictly involved in the sphere of influence of the grace of faith.[93] This tendency, as already indicated, approached the apologetics of dogma and its method, but also evoked new attempts to define the place and proper justification of this discipline.

These exertions became even more prominent in Germany after the Second World War. They were, first, conditioned by the crisis of faith, coming more sharply into awareness, and the "new profile of the unbeliever,"[94] on which especially fundamental theology had to take a stand; but they were also caused by a deeper scientific theoretical awareness of the problem, which was likewise made keener by the situation of the time.[95] Here they first led to a sharper theoretical differentiation within this discipline, which was expressed in the distinction between "apologetics" and "fundamental theology." The term "fundamental theology," ever more establishing itself in place of the defensive-appearing term "apologetics," was to be understood as a self-reflection, immanent in the faith, on the motive of one's own faith, according to H. Lais, and separated from the "apologetics" directed to the unbelievers and proving the "credibility of faith." But at the same time the idea of "fundamental" experienced a new orientation in the progress of modern reliance on science, while it was brought to the meaning of an investigation of foundations, a theological methodology or epistemology. Thus "fundamental theology" was conceived as "theological basic science" after a sort of theological doctrine of principles, which should elaborate and reflect the material as well as the formal principles of theology.[96] A still greater expansion was experienced by the concept of "fundamental," and hence the assigning of the functions of fundamental theology, in K. Rahner, who joined "fundamental theology" with a previous "formal" theology and sought to develop the former as the phenomenology of religions and of Christianity with its culmination in a theory on the "approach of the single to the true religion."[97] But in such an expansion the unity of the subject threatened to be lost again, for such a fundamental theology had the theological scientific theoretical concern common to all theological disciplines, whereas in content it had to be in conflict, as "philosophy of faith," with the philosophy of religion. Therefore these efforts were subject to a not unjustified criticism with regard to the distinction which existed between the foundation of faith and that of theology as a science, and which could be overlooked only to the injury of the clarity and stringency of this discipline.[98] Thus, basically the idea could not be refuted that the task of fundamental theology lay first in the foundation of the act of faith and in the motive of credibility.

---

[93] Cf. also, among others, H. Lang. Die Lehre des heiligen Thomas von Aquin von der Gewissheit des übernatürlichen Glaubens (Augsburg 1929); K. Adam, "Vom angeblichen Zirkel im katholischen Lehrsystem und von dem einen Weg der Theologie," WiWei 6(1939), 1–25.

[94] Cf. also A. Kolping, Katholische Theologie gestern und heute, 221ff.

[95] On this more thoroughly C. Geffré, "Die neuere Geschichte der Fundamentaltheologie," Concilium 5(1969), 418–29.

[96] Thus especially G. Söhngen, "Fundamentaltheologie," LThK IV, 452.

This basic discussion, which was related also to the recently defined relationship of fundamental theology and apologetics,[99] would then as today, where the discussion has still not ended, have been able to awaken the impression that this discipline is in a crisis which affects its existence. As a matter of fact, this claim is still brought forward. However, it must not be overlooked that fundamental theology, despite this uncertainty, did not actually avoid the function of laying the foundation of faith and in this regard involved an abundance of new questions, which were proposed to it by the modern intellectual development. To these belonged, among others, the problems of hermeneutics, of the authenticity of revelation, of existential and transcendental philosophy, but also questions of ecumenism. The Second Vatican Council especially took up what remained of these exertions and sanctioned them in its historical concept of revelation and of its relation to mankind,[100] without thereby legitimizing the excessive tendencies of the "anthropocentric."

The Evolution of Historical Theology with the Aid of the Historicocritical Method

THE PROGRESS OF CHURCH HISTORY

Catholic church history, as research and teaching, achieved a high status already in the course of the nineteenth century and did not fall behind it in the twentieth. As early as the beginning of this century it became clear that the historicocritical method would be maintained still freer and more decisively than before. In this it was inevitable that the judgments on the ecclesiastical past were more strictly adapted to the assumptions of natural history and that they thereby became also more sober and severe. Symptomatic of this new beginning in the twentieth century can be considered L. Duchesne's (d. 1922) Histoire ancienne de l'Église,[101] which, because of his method and presentation, strictly in keeping with the history of religion, of the history of the origin of Christianity was put on the Index in 1912. The extremely positive verdict of A. von Harnack on this work proves[102] that Catholic Church historical investigation was no longer inferior to the Protestant in form but probably permitted the conclusion that in this case it had not yet surely taken the "theological" direction. The attitude of the thoroughly critical S. Merkle (d. 1945) is to be characterized here as more appropriate; it appeared, for example, in its different evaluation of the Enlightenment philosophy,[103] although at that time this did not find general acceptance in the Catholic world. Such expressions of a critical awareness were as little to be attributed to Modernism as the initiatives of A. Ehrhard (d. 1940), working in all areas of church history, who gave to this discipline some stimulation toward its actual and cultural-determinant interpretation. Thus it happened not by chance that out of this historical thought flowed also impulses for the new shape of the Church in modern times, which appeared, among other places, in the much discussed Catholicism and the Twentieth Century in the Light of the Church's Development in the New Age (1901). The perspectives offered here for a meeting of Church and secular world could still be termed modern today, but of course they also display the limits set for all concepts and prognoses gathered from history; for, of the two conditions there named for a meeting between Church and world—turning of modern thought away from anti-Christian prejudices, turning of the Church from an absolutizing of the Middle Ages—the second has indeed been fulfilled in a not always easy development, but not the first, as the appearance of the great movements of apostasy in the first third of the twentieth century shows.

---

[97] "Aufriss einer Dogmatik," Schriften zur Theologie I, 29–34.

[98] Thus, among others, A. Lang, I, 30. A. Kolping, Fundamentaltheologie I, 75ff., gives instructive information on the problem and its complications.

[99] Cf. also H. Lais, "Apologetik," LThK I, 723–28.

[100] For this proof is offered especially by the dogmatic constitution Dei Verbum and the pastoral constitution Gaudium et spes.

The élan and the interest in intellectual and cultural history which a church history thus oriented showed at the beginning of the century in its representatives, was, it is true, slowed but not entirely suppressed by the Modernist controversy and the catastrophe of the First World War, which brought disillusionment to optimistic cultural thought. It was only natural that after the end of the war the perspectives in ideas should be de-emphasized and a calm research should appear predominant, with historians of all nations participating. It included and expanded all areas of church historiography: archeology, with J. Wilpert (d. 1940) and J. P. Kirsch (d. 1941); ancient church history and patrology, with F. J. Dölger (d. 1940) and B. Altaner (d. 1958); the Middle Ages, modern times, and hagiography, with H. Delehaye (d. 1941) and P. Peeters (d. 1950); the new history of the missions, with J. Schmidlin (d. 1944); and the especially assiduously cultivated history of the Popes, which, with L. von Pastor (d. 1928), J. Schmidlin, and F. X. Seppelt (d. 1956), posed an equivalent counterweight in this field to Protestant research. A special significance because of its affinity to a deeply felt concern of the age was acquired by the investigations of A. Baumstark (d. 1948) and C. Mohlberg (d. 1963) in the history of liturgy, the results of which indicated the way to the liturgical movement.

---

[101] Three vols. (Paris 1906–10 and later); cf. Mons. Duchesne et son temps (Rome 1975).

[102] Cf. also G. Denzler, "Kirchengeschichte als theologische Wissenschaft," Bilanz der Theologie III, 458.

[103] Die katholische Beurteilung des Aufklärungszeitalters (Berlin 1909); to the contrary, A. Rösch, Ein neuer Historiker der Aufklärung (Essen 1909).

The intensification of the work of research could not remain without an impact on the exterior organization of the research profession. And so in the course of this widespread activity there came about a recent specialization and separation of individual fields, such as iconography and folklore. On university faculties there resulted, for the same reasons, a dichotomy of the spheres of work and the professorial chairs—ancient church history/patrology, history of the Middle Ages and of modern times—which after the Second World War was followed in some places by still further divisions, such as the church history of a nation.

The works mentioned extended not only to the fundamental investigation of the sources and their editing, in regard to which Catholic researchers in a masterful fashion made their own the precision of the historical method, as, for example, H. Denifle (d. 1905), F. Ehrle (d. 1934), and F. Stegmüller; they proceeded likewise to a comprehensive opening up of new auxiliary means through encyclopedias, lexica, and publication agencies, such as T. Klauser's Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum and Hefele-Leclercq's Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie (1924–53); but they also produced new total presentations of church history and likewise more detailed particular presentations elaborated with a new type of hermeneutical understanding. This is true especially of the research in the German sphere, which was still in touch with the roots of historical thought in the nineteenth century. Hence its interests went also to the working out of the historical details, of the specific and organic, while the work in the Latin countries sphere was still interested chiefly in emphasizing the general and the universal. Thus are explained, among other things, the origin of works which revealed the deeper understanding of original Christianity in its specific peculiarity by F. J. Dölger (d. 1940), a new view of the history of the Reformation by J. Lortz, a deeper penetration of the history of the councils by G. Dumeige, H. Bacht, and H. Jedin, and the attempt at a presentation of church history according to the history of ideas.[104] These and like achievements, which had to have an impact on the teaching profession, produced for church history in the German university faculties a leading position which for a time seemed to surpass dogmatic theology, especially when this was taught according to the Neo-Scholastic textbooks. Thus in retrospect it can be ascertained that Catholic church history not only exploited the favor of the spirit of the age, which was unlocked for historical thought, but, conversely, promoted and positively determined this inclination. In this connection, this discipline, which at the beginning of the century had still awakened the suspicions of the ecclesiasitcal magisterium, proved itself, in its solidity and objectivity, more and more to be the support of Catholic thought. It was surely no accident that the most striking and effective replies to the Nazi ideology in Germany were given by historians, such as W. Neuss's Antimythos, in 1934.

On the whole, even after the Second World War church history retained this positive upward development. The tensions which appeared in the course of the preparation for the dogma of Mary's Assumption between positively oriented history and the different procedure of the justification of the faith resulted from the nature of the matter and were overcome without false dramatizing. In the course of the methodical self-reflection of theology the discussion of the theological character of church history was again taken up and understood by an emphatically theological idea in a salvation-history sense, as, to quote O. Köhler, "mediator between world history and salvation history." Nevertheless, it was to be perceived since the 1950s in the stage when "history" dissolved into "authenticity" and the intellectual orientation was preeminently to the present and future, that historical thought was pushed to the defensive,[105] which may be a reason for the current phenomena of disintegration in Christianity and Church.

OVERCOMING RESISTANCE TO THE HISTORICAL METHOD IN BIBLICAL SCHOLARSHIP

While in church history the historicocritical method ever more established itself from the beginning of the century and could be managed without hindrance in this field, clear limitations ensued for exegesis. In this regard the points of departure for a rise of this discipline were not the worst at the end of the nineteenth century, a situation to which especially the founding of the École biblique in Jerusalem by M. J. Lagrange in 1890 and the works published in the Revue biblique since 1892 and in Études bibliques since 1900 contributed decisively. The establishment of Catholic biblical criticism undertaken by Lagrange[106] was taken note of even in Germany, where it led, among other things, to the conception by F. von Hummelauer, S. J. (d. 1914), of the idea of an organic notion of inspiration ("economy of salvation") and to the generic historical classification of biblical primitive history, the "vision hypothesis."[107] The Biblische Zeitschrift, edited by J. Goettsberger and J. Sickenberger since 1903, worked also in the direction of this thoroughly moderate criticism. But a strongly conservative faction represented by L. Méchineau and L. Fonck opposed this école large; this group sought especially to emphasize the principle of fidelity to tradition in scriptural work. A mediation between the opposing forces was hindered by the condemnation of Modernism and of the liberalizing tendencies in the decrees against these emanating from the Biblical Commission in 1903. Although this ecclesiastical agency, like the Biblical Institute, also founded by Pius X in 1909, were intended per se for the positive advancement of scientific scriptural studies, at first they displayed a retarding influence on exegetical research within the Church, which thereupon turned partly to safe peripheral areas, such as textual criticism.

---

[104] J. Lortz, Geschichte der Kirche in ideengeschichtlicher Betrachtung, 20th ed. (Münster 1932, 1959).

[105] Thus G. Denzler establishes: "The interest in church history, in fact in history in general, is slight today," in Bilanz der Theologie III, 464.

Thus it was not possible for Catholic exegesis to adopt without restriction the results of Protestant scriptural scholarship and the methods of literary criticism, of the comparative science of religion, of the history of tradition and form which lay at its basis. To be sure, it was in this way also spared the mistakes, appearing ever more clearly today, which pertained to the employment of this method, especially in the beginning, and its extreme use.[108] Much as one may occasionally complain that A. Loisy's (d. 1940) suggestions for the use of the historicocritical method were too seldom applied to Holy Scripture, still M. Blondel, here amazingly farsighted, recognized in his confrontation with Loisy that the historical absolutizing of this method could not do justice to Christianity, especially in the form of Catholic dogma, because it threatened finally to lead to a reduction of the whole natural-supernatural reality to the plane of naturalism and positivism.[109] [106] Of epoch-making impact here was especially La méthode historique (Paris 1903).

---

[107] F. von Hummelauer, Exegetisches zur Inspirationsfrage (Freiburg 1904).

[108] Cf. also, of course projected out of today's retrospect, the research of G. Maier, Das Ende der historisch-kritischen Methode (Munich 1974).

The tension here showing itself between history and dogmatic faith and the task implicit in it of mediating between exegesis and dogma, which would thereafter prove to be an essential motive force of Catholic theology in the first half of the twentieth century, could not yet be absorbed after the First World War by Catholic exegesis for the reasons given. Nevertheless, it by no means refused to have anything to do with the knowledge coming from Protestant scriptural scholarship, although the biblical encyclical Spiritus Paraclitus of Benedict XV in 1920 warned against "the novel methods of profane science." True, this opening of exegesis occurred in a cautious way, which especially bore fruit in the preferred fields of work of research into the history of the text and literary criticism. But the results found expression also in the respectable works of "introduction" to both the Old and the New Testament, which appeared, among other places, in the prudent adoption of the results of the criticism of the Pentateuch, of the clarification of the sources by J. Wellhausen (d. 1918) as well as in the genre research of H. Gunkel (d. 1932), but also in the Two-Sources Theory relating to the synoptic question.[110] Also the understanding of the history of the form of the Gospels, brought to light by K. L. Schmidt, M. Dibelius, and R. Bultmann around the turn from the second to the third decade, was recognized by Catholic exegesis—H. J. Vogels, M. Meinertz, J. Sickenberger, P. Benoit—in its positive aims and critically adopted.

If no real originality belonged to Catholic exegesis between the two world wars, in comparison to the Protestant, and its strength lay rather in historical-philological precision than in total theological plan, it in no way remained preoccupied in literary-critical and philological explanation. The exertion for a deepened and total view of Holy Scripture led also to first sketches of the genre, long cultivated in Protestantism, of "biblical theology," by F. Ceuppens, P. Heinisch, A. Lemonyer, F. Maier, O. Kuss, and F. Prat, even if these outlines at first, as a consequence of their attachment to the dogmatic tradition, preferred the systematic collective view to historical analysis and its problems.

---

[109] M. Blondel, Histoire et dogma (Paris 1904).

[110] As paradigmatic of this new type of introduction can be regarded: J. Nikel, Grundriss der Einleitung in das Alte Testament (Münster 1924); J. Goettsberger, Einleitung in das Alte Testament (Freiburg 1928): F. Vigouroux et al., Manuel Biblique, 14th ed. (Paris 1917, put on the Index); A. Wikenhauser, Einleitung in das Neue Testament, 5th ed. (Freiburg 1953, 1962); A. Robert and A. Tricot, Initiation Biblique, 3d ed. (Paris 1954); A. Robert and A. Feuillet, Einleitung in die Heilige Schrift, 2 vols., 2d ed. (Freiburg 1966).

Teaching on the university faculties and also work on the newly appearing biblical commentaries profited from this deeper theological penetration into the spirit and content of Holy Scripture. In addition to the strictly scientific and detailed commentaries, whose prototype was in France the commentary founded by M. J. Lagrange in Études bibliques from 1903 and in Germany the never completed Handbuch zum Alten Testament, edited by J. Nikel and A. Schulz from 1911 to 1933, there arose a relatively new genre of exegetical work in the form of the biblical explanations extending beyond the world of specialists, which were directed to a broader circle of readers and to the religiously educated laity.[111] These efforts were pushed further and made available even for practical preaching through biblical homiletic works—"Keppler School," F. Tillmann—to which, of course, the corresponding understanding was not offered among the parish clergy.

Still, these efforts remained precisely a proof of the interest in the Bible newly awakened by exegesis, as did also the Bible movement, which, recommended also by the Popes since Pius X, gained influence in various forms in all European countries—in Germany and elsewhere through the founding of the "Catholic Bible Work" in 1933, in Austria in close connection with the "Popular Liturgical Apostolate" of Pius Parsch.

It was probably a fruit of this positive development of the understanding of Scripture in Catholicism and of the method cultivated in the Pontifical Biblical Institute by Augustine Bea that the magisterium through Pius XII in the biblical encyclical Divino afflante Spiritu of 1943 proposed caution in regard to modern scriptural scientific methods and recommended to the exegetes to use "prudently" the auxiliary means offered by the modern sciences and to define precisely the literary genres. This official doctrinal pronouncement of the "Liberating Encyclical," often regarded as a breakthrough, was followed by similarly directed official pronouncements in the letter of the Biblical Commission to Cardinal Suhard in 1948[112] down to the instruction of the Papal Biblical Commission on "the historical truth of the Gospels" of 1964,[113] which on the one hand insisted on the "historical truth" of the Gospels, but on the other hand warned against the influx of philosophical and ideological prejudices in the operation of the historical method. At the same time it gave reason to think that the exegete must pursue his work not only as a responsible investigator but also as a believing theologian of the Church.

---

[111] To this belonged, among others, in Germany the Bonner Bibel (1912ff., 4th ed. 1931ff.); in Holland the commentary on the New Testament by J. Keuler (1935ff.).

[112] Cf. A. Kolping, op. cit., 260.

[113] R. Marlé, "Historische Methoden und theologische Probleme," Bilanz der Theologie II, 260.

Exegesis used this freedom just granted to it with great élan, which found expression in newly conceived commentaries, such as the Herder-Kommentar, in fundamental investigations in biblical theology, as also in the "biblical dictionaries" indispensable for the deeper, comprehensive grasp of the deep layers—Bibellexikon of 1951, Bibeltheologisches Wörterbuch of 1950. Even if here and in general the breadth and originality of Protestant biblical scholarship, with its richer tradition, naturally could not be equalled, still a closing of the gap and an approximation to its format became evident. Thereby biblical scholarship also within Catholic theology advanced to a similar position, as befitted it in the sphere of Protestant theology. This resulted, for obvious reasons, in a stronger influence on the systematic disciplines, in relation to which exegesis gained a certain superiority after the Second World War.

For the relations of this discipline to dogma, as in general for its ecclesiastical and faith status, some problems had to ensue, which in the 1950s had not yet made an appearance. Thus it is noteworthy that Catholic biblical scholarship at this time exercised, it is true, caution, for example, in the effort to justify the new Marian dogma, but also did not deny the ecclesiastical position (consult, for example, the problem of the ultimum fundamentum of this doctrine in Scripture).[114] Even more attempted at this time was the building of a bridge to dogmatic theology and to the dogma proceeding from Scripture, as when, for example, the route from the New Testament to the doctrine of Chalcedon was shown to be legitimate,[115] a point of departure for the later dogma of original sin was acknowledged in Romans 5:12–19,[116] and in the New Testament precursors of ecclesiastical dogma were found in the presymbols.[117]

From this basic attitude must probably also be explained the fact that Catholic exegesis in the debate, advancing like an avalanche, over R. Bultmann's thesis on demythologization, did not abandon itself to the fashionable trend, but exercised a sensible and firmly fundamental criticism, which still did not underestimate what was positive in Bultmann's concern.[118] The Second Vatican Council recognized intact the results of the epochal upward development of Catholic exegesis since the Second World War and confirmed to this discipline its leading role within theological scholarship in a series of significant statements, as when it approved the application of literary criticism and the rules of modern hermeneutics,[119] when it placed the ecclesiastical magisterium as a ministerial function below the Word of God in Scripture,[120] and evaluated all of Scripture and its study as "soul of all theology."[121] Of course, the council also expressed the obligation of ecclesiastical scholarship to cling to the theological bases of exegesis according to faith, in the doctrine of inspiration,[122] in the identification of Scripture and God's Word,[123] and in the emphasis on tradition and Church as the ultimately binding courts of interpretation.[124] Of course these positive statements of the council could not completely develop and clarify the problem involved in them for the self-understanding of exegesis. The ever more clearly appearing effort of exegesis in the succeeding years, in connection with the nonobservance of the principles mentioned, to understand itself as the really basic theological science could not be of use to it for long, chiefly as the opposition, which came to light in the strongly divergent events, made itself noticed as a hindrance.

---

[114] This theme is taken up, among others, by A. Bea, "La sacra scritura 'ultimo fundamento' del domma dell'Assunzione," CivCatt 101 (1950), 547–61.

[115] Thus R. Schnackenburg, "Der Abstand der christologischen Aussagen des Neuen Testamentes vom chalkedonischen Bekenntnis nach der Deutung R. Bultmanns," Chalkedon III (1954), 675–93, especially 687.

[116] O. Kuss, Der Römerbrief I (Regensburg 1957), 273.

[117] H. Schlier, "Kerygma und Sophia. Zur neutestamentlichen Grundlegung des Dogmas," Die Zeit der Kirche (Freiburg 1956). The essay first appeared in 1950–51 in Evangelische Theologie.

The Rise of Pastoral Theology to a Scientific Theological Discipline

THE INCREASED SIGNIFICANCE OF GENERAL (FUNDAMENTAL) PASTORAL THEOLOGY

The initiatives, which proceeded from the theology oriented to preaching and from the Bible and liturgical movements, could not remain without effect in the "pastoral care science," especially since these had come into prominence as early as the end of the nineteenth century through a certain flexibility and capacity for accommodation. As a visible sign of this may be regarded the differentiation, beginning around the turn of the century, of pastoral theology into homiletics, catechetics, and liturgy, oriented to the Three Offices Doctrine.[125] Of course, this specialization was purchased with the disadvantage that now there was left for general pastoral theology only a relatively meagre space, which, provided with the colorless designation of "hodegetics," was filled out as regards content with a professional instruction for the pastor which engaged especially in practical directions for its official exercise. Such a "clerical" formal object not only excluded the relation to the entire community but even formally hindered a really scientific elaboration of this subject. And so it was actually taught more in the manner of a technique which should be practiced by the individual pastor on the individual believer than in the manner of a theological reflection. It required a long way until this "remnant" of a pastoral theology again developed to full stature, gained scholarly features, and also again displayed its integrating function relative to the separated partial disciplines.

---

[118] Evaluation of the position of the exegesis in this controversy in K. Hollmann, Existenz und Glaube. Entwicklung und Ergebnisse der Bultmann-Diskussion in der Katholischen Theologie (Paderborn 1972), 40–79.

[119] Dei Verbum, 12.

[120] Ibid., 9.

[121] Optatam Totius, 16.

[122] Dei Verbum, 11.

[123] Ibid., 9.

[124] Ibid., 9, 10.

In fact, the rise of pastoral theology from a practical instruction for the pastor for the individual care of his charges to a scientific theological discipline is one of the most positive advances of the history of theology in the first half of the twentieth century. It is self-evident that this progress was completed not uninfluenced by external factors—negative: pastoral and social distress of proletarianization, departure of the masses from the Church; positive: youth, Bible, and liturgical movements—but it still had its own origin in an inner theological area, namely, in the understanding of the significance of Church and community for the self-realization of the Christian in a world which was ever more alienated from the Christian faith.

The actions initiated in the non-scientific area—Pius XI's Catholic Action in 1925; Workers' Movement of J. Cardijn in 1912 and H. Godin in 1943; Young Christian Workers, and so forth—were first expressed only sparingly in scholarly work, as, for example, V. Lithard's Précis de Théologie Pastorale[126] with its emphasis on Catholic Action, in G. Stocchiero's Pratica Pastorale[127] with its summons to the Church to turn to the world, and in C. Noppel's Aedificatio Corporis Christi[128] with the tendency to the inclusion of the laity into the hierarchical apostolate of the Church and to the notion of a care of souls supported by the community.

---

[125] Cf. also V. Schurr, "Pastoraltheologie im 20. Jahrhundert," Bilanz der Theologie III, 371.

[126] Paris 1929, 3d ed. 1941.

[127] Vicenza 1912, 5th ed. 1936.

[128] Freiburg 1937, 2d ed. 1949.

These impulses were increasingly accepted and scientifically investigated by L. Bopp in his Zwischen Pastoraltheologie und Seelsorgewissenschaft,[129] which also included the still suspect results of psychoanalysis in the circle of its reflections on pastoral theology. To a greater degree the knowledge of the human sciences, especially psychology and medicine, was included in this phase of development of the research into pastoral theology,[130] just as in moral theology.

But a really theological basic concept only established itself since the 1940s, when, not least on the basis of the utilization of historical knowledge rather than the previous route of pastoral scholarship since the Enlightenment, the proper goal of this science was recognized by F. X. Arnold as "the theological understanding of the pastorally operating Church and its types of activity." The basic theological idea, which C. Noppel had found in the then quite attractive concept of the Body of Christ, was here concretized into the "God-Man Principle." The deeper-lying intention went, on the one hand, to a departure from the anthropocentric narrowness of the pastoral theology of the Enlightenment, on the other hand to the pushing back of the guiding idea, felt as illegitimate, of the salvation-mediating Church, in contrast to which, with the "God-Man Principle" the "Divine Incommunicability" and direct relationship of all the work of salvation moved into the foreground, while only the character of a tool, of course of a personal sort, was acknowledged for the Church itself. In this definition of aim was really found a very fortunate synthesis of the contemporary concerns and movements in dogma, scriptural theology, liturgy, and history. The "unity of theology" here found once again a clear expression that could hardly be better achieved later.

In favor of the religious theology content of this basic pastoral start there speaks, among other things, the then appearing demand for a "care of souls from the altar," as J. Pascher calls it, which indeed set up a high ideal, but nevertheless was not perceived as a slogan and became quite effective in union with the liturgical incentives of the epoch.

Immediately before the beginning of the Second Vatican Council the scientific elaboration of fundamental pastoral theology achieved new progress with the publication of the Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie.[131] In it this discipline was emphatically developed out of the nature of the Church and the "theological analytics of the situation of the Church," to quote K. Rahner, was defined as its basis. This ecclesiological concept appeared more comprehensive than the previously prevailing "God-Man" or personological foundation. It anticipated in much the results of the "Pastoral Council,"[132] as the Second Vatican understood itself, as, on the other hand, the council also sanctioned these results. Hence it is comprehensible if thereafter pastoral theology, borrowing an idea from Schleiermacher, understood itself as the "crown"[133] of theological scholarship. However, the postconciliar development seems to show also the dangers of this claim to exclusiveness, which are contained in it, namely, that theology as a whole is subject to practical ends.

---

[129] Munich 1937.

[130] As examples the periodical Arzt und Seelsorger (since 1925) and the works of A. Niedermeyer on pastoral medicine may serve.

[131] Edited by F. X. Arnold, K. Rahner, V. Schurr, L. M. Weber, and F. Klostermann, 4 vols. (Freiburg 1964–69).

THE CATECHETICAL RENEWAL

The new theological orientation with the utilization of general scholarly knowledge made itself especially noticeable positively also in the partial discipline of catechetics, which naturally had to find special attention in the age of a general awakening of youth and its own psychological assessment.[134] To be sure, in catechetics the textual analytical, deductive method of the improved Deharbe Catechism and its preference for the abstract rational presentation as well as its basically apologetic outlook still remained predominant. As an example the Catechismus Catholicus published by Cardinal Gasparri in 1930 can serve: in its narrow, theoretically doctrinally conceived manner it did not correspond to the new pedagogical, didactic, and religious psychological demands. Only in the 1930s, especially in Germany and France, did there begin a turning to the kerygmatic direction of presentation, which, following models of a period before Neo-Scholasticism—J.B. Hirscher and his "salvation history" orientation—after a not unproductive "controversy on method," sought a renewal on the bases of the newer theology, the Bible, preaching, and pedagogical understanding.

Here also the inspiring principle consisted in the synthesis of "religion and life,"[135] which could counteract the previous separation of teaching and life and the intellectualistic orientation of instruction. The "Munich Catechetical Method" of textual development in three formal stages—presentation, explanation, stimulation—defined by H. Stieglitz (d. 1920), following O. Willmann, found, after initial resistance, acceptance in Germany as in most other European countries. But it was also fostered by stimulation from other areas, as by the Work School Principle, according to G. Kerschensteiner (d. 1932), which activated in a new way the peculiar activity of students and group instruction. By means of psychology and the philosophy of value the "principle of experience" also more strongly found admission into catechetical instruction, whereupon the formal stages were modified to the triad of value experience, value exposition, and value realization.

---

[132] For this the pastoral constitution Gaudium et spes must especially be regarded as fundamental.

[133] Thus V. Schurr, "Pastoraltheologie im 20. Jahrhundert," Bilanz der Theologie III, 375.

[134] These tendencies found expression in the work by E. Spranger, Psychologie des Jugendalters (Leipzig 1924, Heidelberg, 27th ed. 1963), which is esteemed and much read even in Catholic circles.

[135] Thus the title of the collection organized by G. Götzel of the Munich Catechetical Union (Munich 1922).

Also very significant were the initiatives which proceeded from Austria, specially interested in practical theology since the Josephinist reform. The Religionsbüchlein published by J. Pichler as early as 1913, with its wide extension into more than fifty languages, intended the turning away from the theoretical doctrine following in the wake of Neo-Scholasticism to personal proclamation of salvation and address. These efforts did not accomplish a formal breakthrough until the 1930s, when, following general pastoral theology, the establishing of a proper material kerygmatic and of a material-kerygmatic method occurred with M. Pfliegler and J. A. Jungmann. Here Christocentrism and the biblical foundation were elaborated in a new way to structural elements of religious instruction and of a "thematic didactic play method," which also facilitated a more intimate union between catechesis and biblical instruction. On the whole, in the course of this development catechetics reached the status of a special form of preaching, which not only proved the theological depth of this movement, but also gave evidence of the unbroken strength of the awareness of faith to introduce the aim of kerygmatics among school-pedagogical conditions.

Of course, this development would not have been thinkable without the stimulus coming from France, where since the separation of Church and state the necessity of the external as well as of the internal reform of religious instruction was especially pressing. But the realization of these aims did not occur until after the First World War—pastoral letter of Bishop A. Landrieux of Dijon in 1922—when the "Munich Method" was also accepted there, and the historicobiblical and salvation history orientation was then definitely set in motion. The Catéchisme a l'usage des Diocèses de France (1940, 2d ed. 1947), constructed on these foundations, first developed the types of a specific didactic play catechism with clear founding in Holy Scripture, with inclusion of the church year, with consideration of elements of a work of instruction, and with the purposeful orientation to the inner participation in prayer and in religious practice. The model work supplied decisive stimuli to the Katholischer Katechismus der Bistümer Deutschlands, which after seventeen years of preparation was published in 1955 and by being translated into some thirty languages had a worldwide effect. Of course, soon after the Second Vatican Council it was regarded as no longer suited to the times, which could be less a judgment of its absent qualities than a sign of the quickly changing situation of the age, which catechetics was hardly able to follow with its outlines.

And so, after the Second Vatican Council there again broke out the controversy over method, ignited at the beginning of the century, in the wake of the manifold strivings for adaptation, but also with the rise of the principle of pluralism, which put the unity of catechetics as a science to the test. The move to existential anthropology, becoming effective thereafter, brought about not only a certain turning away from the kerygmatic and biblical orientation, considered as fundamentalist and biblicist, but also produced the danger of leveling catechetics as a kerygmatic communication of the truth of faith in favor of a purely school history of religious information and of a religious and moral offering. True, the Second Vatican Council acknowledged[136] catechetical instruction as the first means of help in the Church's task of educating, but it also clearly placed it in the "service of the Word,"[137] and did not inaugurate its narrowly existential or informative direction.

THE TURNING OF HOMILETICS TO KERYGMATICS

Following the rise of catechetics and in a certain parallelism to it, there also took place in homiletics an upward movement, which benefited from the stimulation of historical, biblical, and liturgical theology. The difficulties and problems of this ecclesiastical service to people of the mass-epoch and modern industrial society could not but be especially dramatically prominent in the Church's preaching ministry. The disparity between the expenditure of work here occurring and the visible success spread the impression of a "collapse" of preaching, which Benedict XV's encyclical on preaching, Humani generis (1917), appearing during the First World War, complained of without being able to oppose anything substantial to it. This lay not only in the unfavorable state of the times, which prevented a stronger echo of the papal doctrinal letter, but even more in the missing theological foundation of homiletics, which was more and more strongly dependent on the idea of a "theory of spiritual eloquence."[138] In this connection interest in preaching and the effort for its greater efficacy were not slight, as the growth of special periodicals,[139] of systematic instruction,[140] of practical means of assistance,[141] but also of more profound theological and spiritual guides[142] prove. The putting of these exertions into practice was done by a series of impressive preaching figures, such as Bishop P. W. Keppler (d. 1926), A. Donders (d. 1944), Cardinal Faulhaber (d. 1952), R. Guardini (d. 1968),[143] and others, whose activity, especially in the Germany of the Nazi era, did not remain without echo. If it also appears somewhat exaggerated to speak of this epoch beginning after the First World War as of an "age of homiletics,"[144] still on the whole a suitable estimation of the effort of this period is thereby given.

---

[136] Gravissimum educationis, 4.

[137] Dei Verbum, 25.

[138] Thus the title of a work, not unimportant in its day, by J. Jungmann, 2 vols. (Freiburg 1877, 4th ed. 1908).

The novelty and central point of this effort is only appreciated, however, if one points to the biblical-theological foundation. Compared with the previous exertions of homiletics in regard to preaching, which were of a predominantly formal-rhetorical sort, though not without regard for the religious subject, there occurred at the end of the first third of this century in the framework of the development of fundamental pastoral theology also an application of the kerygmatic to preaching as its material and formal principle. From this principle was derived the joining of the content of preaching to Scripture, which led in practice to the rediscovery of the homily as the form directly modeled on the reading and interpretation of Scripture, but from it also derived in the formal realm the personal character of address, the authority of Christ lying in the Word, and the conviction of the quasi-sacramental efficacy of this Word in the believing hearer. In the theoretical elaboration of these theological bases the works of J. A. Jungmann[145] and others showed the way. In the practical application of these principles the explanations of preaching by F. Tillmann,[146] which were on a high level, accomplished much that was significant.

After the Second World War the theological basis of kerygmatics experienced also from the side of dogma a broad support and deepening in the development of a "Theology of the Word," which was conceived not without stimulation by the Protestant theology of the Word.[147] Also this meeting of homiletics and dogma may be regarded as an example for the awareness of unity of the theological disciplines, which was significant for the state of all of contemporary theology.

---

[139] Cf., among others, Kirche und Kanzel (Paderborn 1918–43); Chrysologus (Paderborn 1860–1939).

[140] Thus, among others, F. Schubert, Grundzüge der Homiletik, 3d ed. (Graz 1934).

[141] To it belonged especially A. Koch, Homiletisches Handbuch, 12 vols. (Freiburg 1937ff.).

[142] Cf., among others, A. D. Sertillanges, Verkünder des Wortes (Salzburg 1936).

[143] Guardini's importance in this field was recently assessed by F. Wechsler, Romano Guardini als Kerygmatiker (Paderborn 1973).

[144] Thus V. Schurr, op. cit., 385.

[145] Die Frohbotschaft und unsre Glaubensverkündigung (Regensburg 1936).

[146] Erklärung der sonntäglichen Evangelien (Düsseldorf 1918, 8th ed. 1950); Erklärungen zu den sonntäglichen Episteln followed in 1921 and the 5th ed. in 1950, and zu den festtäglichen Episteln und Evangelien (1940, 2d ed. 1950).

Of course, after the Second World War the inadequacies of this kerygmatic were felt, with the emergence of the notion of "radical authenticity" into theological thought—demythologizing—with the turn to philosophical-theological existentialism, and with the appearance of reflection on the phenomenon of secularization. They concerned not only the precritical, somewhat unhistorical previous exegetical justification—thus, for example, especially discernible in R. Guardini's interpretation of the life of Jesus in his attractive book Der Herr[148]—but also the authoritative address of this "kerygmatic" and its defective adaptation of the message to the one "addressed," who was no longer to be seen only as "object" of the address and also rather to be "met" in his secularized environment. But contrary to these critical objections, which became still stronger after the Second Vatican Council, although the council accepted and gathered together all these impulses in its sober attitude, it must be considered that the problems touched on in them were articulated but not solved. It even seems that the radical solutions—preaching as "information"; preaching as a form of a "political" theology—on the whole approximated rather a step back and a withdrawal from the center. All together, a glance backward to the homiletic and pastoral theological efforts of the period before the council could establish what generally holds good for the development of theology: the building of a bridge to the contemporary believer. Overall the mediation to the spirit of the age succeeded not badly and perhaps better than that of modern theology in its too pronounced and intentional striving for modernity and accommodation to the spirit of the time. As historical experience can teach, theological scholarship must not merely "straggle behind," it must also, to a certain extent, lead.

THE REESTABLISHMENT OF LITURGY AS "THEOLOGY OF WORSHIP"

Unquestionably the liturgy had the most extraordinary and for the outside observer the most visible rise in the first half of this century. It developed in this period from a peripheral theological science, which was still included by the constitution Deus scientiarum Dominus of 1931 among the auxiliary disciplines of theology,[149] to that of a necessary and important "principal subject," a position attributed to it by the Second Vatican Council.[150] In this connection the original incentives and impulses for this development characterizing modern Catholicism lay at first not in the purely scholarly sphere, even if scholarship after a certain starting time opened itself to the new awakened forces, regulated them, and influenced them in turn (see Chapter 9).

---

[147] Cf., among others, O. Semmelroth, Wirkendes Wort. Zur Theologie der Verkündigung (Frankfurt 1962).

[148] Betrachtungen über die Person und das Leben Jesu Christi (Würzburg 1937, 13th ed. 1964).

Stimulated by the liturgical movement, liturgical scholarship also displayed an activity of a new type, which now had as its subject no longer only historical work on the sources, which had been intensively under way since the turn of the century in the course of the growing interest in history.[151] Now ensued the widening and deepening of the work to a sort of "theology of worship," which was accomplished with the acceptance of the equally vigorous ecclesiological and sacramental thought in this period by the theological foundation of the pastoral-practical movement. Its aim was directed to raising the theological stock of ideas from the liturgical sources to the goal of their more profound exploration, but also to the fructification of the entire life of faith. Pius XII later gave to this aim the motto taken from tradition of the lex supplicandi, which is to determine the lex credendi.[152] In the course of this orientation there occurred considerations, pressing to the essential, on the "spirit of the liturgy,"[153] on the connection between "liturgy and the Kingdom of God,"[154] on the meaning of the Eucharist,[155] as well of the sacraments,[156] all of which contributed to the enrichment of dogmatic theology. Again the greatest significance for this intellectual foundation-laying was gained by the mysterium theory of [149] This corresponded somewhat to its classification by the Code of Canon Law, Canon 1365, par. 2.

---

[150] Sacrosanctum Concilium 16.

[151] In the nature of examples for this matter are the works and editions, partly quoted in the church history survey, of A. Franz (d. 1916), Die Messe im Deutschen Mittelalter (Freiburg 1962); M. Férotin, Liber Mozarabicus Sacramentorum (Paris 1912); C. Mohlberg (d. 1963), Liber Sacramentorum Romanae Ecclesiae Ordinis Anni Circuli (Rome 1960); Missale Gallicanum Vetus (Rome 1958).

[152] Encyclical Mediator Dei (1947).

[153] R. Guardini, Vom Geist der Liturgie (Freiburg 1918, 19th ed. 1957); Liturgische Bildung (Rothenfels 1923).

[154] Cf. also J. Kramp, Messliturgie und Gottesreich. Darlegung und Erklärung der kirchlichen Messformulare, 3 vols (Freiburg 1921, 5th ed. 1922).

[155] The following may serve as examples for this liturgical-theological orientation: J. A. Jungmann, Die liturgische Feier. Grundsätzliches über Formgesetze der Liturgie (Regensburg 1939); J. Pascher, Eucharistia. Gestalt und Vollzug (Münster 1947).

[156] J. Pinsk, Die sakramentale Welt (Freiburg 1938).

O. Casel (d. 1948),[157] in the discussion of which the work was altogether motivated to the theological clarification of the Sacrifice of the Mass and of sacramental reality.[158] It was not least of all the process of theological deepening which obstructed an externalization of the aims, lying within the area of the possible, and which finally also paralyzed the fears and resistances to this movement, that occasionally increased enormously.[159] A clarification to be understood in the affirmative sense was finally produced by Pius XII's encyclical on the liturgy, Mediator Dei (1947), which by way of suggestion already made known the desire for reforms in liturgy, whereas the hitherto practical efforts in regard, for example, to Gregorian chant[160] and church music,[161] had operated rather in the sense of a restoration. The Pope introduced some significant reforms, including the approval of numerous rituals with vernacular texts and songs, the introduction of a new translation of the psalms, the Psalterium Pianum, but especially the renewal of the Holy Week and Easter Vigil Liturgies. The fact that these reforms were either prepared or accompanied by research,[162] ever more intensified after the Second World War, as well as by the work of the newly founded Liturgical Institute[163] and the liturgical congresses[164] produced for liturgical scholarship a theological importance which was highly esteemed by the Second Vatican Council. The council itself had multiplied the tasks of this discipline with its reforms, carried out or announced. But it could not be foreseen that it would be necessary for the liturgy in the era beginning after the council, when the liturgical movement branched out and an at times excessive wave of experimenting and adapting followed it, to look back again rather at the "spirit of the liturgy," as R. Guardini expressed it, and the theological bases of its work as Opus Dei.

---

[157] In addition to the works cited in n. 30, special notice should be given to the parts of his literary remains that have been published of his planned "special life work": Das christliche Opfermysterium. Zur Morphologie und Theologie des eucharistischen Hochgebetes, ed. by V. Warnach (Graz, Vienna, and Cologne 1968).

[158] On the results to the end of World War II information is supplied by T. Filthaut, Die Kontroverse über die Mysterienlehre (Warendorf 1947).

[159] An expression of these fears and tensions is presented by the brochure of J. Kassiepe, Irrwege und Umwege im Frömmigkeitsleben der Gegenwart (Würzburg 1940).

[160] The reform of the chant obtained from Pius a new impetus through the motu proprio of 1904 and the decree of 29 April 1911.

[161] Cf. also the motu proprio on church music, Tra le sollecitudini of 22 November 1903.

[162] As examples the following may be referred to: J. A. Jungmann, Missarum Sollemnia (Vienna 1948, 5th ed. 1962); Liturgisches Jahrbuch (1950ff.); La Maison-Dieu (1945ff.); M. A. P. Schmidt, Introductio in Liturgiam Occidentalem (Rome, Freiburg, and Barcelona 1960); C. Vagaggini, Il senso teologico della Liturgia (Rome 1957); C. Floristan, El año litúrgico, 2d ed. (Barcelona 1966).

[163] In Germany: the Liturgisches Institut at Trier (since 1947); in France: the Centre de Pastorale Liturgique at Paris (since 1947); in Italy: the Centro di Azione Liturgica at Genoa (since 1947).

[164] Here may be named selectively: Frankfurt 1950; Munich 1955; Assisi 1956; Nijmegen 1959.

The formation and growth of liturgical scholarship, which was intentionally placed here at the end of the first phase of the history of theology in the first half of the twentieth century, can, it is true not be taken as the supreme value for reaching a verdict on the total development of the theology of this period, because naturally a development does not proceed in all departments of knowledge in the same way. Hence the entire verdict on this theological period must also be more cautious. Nevertheless, it cannot be expressed negatively: Measured by the standard of scholarship, the accomplishments of the historicocritical work of theology stand on no low stage; in the systematic sphere the effort for a more vital grasping and stating of the truths of faith was not to be underestimated, even if great syntheses remained rare. As regards the claim of this theology on the Church, it felt itself on the whole to be rather the serving agent of the body of teachers and believers than as a critical tribunal. And so its calls for reform were moderate and restrained, although it was precisely in this moderation that they had their effect in the Church and did not leave the faithful uninfluenced. As regards this theology's ecumenical and world relations, the total attitude may often seem to the modern observer to be strongly introverted, too self-centered, and too little open. True, the "bringing back of the world"[165] was also its concern, which it intended to realize not by means of external activities and proclamations but by the interior way of penetration into the mysterium of salvation, which remained the real object of its work. Surely there resulted from this the danger of an imbalance of the "sapiential," "contemplative" factor to the detriment of direct and world-related action, the limits of which it recognized in a certain sobriety. Here it was more realistic than the enthusiastic optimism of an A. Ehrhard at the beginning of the century, and under the impression of the powers of wickedness that burst forth in two world wars it could rightly be convinced that the modern world would never abandon its aversion to Christianity. Nevertheless, this theology, with all its limitations and boundaries, prepared the council of the "Church's opening up to the world" and paved the way for it.

---

[165] Thus the title of a book by O. Bauhofer (Freiburg 1937), highly regarded in its day.

CHAPTER 9

*Movements within the Church and Their Spirituality

In the years following the First World War there ensued a series of new starts, indeed an extensive and profound renewal of religious and ecclesiastical life in Central Europe. The reasons for this are many-layered: first of all, the concentration and consolidation of church life in the nineteeth century under the guidance of Popes such as Pius IX, Leo XIII, and Pius X produced their fruit. Very different in character, style of leadership, and determination of goals, these Popes made their contribution each in his own way. What had long been regarded as dead proved to be alive. The experience of the war and of the collapse of a liberal, individualistic culture that believed in progress created a new openness to transcendence and the predetermined truths of revelation, as well as to the form of religious life in the ecclesial community. The philosopher Peter Wust (1884–1940) indicated the keyword, applicable also to other fields, with titles such as "resurrection of metaphysics" (1920) and "the return of German Catholicism from exile" (1924). The call of the age for the "spirit of the whole," as expressed by Julius Langbehn, the demand for the organically grown, for life as the genuinely real and creative against intellectualism and materialism, against isolation and uprooting, the turning to the original, to the sources, away from the manufactured, derived, and merely imagined were united with the new self-consciousness of awakened religious forces. These were expressed especially in the liturgical movement, the Bible movement, and the lay movement supported by a new awareness of the Church. But these were not currents moving parallel and to be separated from one another; rather, they influenced one another and supported one another. At first they affected smaller circles of academicians and youth in the associations of the Catholic youth movement, whereas the broad strata of the communities were further supported in their religious life by the forms of devotion characteristic of the nineteenth century: devotion to the Blessed Sacrament, to the Sacred Heart of Jesus, and to the Virgin-Mother Mary. But the development of the decades from 1920 to 1950 was noted for the fact that these more traditional forms of devotion were also affected by reflection on Holy Scripture, the theology of the Fathers, and the liturgy of the Church and the Christocentrism contained in it.

---

* Erwin Iserloh

The Liturgical Movement

The beginnings of the liturgical movement extend into the nineteenth century; they are related to the renewal of Benedictine monasticism. The Belgian abbey of Maredsous, founded in 1872 from Beuron, which had been established in 1863, in 1882 published a people's missal, the Missel des Fidèles. Anselm Schott (1845–96), who had lived at Maredsous during the temporary suppression of Beuron in the Kulturkampf, followed this example in 1884. By means of his Mass Book he aimed, as he said in the foreword, "to contribute a little so that the Church's rich treasure of prayer, which is set down in its sacred liturgy, may become more and more accessible and familiar to the faithful."

The impetus to the liturgical movement as a breakthrough of the laity to active participation in the Church's liturgy proceeded from Belgium. It had been preceded by the decrees of Pius X of 1903 and 1904 on the chant and of 1905 on frequent and early Communion. In keeping with his motto, "To unite all things in Christ," the Pope aspired to the renewal and consolidation of the Christian spirit of the faithful. "The first and indispensable source from which this spirit is drawn," so Pius X stressed in the motu proprio of 1903, "is the active participation of the faithful in the sacred mysteries and the public and solemn prayer of the Church."[1] A Benedictine of Mont César, Lambert Beauduin (d. 1960), was deeply affected by these ideas of the Pope. Before his entry into the monastery—he was professed in 1907—he had been a diocesan priest at Liége and had belonged to the "Labor Chaplains," a community of worker-priests. Accordingly, also as a monk he strove to work among the people by means of the liturgy, that is, to move out of the narrow framework of academic circles into the congregations. At the National Congress of Catholic Works, inaugurated by Cardinal Mercier, he demanded at Mechelen in 1909 that the missal itself should be disseminated as the prayerbook but at least that the complete text of the Mass and of Sunday vespers should be made available to the people in a vernacular translation. This congress became the "Mechelen Happening"[2] through the enthusiastic talk of a layman, the history professor Godefroid Kurth (d. 1916). In it he traced religious ignorance back to the still greater ignorance of the liturgy. He concluded thus: "Give to the faithful an understanding and, as a consequence, a love for the mysteries which they celebrate, give them the missal to use, and with it replace the many mediocre prayerbooks." An enthusiastic assent of the congress was given. A few weeks later there appeared in a large printing for Advent the first fascicle of La vie liturgique, a small booklet which provided the liturgical texts with the corresponding explanations.

---

[1] ASS 36 (1903–04), 388.

[2] B. Fischer, "Das 'Mechelner Ereignis' vom 23.9.1909," LJ 9 (1959), 203–19; E. Iserloh, "Die Geschichte der Liturgischen Bewegung," Hirschberg 12, (1959), 113–22, 115.

In Germany the liturgical movement at first remained confined to academic circles. The spiritual leadership belonged to the abbey of Maria Laach under Abbot Ildefons Herwegen (1874–1946). In 1913 he celebrated Holy Week with a group of academicians—among them men such as the future Chancellor Heinrich Brüning and French Foreign Minister Robert Schuman[3]—and revealed to them the liturgy as source of piety. At Maria Laach in 1918 the first "community Mass" was celebrated as Missa recitata or, preferably, dialogata.

The Catholic youth, affected by the general German youth movement, first the Fountain of Youth under Romano Guardini, then the student movement New Germany, and finally the Association of Young Men and the Storm Band under Ludwig Wolker (1871–1955), enthusiastically adopted the new manner of celebrating the liturgy. In the liturgy these youth found a realization of their longing for community, for essential and authentic form, and for the embodiment of religion in "sacred signs." For their part they promoted the liturgical movement with their untroubled enthusiasm to victory against resistance and abuses as well as against theological hesitations. The spontaneously growing new liturgical practice was from the start accompanied and clarified by a theology which united strictly scientific, even historicoarchaeological investigation with proclamation and piety. Especially effective in the area of liturgical formation was Romano Guardini (1885–1968) with his Vom Geist der Liturgie (1918), Liturgische Bildung (1923), Von heiligen Zeichen (1927), and his scriptural-theological introduction, Der Herr (1937). He led to reading and reflection on Holy Scripture, but also encouraged that the world should be taken seriously and interpreted with the eyes of faith. From 1923 professor in Berlin of Philosophy of Religion and Catholic Worldview, he understood these as "the unity of that view which embraces the living reality of the world by faith."

The texts of the Ordinary of the Mass, published by the three communities mentioned for common prayer in the "Community Mass," give a picture of the growing liturgical and religious and pedagogical experience: The Gemeinschaftliche Andacht zur Feier der heiligen Messe, published by Guardini in 1920, provided the text of the Mass only with paraphrasing interpretive additions. The Missa composed in 1924 by Father Joseph Kramp (1886–1940) for the "Union of New Germany" led to the praying aloud of the entire Mass from the prayers at the foot of the altar to the Last Gospel except for the canon, without making any distinction between the public prayers of the priest and the congregation and the private prayers of the priest. This booklet was an expression of the first excess of zeal in which people felt that the community nature of the Mass was expressed by the fact that all prayed everything, which threatened to lead to an empty, loud operation and supplied welcome material to critics. The Kirchengebet published in 1928 by Ludwig Wolker made the newer knowledge its own, especially in the later issues, and, in accord with the "High Mass Rule," asked which prayers belonged to the priest, the reader, and the congregation respectively, and which were to be prayed quietly. The translations of the Kirchengebet, which had a circulation of several million, were transformed into new editions of diocesan prayerbooks.

---

[3] R. Schuman, "Ein Blatt dankbarer Erinnerung," LJ 9 (1959), 194.

This route of the liturgical movement into the congregations was first taken in the German language area by the "Popular Liturgical Apostolate" of Klosterneuburg near Vienna under Pius Parsch (1884–1954). In his own publishing establishment he published the texts of the Sunday liturgy—25 million down to 1930—in order to "bring the Church's worship to the simple folk." He revealed the meaning of the liturgy for a new biblical piety in books such as The Church's Year of Grace (1923, 14th ed. 1952–58) in three volumes, Lernt die Messe verstehen (1931), and in the periodicals Bibel und Liturgie (1926ff.) and Lebe mit der Kirche (1928ff.).

"Popular liturgy and pastoral care" were also the supporting elements of the parish work of city pastors such as Georg Heinrich Hörle (1889–1942) at Frankfurt, Konrad Jacobs (1874–1931) at Mühlheim in the Ruhr, Joseph Könn (1876–1960) at Cologne, and of the Oratory of Saint Philip Neri, founded at Leipzig in 1930. Starting with the axiom that all participation has to take place in accord with the capabilities of the participant, there was sought a celebration of Mass and of the Liturgy of the Hours that would do justice to both the liturgy and the congregation. Thus there came about the "Prayed Sung Mass" and the "German High Mass," in which the texts were sung in melodies adapted to the German language, and priest, servers, choir, and congregation performed the parts of the liturgy proper to them.

With such a distribution of roles the danger of an activist industry was banned; in the liturgical happening there were periods when the individual, priest or member of the congregation listened quietly or silently sought union with the common action or assented to the effecting word of the priest. If liturgical piety meant extension of often narrow and egoistic prayer to the concerns of the Church, immersion in the movement through Christ in the Holy Spirit to the Father, it is still not a substitute for prayer in the "private room," that is, for the intimate encounter of the individual with God. Community prayer demanded that reflective "personal" prayer should not become a soulless idling. This integration of the public congregational prayer and the prayer of the individual has still not been fully achieved. This shows the difficulty of terminology. For the latter must not be "private," and the former must not be impersonal. It is not enough that one praying liturgically should lend only his lips to the Church for the praise of God. In the 1930s there were violent confrontations over this.

Exaggerations, narrow-mindedness, and wilfullness of overzealous circles from the liturgical movement led to anxious and passionate criticism, among other places, in the lively book of the popular missionary M. Kassiepe, Irrwege und Umwege im Frömmigkeitsleben der Gegenwart (1939), and in A. Doerner's Sentire cum Ecclesia (1941). But there was no "official short circuit," against which R. Guardini had warned in 1940 in his "Word on the Liturgical Question," a letter to Bishop Stohr. Instead, the conflicts led to the German bishops' taking up the liturgical efforts, and so the liturgical movement became the liturgical renewal directed by the Church's authority. In 1940 the Episcopal Conference formed the Liturgical Section under Bishops Albert Stohr and Simon Konrad Landersdorfer and a Liturgical Commission of experts in theory and practice. Their work led to the 1942 "Guidelines for the liturgical structure of the parochial liturgy."

A memorandum of Archbishop Konrad Gröber of Freiburg, which he submitted on 18 January 1943 to the Curia and his fellow-bishops,[4] threatened to lead to a new crisis. The seventeen points "giving occasion for uneasiness" were, among others: the imminent schism in the clergy, an "alarmingly flourishing mysticism of Christ" as a consequence of an exaggerated interpretation of the doctrine of the Corpus Christi Mysticum, the overstressing of the doctrine of the general priesthood, the "thesis of Meal-Sacrifice and Sacrificial Meal," the "overemphasis of the liturgical," the effort to make the congregational Mass obligatory, and the use of German in the Mass. "Can we German bishops," thus concluded Conrad Gröber, "and can Rome still keep silent?" This memorandum crossed a letter of Cardinal Secretary of State Maglione, which the chairman of the Episcopal Conference, Cardinal Bertram, received on 11 January 1943. In it there was complaint against encroachments by radical representatives of the liturgical movement, a report on them was demanded, and a series of proposals was made as to how the good in it could be fostered.

---

[4] T. Mass-Ewerd, Die Krise der Liturgischen Bewegung in Deutschland. Studien zu den Auseinandersetzungen um die "Liturgische Frage" während des Zweiten Weltkriegs auf Grund bisher unveröffentlichter Dokumente (Regensburg 1977); F. Kolbe, Die Liturgische Bewegung (Aschaffenburg 1964), 72–75.

In the opinion of the West German bishops of 8 April 1943 to the Roman inquiry there was expressed how very much the celebration of the liturgy had become a source of strength in the age of National Socialism and of the war. "German Catholicism has been for ten years in abnormal circumstances. An activist young clergy and an equally activist Catholic youth that is enthusiastic for the faith see themselves more and more abruptly repressed on all sides. . . . Add to this, that it is of great importance to zealous young priests to give at least to the youth in the Church an awareness and experience of community, to bind them to the Church, and thereby to deepen and consolidate them in the faith."[5]

On 10 April 1943 Cardinal Bertram gave to Rome a comprehensive report on the origin of the liturgical movement, on the forms of congregational participation in Mass, including the German High Mass as a "sung Mass, joined with popular singing in German," and on the "defects and mistakes of the liturgical movement." An indirect position on the controverted questions was indicated as early as Pius XII's encyclical Mystici corporis, because in it the Pope acknowledged the understanding of the Church by the liturgical movement and termed the new understanding of the sacred liturgy the cause of a deeper consideration of the riches of Christ in the Church.

On 24 December 1943 Maglione made known the Roman decision to Cardinal Bertram. In it the religious and pastoral fruits of the liturgical movement were praised but a warning was lodged against arbitrary innovations, the desires made known by Bertram relative to the forms of Mass were granted, and work on a German ritual was encouraged. Finally, it was suggested to the bishops to take the leadership in hand. The final point of the Roman examination and the point of departure for the liturgical reform pursued by the Curia came in the encyclical on the sacred liturgy, Mediator Dei, of 20 November 1947. In it Pius XII made use of the keyword of "active and personal participation." The liturgy is "the public worship which our Redeemer, the Head of the Church, gives to the heavenly Father and which the community of believers offers to its Founder and through him to the eternal Father. . . . It displays the total public worship of the Mystical Body of Jesus Christ, namely, the Head and his members."[6]

A Roman commission was established in 1946–47 for the reform of the liturgical books. In the "Liturgical Institute" the German bishops created a work center at Trier. Corresponding institutions arose in other countries, such as the Centre de pastorale liturgique at Paris. In addition to liturgical congresses at Frankfurt in 1950, Munich in 1955, and Assisi in 1956, international study meetings took place. The Congregation of Rites approved the German ritual in 1950, in 1951 occurred the restoration of the Easter vigil, and in 1955 the renewal of all of Holy Week. The precept of the Eucharistic fast was greatly mitigated in 1953 and 1957 and thereby the way for the general permission for evening Mass was opened. Even after the announcement of the council and although the general reform of the liturgy was reserved to it, in 1960 a reform of the rubrics of breviary and Mass was decreed. It produced a simplification and served the real and meaningful performance of the rites and prayers. All these preliminary activities make it understandable that at the council the "Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy" (1963) was the first item ready for a decree and also that the postconciliar reorganization of the liturgy could proceed quickly. The council made the active participation of the congregation, called for by Popes Pius X, Pius XI, and Pius XII, possible in a way that no one could have expected and thereby took up the aims of the liturgical movement for the Universal Church (see Chapter 4). Meanwhile, it had spread to other European countries—for example, to the abbey of Silos in Spain—and to America—to Saint John's Abbey in Collegeville—where it obtained a social and ethical character.

---

[5] T. Maas-Ewerd, loc. cit.

[6] AAS 39 (1947), 521–95, 528f.

New Awareness of the Church and the Scriptural Movement

The liturgical movement was an expression of a new awareness of the Church, just as, conversely, the celebration of the liturgy permitted an entirely new experience of the Church as community. As early as 1921 Romano Guardini had declared in lectures "on the Meaning of the Church": "A religious movement of incalculable import has begun: the Church is awaking in souls."[7] Against religious individualism and subjectivism Guardini showed: "The religious life no longer proceeds only from the I, but at the same time awakens in the opposite pole, in the objective, formed community" (p.13).

It could be expected that youth which, in the name of truthfulness and personal responsibility, stood up against convention and the claims to authority on the part of civil society would have rejected the Church with its foreign legality and its rigid institutions. On the contrary: In the Church's liturgy wide circles of youth found a vital expression and a corroboration of their longing for community and at the same time correction and support in their predetermined and established position. Church was experienced not so much as institution, as agent of salvation, but as fruit of salvation, of community of life and love, whose center and foundation is Christ himself. "Christ the Lord is the real I of the Church."[8] He is the head, and Christians have life and salvation as members of his body. Church was seen preeminently as Corpus Christi mysticum. If hitherto, especially in the nineteenth century, the Catholic had understood the Church as something like a collective person, to which he belonged, whose adherent or child he was, which he defended and loved, and in which he believed, so now there is question of a community, which he believes and whose member he is. The Christian does not stand facing the Church, but in it: "We are the Church," is said in many addresses and professions. Submission to the Church or, better, into the Church does not mean self-alienation but self-discovery: "To that extent I am a Christian personality, when I am a member of the Church and the Church is living in me. If I speak to it, then I say, in a fully profound understanding, not 'you' but 'I.' "[9] [7] R. Guardini, Vom Sinn der Kirche (Mainz 1922), 1.

---

Thus the Church could be understood, in fact experienced, as a principle of life, not so much as a legislator but as the source of strength and in the effort for the neighbor as the motive of moral and ascetical exertion. Books such as Der mystische Leib Christi als Grundprinzip der Askese (1936) by F. Jürgensmeier or Morale et Corps mystique (1937) by E. Mersch are characteristic of this. Altogether people wanted to move away from a casuistic and individualistic doctrine of sin to a doctrine of virtue as the message of the imitation of Christ. This was the direction taken by the Handbuch der katholischen Sittenlehre (1931–37) of the former exegete, Fritz Tillmann (1874–1935), with the volumes Idee der Nachfolge Christi and Die Verwirklichung der Nachfolge Christi.

The scriptural movement had made it possible to get to know this Christ, to meet him not in the rarefaction of Neo-Scholastic theology or of catechisms, but directly in Holy Scripture. Christocentric piety was awakened and deepened by means of the text of the New Testament itself in good vernacular translations and a series of scientifically based books on the life of Jesus, such as M. J. Lagrange, L'Évangile de Jésus-Christ (1928); L. de Grandmaison, Jésus-Christ, sa personne, son message (1928); J. Lebreton, La vie et l'enseignement de Jésus-Christ, notre Seigneur (1931); F. M. Willam, Das Leben Jesu im Lande und Volke Israel (1933); K. Adam, Christus unser Bruder (1926) and Jesus Christus (1933); R. Guardini, Der Herr (1937); and others. The program of Catholic youth read: "Life formation in Christ." Jesus, undiminished Man in his divinity, became the model, and the "Christus totus," Christ continuing to live as the Church, was seen as the basis of one's own life and of love of neighbor. Untroubled by an opposition between the historical Jesus and the Christ of faith, people directly took up the text of the Gospels in private reading of Scripture or in "Bible Groups," sought to make present, in the style of the Spiritual Exercises of Saint Ignatius Loyola, the scenes, situations, and figures described there, and to find the "application" to their personal life. Characteristic of this sort of biblical work is the book by Martin Manuwald, S. J., Christuskreis. Der Jugend und ihren Führern."[10] [8] Karl Adam in Das Wesen des Katholizismus, which appeared in its first edition in 1924, in its thirteenth in 1957.

---

[9] Ibid., 33.

Catholic Action

Corresponding to the new awareness of the Church in broad circles of the laity and their understanding that a person could be a living member in the body of Christ only if the life stream is passed on, was the summons by the Popes to the lay apostolate, to Catholic Action. At the beginning of his pontificate, which was put under the motto "The Peace of Christ in the Kingdom of Christ," Pius XI, alluding to the general priesthood of all believers, summoned to "active work for the spread and renewal of the Kingdom of Christ."[11] In a letter of 13 November 1928 to Cardinal Bertram and elsewhere, the Pope several times defined Actio catholica as the "participation of the laity in the apostolate of the hierarchy."[12] It is a "social movement" with the aim "of advancing the Kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ and thereby communicating to human society the highest of all goods." Catholics, in their sharing in the hierarchy's apostolate, should be put in the position "of spreading everywhere the principles of the Christian faith and of Christian doctrine, defending them energetically, and giving effect to them in private and in public life."[13] The Pope saw the Church preeminently as the Kingdom of God on earth. In conformity with this was the institution of the solemnity of Christ the King in the jubilee year 1925. Christ's royal dominion was based on the innate right of his divine and human natures as well as on the acquired right of his work of redemption. Only in the recognition of his Kingship in private and public life can a world without peace and help find peace. "The plague of our age," stressed the Pope in the encyclical Quas primas on the institution of the solemnity of Christ the King, "is the so-called laicism, with its errors and godless aims." Catholics have "neither that social position nor that influence . . . which those really should have who hold high the torch of truth." The Pope attributes this deplorable state of affairs "to the indifference and timidity of the good, who withdraw from the fight or make only a weak resistance. . . . But if only all the faithful understand that they must fight under the standard of Christ the King with courage and perseverance, then they will strive with apostolic zeal to lead the alienated and ignorant souls back to the Lord, and they will exert themselves to maintain his rights inviolate."[14] [10] Nuremberg 1930.

---

[11] AAS 14 (1922), 695.

[12] Ibid. 20 (1928), 385.

[13] Ibid.

The organization of Catholic Action under strict guidance of the hierarchy was strongly determined by the situation of the Church in Italy under the Fascist regime, which wanted to assure the Church only a meagre freedom of movement for its impact in the world and which especially claimed for itself the education of the young. A crisis arose even after the Lateran Treaties as a consequence of the totalitarian claims of Fascism. In the sharp encyclical Non abbiamo bisogno on 29 June 1931[15] Pius XI warded off the attacks on Catholic Action, whose nonpolitical character had been established in ARTICLE 43 of the concordat and himself attacked the absolutizing of the state. On 2 September 1931 an agreement was reached whereby the Catholic Youth Associations were incorporated into the state organization, Balilla, in which their own chaplains should provide religious instruction. Catholic Action, on the contrary, was to be able to work freely and independently. Its purely religious character and its direct dependence on the hierarchy were to be assured by its organization according to parishes and dioceses and a rearrangement according to "natural states" and not according to professions.

This model could not be realized or encountered opposition in countries like Germany, where for decades in the free sphere of the Church a series of associations related to various professions had been established, which, indeed, saw in the apostolate an essential element of their work, but in relative independence of the bishops were able to undertake functions and make decisions which did not pertain to the direct mandate of the bishops. They incorporated the idea of Actio catholica and of the apostolate as work for the Kingdom of Christ the King into their program and their work, without making essential changes in the structure of these societies.

In Belgium and France Catholic Action gained a special position as a "specialized" organization, that is, oriented to defined professions, such as working youth, rural youth, and students. In Belgium there was established in 1924–25, as a continuation of the existing Jeunesse syndicaliste founded by the priest Joseph Cardijn (1882–1967, a cardinal in 1965),[16] the Jeunesse Oeuvrière Chrétienne (JOC), which was approved by Pius XI in 1925, adopted in France on the Belgian model in 1926, and then, especially after 1945, spread throughout the world. In West Germany after the Second World War there was at first no agreement as to whether the workers' unions—as was compulsory in the Nazi period—should be further established on the basis of parishes according to states of life and nature—male and female youth, men and women—or be again distinct according to profession—workers' unions, journeymen's unions, rural people, New Germany, academic associations, and so forth. The decision was again overwhelming for the latter form. The Young Christian Workers (CAJ) was basically the only new foundation as regards organization and method of work. It was called into being in 1947[17] and operated like the JOC, separated into male and female youth. The training took place according to the principle "see, judge, act." The young worker was to be led to see the concrete reality of his life, to evaluate and form it in the light of the Catholic faith. It especially mattered to the CAJ to fill a firm nucleus of "protagonists" with a missionary spirit by retreats and social and political study meetings. Correspondingly there arose for student youth the Jeunesse étudiante chrétienne (JEC) and for rural youth the Jeunesse agricole chrétienne (JAC).

---

[14] Ibid. 17 (1925), 606.

[15] Ibid. 23 (1931), 285–312.

In view of the numerous forms of the lay apostolate, differing in directness, intensity, and the structure required by the situation, Pius XII was moved to expand the concept of Catholic Action and to distinguish various forms of the organization and gradations of dependence on the hierarchy. Concerning the Marian congregations he declared in the apostolic constitution Bis saeculari of 27 September 1948 that they could be termed "with full right Catholic Action under the guidance and support of the Blessed Virgin Mary."[18] If Pius XI spoke of the participation of the laity in the hierarchical apostolate, Pius XII preferred to speak of collaboration or help.[19] According to the encyclical Mystici corporis of 29 June 1943, Christ requires the help of his members. "A really awesome mystery . . . that the salvation of many is dependent . . . on the cooperation which the shepherds and the faithful . . . have to provide."[20] [16] J. Cardijn, Was ist die CAJ?, 3d ed. (Essen 1955); idem, Die Schicksalsstunde der Arbeiterschaft (Essen 1955).

---

[17] J. Angerhausen, "Die Christliche Arbeiter-Jugend, die deutsche CAJ," TThZ 63 (1954), 280–88; J. Angerhausen, M. Meert, CAJ, Weg der Umkehr (Essen 1957).

[18] AAS 40 (1948), 393–402.

[19] Address of Pius XII to the Catholic Action of Italy on 4 September 1940, AAS 32 (1940), 362.

In his address to the First World Congress of the Catholic Lay Apostolate on 14 October 1951, the Pope stressed that dependence of the lay apostolate on the hierarchy admitted gradations; the narrowest was that for Catholic Action: "It is a tool in the hand of the hierarchy and should be, as it were, the extension of its arm. Hence, by its nature it is subordinate to the chief shepherds of the Church. Other organized or unorganized works of the lay apostolate can relinquish their free initiative to a greater degree, each as its aims require."[21] As the Pope emphasized at the Second Congress for the Lay Apostolate in 1957, Catholic Action can—understood as an organization—claim no monopoly for itself. It bears well the character of an official lay apostolate. The apostolate of prayer, of vocation, and of life witness can be termed lay apostolate in the broader sense. Further there is the "free apostolate" of individuals and groups that put themselves at the disposal of the hierarchy and let themselves be assigned tasks by it for a limited or indefinite time. There remained the danger that the lay apostolate would be restricted to the tasks which take place in the Church itself or which are worked out by the laity as the "elongated arm of the hierarchy" and came from the field of vision of the strictly lay functions of interpretation of the world, guidance of the world, and sanctification of the world. The conciliar decree "On the Apostolate of the Laity" seeks to meet this danger by stressing, among other things, that the laity "exercise their apostolate in the Church as in the world, in the spiritual as in the secular order" (ART. 5). According to the "pastoral constitution on the Church in the world of today" there must be made a "clear distinction between what Christians as individuals or as a group do in their own name as citizens who are directed by their Christian conscience and what they do in the name of the Church together with the shepherds."[22]

The Spiritual Exercises Movement

If in the mind of Pius XI the first goal of Catholic Action is to form the conscience of Christians in so powerfully Christian a way that at any time and in any situation of private and public life they are in a position to find the Christian solution of the many problems that arise,[23] then the

---

[20] AAS 35 (1943), 213.

[21] Ibid. 43 (1951), 789.

[22] ARTICLE 76; cf. Lumen gentium, ART. 36.

[23] So also the decree "On the Apostolate of the Laity" of the Second Vatican Council, ART. 20.

Ignatian Spiritual Exercises were a valuable help in this. It was their aim to lead to the personal sanctification required as the basis of apostolic spirit and life as a preliminary to the sanctification of others. The number of participants in the Exercises grew by leaps and bounds in the 1920s. If into the nineteenth century they were conducted almost exclusively by Jesuits, now other orders also took part, to a degree in a form corresponding to their special spirituality. Since the Exercises Convention at Innsbruck in 1922 and Pius XI's constitution Summorum Pontificum[24] of 25 July 1922 and his encyclical on the promoting of the Spiritual Exercises[25] of 20 December 1929, it is possible to speak of an Exercise Movement. Pius XI named as the worst sickness of the day the "continuous passionate devotion to the external world" and the "insatiable greed for wealth and pleasure," which no longer let people think of eternal truths and of God, the first cause and last end. The Exercises should provide place, time, and quiet for this. The sharing by groups of Catholic Action in the Exercises especially gladdened the Pope. "Many take part in them, the better to equip themselves and to keep themselves ready for the Lord's battles. Thus they find not only prop and support perfectly to develop in themselves the ideal of the Christian life; not rarely they also find in their heart a mysterious call from God, who invites them to the holy service and the fostering of the good of the neighbor's soul and this incites them to the exercise of a full apostolate."[26] In 1936 the Jesuits alone gave 16,043 courses with 680,788 taking part. Add to this in the missionary areas 631 courses with 24,225 participants.[27] In Germany 109,000 men, women, and youths made the Exercises in 1955.[28] After the Second World War they became part of the extraordinary care of souls, systematically promoted and attended by pastoral officials.

If the Exercises, in accord with their origin, aimed rather at conversion of life, the "great decision" of the adult, as H. Rahner expresses it, then the pastoral care of the young developed in religious days of recollection ("retreat days," "free times") forms of training in the spiritual life and of a deepening of faith suited to the mentality and situation of the young and students. According to Ludwig Esch, S. J. (1883–1956), who in the years 1919 to 1951 gave the Exercises for 54,884 pupils, students, and priests, these provided "a new setting on the right road, a growth in the setting of goals, a clarifying in regard to self and the entire world of the faith, but thereby also a profound joy."[29]

---

[24] AAS 14 (1922), 420–22.

[25] Mens nostra, AAS 21 (1929), 689–706.

[26] AAS 21 (1929), 689–706, 691, 701.

[27] H. Becher, Die Jesuiten. Gestalt und Geschichte des Ordens (Munich 1951), 400.

[28] HK 11 (1956–57), 73f.

Eucharistic Piety in Transition

The liturgical movement and the reflection on the Bible were at first matters for circles of youth and academicians. Parish congregations were first affected by them after 1930. The broad mass of the Catholic people was still supported by the great currents of the traditional piety of the nineteenth century, which lived and found expression in the worship of the Eucharist, devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus, and the veneration of Mary and the saints. But it is characteristic of the situation that the old was gradually permeated by the new and thereby experienced a deepening and return to essence and center. This becomes especially clear in the Eucharistic piety, which until the end of the nineteenth century was almost exclusively a worship of adoration, then as the Eucharistic movement led to frequent Communion, and only after uniting with the liturgical movement again understood the Eucharist as a sacrifice of thanksgiving, which the Lord celebrates with his Church and into which the Christian enters fully by sharing in the sacrificial meal.

Dogmatic theology used to treat the Sacrament of the Altar in three sections, which were isolated from one another: (1) the Real Presence of Christ in the Eucharist, which had as a consequence the merit of adoration; (2) the Eucharist as sacrament, that is, as Communion; (3) the Eucharist as sacrifice.[30] For devotion the deciding factor was the presence of Christ in the tabernacle or in the monstrance. The Mass was seen predominantly as the means for "confecting" the sacramental presence, and therefore attention was focused on the moment of transubstantiation. But even this happening was covered over, because the Mass was often celebrated, for the sake of special solemnity, before the Blessed Sacrament exposed on the altar, and from the start this presence had to be venerated by, among other things, kneeling, before the Lord offering himself became present under the appearances of bread and wine and the congregation could go through him and with him and in him before the Father.

Although Pius X had demanded in 1903 that the faithful should draw the Christian spirit "from the first and real source, namely, from active participation in the holy mysteries and the public and official prayer of the Church,"[31] whereby he gave the keyword for the later liturgical movement, he did not himself, in the decree Sacra Tridentina synodus on daily Communion of 1905[32] and in the First Communion decree Quam singulari of 1910, go into the connection of Mass and Communion and treated the value and the significance of frequent and early Communion by itself in isolation. The "Eucharistic movement" inaugurated by him thus became the "Communion movement"[33] in its own development, independent of the liturgical movement, in fact in some respects retarding it. It did not produce the breakthrough to a common view of Mass and Communion. The fostering of frequent, even daily Communion brought about that—in accord with the Pope's desire[34]—the worship of adoration no longer occupied the first place within Eucharistic piety and relaxed that only too close connection of confession and Communion. However, from now on Communion was seen in isolation: isolated from what happened at Mass, but also isolated in so far as the understanding of Communion saw only the union of the individual soul with Christ but not the community of those communicating; characteristically in the decree Sacra Tridentina synodus there was no reference to Communio as community in the body of Christ.

---

[29] L. Esch, Neue Lebensgetaltung in Christus, 7th ed. (Würzburg 1952), 296; E. Holzapfel, L. Esch, Ein Leben für die Jugend (Würzburg 1963).

[30] Thus still L. Ott, Grundriss der Dogmatik, 3d ed. (Freiburg 1957), XVf.

It was in keeping with this isolated understanding of Communion that the real happening at Mass was completely overlapped and concealed by the preparation for the reception of Communion and by the thanksgiving and that one prayed one's own Communion devotions. To obtain time for the thanksgiving, Communion was often distributed before Mass or after Mass in order not to detain long those not communicating. The Eucharist was especially at the service of the religious and moral character formation of the individual, it was regarded as "countermeans for the freeing from daily sins and preservation from mortal sins."[35]

Even after the First World War the situation seemed not essentially different, and as late as 1928 it could be said in a lecture at the Second Catechetical Congress at Munich: "Holy Communion . . . in spite of Pius X's decrees on Communion still has not always in the awareness of the people the significance proper to it in the liturgy."[36] Only the encounter and connection with the liturgical movement at the beginning of the 1930s assisted the Eucharistic movement to the correct theological self-understanding and to an effective breakthrough in the following period. With its efforts for as active a participation as possible by all in the celebration of Mass, the liturgical movement led to Communion as a sacrificial meal being organically added to conscious and active participation in the action of sacrifice and forming a whole with it. In the course of this development to an "organic" understanding of the Mass the preparation for Communion was increasingly seen in the celebrating of the Sacrifice of the Mass itself and no longer relegated to the Communion devotion that ignored what happened at Mass. Assiduous ascetical exertions, characterized by concern for the worthiest possible Communion, gradually gave way to a more uncomplicated and more joyful Communion and Mass piety, by which were increasingly created more favorable presuppositions for the early and frequent reception of Communion.

---

[31] Motu proprio Tra le sollecitudini of 22 November 1903, ASS 36 (1903–4), 331.

[32] ASS 38 (1905–6), 400–409; Quam singulari, AAS 2 (1910), 577–83.

[33] Cf. H. Fischer, Eucharistiekatechese und Liturgische Erneuerung (Düsseldorf 1959), 11–24.

[34] According to Sacra Tridentina synodus the meaning of Communion is not "chiefly . . . to render God honor and adoration," ASS 38 (1905–6), 401; Rohrbasser no. 193.

[35] Sacra Tridentina synodus, ASS, ibid.; Rohrbasser no. 193.

[36] Quoted from H. Fischer, Eucharistiekatechese, 45.

No longer the consummated sacrament, that is, the sacramental presence of the Lord under the species of bread and the adoration of his divinity, stood in the foreground, but the process, the celebration in which with thanksgiving the surrender of the Lord to the Father, his sacrifice, becomes present and he, as Mediator, leads us to the Father. The only too static notion of the Eucharist was overcome, and the Eucharist as an action was more strongly stressed, for example, the abolition of exposition during Mass, which was in any event contrary to the Church's decrees, and the custom, twice recommended by Pius XII in Mediator Dei (1947), of giving Holy Communion with Hosts consecrated during the same Mass.[37]

The new understanding of Communion and Mass only slowly acquired influence on the organization of Eucharistic congresses. Before and after, here the worship of adoration was in the foreground, joined to a powerful demonstration of faith, so that the procession, arranged with great display, appeared as the climax of each congress. The growing internationalizing of the congresses, at whose head stood a papal legate from 1906 on, gave these meetings the character of a "World Corpus Christi."

After the First World War the series of congresses began again at Rome in 1922. The world's disunion experienced in the war evoked for this and the succeeding congresses a new accentuation: the Host was honored as the symbol of the unity among peoples and asserted as the sole means of leading people together to lasting union. At Rome's desire there followed congresses at intervals of two years: in 1926 at Chicago, in 1928 at Sydney, in 1930 at Carthage, in 1932 at Dublin. Latin America was first added in 1933 at Buenos Aires. There followed those at Madrid in 1936 and Budapest in 1938. Once again war interrupted the series of congresses, which was not continued until 1952 at Barcelona. In the organization of this congress the growing together of the liturgical and the Eucharistic movements found clear expression: the closing procession no longer constituted the climax, beside which, more or less without visible connection, Masses and the distribution of Communion took place, but the common celebration of the Eucharist was moved directly into the center.

---

[37] AAS 39 (1947), 564f.; Rohrbasser nos. 305 and 307.

The complete elaboration of this new accentuation took place at the Munich Congress in 1960, for which Josef Andreas Jungmann had awakened to new life the idea of the statio. As early as 1930, on the occasion of the Eucharistic Congress at Carthage, Jungmann had called attention to the custom, frequently attested in the ancient Church but acquiring a special form in the Roman Church of the Middle Ages, whereby the bishop on specific Sundays and feasts of the year, but especially in Lent, celebrated a migratory Mass in the most important churches in order to make visible the notion of the unity of bishop, clergy, and people.

This Statio Urbis, as Jungmann said, could serve as model for a Statio Orbis, the experience of the community of the Church in the common Eucharistic celebration as the climax of the Eucharistic Congress. Jungmann's suggestion, hardly noticed in 1930, was adopted in the episcopal pastoral letter for the Munich Congress of 1960. Thus the community Eucharistic celebration, in which the Universal Church became experienced and visible as the Mystical Body of Christ, gave to this congress a special character and emphasized with incomparable clarity the preeminence of the sacrificial event in union with the sacrificial meal as contrasted with the adoring gaze. The notion of the Statio Orbis deprived this congress of the character of a triumphalist stressed self-celebration; the stress lay not on demonstration but on the daily accomplishment of the sacrifice.

The organization of the Munich World Congress in accord with the concept of the Statio Orbis allowed the spirit of the liturgical renewal to acquire a quite visible form and thereby facilitated the preparation of new liturgical arrangements by the Council.

Devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus

Devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus, which achieved a high rank in the nineteenth century because of papal encouragement, occupied also in the twentieth century a broad area in popular piety; very widespread was the observance of the first Friday of the month as Sacred Heart Friday, joined with Communion and prayer for an intention determined each month by the Pope. The effort for a solid theological foundation of this devotion by recourse especially to biblical statements, but also to patristic theology, marked both the work of theologians and expressions of the magisterium; this work was all the more urgent, as trashy, sentimental distortions were a great danger in this devotion that appealed to the affective-emotional classes.

In the encyclical Miserentissimus Redemptor of 1928 Pius XI gave the feast of the Sacred Heart the highest liturgical rank, with a new Mass formulary and office. In view of the needs of the day, the encyclical called for penance and expiation, which occupy "always the first and foremost position in the honoring of the most Sacred Heart of Jesus" (no. 135). Through the papal regulations the devotion to the Heart of Jesus and its incorporation into the liturgy achieved a first goal; the theological foundation also here reached an important stage as the attempt was made to join the Heart of Jesus mysticism with the theology of the Fathers and to consolidate the devotion to the Sacred Heart in the central mysteries of salvation.

The world crisis of the 1930s again afforded the Pope the occasion to recommend the devotion to the Sacred Heart as a means of salvation in the encyclical Caritate Christi compulsi of 3 May 1932. Considering the misery of the period, the godlessness, and the hatred of every religion, joined in socialism with the struggle for one's daily bread, the Pope commanded the holding of public Masses of atonement on the solemnity of the Sacred Heart.

Under Pius XII, who in his first encyclical had referred to the consecration of the human race to the Sacred Heart, exertions in regard to the devotion to the Heart of Jesus reached a climax, especially in regard to theology. True, at this time doubts and objections were also heard, for example, that the devotion to the Sacred Heart fostered a purely individualistic piety, which in view of the growing awareness of community in the sphere of the Church could not but evoke grave hesitations. To others some vivid presentations and devotional forms seemed rather repulsive; others again attributed to the devotion to the Sacred Heart a historical right, it is true, as a reaction to the sentiment-destroying and rigoristic Jansenism and as a Christianization of subjectivism in the nineteenth century, but they were inclined to deny the importance of this cult for the twentieth century and the tasks allotted to it. And some raised the reproach of particularism: one element, the heart, would be dissociated from the person of the Redeemer and hence a total view would be made more difficult.

An intensive theological work, especially in the 1950s, sought to take into account the doubts that were becoming loud and the difficulties by undertaking to clarify the heart in its total character, the physical as well as the spiritual included, from biblical expressions of the Old and New Testaments.

"Heart is," as Guardini writes, following Blaise Pascal, "the spirit in so far as it is in contact with blood . . . . Heart is the spirit made hot and sensitive by blood, but at the same time spirit elevated by the clarity of contemplation, by the distinctness of character, by the precision of judgment. Heart is the organ of love. . . . It is that which is experienced in the heart."[38] Thus the Heart of Jesus is the symbol of the love of the Redeemer, as love of the Father and of mankind. Devotion to the Heart of Jesus means to let oneself be embraced by this love of Jesus. It must be expressed in a serving apostolic life.

The fruit as well as the point of departure of such exertions for a theological justification of devotion to the Sacred Heart in accord with the time were the statements of Pius XII in his encyclical Haurietis aquas of 15 May 1956. This document took issue with the most varied misunderstandings and errors and sought—contrary to the minimizing of this cult as based on a private revelation—to make clear that the devotion to the Sacred Heart "can look back to an advanced age in the Church and has in the Gospels themselves a solid foundation, so that tradition and liturgy clearly favor it." The reason for this cult, which is distinguished as the "most effective school of the love of God," is twofold: the first consists in this, that Christ's heart, "the noblest part of human nature, is hypostatically united with the person of the divine Word; hence to it must be paid the same worship of adoration by which the Church honors the person of the incarnate Son of God . . . . The second reason results from this, that his heart, more than all other members of his body, is a natural indication or symbol of his unending love for the human race."[39]

The Pope's explanations, which apply in detail especially to biblical statements, end in the admonition that in the devotion to the Sacred Heart there is "no question about just any traditional form of piety, which may, according to the preference of each, be treated lightly or underestimated in relation to other forms, but of a practice of divine adoration, which, like no other, is able to lead to Christian perfection. . . . Everyone who then has a slight estimation of this great gift of Jesus Christ to the Church is pursuing a dangerous and unholy matter and is offending God himself."[40] [38] R. Guardini, Christliches Bewusstsein. Versuche über Pascal (Leipzig 1935), 177.

---

[39] AAS 48 (1956), 316.

[40] Ibid., 346.

Despite the encouragement of and propaganda for the devotion to the Sacred Heart by the official magisterium, it seems to be fading more and more from the awareness and life of piety of the members of the Church. This probably has less theological than spiritual-historical reasons. An age like ours, which sees so strongly in Jesus the "Man for us," would have to have in it understanding for love that is self-sacrificing and consumed for the neighbor; but to see and honor this represented in the bleeding Heart of Jesus—for this there is lacking today the sense of the symbol.

Devotion to Mary and Mariology

The growth of the Marian movement from the second third of the nineteenth century continued on into the twentieth. Pius XI and Pius XII continued the line of their predecessors in the promoting of devotion to Mary. Among believers it received impetus from appearances of Mary, especially from that at Fátima in Portugal, which was made to three Portuguese children in 1917. It and also the appearances in the Belgian localities of Beauraing in 1932–33 and Banneux in 1933 obtained ecclesiastical approbation.[41] They led to a brisk pilgrimage. At Fátima Mary demanded especially the praying of the rosary for the peace of the world, the consecration of Russia to her immaculate heart, and Communion of reparation on the first Saturday of each month. Pope Pius XII, whose episcopal ordination occurred at Rome on 13 May 1917, the day of the first appearance of Mary at Fátima, regarded himself throughout his life as bound to the aims of Fátima in a special way. On 8 December 1942 he performed the consecration of the entire human race to the Immaculate Heart of Mary.[42] On 7 July 1952 he finally addressed to all the people of Russia an encyclical in which they were dedicated to the Immaculate Heart of Mary. To spread the aims of Fátima there was established, at the urging of the Canadian Bishop Dignan, a "Rosary Crusade," which had a worldwide expansion. In 1947 there arose in Vienna, under Franciscan leadership, the Rosary Atonement Crusade.

---

[41] Cf. LThK, 2d ed., VII, 64: "Ecclesiastical approbation does not mean an infallible assurance of the supernatural origin of the appearances. It means: (1.) The alleged event contains nothing against faith and morals; (2.) it can be made public and become the object of cult; (3.) it offers, like other historical events, sufficient arguments that the fact of its supernatural cause can be reasonably accepted by human faith." The ecclesiastical officials are very cautious in regard to recognition. As opposed to the three appearances of Mary approved since 1930, thirty have been expressly repudiated.

[42] Cf. the consecrating prayer, "Regina del Santissimo Rosario," AAS 34 (1942), 345f.; Rohrbasser nos. 546–49.

Marian piety and the lay apostolate were now in close connection. Thus in the lay organization, the "Legion of Mary," which was founded by Frank Duff in Dublin in 1921 and spread rapidly on all the continents, especially in mission countries. With an aggressive tone like that of the Legion of Mary, there appeared also the Militia of the Immaculate Conception, founded in 1917 by Father Maximilian Kolbe (1894–1941), who later died in a concentration camp, and also the Blue Army of Mary, called into being in 1947 by Harold von Colgan. The last named sees its task principally as the spreading of the message of Fátima.

The lay apostolate of the Marian congregations, which are called "Marian" not only "because they take their title from the Mother of God, but especially because the individual members promise an especially interior veneration of the Mother of God and give themselves to her through a complete surrender of consecration,"[43] received encouragement and impetus from Pius XII's apostolic constitution Bis saeculari of 1948. In 1953 was founded the World Association of Marian Congregations, which since 1956 is a member of the Conference of International Catholic Organizations. From the spirit of the Marian congregations proceeded, at first depending on the Pallottines, the Schönstatt Movement, building on the educational work of Father Josef Kentenich (1885–1968); Marian sisters, Marian brothers, and Schönstatt priests are the agents of the work.

In encyclicals Pius XI and Pius XII several times expressed their views on problems of Mariology and devotion to Mary and gave new impulses or took up such. Thus in 1937 Pius XI in the encyclical Ingravescentibus malis[44] recommended the rosary, with clear allusion to Fascism and Communism, in view of the threatening world situation. A series of new Marian feasts was introduced: in 1931, on the occasion of the fifteenth centenary of the Council of Ephesus, of the feast of the Maternity of the Blessed Virgin Mary on 11 October, in 1944 the feast of the Immaculate Heart of the Blessed Virgin Mary on 22 August, and finally in 1954 the feast of Mary our Queen on 31 May. The climax of the papal initiatives came with the proclamation of the dogma of the bodily Assumption of Mary into heaven on 1 November 1950. The proclamation was preceded by a survey of the episcopate of the world. This confirmed that the bodily Assumption of Mary was a firm conviction of faith of the members of the Church and almost unanimously agreed to the opportuneness of the definition. According to the dogmatic bull Munificentissimus Deus, Mary, who was already a sharer in the full redemption, is a sign for mankind, threatened in a secularistic world of materialism; mankind should recognize in Mary that human fulfillment is to be found only in God: it is to be hoped, said the Pope, "that through the contemplation of the glorious example of Mary there may grow ever stronger the insight into what high value human life has, when it is used to carry out the will of the heavenly Father and to act for the welfare of the fellow man. And it can also be . . . expected that the truth of Mary's Assumption may show to all clearly to what noble end we are destined in body and soul. Finally, faith in the bodily Assumption of Mary into heaven will strengthen faith also in our resurrection and lead to energetic activity."[45] [43] Bis saeculari, no. 189, AAS 40 (1948), 401; Rohrbasser no. 1631.

---

[44] AAS 29 (1937), 373–80.

Marian literature, powerfully increased in the twentieth century, reached its climax in the 1950s in regard to mere number of publications: thus, between 1948 and 1957 about one thousand titles per year appeared. Not rarely these works contained exaggerations which went far beyond the measure found in the dogma and liturgy of the Church. All the more, theologians such as Otto Semmelroth, Hugo and Karl Rahner, Michael Schmaus, and others, sought to open up the biblical and patristic sources of Mariology and to consider the ecumenical problem. Inspired by the works of early Christian tradition, which had treated Mary not for her own sake but in the framework of the divine economy of salvation, theologians of the 1940s and 1950s dealt with Mary and her privileges no longer as isolated, but with a view to the entire doctrine of salvation: thus Mariology was seen in its relations to Christology, ecclesiology, and eschatology. Mary was no longer the object of a merely individual cult—just as also the individualistic understanding of the Church in these years yielded to a more community-related view—but she was seen in the framework of the theology of salvation, hence in connection with redemption, humanity, Church, and perfection: Mary, prototype or type of the Church.

Also concerned for a new basis for devotion to Mary were the Marian congresses, which took place on regional, national, and international levels. Further, there were formed societies for Marian studies, and in 1950 an international Marian Academy was founded. In Germany must be mentioned the Mariological Workers Community of German theologians; in France the Institut Catholique at Paris received a special Mariological chair; and at Rome the Mariological Academy was made a papal academy by a motu proprio of John XXIII of 8 December 1959.

---

[45] Munificentissimus Deus, no. 201, AAS 42 (1950), 553–771.

Institutes, academies, societies, and working communities published the results of their individual investigations and meetings in numerous periodicals and cooperative works. With the end of the pontificate of Pius XII, as whose Marian climaxes must be given the years 1950, 1954 (the Marian Year), and 1958 (centenary of Mary's appearance at Lourdes), there began a slackening of enthusiasm in devotion to Mary and Mariology, a tendency which even the suggestions of the Second Vatican Council could not stop and which lasts till today. The council composed no Marian schema of its own, but dealt with Mary within the schema on the Church. Here Mary appears expressly as "type of the Church with respect to faith, love, and perfect unity with Christ."[46] For the rest, the Second Vatican Council imposed on itself with regard to Mariology an intentional caution; it had "no intention of proposing a complete doctrine of Mary or to decide questions which were not yet fully clarified by the work of theologians."[47] The constitution presented Mary's position in Christ's salvific work but avoided the term "Coredemptrix," which since the beginning of the twentieth century quite often stood in the center of the discussion and had even been used by the Popes, but had given occasion to misunderstandings.

In regard to the fear that, because of the devotion to Mary and the emphasis on the cooperation of the Mother of God in the work of redemption, the image of Christ would be obscured, the council made it clear that "in the honoring of the Mother, the Son, on account of whom everything is . . . is correctly known, loved, and glorified, and his commandments are observed."[48] But in the veneration of Mary the correct measure must be maintained. Thus the council admonishes "to promote generously the veneration, especially the liturgical, of the Blessed Virgin" and thereby "also to hold carefully aloof from every false exaggeration as well as from too summary an attitude in contemplating the unique dignity of the Mother of God."[49]

The Spiritual Development of the Orders

The continuing growth since the second half of the nineteenth century of the number of members of the orders and congregations as well as of the number of their foundations was at first maintained in the twentieth century. More or less clear variations within the development can be explained by a parallel reflection on the history of the period and to a great extent referred to external factors.[50]

---

[46] Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, Lumen gentium, ART. 63.

[47] Ibid., ART. 54.

[48] Ibid., ART. 66.

[49] Ibid., ART. 67.

Whereas, following the recovery from the losses of the First World War, a "monastic spring" was clearly to be recorded in Germany, there appeared toward the end of the 1920s a noticeable slackening of the growth, which found expression in 1936 in the orders of sisters in a slight decline in the number of recruits; this was in part the effect of the low birthrate of the years between 1914 and 1920 but must also especially be regarded for the following period under the aspect of the propaganda of the National Socialist regime. Its measures hostile to the orders reached their climax in the decree by Rudolf Hess of 19 November 1940 whereby entrance into monasteries was stopped. After the end of the Second World War, it is true, the number of members of the orders was stabilized in a thereafter slight growth, but the number of novices reached only little more than half of the prewar recruits. Also to be coped with were the severe damages done to the religious life because of members killed in the war, a considerable migration movement, and the loss of houses and schools of the orders. If after the war the orders could again attend to their tasks in the schools, then this meant additional deficiencies in the charitable work, in which meanwhile the sisters had found a field of activity. In part, the losses were compensated by the religious expelled from Eastern countries.

If the development of the religious clergy is compared with that of the diocesan clergy, it must be stated, at least for Germany and its Western neighbor nations, that during the postwar years the religious clergy could record a relatively larger growth than the diocesan clergy; for example, whereas between 1948 and 1958 in France the number of diocesan priests decreased about sixty percent, the number of religious priests in the same period rose about 1,417, that is, 28.7 per cent.[51] The reasons for this were the readiness for radical response after the experiences of the war and the collapse and the demand for stability and security, which were promised by the vita communis of the religious community. In mission lands the stronger increase in native religious priests must also be attributed to the fact that missionary work was almost exclusively in the hands of the orders and the model of the diocesan priest was absent.

As regards the distribution of the recruits among the various orders, a "change of tendency" must be noted: While from the beginning of the century the recruits applied chiefly to the "active" communities and among these the more recent congregations and those more adapted to the needs of the time had on an average a larger growth than the ancient types of orders,[52] from the 1950s especially the number and spread of the contemplative communities increased. At the Mainz Katholikentag of 1948 Friedrich Wulf tried to explain the change that was becoming apparent thus: "In many newer communities it was the purpose, it was specific tasks, which created a community . . . . True, even in the establishing of the modern religious rules an effort was made to follow great models, for example, the Franciscan or Augustinian rule was made the basis, but people still were unable to grasp the living spirit of these models. And so they made almost all alike down to the most trivial details, but there was usually lacking the profound uniform basic structure, which gives to all expressions of piety a definite form and a definite character. This could not but have an especially clear impact in a period of crisis, as we experienced it, and especially in large communities the spiritual formation of the younger members of the order left much to be desired. . . ."[53]

---

[50] Cf. Becker, "Der Schwesternnachwuchs seit dem Ende des Ersten Weltkrieges bis zur Gegenwart, zusammengefasst wiedergegeben," HK 4(1949–50), 233f.

[51] Cf. J. Kerkhofs, "Aspects sociologiques du sacerdoce," NRTh 82(1960), 289–99, 291; see also Chapter 11.

Raymond Hostie[54] proceeded from similar observations when, alongside numerical growth as a mark of all religious communities in the twentieth century, he specified "stability of the organizational structure" and a certain "immobility."[55] The latter appeared in a certain rigidity in the interpretation of the rule and a concealing of the basic uniformity of communities by emphasizing originality in unessential externals and in an isolation of the monasteries from the general cultural development. It was no accident that, in the renewal movement within the Church of our century, monasteries such as Solesmes, Subiaco, Beuron, Maria Laach, and others took part: by recourse to monastic origins they gained a clear ideal and hence were in a position to supply new impulses. Against this background must be understood the efforts of the Popes to bring the orders back to the essential by reflection on the spirit of the respective founders and law which inspired them and thereby to free them for the tasks of the day.

After Pius XI (1922–39) had worked successfully for an adjustment between the liturgical reform movement of the Benedictines and the tradition of the exercises and of devotion to the Sacred Heart of the Jesuits, the exertions for a reform of the orders achieved its climax in many pronouncements of Pius XII (1939–58). The prelude to the accommodation of the orders to the time and its needs, as desired by the Pope, was given in an article, inspired by his ideas, by the Jesuit Riccardo Lombardi in Civiltà Cattolica.[56] Although religious were admonished in it not to be "adventurers" in order that "the conservative viewpoint may always retain its validity alongside the mood for innovation,"[57] still they should as "the highly motivated avant-garde in an anxious hour give to reform the example of the greatest preparedness in relation to the new positions demanded by the welfare of humanity."[58] "Avoid," Lombardi called upon the religious, "a stagnating rigidity which would remove you from the course of life; on the other hand, be unchanging, as a river is unchanging, which is fed from an everlasting source but constantly renews itself in the stream!"[59]

---

[52] Cf. HK 8 (1953–54), 311; statistics on the recruits for the orders (1940–52): growth of the orders on the average 19.13 percent, of the congregations on the average 33.54 percent.

[53] A. Scheuermann, "Um die Zeitnähe des Ordensstandes," GuL 24 (1951), 274–84, 280.

[54] R. Hostie, Vie et mort des ordres religieux (Paris 1972), cf. 253–73.

[55] Op. cit., 253.

This impulse found its continuation at the First International Congress of Religious at Rome in 1950, which was under the slogan determined by the Sacred Congregation for Religious: "The renewal of the states of perfection adapted to the present day and its circumstances." In his address[60] to some five hundred representatives of the orders and secular institutes the Pope called upon the religious: Motivated by the conviction that the Catholic faith is able to form every age, "pay attention to the opinion, judgment, and morals of your environment and accept what you find good and just in it as valuable indications; otherwise you cannot be advisers, help, support, and light to your fellow human beings. . . . There are areas, indeed very many, in which you may, in fact must, adapt yourselves to the style and needs of the time and the people. . . ."[61]

Especially for the contemplative orders of women the Pope derived from this the duty to "reasonable modernization,"[62] which should find its expression not least in a "moderate participation in the apostolate."[63] The apostolic constitution Sponsa Christi[64] of 21 November 1950, decisive in this context, accordingly supplemented, among other things, the strict prescriptions of inclosure for monasteries of nuns with the modified form of the so-called "little papal inclosure." In ARTICLE 8 of the constitution, with reference to the economic security of the orders, there was imposed on the nuns the obligation to a suitable work, which was consistent "not only with the law of nature but equally with a duty of penance and expiation."[65] In a glance at the lack of recruits the Pope in 1952 repeated his plea to the superiors of orders: "Pay attention, especially in this age of a vocation crisis, to this, that the behavior, manner of life, and asceticism in your religious families not become hindrances or reasons for refusal. . . . Adapt yourselves in all things which are not essential, so far as reason and regulated charity permit."[66] Pius XII's special concern was for the formation of the recruits. He demanded a uniform formation of the young religious by "proved and selected personalities."[67]

---

[56] Civiltà Cattolica, 19 March 1949, no. 6.

[57] Op. cit., 84.

[58] Op. cit., 82.

[59] Op. cit., 89.

[60] L'Osservatore Romano, no. 289, of 9–10 December 1950.

[61] AAS 43(1951), 34.

[62] Ibid., 10.

[63] Op. cit., 11.

[64] Op. cit., 5–24.

A further effort to lead the monasteries out of their isolation went in the direction of a greater cooperation, both through "coordinating of the diocesan clergy and the religious clergy"[68] and through stronger contact of the individual religious communities with the competent bishops as with Rome, and finally through cooperation or, respectively, even merger of monasteries. Results appeared in the form of unions, chiefly of monasteries of women, and in an improved organization and coordination of the efforts of the orders from Rome as the center. In spite of some very promising new starts, however, the reform efforts led on the whole—as also hints of the Pope in his talk at the Second International Congress of Religious at Rome in 1957 confirmed[69]—to further difficulties, among others in the interpretation of the vow of obedience, rather than to fruitful renewal. The chief problems seemed to be the form and exercise of authority, the common life with experiments of small communities, uncertainty in regard to function, the age structure, and so forth.

It was damaging for religious that they were scarcely supported by the believing awareness of the community, let alone that of the broader public. Their services were expected, there were protests when communities closed houses because of lack of recruits, but there was no effort to offer a solution in prayer, meditation, and concern to the problems of the life and recruitment of the orders.

In this situation there occurred new types of attempts at a uniting of the monastic ideal with the demands of the apostolate through an extensive breaking away from the framework of the old orders and congregations. As an example may be mentioned the Little Brothers of Jesus, which, as a continuation of the work of Charles de Foucauld (1858–1916), realized a new type of apostolate "in the midst of the world." With complete abandonment of inclosure, they live together in communities of about four members and separately pursue a secular calling. As their founder tried, by an exemplary life, to bring the Gospel to the tribes in the Sahara, so his brotherhoods pursued the same goal in the non-Christian and, for evangelization, very accessible "desert" of our modern secularized civilization. Out of the strength of the love and imitation of Christ, they seek through the simplicity of their life-style and hospitality to be open to the encounter with the Lord in people. And so the Eucharist and Holy Scripture constitute the support of their community. "Work for the sanctification of the world," Charles de Foucauld has the Lord say and thereby expresses the essential element of his vocation, "work for it as my Mother, wordless, silent, build your retreats in the midst of those who do not know me, carry me into their midst by erecting there an altar, a tabernacle, and bring there the Gospel, not by mouth but by example, not by preaching it but by living it."[70] By 1960 the number of brotherhoods grew to forty-five in twenty countries with a total of 216 brothers. Since 1939 there has been a female branch of the Little Sisters of Jesus with like aims.

---

[65] Op. cit., 13.

[66] J. Zürcher, Päpstliche Dokumente zur Ordensreform (Einsiedeln 1954), 122ff.

[67] Apostolic constitution Sedes Sapientiae of 31 May 1956, AAS 48 (1956), 354–65, 358.

[68] GuL 24(1951), 92; cf. no. 7.

[69] Cf. AAS 25(1958), 34ff.

The Secular Institutes

Whereas the new impulses for a reform and adaptation of the orders and congregations to the needs of the time proceeded essentially from the Holy See, there was active around the middle of the twentieth century in the "secular institutes" a form of striving for Christian perfection which had developed without the cooperation and to a degree under the skeptical observation and repudiating reactions of the official ecclesiastical offices. The members of these new communities, whose beginning extend back to the early nineteenth century, strove to realize the life of the evangelical counsels as individuals or in small groups in the midst of the world; without public vows and without being bound to a strictly organized community life, they felt themselves entirely bound to the apostolate in the milieu of the moment, especially of a secular calling.

---

[70] Quoted from H. Urs von Balthasar, "Kirchenerfahrung dieser Zeit," Sentire Ecclesiam, ed. by J. Daniélou and H. Vorgrimler (Freiburg 1961), 743–68, 754.

Soon these communities turned out to be as necessary as suited to the apostolic permeation of the secularized world. The number of Instituta saecularia grew. The initial opposition on the part of theologians and the Curia was to a great extent based on the traditional teaching of the inseparability of the state of perfection and solemn profession. But the then ensuing papal approval, at first only in individual cases, was all the more possible when Leo XIII in the constitution Conditae a Christo of 8 December 1900[71] had recognized the congregations that had already reached flowering as communities of religious and as a state of perfection.

Protracted preliminary work by ecclesiastical commissions and consultations by the Congregation of the Council in union with the Holy Office and the Congregation of Religious paved the way for the recognition of secular institutes as a "third state of perfection" by Pius XII's apostolic constitution Provida Mater Ecclesia of 2 February 1947.[72] The norms of this constitution applied to "communities, both of clerics and of lay persons, whose members observe the evangelical counsels in the world for reaching Christian perfection for the complete fulfillment of their apostolate."[73] The Church recognizes the dedication of life of the members of secular institutes and their vows or promises but does not grant either the public nature of these vows in the form of a solemn profession or make obligatory their "common life or living under the same roof";[74] "one or several common houses"[75] are, however, desired as centers of formation and meeting, as dwelling places of the leaders of the union, and for the reception of individual members for reasons of health or other considerations. The connection between the institute and its members is a "perpetual or temporary" one,[76] as well as a "mutual and perfect" one.[77] The right to found "secular institutes" pertains to the bishop, with the obligation of consulting the Congregation of Religious and reporting to it.

A year after Provida Mater Ecclesia, Pius XII on 13 February 1948 issued the motu proprio Primo feliciter anno,[78] in which the "secular institutes" were expressly praised and confirmed. In it the Pope thanked for the "help which brought to the Catholic apostolate in extremely great providential wisdom consolidation in our evil age that has fallen to pieces."[79] The stressing of the striving for perfection, which should "be adapted to life in the world in all things and brought into harmony with them,"[80] as well as the emphasis on the apostolic activity of the "secular institutes," which should be carried out "not only in the midst of the world, but, so to speak, out of the world,"[81] make clear the change which the notion of "secular institutes" has gone through since their origin: Whereas it originally was meant in the sense of a purely negative limitation in relation to the religious state, and in the preparations for Provida Mater Ecclesia there was still consideration of including the new societies in the concept of "religious state," now with the stressing of the "worldly" character of the secular institutes the qualitative distinction to the orders appeared in a manner which assisted the notion of "secular institutes" to an independent development and a positively filled autonomy. The new departure, which was rather hindered than encouraged by tendencies to "claustration," through the making aware of the general vocation released forces for sanctification which opposed the increasing clericalization of the orders and in general the tension between clergy and laity. Areas not yet reached or attainable—especially in the missions—could be opened up for apostolic penetration.

---

[71] ASS 23(1900–1901), 341–47.

[72] AAS 39(1947), 114–24.

[73] Ibid., 120.

[74] Op. cit., ART. II, par. 1, p. 120.

[75] Op. cit., ART. III, par. 4, p. 122.

[76] Op. cit., ART. III, pars. 3, 1, p. 121.

[77] Op. cit., ART. III, pars. 3, 2, p. 121.

[78] AAS 40(1948), 283–86.

The number of secular institutes grew by 1962 to fifteen communities of papal right, about sixty of diocesan right, and a still greater number of unions which were just seeking ecclesiastical approbation. In the great majority these were communities of women, and strikingly enough many of them in Latin countries.

Because of the considerable number of existing "secular institutes" and the great diversity of their tasks, here only a few of the most important can be mentioned as representative: As "the authentic model of the secular institute"[82] the Opus Dei is designated in the papal charter of approbation. It is one of the most widespread, numerically strongest, and, on account of the professional excellence of its members, most influential "secular institutes." The community was founded at Madrid for lay persons and priests by the young priest José María Escrivá de Balaguer (1902–75) under the name of Sociedad Sacerdotal de la Santa Cruz y Opus Dei and, as the first of the "secular institutes," obtained papal approval on 24 February 1947. At the beginning of the 1960s it already comprised around fifty thousand members from sixty-five nations and virtually all classes and professions, including some 2 percent priests.

---

[79] Ibid., 283.

[80] Op. cit., 284f.

[81] Op. cit., 285: "non tantum in saeculo, sed veluti ex saeculo."

[82] Quoted from O. B. Roegele, "'Opus Dei': Legende und Wirklichkeit einer umstrittenen Gemeinschaft," Opus Dei—Für und Wider (Osnabrück 1967), 148–80, 152.

An essential center of gravity of the activities of the institute lies in the field of the religioideological and scholarly formation and training of the academic recruits. This was seen in the founding in 1952 of its own university, recognized by the Holy See in 1960, in the Basque provincial capital, Pamplona, as a first step to other foundations of schools in many countries. But the stressing of the profession as the chief means of personal sanctification and of the apostolate became the occasion for the forming of centers of Opus Dei in the worker's quarters of large cities, whereby the chief stress lay on the erecting of places of formation and of pastoral care in the milieu of the workers' calling. Members of Opus Dei also put themselves at the disposal of the missions, and thereby they joined apostolic activity with professionally qualified work of development. In Peru Opus Dei undertook one of the most difficult missionary areas of Latin America. Finally, a series of literary and publicity activities in periodicals and publishing must be mentioned.

Likewise of papal right is the institute of the Prêtres du Prado, which is restricted to French members but is typical of many communities of a like orientation. It was founded in the nineteenth century as purely a community of priests by Father Chevrier (1826–79), who was closely linked to the Curé d' Ars, Saint Jean Baptiste Marie Vianney. In accord with the aim fixed at that time, the members aspire, even today, to make the Gospel credible to the poor through personal poverty. While the work threatened to fail in Chevrier's lifetime, the number of members increased in the present century from thirty-two in 1922 to 610 priests in 1960, as well as 202 sisters, whose sphere of activity extends far beyond France to Africa, Japan, Chile, and elsewhere. The members see the sphere of their apostolate especially in parochial care of souls, but also work as catechists and pastors among the workers and the working youth.

The most important German contribution to the development of the secular institutes is the multibranched Schönstatt Work with its international expansion. It was called into being in 1914 by Father Josef Kentenich (1885–1968). To this work belonged a group of Marian apostolate lay communities as well as several secular institutes, of which first the "Schönstatt Marian Sisters" obtained in 1948 the papal Prodecretum laudis, a step toward definitive recognition, which came on 8 December 1976. The long-range goal consists in the "Marian formation of the world to Christ." In conformity with the spirituality of "working-day sanctity," a "dynamic relation to the world" should make it possible for the institute, in the most suitable form of the moment, whether as individuals or in the group, to carry out the tasks in Church and world. The male branch includes, besides the institute of the "Schönstatt Fathers," who are chiefly professionally active for the Schönstatt Work, the "Schönstatt Priests" as a community of diocesan priests and the less strong "Schönstatt Marian Brothers." The members of the community of the "Ladies of Schönstatt" remained in their lay calling and frequently devoted themselves secondarily to various apostolic tasks in the Church's pastoral care and caritas. A two-year novitiate and two tertiarates should consolidate and deepen the religious life of the members by means of further religious formation and introduction to study. Due to the unobtrusiveness of their dress and life-style many of the women were able to continue their apostolic work to an astonishing degree even during the Nazi period. Around 1976 the "Schönstatt Marian Sisters," with more than twenty-eight hundred members from almost thirty nations, were the largest female secular community in Germany. Since 1933 they have expanded outside, among other places to South Africa, Brazil, Argentina, Uruguay, Chile, the United States, Australia, and Switzerland. During the period of the war and persecution the institute undertook tasks in some Slavic countries. The centers of gravity of its efforts lie in the fields of education and caritas. Community experiences in this branch of the Schönstatt Work a very intensive emphasis: One who desires to enter leaves his former group in life and places himself entirely at the disposal of the institute. The members are prepared for the tasks of their calling by an intensive schooling of eight and one-half years. After the completion of their training they are divided into intern members, who live with uniform dress in the home community, and extern members at individual posts in religious or secular dress, as well as the Sisters of Adoration.

Through its many-faceted apostolic commitment, the new form of life of the "secular institutes" had a favorable impact on the pastoral attitude of the old orders and on making aware the close connection of the contemplative ideal with the apostolate. Hans Urs von Balthasar also points to the importance of the "secular institutes" for the choice of a state of life by the unmarried woman.[83] If she sees herself not called to the religious state, then, since admittance to the priesthood is denied her, she can easily incur the tension of an unclear intermediate stage between the simple "unmarried life" and virginity undertaken from religious motives. Here membership in a "secular institute" can offer a function in life and support.

---

[83] Cf. H. Urs von Balthasar, Der Laie und der Ordensstand. (Freiburg 1949), 93–97.

While the "secular institutes" in their adaptation to the needs of the time also supplement the old orders and congregations in many ways with the élan of a new departure, for their part they are supported by the spirituality living in these orders, so that, in the continuity of the Christian striving for perfection, no break but an enrichment pointing to the future may occur.

Worker-Priests

The ecclesiastical authority also directed to secular institutes the groups of dedicated pastoral workers who, searching for new ways to regain for the faith the workers alienated from the Church, were willing to share their daily work, their manner of life, and their environment. A highly motivated experiment became in its beginnings the "scandal of the twentieth century and the drama of the worker-priests."[84] In 1943 Fathers Henri Godin (1906–44) and Yvan Daniel had issued a report on the Christian conquest of the proletarian classes under the title Is France a Mission Land?[85] The work, which courageously expressed what had long been known but not admitted, proceeded from the observation that, for the proletariat alienated from the Church, the traditional parish was entirely inaccessible, because it required of it the changing of its mentality and way of life, and conversely the parochial care of souls scarcely penetrated into the modern pagan world. Loyal to the model of Gregory the Great in regard to the Anglo-Saxons and to the efforts of the mission in remote lands for native priests and a preaching adapted to the manner of thinking and intelligence of the natives, one should bring to the workers' world a pure religion purged of human additions which enclose a civilization. Was not Saint Paul a pagan with the pagans and a Jew with the Jews? A year previously, on 5 October 1942, on the initiative of the Assembly of the Cardinals and Archbishops of France at Lisieux, the priestly seminary of the Mission de France had been opened. It was supposed to attract to the de-Christianized areas suffering from a lack of priests those who were capable of entering into the mentality of the outsiders. Cardinal Suhard (1874–1949) of Paris, who had approved Godin's report before its appearance, formed in 1944, under the name of Mission de Paris, a group of priests who, freed from ordinary parochial ministry, were to seek and go new ways of the apostolate. They proposed to "hold up the Catholic priesthood as a model in a missionary manner, beginning with the dependent, deprived, collective life of the poor of this day, through the same living conditions, . . .

---

[84] A. Collonge, Le scandale du XX^{e} siècle et le drâme des Prêtres-ouvriers (Paris 1957).

[85] La France, Pays de Mission? (Paris 1943).

through the clear intention of belonging to a given social class and of living on the level of the best of its members."

The designation "worker-priest," prêtre-ouvrier, for a priest who worked a full day at a job, was not distinguishable externally from a worker, and was not at first known as a priest in his closest environment, came into use through the Diary of a Worker-Priest by Henri Perrin, S. J.[86] The book told of the activity of French priests among their countrymen who were prisoners of war or those bound to work in Germany. The access into the life-style of the working world here offered by the situation was experienced as an effective apostolic possibility and after the war was continued by priests, including members of the Mission de Paris, Lyon, and other industrial towns. It was less concerned, after the example of Saint Paul (1 Cor. 9:15–18), to earn one's livelihood by one's own work; rather, according to Cardinal Suhard, the work of these priests was "the act of naturalization of the priests among people to whom he was hitherto only a foreigner; suffering and ready for penance, he shares in human existence."[87] In his 1947 pastoral letter "Growth or Decline of the Church,"[88] which obtained worldwide attention, the cardinal had demanded an apostolate of incarnation in the overcoming of Modernism and integralism. "Adaptation means not compromises, not systematic substitution of the old by the new, a fortiori not mutilation of the Gospel but only integral and intelligent incorporation of this Gospel into that which is to be converted. . . . To be an Apostle means to undertake in so far as it can be properly undertaken all of the human and of the world which man had fashioned for himself, to permeate all. All, which means, apart from sin, all values, even those hitherto foreign to the Christian, in so far as it is not simply a question of mankind's own mad ideas."[89]

The boundaries indicated by the cardinal between the required adaptation to the world and becoming uniform with the world (Rom. 12:2), the falling victim to the world, cannot easily be carried through in daily life and demands great religious strength and a considerable gift of discernment. This and a basic philosophical and theological formation for the confrontation with the ideology of Marxism have not rarely been lacking. Solidarity with the workers and this included sharing in struggles over wages and strikes in a front with the Communists brought the worker-priests into the twilight. And at the Curia there was concern for their spiritual life and the preeminence of the priesthood proper and pastoral care. On 23 September 1953 there was issued through Nuncio Marella to twenty-six bishops and religious superiors the request to break off the experiment.

---

[86] Journal d'un prêtre-ouvrier (Paris 1945).

[87] Cardinal Suhard, Le prêtre dans la Cité (Paris 1949).

[88] Essor ou déclin de l'Église (Paris 1947).

[89] Ibid., 63–67.

Meanwhile, public opinion had been attracted in a sensational way to the worker-priests through the press and Gilbert Cesbron's novel that appeared in 1952, The Saints Go to Hell, which obtained a circulation of more than two hundred thousand copies and many translations. Secrecy about the measures of the Curia, as was demanded, was impossible. Millions of Frenchmen had gained a great sympathy for the worker-priests and were indignant. In difficult discussions among Rome, the bishops, and the worker-priests possibilities were sought for continuing the apostolate under other conditions—only three hours work per day, life in a community of priests. Not all the approximately one hundred priests followed the directions of the bishops. Others, in an understanding with the bishops, quietly made new efforts. In March 1957 the Assembly of the Cardinals and Archbishops of France founded the Mission Ouvrière in an effort to make possible in modified form the presence of the priest in the workers' milieu. On the occasion of his first visit, in June 1959, to John XXIII, from whom as the former nuncio at Paris a special understanding was anticipated, Cardinal Feltin, archbishop of Paris, made a report on the matter. To his request that in special cases worker-priests might again be appointed as full-time workers, there was made known to him on 3 July the decision of the Holy Office that for the future every sort of factory work should be forbidden to priests. "The Holy See," said the decision of the Holy Office, "is of the opinion that for the apostolate in workers' environments it is not essential to send priests into the workers' milieu and that it is not possible to sacrifice to this end the traditional notion of the priesthood, even if the Church sees in this apostolate one of its dearest tasks. . . . It is true that the priest, like the Apostles, is a witness (cf. Acts 1:8) but a witness of the resurrection of Christ (cf. Acts 1:22), as of his divine and redeeming mission. He gives this witness especially by the word and not by manual labor among factory workers, as if he were one of them." Factory work makes it impossible to pursue the priestly duty of prayer. Even if some accomplish this, they should devote their time better to their priestly office than to manual work. "Did not the Apostles institute the diaconate precisely in order to free themselves from temporal affairs . . .? (Cf. Acts 6:2, 4)."[90] The bishops should reflect whether it is not the time to establish for the apostolate in workers' environments secular institutes whose members could be taken from priests and lay persons, of whom the latter could pursue the apostolate of work without temporal limits. The priests give their lay brothers a basic instruction and spiritual formation adapted to the workers' life, advise them in their problems, and support them in their difficulties. Father Loew, O.P., followed this route at Marseille with the secular institute "Saint Peter and Saint Paul," in which lay persons and priests devoted themselves together to the worker mission on the parish basis. The "Little Brothers of Jesus," a brotherhood in the spirit of Charles de Foucauld, also traveled a similar road.

---

[90] HK 14 (1959–60), 77.

The community called "of the Prado" after one of the former amusement sites purchased by the founder in a slum quarter of Lyon, worked with mission teams, three to five strong, of priests and lay brothers, who settled in the midst of workers' areas and earned their own livelihood. Auxiliary Bishop Alfred Arcel pursued a cobbler's trade in Lyon-Gerland as head of a team in homework until 1959. He had to give up this activity but remained superior of the "Prado" and, as auxiliary bishop, collaborator with Cardinal Gerlier.

The basic feature common to the religious movements here discussed, the spirituality from which they arose or by which they were stamped in their course, is difficult to pinpoint. The spirituality of these decades seems most clearly characterized by a Christocentrism that is oriented to the apostolate. The historical Jesus, "Christ our Brother," came alive again: Jesus assumed our concrete life and fulfilled it in his death and resurrection. In his passage, Pascha, through death to glory he expanded his existence—limited to him as an individual during his earthly life—to the "mystical Christ," who has us participate by baptism in his destiny and his divine life. This is accomplished in the Church, which is the body of Christ mysteriously united to it in a living unity. The new life of the child of God, Christ in us and we in Christ, is a task for the Christian. He should form his life and the world in Christ to the honor of God the Father. But Christocentrism means not a spiritualistic reversion to individualistic interiority or flight from the world, but, on the contrary, the stressing of the fully human and of the world, which is included in the spiritual life.

If in Jesus Christ divinity and humanity have become a personal unity, without admixture or separation, then the "yes" to Christ means also a "yes" to people and to his earthly creation. The human is not annihilated in him but confirmed and surrendered. "If the human and earthly, nature and culture, are to be accepted, then this happens on the highest and purest level in Christ's human nature." "The miracle, the shocking, does not lie in a man's becoming God but in the incarnation of God. This makes the Christian exult."[91]

Like theology, so also spirituality stands under the sign of a turning to the world: the taking seriously of one's own worth and one's own destiny in the light of the mystery of the incarnation of God. Creation and incarnation are seen in intimate connection. The Logos, in whom everything was created, became Man in order to lead everything back to God. The incarnation is not intended first with reference to redemption from sin; it is the goal and crown of creation and would have happened even without the fall into sin. "Through him and by him everything was created" (Col. 1:16). God's "yes" to the world in creation finds its confirmation and fulfillment in the incarnation. From here on one strives to refute by word and deed Nietzsche's charge and that of the Marxists, that Christ misued the world for a beyond, that Christianity is far from people and their problems.

This is promoted by works such as V. Poucel, Against the Opponents of the Body (1937); G. Thils, Theology of Earthly Realities (1947); M. D. Chenu, Theology of Work (1955); Y. Congar, The Layman: Outline of a Theology of the Laity (1953); G. Philips, The Layman in the Church: A Theology of the Lay State (1952); Alfons Auer, The Christian Open to the World: Principles and History of Lay Piety (1960). The salvation history line—creation, incarnation, Parousia—makes one think of Jean Daniélou's Secret of History (1953), and of Hans Urs von Balthasar's Theology of History (1950), but again makes one aware of the eschatological feature of Christianity in contrast to an often too optimistic incarnational theology.

In asceticism the active virtues were more strongly stressed. It was explained that the Christian can only assure his own salvation if he is concerned for the salvation of the others. The diversity of Christian manifestation in a rapidly changing political, economic, and social environment became clear and with it the necessity of again preparing for it. This required a greater measure of personal responsibility and gave to the spiritual and moral life an unequally greater dynamism. It penetrated more strongly into the awareness that not only the human acts directly related to God—prayer, meditation, and liturgy—are religious, but everything that is done for the honor of God, in accord with Paul's statement: "Whether you eat or drink or whatever else you do, do all for the glory of God" (1 Cor. 10:31). Thus it is significant that on the four-hundredth anniversary of the death of Saint Ignatius (d. 1556) "in actione contemplativus" or the "to find God in all things" was stressed as the message of the saint for our day.[92] It corresponds to this, that "working-day sanctity" became the characteristic slogan for the spirituality of religious movements, and the "little way" of Thérèse of Lisieux obtained new luster.[93] In contrast to the disillusioned and self-centered Christocentrism of the Devotio moderna, for the "little" Thérèse it meant to love Jesus above all, to save souls for him, in order that he might be loved more.

---

[91] K. Adam, Christus unser Bruder (Regensburg 1926, 3d ed. 1935).

---

[92] E. Coreth, "In actione contemplativus," ZKTh 76 (1954), 55–82; E. Iserloh, "'Gott finden in allen Dingen,' Die Botschaft des heiligen Ignatius von Loyola an unsere Zeit," TThZ 66 (1957), 65–79, reprinted in E. Iserloh, Verwirklichung des Christlichen im Wandel der Geschichte (Würzburg 1975), 99–113; J. Stierli, "Das Ignatianische Gebet: 'Gott suchen in allen Dingen,'" Ignatius von Loyola, ed. by F. Wulf (Würzburg 1956), 151–82.

[93] I. F. Görres, Das verborgene Antlitz. Eine Studie über Therese von Lisieux (Freiburg 1944); new edition: Das Senfkorn von Lisieux, 9th ed. (Freiburg 1964); H. Urs von Balthasar, Therese von Lisieux. Geschichte einer Sendung (Cologne 1950); Therese vom Kinde Jesu. Selbstbiographische Schriften. Authentischer Text (Einsiedeln 1958); A. Combes, Die Heilandsliebe der heiligen Teresia von Lisieux (Freiburg 1951).

CHAPTER 10

*Developments in the Clergy since 1914

The Swiss theologian Hans Urs von Balthasar, on the occasion of the Third Synod of Bishops at Rome in 1971, expressed the conviction that the clergy is today "the clear trouble spot of the Church."[1] In this connection he had in mind the role of priests within the postconciliar development, especially within the reform of the liturgy just as much as the alarming tendencies in the clergy itself and its relations to the episcopate.

The most recent "priestly crisis" cannot be understood and properly explained against the background of the immediately preceding decades. Its roots go deeper. At the beginning of our century individual priests and groups of priests had taken an interest in bridging the chasm between Church and theology on the one side and the modern world and its temper on the other side, and hence had demanded reforms within the Church.[2] Even then there was question of the language of the liturgy, of church discipline, of the Church's stance in the social question, as well as of problems of the clerical state, for example, the obligation to celibacy, the relations between priests and bishops, and the form of clerical education. As widespread as the aims of such priestly groups were their motivation and character. They extended from Romolo Murri's Democrazia Cristiana in Italy and Marc Sangier's Sillon in France to the Swabian cranks who wanted to found a union of priests for protection of the interests of the clerical state against Bishop Keppler of Rottenburg.[3] In 1901 there took place in Vienna a quite well attended Austrian clergy meeting, which aimed to improve the feeling of solidarity among the priests as well as their social position and material situation. However, the Austrian episcopate forbade the repetition of this meeting.[4]

---

* Norbert Trippen

[1] J. Hoffner, H. Urs von Balthasar, eds., Bischofssynode 1971. Das Priesteramt (Einsiedeln 1972), 6.

[2] From the abundance of contemporary reform writings let the following be named as quality examples: H. Schell, Der Katholizismus als Prinzip des Fortschritts (Würzburg 1898: on the Index!); A. Ehrhard, Der Katholizismus und das zwanzigste Jahrhundert (Stuttgart and Vienna 1901). Less balanced reform efforts are described by A. Hagen,

All these initiatives in the clergy, effected independently of the episcopate and directed to inner church reform goals, fell under Pius X's suspicion of Modernism and were suppressed in this Pope's struggle against the heresy assumed by him to be everywhere. The encyclical on Modernism, Pascendi, of 8 September 1907, again forbade priests to take the editorship of newspapers and periodicals without the previous permission of the bishops, who were moreover obliged to supervise the activity of priests as reporters or collaborators on such publications. The bishops should permit congresses of priests only in very rare cases.[5] At the same time the Scholastic orientation of theological studies and strict rules for the education of priests in seminaries were decreed, so that the suppression of these reform groups in the clergy succeeded, especially since the First World War and the subsequent upheavals left no room for a further confrontation with Modernism that was not desired by Benedict XV.

Between the two world wars there appeared or developed a few associations of priests, which pursued, however, purely religious and ascetical or legal and economic aims.[6] There were no tensions worthy of

---

Der Reformkatholizismus in der Diözese Rottenburg (1902–1920) (Stuttgart 1962); cf. also N. Trippen, Theologie und Lehramt im Konflikt. Die kirchlichen Massnahmen gegen den Modernismus im Jahre 1907 und ihre Auswirkungen in Deutschland (Freiburg, Basel, and Vienna 1977), passim.

[3] Hagen, op. cit., 51–61.

[4] F. Funder, Vom Gestern ins Heute. Aus dem Kaiserreich in die Republik (Vienna 1952), 342ff. A similar congress had already taken place at Bourges in 1900 (Hagen, op. cit., 51).

[5] In question are paragraphs 34 and 35 of the encyclical Pascendi: A. Michelitsch, Der biblisch-dogmatische "Syllabus" Pius' X. samt der Enzyklika gegen den Modernismus und dem Motu proprio vom 18. November 1907, 2d ed. (Graz and Vienna 1908), 346ff; cf. Trippen, op. cit., 29.

[6] Konrad Algermissen provides a survey of these class unions in LThK 8 (1936), 471ff.

mention between episcopate and clergy. The system of the strictly secluded seminary training functioned, even if it was already regarded as antiquated and occasionally smiled at by more far-sighted academic teachers and numerous students. However, there was no thought of a fundamental reform but of assisting in a mild practical application of the existing order. Exegetes, dogmaticians, and church historians, especially in the state academic chairs in Germany, were able to distinguish between research hypotheses and results and what might have been publicly represented and published.

A limited field of activity for autonomous reform tendencies of the younger clergy that were not always familiar to and approved by the episcopate was supplied especially in Germany by the youth movement and, in connection with it, the liturgical movement in the 1920s and 1930s.[7] On the travels of youth, priestly dress must first be laid aside. Corresponding decrees in diocesan synods, as, for example, in the Cologne diocesan synods of 1922 and 1937,[8] then spoke clearly. The introduction of the "community Mass" with the recitation of the vernacular translation parallel to the Latin Mass texts occurred not without tensions between liturgically active circles of youthful priests and the older pastors or the episcopate. Also the beginnings of the ecumenical movement, pursued by individual priests and lay groups, were in no way under the encouraging benevolence of all bishops. Nevertheless there prevailed among the diocesan clergy a relationship of serene loyalty between priests and bishops. There was in the clergy no basic criticism of the Church, its doctrine, and its discipline. The Hymns to the Church of Gertrud von Le Fort reflect a widespread outlook even in the clergy of those decades.

The worker-priests in France[9] can be regarded as a first movement in the clergy in which postconciliar points of discussion on the priestly state and priestly life seemed to be anticipated. It is characteristic of its starting situation in the early 1940s that this movement was begun by the French episcopate: When during the war several thousand French seminarians and members of Catholic Action were forced to work in German factories, the bishops of France founded a secret pastoral work to take care of them. Twenty-five priests put themselves at their disposal. The experience of this enterprise with an entirely different priestly activity and life-style constituted the basis for the Mission de Paris after 1946. Renouncing the middle-class manner of life, priests sought to live as workers among the workers. However, it soon appeared that, because of the solidarity with the working class and its social and political goals, conflicts with the ecclesiastical authorities could not be avoided. The relations of the worker-priests to the parish priests were increasingly strained, because the latter lived in a bourgeois mentality and had no understanding of the demands of the workers and their priests. The bishops of France were partly concerned for the social position of the worker-priests, the Roman Curia rather for their spiritual life. In 1953–54 the experiment was interrupted at Rome's direction. The majority of worker-priests finally submitted to the pertinent decrees and returned to their diocese or order. The attempt and its failure occupied French and European public opinion until the eve of the council.

---

[7] On the Youth Movement see the general bibliography for this chapter.

[8] Die Diözesan-Synode des Erzbistums Köln 1922 am 10.11 und 12. Oktober (Cologne 1922), 31: "It is especially prescribed that clerical garb is obligatory even for travel and especially for travel. If a cleric is forced to make journeys on which he probably cannot wear clerical dress, he should previously inform the vicar general." Corresponding decree of the synod of 1937, ibid. (1937), nos. 28, 51.

[9] See the general bibliography for the chapter.

The Second Vatican Council expressed itself in two decrees on the formation and on the ministry and life of priests, but the question of priests did not supply any of the council's central subjects. For the succeeding unrest among priests quite other statements of the council were of indirect but all the more persistent effectiveness, above all the dogmatic constitution Lumen gentium, with its new self-understanding of the Church as the pilgrim "People of God," but also the higher valuation of the general priesthood of the faithful and the opening to the world in the pastoral constitution Gaudium et spes. The reconsideration and the change which the council produced, most clearly visible in the liturgy, led to an interior insecurity in many priests, to public discussions on the priestly office and the priestly form of life, to the rapid increase of resignations of their office by priests, finally to the forming of groups of priests with partly sociopolitical, partly anti-hierarchical, partly class-solidarity goals. Within a short time there was a strong mobilization of public interest for the question of priests within and outside the Church, which of course again quickly evaporated.

In the effort to trace this development that erupted and peaked between 1968 and 1971, one must not lose sight of the fact that countries and continents were affected differently by it. Neither in Poland and other Eastern bloc states nor in Vietnam or the missionary Churches of Africa was there a disturbance comparable to that in Western Europe and North and South America. The inner uncertainty and external solidarity of many priests developed in part out of the theological and reform impulses of the Second Vatican Council, but in part also out of the ideological pluralism and the lack of spiritual orientation of the Western democracies. Hardly accidental must have been the temporary connection of this group of priests with the unrest at the Western universities and in the younger generation in general. Had not the council, more unambiguously than earlier ecclesiastical pronouncements, referred pastoral care to the service of the world and the recognition of its proper values? Thus the repercussions of developments outside the Church on the clergy of the Western world could not be absent.

With the end of the council there began in Europe and America a theological discussion on the raison d'être of a priesthood based on a sacramental ordination and undertaken for life. Do the beginnings in the New Testament offer a dogmatically satisfactory justification? it was asked. The lack of priests, the permanent diaconate restored by the council, and the higher valuation of the general priesthood of the faithful as well as their being entrusted with pastoral services hitherto reserved to priests made unavoidable the question in what did the differentia specifica of the ordained priest consist in contrast to other believers active in the pastoral ministry.[10] If the priesthood as a special state, in contrast to the rest of the faithful, came under discussion in relation to theology and the inner structure of the Church, the decline of authority during those years in the Western democracies went out of the way to make acute the question of the self-understanding and role of the priest in Church and society. Just as in the secular sphere only authority based on objective competence and transmitted for a limited time would be tolerated, so too priests and their "solidarity groups" that were being established demanded that the official priestly ministry be justified, no longer sacramentally (vertically) but functionally, that is, by service to the congregation (horizontally); it had to be bestowed for a time and, depending on the circumstances, could be exercised in a secondary occupation. The priest had to become involved in the world and its problems and legitimize himself to his fellow citizens by a civil profession.

Younger priests especially were affected by these considerations. At first, these considerations led to their demanding the abandonment of priestly dress and class privileges. Here there was probably more at stake than an external approximation of life-styles and customs to the environment. For many there lay here the profession that sacramental ordination did not essentially distinguish the priest from the other members of the People of God.

Parallel to the discussion over the office and function of the priest and in inner dependence on it was a confrontation over the obligation of priests to celibacy. At the council there had been widely opposed standpoints and motions on the extension of this obligation and its theological justification within the Decree on the Ministry and Life of Priests.[11] Pope Paul VI had finally rendered the discussion harmless when on 10 October 1965 he sent a letter to the president of the Conciliar Praesidium, Cardinal Tisserant, in which he requested that the question of celibacy not be discussed in full council and announced a statement to the clergy on priestly celibacy. This letter to Cardinal Tisserant was read in the aula on the next day and determined the further decisions of the council fathers. In number 16 of the Decree on the Ministry and Life of Priests it was recognized that celibacy is "not demanded by the very essence of the priesthood, as the practice of the Ancient Church and the tradition of the Eastern Churches show. . . . But celibacy is in many respects proper to the priesthood." As justification were cited the identification of the priest with Christ and the greater availability for the priestly ministry. "This holy Synod approves and reconfirms the law for those who are chosen for the priesthood, in regard to which the Spirit gives it the confidence that the Father will generously give the calling to the celibate life . . . if only those who participate in the priesthood of Christ through the Sacrament of Orders humbly and insistently pray for it, together with the whole Church."

---

[10] For the "uncertainty of role" of many priests, cf. the contributions of Glatzel in the Jahrbuch für christliche Sozialwissenschaften and in the Stimmen der Zeit (cf. the bibliography for the chapter). For the discussion on the office: Küng, Wozu Priester? Reform und Anerkennung kirchlicher Ämter; Schuh, Amt im Widerstreit.

Precisely this last expectation seemed in the succeeding years not to be realized. If it is hardly possible to obtain exact figures on the number of those who abandoned the official priesthood, still the research of the Swiss Pastoral Sociological Institute must have come close to reality when it reckoned between 1963 and 1970 from twenty-two to twenty-five thousand resignations in the diocesan clergy, corresponding to 5 percent of the clergy.[12] Especially alarming is the preponderance of younger priests among those leaving. This trend converged with the shockingly declining number of candidates for the priesthood and especially of priestly ordinations.[13] These last dropped, for example, in the German Federal Republic from 506 in 1965 to 213 in 1972; it is precisely here that the contrast to Poland and some mission countries is crystal clear: there is no lack of recruits there at this time.

This distressing development may have induced Paul VI very soon to redeem the promise to the council fathers of a statement on priestly celibacy. The encyclical Sacerdotalis caelibatus of 24 June 1967 did not, however, contribute to relaxing the tensions over the celibacy discussion but rather made them more acute. As was stressed in the later survey of priests, a great number of priests, especially those positively decided in the celibacy question, had not even read the encyclical,[14] whereas the troubled younger clerics regarded its content as disillusioning. The Pope adopted the essential statements of the conciliar decree on the celibacy of priests, but continued in the justification of celibacy, in the retaining of the union of the priestly vocation and the obligation of celibacy as well as in the estimation of those who abandoned the priesthood as "pitiable deserters" in the traditional ideas and arguments.

---

[11] Cf. also F. Wulf, S.J., "Kommentar zu Art. 16 des Dekrets 'Presbyterorum Ordinis,'" Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil 3, 214–21, especially 217.

[12] Reproduced in Siefer, Sterben die Priester aus? 76f.

[13] Ibid., 77–89.

The temporarily violent discussion of celibacy took place in the mass media, in journalism, and a rapidly growing literature of brochures, but also in lectures and organized discussions.[15] In this connection it became clear that the obligation of celibacy of priests was no longer understood, not only by a large portion of the younger clergy, but also in broad levels of the Catholic people and was no longer approved without more ado.

The dissatisfaction with the celibacy encyclical must have been one of the determining events for the founding, still in preparation, of the solidarity groups of priests in various European countries. Thus the meetings and publication organs of these groups were then also the forum in which the demands and expectations in regard to the celibacy question were articulated not as representing the entire clergy—the groups included only a very small percentage of priests—but still for an active stratum of younger priests in the Western hemisphere. It was again and again stressed that it was not a question of suppressing celibacy as a freely accepted charism but of ending the legal obligation of celibacy for all priests of the Latin Church. Even more strongly was it demanded that tried men in the married state, viri probati, be admitted to priestly ordination—a demand that had already been rejected by the council!—and married priests allowed to exercise their office further.

In close connection with the obligation of celibacy there was discussed in groups of priests the question whether the "official priesthood" and the "clerical state" were even replaceable, to what extent priests were included with the powers supporting society and had lost touch with the day-to-day world.[16] There was heard the demand for a professional activity of priests, for closer solidarity with the working class and the peripheral social groups. Finally, the meeting of priests at Chur in 1969 demanded also a political commitment of priests against capitalistic and totalitarian systems in favor of a more just and humane society. If such demands were powerfully inspired by the political situation of some European states and especially of Latin America, the demand for inner democratization of the Church, for collaboration of priests and lay persons in the making of ecclesiastical decisions, was based on conciliar statements, which seemed to point in this direction, but which were often enough excessively interpreted. People pressed for transparency in the decision-making process and exercise of authority in the Church, especially for the sharing by clergy and people in the selection of bishops and the filling of other ecclesiastical positions of leadership.

---

